50475

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART
INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

VOLUME CXXXIX

JULY 4, 1934, to DECEMBER 26, 1934

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

83

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXIX

JULY 4, 1934, to DECEMBER 26, 1934

(Nos. 3600-3625)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
Dt	Driftway
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	July 4	365-392	October 3
29- 56	July 11	393-418	October 10
57- 84	July 18	419-462	October 17
85-112	July 25	463-490	October 24
113-140	August 1	491-518	October 31
141-168	August 8	519-546	November 7
169-196	August 15	547-574	November 14
197-224	August 22	575-602	November 21
225-252	August 29	603-630	November 28
253-280	September 5	631-658	December 5
281-308	September 12	659-694	December 12
309-336	September 19	695-722	December 19
337-364	September 26	723-750	December 26

A

- AAA. See Agriculture
- Abbey theater players. J. W. Krutch; D.... 629
- Abbott, Grace; resigns as head of children's bureau; EP 3
- Abel, Lionel
  - Malraux and the individual; S.... 443
- Abundance of scarcity; E.... 173
- Abyssinian-Italian dispute; EP.... 724
- Academic freedom
  - California, liberalism in. G. P. Adams; C 439
  - California, university of; action against radicalism; EP 198
  - College of the city of New York students expelled for protest against fascism; EP 604
  - Conflict between reaction and radicalism, at College of the city of New York and the University of California at Los Angeles; EP 548
  - Encroachments renewed; EP 282
  - Fascism at Columbia university; E..550; see also E......523; 550; C.... 590
  - Hanfstängl, E. F. S., demonstrators against, at Harvard, imprisoned. L. Kirstein; C 648
  - Pittsburgh, university of; dismissal of R. E. Turner; EP 57
- Adamic, Louis
  - Company unions and the A. F. of L.; S 67
  - Investigates reading of proletariat; E... 700
  - Jugoslavia, after assassination of King Alexander; S 470
  - Steel strike, collapse; S......9; see also EP 1
  - Strike, strange, in Jugoslavia; S.... 239
- Adams, George P.
  - Liberalism in California; C.... 439
- Adams, Mildred
  - Dog days in Washington; S 96
- Adams, William
  - Shipping conspiracy; S........262, 295; see also EP 254
- Advertising
  - Advertisers' opposition to legislation to aid consumers; E 5
  - Code under NRA proposed; EP.... 171
  - Legree's whip as used by J. W. Thompson Company; EP 199
- Aeronautics
  - Airplanes, war. Low; Ct.... 260
  - Military, competition in; E.... 174
- Age of distribution, the. S. Chase; S....93; see also C 270
- Agonie des aigles, l'. W. Troy; MP.... 721
- Agreements, collective. See Labor unions
- Agricultural adjustment administration. See Agriculture
- Agriculture
  - Drought and the Agricultural adjustment administration. B. H. Hibbard; S... 15
  - Drought, ravages of; E.... 145
  - Farmers' strike, Seabrook farms, Bridgeton, New Jersey; EP...59; EP...113; EP 633
  - Labor, farm, investigation to be made; EP 87
  - Labor, E. Harris; C....536; see also... 302
  - Labor under "new deal.' W. C. Montross; S 301
  - Loans. M. E. Livesey; S......408; see also C 537
  - Strikes:
    - Farmers' strike, Bridgeton, New Jersey; government as strike-breaker. C. E. Warne and L. Huberman; S 188
    - Bridgeton; hunger strike of W. H. O'Donnell; EP 633
    - Onion workers' strike.... 274
- Airplanes. See Aeronautics
- Alabama goes on strike. A. Kendrick; S... 233
- Albany, New York; hunger marchers beaten; EP 549
- Alcoholic liquors
  - Attack on state store systems by J. H. Choate, junior; EP 227
  - Legal, a year of. H. L. Mencken; S... 666
- Alexander, King, of Jugoslavia, assassination; EP......421; E 466
- Aliquippa, Pennsylvania, steel town. H. J. Ruttenberg; S 623
- Aluminum company of America; strike called; EP 199
  - Strike fails 386
- Amalgamated association of iron, steel, and tin workers. See Steel and iron
- American bankers association, Roosevelt's address to; E.... 523
- American circle, organization. M. Granite; C......646; see also C.... 711
- American civil liberties union, conference; EP 725
- American federation of labor
  - Challenge to; E 368
  - Company unions and the federation. L. Adamic; S 67
  - Convention; EP 422
  - Graft and industrial unions, at convention. T. Clement; S.... 481
  - Metal trades department, dispute over jurisdiction; EP 395
  - Vertical union wins; E.... 467
- American home economics association convention; EP 30
- American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
- American newspaper publishers' association. See Freedom of the press
- American liberty league; E 257
- American national red cross. See Red cross
- American-Russian relations. See Russian-American relations
- Anaconda copper company. See Copper
- Annuities. See Walker, W. D.
- Anything goes. J. W. Krutch; D.... 692
- Appalachian parkway, proposed. H. Broome; C 46
- Arizona, Japanese farmers persecuted; EP.. 423
- Armament limitation and disarmament
  - Betting on. Low; Ct 8
  - Japanese demand for equality in naval armament; EP 519
  - Japanese proposals; EP 282
  - Naval conference, London; deadlock; E. 579
  - Naval conference, London; R. G. Swing; S 558
  - Naval sea-saw. Low; Ct.... 702
  - Washington naval treaty, Japan's intention to denounce; EP.... 631
- Armaments
  - Aeronautics, military, competition in; E. 174
  - Never large enough to insure peace. O. G. Villard; S.... 610
  - See also Munitions of war
- Armenia; nationalism, and murder of Archbishop Tourian; EP 86
- Arms. See Munitions of war
- Aronovici, Carol
  - Housing, United States; S.... 37
- Ascoli, Max
  - Fascism at Columbia university; C.... 565
- Auden, W. H. James Burnham; S.... 164
- Austin, Mary; death; E.... 231
  - Tribute to. A. Martin; C.... 409
- Austria
  - Dollfuss assassination, and Nazi defeat in Austria; E 144
  - Dollfuss murder, and after. J. Gunther; S 204
- Authors, English. J. Burnham; S.... 164
- Automobiles
  - Automobile labor board's union plan; EP 696
  - Code 355
  - United automobile workers national council formed; EP 1
  - Wages and hours told at hearing; EP... 725
- Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

- Baker, Newton D.; shamelessness. O. G. Villard; S 7
- Baldwin, Roger
  - Appeal for California objectors to Reserve officers' training corps; C.... 132
- Balkans; fascism, swing to. J. Gunther; S.. 13
- Ballad hunting, sport of. C. Rourke; S.... 192
- Bankers, President Roosevelt's address to; E. 523
- Bankhead act. See Cotton
- Bargaining, collective. See Labor unions
- Barkelew, James T.
  - On proposed liberal party; C.... 739
- Barkley, Frederick R.
  - New deal balance sheet; S.... 155
- Barnes, Harry Elmer
  - On Krutch articles on Europe; C.... 437
- Baron, Rose
  - On Christmas in prison; C.... 649
- Barretts of Wimpole street, the. W. Troy; MP 419
- Barstow, Robbins Wolcott, and others
  - Appeal for victims of German persecution; C 537
- Barth, Karl, dismissed by Nazis; EP.... 660
- Barthou. Louis, assassination; EP.....421; E 466
- Bathing suits, men's; E 118
- Battle, the. W. Troy; MP.... 721
- Beals, Carleton
  - Mexico, church and state; S.... 733
- Becker, Ray, appeals again. C. Camp; C... 438
- Beens, Roland A.
  - Relief, unemployment; C 648
- Beet sugar. See Sugar
- Belief. I. A. Richards; S.... 71
- Belle of the nineties. W. Troy; MP.... 419
- Bellussi, Antonio, appeal for. G. E. Novack; C 384
- Bennett, Helen Christie
  - Salesmen, outside, plight of; S.... 385
- Berkelhammer, Irving
  - Sea tragedies; C 439
- Berry picking. J. Macnamara; S......302; see also C 536
- Between two worlds. J. W. Krutch; D.... 573
- Biddle, Francis B., new chairman of national labor relations board; EP........603; article by R. G. Swing; S.... 639
- Bingham, Alfred M.; arrest for picketing; EP 31
- Birth control
  - And class war. C. I. Claflin; C....271; see also E 33
  - And theology; E.... 146
  - Indorsed by Protestant episcopal church; EP 491
  - Roman catholic attitude; E........33; see also C 271
  - "Safe" period. D. D. Bromley; S..346; See also C.... 592
- Bisson, T. A.
  - Japanese trade "menace"; S.... 527
- Blue eagle. See National industrial recovery act
- Boards, labor, multiplication of; E.... 61
- Bolivia. See Chaco war
- Books
  - Blurbs; Dt 298
  - Censorship. See Censorship, literary
  - Children's, in Russia. L. Nadejena; S.. 44
- Borah, Senator William E.; on the warpath. O. G. Villard; S.... 91
  - Position. R. G. Swing; S.... 639
- Boston protest against Hanfstängl. C. McBride; C 480
- Boyd, Ernest
  - Howe, E. E., sage of Potato hill farm; S 247
  - Reply by L. Lewisohn to article on Jews; C 130

- Brass and copper-goods industry; workers and the code; EP 2
- Bread; Dt 352, 407
- Brenner, Anita
  - Gellert, H., replies to her review of his book. Karl Marx's Capital in lithographs; C 48
  - Spain, revolution in—act three; S 476
  - Spanish literature and the republic; S 276
- Breshkovsky, Catherine; death; EP 339
- Bride of Torozko, the. J. W. Krutch; D 391
- Bridge, San Francisco, name Rolph suggested. W. Hogan; C 47
- Bridgeton, New Jersey, farmers' strike. See Agriculture—strikes
- British agent. W. Troy; MP 419
- British labor party. See Labor party, British 6
- British trade union congress; reverses attitude toward general strike in case of war; EP 310
  - Session. H. J. Laski; S 378
- Brittle heaven. J. W. Krutch; D 629
- Bromley, Dorothy Dunbar
  - Birth control, sanctified; S .... 346; see also C 592
- Broome, Harvey
  - Parkways, in wilderness; C 46
- Buck, A. E.
  - Taxation in the new social state. Public budgeting; S 472
- Budgeting. See Taxation
- Builders. See Construction
- Bulldog Drummond strikes back. W. Troy; MP 336
- Bums. See Unemployment
- Bureaucracy in Tennessee valley authority case. R. G. Swing; S 405
- Burke, Kenneth
  - Hindemith; M 487
- Burnham, James
  - Auden, W. H.; S 164
  - Comment on Krutch articles on Europe .. 373
- Bus riding; Dt 19
- Business
  - Big, on the warpath. Low; Ct 120
  - Big, seeks new friends. P. H. Noyes; S 104
  - Confidence, lack of. P. H. Noyes; S 241
  - Rise predicted by NRA statistician Henderson; refuted by reports; EP 143
- Business depression
  - Administration measures forecast; EP 548
  - Albany hunger marchers beaten; EP 549
  - American recovery program, instability of; EP 520
  - Employment not enough; E 494
  - Recovery, stability questioned. M. S. Stewart; S 291
  - Relief business booming. J. Rorty; S 206
  - Suicide and the depression. M. A. de-Ford; S 42
  - United States and world recovery. M. S. Stewart; S 316
  - World conditions; EP 227
- Business men, what they think. See What business men think
- Business tax. See Unemployment relief—New York City
- Butler, Nicholas Murray. See Columbia university
- Butler, Smedley D., and reported fascist plot; EP 631

C

- Cairns, Huntington, literary censor; E 496
- California
  - Anti-red hysteria; EP 171
  - Court action against maintenance of civil rights; EP 493
  - EPIC ("End poverty in California"). U. Sinclair; S 351
    - And the Ohio plan. R. G. Swing; S .... 379; see also C 479
    - Driver sought for speaking tour in support of plan. J. J. Klaber; C. 352
    - Future of; comment on election. U. Sinclair; S .... 616; see also C 741
    - Sinclair campaign; E 522
  - Filipino labor union, intimidation; EP .. 422
  - Liberalism in. G. P. Adams; C 439
  - Pensions, old-age; Townsend plan; EP .. 465
  - San Jose, anti-red hysteria. J. Terry; S 161
  - Sinclair, U., apology for statement about Negro preachers and election sermons; C .... 741; see also 616
  - Sinclair, U., candidacy for gubernatorial nomination. O. G. Villard; S 35
  - Sinclair defeat; EP 547
  - Sinclair, epic of; E 495
  - Sinclair, victory in Democratic primary; E 285
  - Strikes, casualty list. L. Levenson; S .... 243; see also C 410
  - Strikes; investigation by Industrial association of San Francisco 411
  - Utopia incorporated. M. A. de Ford; S .... 268; see also 273
- California, university of, radicalism, action against; EP 198
  - Reserve officers' training corps; appeal for objectors. R. Baldwin; C 132
- California, university of, at Los Angeles; conflict between reaction and radicalism; EP 549
- Calkins, Clinch
  - Poem. (To an infant born in times of great change); P 220
- Camp, Carol
  - On Centralia case; C 438
- Canada; political and economic situation; EP 198
  - Politics, revolt in. F. H. Underhill; S .. 671
- Canadian medical association, plain for socialized medicine; EP 633
- Capital and labor; mediation, ghost of. R. G. Swing; S 474
- Capitalism
  - And communism; comment on Berle review of Corey's "Decline of American capitalism." B. Ginzburg; C .... 536; see also 305
  - And war profiteering; EP 2
  - Capital on strike. R. G. Swing; S 289
  - Improvidence, hand of. W. L. Garrison, junior; S 562
  - Liberal futility and a new approach. W. S. Wasserman; S 498
    - See also Economics
- Captain hates the sea, the. W. Troy; MP .. 750
- Carlson, Avis D.
  - Wichita, Kansas, conflict in; S 534
- Carlson, Oliver
  - Southern workers; S 353
- Cather, V. W.
  - On communists; C 325
- Catholic church. See Birth control
- Censorship, literary; Ellis island for books; E 496
- Censorship, moving pictures
  - Boycott movement; E 34
  - Church and movies. G. E. Shipler; C .. 409
  - Frenzy of censors grows; EP 87
  - Movement. J. Rorty; S 124
- Central Europe. See Danube basin
- Centralia case again. C. Camp; C 438
- Chaco war
  - Embargo on arms importation not successful; EP 115
  - Paraguay defeats Bolivia at Fort Ballivian; EP 604
- Chapin, C. H. B.
  - On Nation and article on New Jersey gas and electric service; C 675
- Charles II. See Walker, W. D.
- Chase, Stuart
  - Age of distribution; S .. 93; see also C .. 270
- Chicago, teachers, payment. E. Smith; S 322
  - Unemployment; civil works education service in the flop-houses. D. Scheyer; S 216
- Chicken raising; Dt 298
- Child labor
  - Amendment, passage urged by President Roosevelt; EP 632
  - As "education"; EP 2
  - In agriculture; EP 465
- Children's books in Russia. L. Nadejena; S. 44
- Children's hour, the; J. W. Krutch; D 656
- China
  - Bandits, activity; EP 697
  - Communists' success; EP 724
  - Dropped from council of League of nations; EP 394
  - Fascism; "Blue shirts." H. R. Isaacs; S 433
  - Gold standard. adoption threatened by government; EP 491
  - Murder of missionaries wrongly laid to communists; EP 724
  - Revolution on the march; E .... 635; see also 638
  - Szechuan, red army triumph in. C. Corcoran; S .. 638; see also EP .. 394; E .. 635
  - United States, intervention by. H. F. Ward; C 712
    - See also Chinese-Japanese relations
- Chinese Eastern railway. See Japanese-Russian relations
- Chinese-Japanese relations
  - Japanese ambitions in China; EP 519
  - Railway question; EP 30
  - Status quo; Japanese interest in; E 201
- Choate, Joseph H., junior; attack on state liquor-store systems; EP 227
- Christian, Hans
  - Kohler wins; S 540
- Christmas fund for class-war prisoners. J. Wagner; C 713
- Christmas in prison. R. Baron; C 649
- Church, German. See Germany
- Churches and movies. G. E. Shipler; C 409
- Cigar workers; strike in Pennsylvania 163
- Civil liberties. See Liberties, civil
- Civil works education service. See Unemployment
- Claflin, C. I.
  - Birth control and class war; C .... 271; see also E 33
- Class-war prisoners' Christmas fund. J. Wagner; C 713
- Clement, Ernest W.
  - Western literary messenger; material sought; C 384
- Clement, Travers
  - American federation of labor and craft union; S 481
- Closed shop. See Labor unions
- Clothing, men's. See Garment industry
- Coal; price-fixing in St. Louis under NRA. C. D. MacDougall; S 183
- Coal miners, American
  - Bootleg mining 219
  - Peace, formula for 275
  - Union strife, Pennsylvania; EP 548
- Coal miners, Hungarian
  - Strike; self-burial by miners; EP 465
- Coal miners, Jugoslavian; strike, strange. L. Adamic; S 239
- Codes. See National industrial recovery act
- Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
  - Being; P 22
- Cohen, Joseph
  - Reserve officers' training corps, abolition advocated; C .... 103; see also EP 3
- Coleman, McAlister
  - Power, New Jersey, cost of; S .... 588; see also C 675
- Collective bargaining. See Labor unions
- College of the city of New York; conflict between reaction and radicalism; EP .. 548
  - Student expulsion after protest against greeting to fascist students; EP 604
- Colleges and universities. See Academic freedom; Education
- Colman, Louis
  - Ku klux klan; revival; C 20
- Colorado; relief, low amount; EP .... 87; see also C 104, 212
  - Roche, J., defeated for Democratic nomination for governor; EP 338
- Columbia university, President N. M. Butler, and fascism; E .... 523; article by "Special investigator," S .... 530; E .... 550; C .... 565; C .... 590; EP .. 604
  - Begins work; EP 169
- Committee on economic and social security, activity. R. G. Swing; S 318
- Commonwealth college offers scholarships for essays. C. Moskowitz; C 132
- Communism; and capitalism; comment on Berle review of Corey's "Decline of American capitalism." B. Ginzburg; C .... 536; see also 305
- Communists, American; approach to socialists; EP 660
  - Communism, "driving out"; Dt 298
  - Hunt, New Jersey 304
  - South Dakota's method of dealing with "reds"; EP 311
  - Work in strikes decried. V. W. Cather; C 324
- Company unions. See Labor unions
- Confidence, lack of. P. H. Noyes; S 241
- Congress against war and fascism. J. A. Wechsler; C 241
- Congress, United States; new, issues before. R. G. Swing; S 582
- Constitution, saving. R. A. Emberg; C 324
- Construction; difficulties on unemployment relief for workers. R. A. Beens; C 648
- Consumers. See Food and drug bill
- Control of output. See Production control
- Conversation piece. J. W. Krutch; D 573
- Copeland (Tugwell) bill. See Food and drug bill
- Copper; Montana strike. W. Kinney; S .. 98; see also EP 86
  - Strike against Anaconda settled 386
- Copper and brass-goods industry; workers and the code; EP 2
- Corcoran, Crispian
  - Red triumph in Szechuan; S .... 638; see also E 635
- Cornick, Philip H.
  - Finance, local; S 586
- Cothren, Marion D.
  - International council of women, meeting; S 184
- Cotton; continuance of Bankhead restriction act voted by growers; EP 724
  - Production and prices; EP 366
- Cotton-garment industry; strike threatens 355
  - Compromise foreseen; EP 393

- Cotton-textiles industry
  - India; obstacles to labor movement; EP. 283
  - Johnson, General, speech on strike; EP.. 337
  - Labor solidarity shown; EP............ 338
  - NIRA strike. M. Marshall; S......... 326
  - Strike. J. W.; S..................... 273
    - Authorized by New York convention of United Textile workers of America; EP 226
    - Begins; EP 281
    - Steps toward settlement; EP....... 309
    - "Settlement"; E 398
    - "Victory"; E...................... 367
    - Workers go back to work. M. W. Hillyer; S 414
- Coughlin, Father. R. G. Swing; S......... 731
- Crawford, Bruce
  - Liberal party, need for; C............. 711
- Crawford, George
  - Case; investigation by National association for the advancement of colored people. C. H. Houston and L. A. Ranson; S...17; see also C...75; C...157-159
- Crime and criminals; National crime conference; EP 724
- Criticism, dramatic. See Theater, the
- Crosby, A. L. See Newspapers
- Cuba; happenings; EP 3
- Cuban-American relations; reciprocity pact with United States. O. G. Villard; S 287
  - Inequalities under treaty; EP.......... 253
- Cummings, Attorney General Homer S., on saving the constitution. R. A. Emberg; C 324
- Currency; dollar, stabilization. M. S. Stewart; S 560
  - Policy, American, ill-conceived; EP..... 659
- Custer, General George A.; comment on life. O. G. Villard; S 701
- Cutting, Bronson, campaign; E 522

D

- Dairy business. See Milk
- Damon, Anna
  - International labor defense and Scottsboro case; C....674; see also EP.... 661
- Dance with your gods. J. W. Krutch; D... 486
- Danube basin
  - War germs. I. Crisis in succession states. O. Jaszi; S 556
  - II. Constitutional problems in the victor states. O. Jaszi; S 583
  - III. Nationality problem. O. Jaszi; S.. 669
  - IV. Can we avert war? O. Jaszi; S.. 736
- Dark victory. J. W. Krutch; D............ 629
- Dawson, Mitchell
  - Insull on trial; S...................... 611
- Dawson, Sidonia, discharge as New York City relief worker. B. L. Riback and W. Hodson; C.....508; see also EP..... 493
- Day, Joseph P., on housing program; EP.... 632
- De Ford, Miriam Allen
  - San Francisco strikes; S.....65; S..... 121
  - Suicide and the depression; S.......... 42
  - Utopia incorporated, in California; S......268; see also................ 273
- Dell, Robert
  - Hitler, future of; S.................... 320
- Depression. See Business depression
- Determan, Mrs. Anna Alson; work to make military training optional at university of Minnesota; EP....3; see also C... 103
- Deutsche Zeitung, New York. See New York Deutsche Zeitung
- Dickenson, Emily, play, Brittle heaven. J. W. Krutch; D 629
- Dictators, high politics among; Low; Ct..... 428
- Dillinger, John. Low; Ct.................. 176
- Disarmament. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Discovering America; Dt 507
- Distaff side, the. J. W. Krutch; D........ 418
- Distribution, age of. S. Chase; S.......... 93
- Divided by three. J. W. Krutch; D........ 460
- Doane, Robert R., on abundance and scarcity; E 173
- Dock strike. See San Francisco
- Dole. See Unemployment
- Dollar, value of. See Currency
- Dollfuss, Engelbert. See Austria
- Donovan, John. See National industrial recovery act
- Drama. See Krutch, J. W.; Theater, the
- Drinker respirator. See Inventions
- Drought; Dt 211
  - See also Agriculture
- Drug and food bill. See Food and drug bill
- Drugstores; clerks on strike................ 441
  - Pharmacy, defense of. H. J. Fuller; C.. 46
- Du Pont, Irenee. See Munitions of war
- Dynamite, found in oil strike............... 274

E

- Economic conditions, world; EP............ 227
- Economic planning, social, conference. M. L. Fledderus and M. van Kleeck; C..... 621
- Economics
  - Abundance of scarcity; E............. 173
  - Age of distribution, the. S. Chase; S......93; see also C............... 270
  - Improvidence, hand of. W. L. Garrison, junior; S 562
  - Liberal futility, and a new approach. W. S. Wasserman; S.............. 498
  - Recovery program, American, instability of; EP 520
  - See also Business depression
- Edelman, John Walter
  - Contradicting Mr. Solow; C......271; see also 160
- Editor and publisher on American newspaper guild; EP 396
- Education; college, menace of; E.......... 257
- Educational finance. See Schools
- Einstein, Albert
  - Comment on Krutch articles on Europe. 373
- Elections
  - Campaign, last look at. R. G. Swing; S 529
  - Campaigns of Sinclair, La Follette, Cutting and others; E.................. 522
  - Liberal vote, growth of; EP............ 605
  - Primary; E 340
  - Primary, results; EP................... 365
  - Republican party, death of; E.......... 578
  - Results; EP 547
  - Roosevelt, President, and results. O. G. Villard; S 581
- Elevator men's strike, New York City; M. M.; S.......................... 624
- Elliott, Grace
  - Appeal for North Carolina needy; C.... 713
- Emberg, R. A.
  - Saving the constitution; C............. 324
- Employers. See Labor
- Employment not enough; E................ 494
- "End poverty in California." See California
- England. See Great Britain
- English language; good usage. W. B. Thomas; C 103
- EPIC. See California
- Etiquette; Dt 74
- Europe
  - Blocs. Low; Ct........................ 202
  - Future. Low; Ct....................... 64
  - Security or war; E..................... 663
  - Was Europe a success? J. W. Krutch; S...... 177, 209, 237, 267; comments by A. Einstein, B. Russell, A. Huxley, H. L. Mencken, and J. Burnham, 373; letters on articles.................. 437
  - See also Balkans; Danube basin
- European war
  - Anniversary. O. G. Villard; S........ 203
  - Error that cost war. O. G. Villard; S.. 610
  - Germany in 1914. A. Feiler; S........ 152
  - London in 1914. L. Read; S.......... 150
  - Outbreak, August, 1914. L. S. Gannett; S 149
  - Outbreak, in England. Low; Ct........
  - Paris in August, 1914. J. Prevost; S.. 151
  - Sarajevo, twenty years later ; EP...... 29
  - United States in 1914. H. E. Stearns; S 154
- Exiles, political, tragedy of. E. Goldman; S. 401

F

- Farley, James A., and the jobs. O. G. Villard; S 497
  - Correspondence with R. Moses; EP..... 463
- Farm labor. See Agriculture
- Farmer takes a wife, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 573
- Farmers' strike. See Agriculture
- Farming. See Agriculture
- Fascism
  - Balkan states, J. Gunther; S........... 13
  - Columbia university. See Columbia university
  - Italian students greeted officially on return from United States; EP........ 604
  - New York high schools, fascism in. W. H. Wolff and others; C.......... 590
  - United States, reported plot; EP....... 631
- Federal finance. See United States
- Federal land bank, mortgage from, difficulties. M. E. Livesey; C...408; see also C.. 537
- Feiler, Arthur
  - Germany at outbreak of war, 1914; S.. 152
- Feinstein, Isidor
  - New York's relief crisis; S............ 213
- Fellowship of reconciliation; appeal for victims of German persecution; C....... 537
- Filene, Edward A.
  - See New deal through; S............. 707
- Filipino labor union. See California
- Films. See Moving pictures
- Finance, public
  - I. In the world crisis. P. Studenski; S......429; E 424
  - II. Public budgeting. A. E. Buck; S.. 472
  - III. Federal finance. W. Withers; S.. 505
  - IV. State finance. M. S. Kendrick; S. 532
  - V. Local finance. P. H. Cornick; S.. 586
  - VI. Educational finance. J. K. Norton; S 643
  - VII. Coordination of American finance. C. Heer; S.......................... 705
  - Control of. R. G. Swing; S........... 613
  - Educational. See Schools; Finance, public
  - Federal. See United States
    - See also Noyes, P. H.; Taxation
- First world war, the. W. Troy; MP....... 602
- Fischer, Louis
  - Lenin, Trotzky and world revolution; C. 186
  - Putilov's revisited; S.................. 348
  - Russia; playgrounds and factories; S... 703
  - Russia, trip around; S.. 500; correction, 565
  - Russia, young, at play; S............. 128
- Fledderus, M. L., and M. van Kleeck
  - Social economic planning; C........... 621
- Flop-house. See Unemployment
- Food; prices, soaring. Low; Ct............ 288
- Food and drug bill; consumers forgotten; E. 5
- Foreign trade. See Trade, foreign
- Fowler, Albert V.
  - Syracuse university, yellow journalism and radicals; C...................... 740
- Fox, George M.
  - Liberal party, need for; C............ 711
- Fraenkel, Osmund K.
  - Scottsboro case, conduct of; C......... 647 see also E, 607
- France
  - Governmental "reforms" proposed by Doumergue; EP...................... 492
  - Italy, relations with; E............... 312
  - Ministry, new, headed by Flandin; EP.. 575
  - Politics; socialists and communists unite; EP 115
- Franco-Russian relations; military alliance, suggestion of; EP................. 632
- Frank, Waldo
  - On Nation's review of his book, The death and birth of David Markand; C.................... 592; see also 542
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Freedom of the press; "defended" by American newspaper publishers' association; E 467
- Frey, George
  - Liberal party, need for; C............. 711
- Friends of the new Germany. See German-Americans
- Fuller, H. J.
  - Pharmacy, defense of; C.............. 46
- Furtwängler, Wilhelm, ousted by Nazis; EP. 697

G

- Gannett, Lewis S.
  - European war, outbreak; S........... 149
- Garment industry; code, protection for workers under 191
- Garrison, Lloyd K., resignation as head of National labor relations board; EP... 464
- Garrison, William Lloyd, junior
  - Hand of improvidence; S............. 562
- Gastwirth, Paul
  - Teachers, appeal for; C............... 185
- Gay divorcee, the. W. Troy; MP.......... 657
- Geiger, H. Van Vleck
  - Crawford case defense; C.. 157; see also 17
- Gellert, Hugo
  - On A. Brenner's review of his book, Karl Marx' Capital in lithographs; C 48
- General motors corporation, recognition of "collective bargaining" by corporation; EP 493
- General tire and rubber company; strike a defeat for labor.................... 191
- Georgia; Herndon case; state suppresses insurrection. W. Wilson; S.............. 127
- German Americans; Friends of the new Germany quiescent; EP................. 119
- Germans in America; Spivak, J. L., anti-Nazi activities; EP................. 492
- Germany
  - Barth, K., dismissed by Nazis; EP.... 660
  - Boycott of. O. G. Villard; S.......... 315
  - Character, German. O. G. Villard; S.. 63
  - Coup de force of June 30; E.......... 89
  - Economic policy as seen in ending of commercial treaty with United States; EP 463
  - Finances; effort to avert collapse; EP.. 115
  - Furtwängler, W., ousting by Nazis; EP 697
  - Hess, Rudolph; "appeal" to French; EP 58
  - Hitler, Adolf:
    - Assumes presidential powers; E.... 172
    - Coup. Low; Ct.................... 92
    - Coup against Storm troopers; E.... 61
    - Future of. R. Dell; S............ 320
    - Hitler's "Me und Gott." O. G. Villard; S 119
    - Nazis, executions by Hitler; E..... 32
    - Terror mounts. E. Lawrence; S.... 261
    - Vote for; EP, 225; article by R. Dell, 320; EP.................. 339

  Illusion. Low; Ct 148
  In 1914. A. Feiler; S 152
  Isolation. Low; Ct 730
  Mühsam, Erich; murder by Nazis; EP, 85; letter by L. B. Milner 741
  Nazi propaganda in the United States; EP 85
  Nazi week in Nürnberg; EP 310
  Nazis from cruiser Karlsruhe received at Boston; anti-Nazi demonstration; EP. 3
  Protestant church, crisis in; EP 365
  Protestant church, revolt against Nazi regime; EP 463
  Protestant churches, Nazis lose; EP 549
  Reichstag building fire; murders of June 30, connection with fire; EP 114
  Revolt, Von Papen's; E 5
  Saar. See Saar
  Thompson, D., expulsion; EP 255
  Women speak out; E 286
Gide, André, conversion of. W. Troy; S 444
Ginzburg, Benjamin
  Capitalism and communism; Berle on L. Corey's "Decline of American capitalism"; C, 536; see also 305
Gisolfi, Anthony M.
  Fascism at Columbia university; C 590
Glassberg, Benjamin
  Colorado relief; C 212
"Go-withoutism"; Dt 478
Gold eagle guy. J. W. Krutch; D 692
Gold standard. See China
Goldman, Emma
  Exiles, political, tragedy of; S 401
Gondoliers, the. J. W. Krutch; D 335
Gordon, W. H.
  On proposed liberal party; C 740
Government employees; substitute postal employees, treatment of 566
  Unionism opposed; EP 59
Granite, Mark
  American circle; C, 646; see also C, 711; C 738
  Need for good $25 house; S 710
Great Britain
  Elections, municipal, labor party gains; EP 548
  Labor party, outlook. S. K. Ratcliffe; S 39
  Politics; parties in conference. H. J. Laski; S 502
  Politics, revolt against complacency. H. Laski; S 502
Green, William; talks socialism; EP 170
Gregory, Horace
  I saw a man in the wind; P 448
Grilli, Marcel F.
  Fascism at Columbia university; C 590
Gross, Harry L.
  Oregon, vigilante justice in; S 742
Groves, Harold M.
  Wisconsin's new party; S 122
Gruening, Ernest, appointment as head of division of territories and island possessions; EP, 225; see also 232
Gruening, Martha
  Crawford case; C, 75; see also 17
Gulf refining company
  Proceedings against, under NIRA 744
  Strike 191
  Strike; dynamite found 274
Gunther, John
  Balkans swing to fascism; S 13
  Dollfuss murder; S 204

H

Haas, Reverend F. J.; attack and defense 160, 273, 352
Haggin, B. H.
  Crawford case; C, 158; see also 17
Hague, Mayor Frank O.; record on union activities; EP 31
Haiti; withdrawal of United States forces; EP, 225; see also 232
Hale, Ruth, death; EP 367
Hanfstängl, Ernst F. S.; Hitler's court jester; E 6
  Protest against, in Boston. C. McBride; C 480
  See also Harvard university
Harriman hosiery mill. See National industrial recovery act—Blue eagle
Harris, Evelyn
  On farm labor; C, 536; see also 302
Hartshorne, Charles
  On proposed liberal party; C 739
Harvard university; E. F. S. Hanfstängl, demonstrators against, in prison. L. Kirstein; C 648
  Returns Hanfstängl gift; EP 423
  See also Inventions
Hauptmann, Bruno Richard. See Lindbergh, C. A.
Headlines; Dt 157
Health insurance. See Medicine, socialization of Hearth fires; Dt 535
Hedda Gabler. J. W. Krutch; D 720
Hedin, Sven; Dt 130
Heer, Clarence
  Coordination of American finance; S 705
Henderson, Leon. See Business
Herbst, Josephine
  On Nation's review of her book, The executioner waits; C, 591; see also 514
Herndon, Angelo; appeal for. Q. Howe; C 185
  Georgia supreme court sustains conviction. W. Wilson; S 127
Hess, Rudolph. See Germany
Hibbard, Benjamin Horace
  Drought and the Agricultural adjustment administration; S 15
Higgins, Florence
  Milwaukee electric railway and light company strike; S 66
High schools. See Schools
Hillsboro, Illinois, case of men accused of conspiracy to overthrow government; EP 697
Hillman, Alex L.
  On Krutch articles on Europe; C 437
Hillyer, Mary W.
  Textile workers return to work; S 414
Hindemith. K. Burke; M 487
Hindenburg, Paul von, patriot and traitor. O. G. Villard; S 175
Hirsch, Alfred H.
  Jersey City, scab city; S 509, 538
Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Hoan, Herbert
  On Krutch articles on Europe; C 437
Hodson, William
  On discharge of New York city relief worker; C, 508; see also EP 493
Hofrichter, Blanche
  Loyalty oath; C 407
Hogan, William
  Rolph as name for San Francisco bridge; C 47
Holmes, John Haynes
  Liberal party, need for; C 711
Home work, evils of; E 579
Homes. See Housing
Homes, American, under present system; EP 30
Hoover, Herbert; liberty, views on; E 313
Hopkins, Harry L., on relief problem; EP, 575; correction 741
  Unemployment relief plan; EP 29
Horses, racing; New England trotting meet. H. E. Stearns; S 235
Hosiery workers; vigilantes kidnap organizers; EP 309
Hotel workers; sentenced strikers, appeal for. F. Morrow; C 132
Householders, help for, proposed; E 369
Housekeeping, former; Dt 620
Housing
  Good $25 house, need for. M. Granite; S 710
  Ickes program; EP 632
  Loans, cost of. R. Steffan and A. Mayer; letters, 479; see also 403
  New York city; Public works administration interference; EP 58
  Program, need for. A. Mayer; S, 403; see also C 479
  United States, government movement. C. Aronovici; S 37
Houston, Charles H., and L. A. Ranson
  Crawford case; S, 17; see also C, 75, 157-159
Howe, E. W. Ernest Boyd; S 247
Howe, Quincy
  Herndon, A., appeal for; C 185
  Liberal party, need for; C 711
Huberman, Leo, and C. E. Warne
  Government, United States, strikebreaker; S 188
Humor and wit; E 609
Hungary. See Coal miners, Hungarian; Jugoslavian-Hungarian relations
Hunger marchers, Albany, beaten; EP 549
Huxley, Aldous
  Comment on Krutch articles on Europe. 373
Hyde, Maxwell
  Liberal party, need for; C 712

I

Ickes, Secretary Harold LeClair; housing program; EP 632
  Problem for 191
Improvidence, hand of. W. L. Garrison, junior; S 562
Independent union of all workers. H. Solow; S 622
Income tax returns for 1933; EP 696
India; labor, militancy. V. K. K. Menon; S, 293; EP 283
  Parliamentary committee report; EP 632
Industrial association of San Francisco and the strike; E, 228; E 258; 411
Industry
  Defies New deal; E 698
Industry and labor, articles on. See Labor and industry
Infantile paralysis. See Inventions
Injunctions; Levering and Garrigue case; anti-injunction act upheld by United States supreme court; EP 492
  New Jersey 355
Insull, Samuel; acquittal; EP 631
  Trial. M. Dawson; S 611
Insurance, health. See Medicine, socialization of Insurance, social; pension law for railway workers; law upheld by lower court; E 231
  Program for. R. G. Swing; S 318
  Railway pensions act held unconstitutional; EP 519
Insurance, unemployment. See Unemployment
International council of women. See Women
International industrial relations institute at work on social-economic plan for United States; E 662
International juridical association; work of. I. Polier; C 21
International labor defense. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
International labor organization, United States joins; EP 255
International relations; cooperation, need for, recognized; EP 604
International socialist student federation, congress. J. P. Lash; S 297
International student service, meeting on Negro problem; EP 696
Internationalism, new; E 494
Inter-state milk producers' association. See Milk
Inventions; Harvard university decision to bar patenting of medical discoveries; case of Drinker respirator for use in infantile paralysis; EP, 57; see also C 132
Iolanthe. J. W. Krutch; D 335
Ireland; O'Duffy, General, retires; EP 366
Iron. See Steel and iron
Isaacs, Harold R.
  China, "blue shirts" in; S 433
Isham, Alfred F.
  Colorado relief; C, 104; see also EP 87
Issoski, George, released; EP 520
Italian-Abyssinian dispute; EP 724
Italy; France, relations with; E 312
  Women to be forced out of industry; EP 311

J

Japan
  Army and navy appropriations, record; EP 631
  Cabinet, new; EP 58
  Capitalist heaven. Low; Ct 526
  Disarmament proposals; EP 282
  Fascism, threat of; E 425
  Relations with United States; naval discussions. R. G. Swing; S 558
  Relations with United States; no light from Roosevelt; EP 141
  Trade "menace." T. A. Bisson; S 527
    See also Armament limitations and disarmament
Japanese-Chinese relations. See Chinese-Japanese relations
Japanese in United States; farmers persecuted in Arizona; EP 423
Japanese-Russian relations
  Chinese eastern railway, agreement near; EP 366
  Chinese Eastern railway, trouble over; EP 197
  Tension over arrests of soviet citizens and Chinese Eastern railway; EP 310
Jaszi, Oscar
  War germs in Danube basin. I. Crisis in succession states; S 556
  II. Constitutional problems in the victor states; S 583
  III. Nationality problem; S 669
  IV. Can we avert war? S 736
Jayhawker. J. W. Krutch; D 600
Jeans, Sir James, lectures on space; E 633
Jennings, Dean S. See Newspapers
Jersey City, New Jersey; Hague, Mayor, record on union activities; EP 31
  Scab city. A. H. Hirsch; S 509, 538
Jews; truth about the Jews; reply to E. Boyd. L. Lewisohn; C 130
Johnson, General Hugh S.; textile strike, speech on; EP 337
    See also National industrial recovery act

- John Reed clubs, national board
  - Wittenber, Jan, demand for release; C.. 47
- Judgment day. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 391
- Jugoslavia; after assassination of king Alexander. L. Adamic; S 470
  - Strike, strange. L. Adamic; S 239
- Jugoslavian-Hungarian relations; expulsion of Hungarians, and threats of war; EP. 695

K

- Kain, Theodore
  - Asks Des Moines readers to form club; C 300
- Karlsruhe (cruiser). See Germany
- Kellett, Kenneth
  - On proposed liberal party; C........... 738
- Kendrick, Alexander
  - Alabama goes on strike; S........... 233
  - Long, H., "revolution"; S 207
- Kendrick, M. Slade
  - State finance; S 532
- Kennedy, Joseph P. See Stocks and bonds
- Kinney, Ward
  - Montana copper strike; S, 98; see also EP 86
- Kirov, Sergei M., assassination; EP........ 696
- Kirstein, Lincoln
  - Imprisonment of demonstrators against Hanfstängl; C 648
- Klaber, John J.
  - On speaking tour for Sinclair plan; C.. 325
- Kohler company
  - Company union wins. H. Christian; S. 540
  - Myth dies. G. Mickelsen; S........... 187
  - Strike 162
- Kravif, Hy
  - "Women who work"; C, 212; see also 80; C 325
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
  - Abbey theater players; D.............. 629
  - Anything goes; D 692
  - Between two worlds; D................ 573
  - Bride of Torozko, the; D.............. 391
  - Brittle heaven; D 629
  - Children's hour, the; D............... 656
  - Conversation piece; D 573
  - Dance with your gods; D.............. 486
  - Distaff side, the; D.................. 418
  - Divided by three; D.................. 460
  - Farmer takes a wife, the; D.......... 573
  - Jayhawker; D 600
  - L'Aiglon; D 600
  - New gossoon, the; D 629
  - Page Miss Glory; D.................. 692
  - Sailors of Cattaro; D 749
  - Sleeping clergyman, a; D............. 486
  - Within the gates; D.................. 546
  - Gold eagle guy; D.................... 692
  - Gondoliers, the; D................... 335
  - Hedda Gabler; D 720
  - Iolanthe; D 335
  - Judgment day; D 391
  - Lady Jane; D 364
  - Lost horizons; D 517
  - Merrily we roll along; D............. 460
  - Personal appearance; D 517
  - Post road; D 720
  - Revenge with music; D............... 720
  - Small miracle; D 418
  - Spring song; D 460
  - Tight britches; D 364
  - Was Europe a success? S.....177, 209, 237, 267; comment by A. Einstein, B. Russell, A. Huxley, H. L. Mencken, and J. Burnham......373; comments, letters 437
- Ku klux klan; revival, and White legion. L. Colman; C 20
- Kussy, Bella
  - On Krutch articles on Europe; C....... 437

L

- Labor
  - Agricultural. See Agriculture
  - Boards, multiplication of; E............ 61
  - Child. See Child labor
  - Disputes act proposed by National association of manufacturers.............. 716
  - Employers in flight; migration to evade contracts may be enjoined............ 304
  - Farm. See Agriculture
  - Home work, evils of; E............... 579
  - India. See India
  - Iron workers, offer to, by steel trust; E. 634
  - Massachusetts, and review of "Women who work." S. K. Selekman; C...... 325
  - Mediation, ghost of. R. G. Swing; S... 474
  - Mexican; EP 338
  - National labor relations board:
    - Biddle, F. B., new chairman; EP.. 603
    - Constitution, powers, et cetera; EP. 30
    - Donovan case. See National industrial recovery act
    - Garrison, L. K., resignation; EP... 464
    - Hears cases under Section 7-a, national industrial recovery act; EP. 171
    - Rulings 595
  - Policemen and labor demonstrations. A. Policeman; C 675
  - Southern, organizes. O. Carlson; S.... 353
  - "Truce." J. Rorty; S................. 593
  - Truce, end of; E..................... 552
  - Unemployment. See Unemployment
  - Unrest; E 116
  - Wages and profits. Low; Ct........... 372
  - Women and wages. A. Lutz; S....440; see also C.......................... 564
    - See also Strikes
  - See also Injunctions; Labor unions; National industrial recovery act; Strikes
- Labor and industry......160, 187, 213, 243, 272, 301, 326, 353, 385, 411, 440, 481, 509, 538, 566, 593, 622, 650, 714, 742.
- Labor board, national. See Labor
- Labor party, British; outlook. S. K. Ratcliffe; S 39
  - Conference, annual; EP 421
- Labor relations board, national. See Labor; National industrial recovery act—Donovan, J.
- Labor unions
  - Automobile labor board's plan; EP...... 696
  - Bargaining, collective; E...........341, 595
    - Basic principles enunciated; EP.... 281
    - National industrial recovery act; Section 7-b, applications in making collective agreements; EP........ 226
    - Nation's stand commended. J. W. Warner; C....300; see also E... 145
    - Recognition by General motors; EP. 493
    - Railway workers win victory for collective bargaining 387
    - Steel and collective bargaining...... 275
  - Closed shop; validity upheld in Connecticut court decision; EP............. 142
  - Collective bargaining. See Labor unions —Bargaining, collective
  - Company unions:
    - And the American federation of labor. L. Adamic; S............. 67
    - Decisions against 441
    - Forbidden in New York City bus franchise; EP 59
    - Kohler company union wins. H. Christian; S 540
    - Railway, company unionism dying; EP 87
    - Railway workers coerced into company union 716
  - Filipino union, California, intimidation; EP 422
  - Majority rule; E 341
  - Majority rule, war against............ 387
  - Picketing permitted, other restrictions on strikers removed, New York city; EP. 226
  - Recognition by industry under way. R. G. Swing; S 639
  - Steel, election 387
  - Vertical union wins in A. F. of L.; E.. 467
  - Western, H. Solow; S................ 622
    - See also American federation of labor; Coal miners
- Lady Jane. J. W. Krutch; D............. 364
- La Follette, Senator Robert M., junior. O. G. Villard; S.................... 147
  - Campaign; E 522
- La Follette, Suzanne
  - Negroes and the NRA; S 265
- L'Aiglon. J. W. Krutch; D............... 600
- Lamont, Corliss; arrest for picketing; EP... 31
- Lamson, David; murder case; E 341
  - New trial granted; EP................ 464
- Landormy, Fanny
  - Livingston, A., injustice to; C......... 591
- Lane, Joseph M.
  - "Safe" period; C......592; see also.... 346
- Lash, Joseph P.
  - International socialist student federation, congress; S 297
  - Socialism's new beginnings; S......... 650
- Laski, Harold J.
  - British parties in conference; S........ 502
  - British politics, revolt against complacency; S 641
  - British trade union congress; S........ 378
  - Leningrad letters; S................69, 100
  - Strike, general, problem of; S.......... 179
- Lasser, David
  - Taxing New York city for unemployment relief; C 648
- Last gentleman, the. W. Troy; MP....... 574
- Lawrence, Evelyn
  - Hitler terror; S 261
- League of nations
  - Assembly, fifteenth; little done; EP..... 394
  - China dropped from council; EP........ 394
  - Russian admission imminent; EP....... 282
  - United States membership. R. G. Swing; S 639
- Ledger, Newark, N. J. See Newspapers
- Lengyel, Emil
  - Says his film, The world in revolt, is not reactionary; C....212; see also... 124
- Lenin, N. See Russia
- Lester, Richard A.
  - EPIC and the Ohio plan; C.......479; see also 379
- Levenson, Lew
  - California casualty list; S.........243; see also C 410
  - Case of T. Sharpe; S......372; see also S......243; C 410
- Levering and Garrigue case. See Injunctions
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
  - On Krutch articles on Europe; C....... 437
  - Russia; protest against conditions; C.... 20
  - Truth about the Jews; reply to E. Boyd; C 130
- Liberalism
  - Growth shown in election vote; EP..... 605
- Liberals; American circle, organization. M. Granite; C....646; see also C....711, 738
  - Futility, and a new approach. W. S. Wasserman; S 498
- Liberties, civil, conference on; EP.......... 725
- Liberty, Hoover views; E.................. 313
- Liberty, meaning of, according to American liberty league; E 257
- Life, modern; Dt 738
- Lindbergh, Charles Augustus; "third degree" not used on B. R. Hauptmann; E.... 396
- Linscott, R. N.
  - On Villard review of "Forty-two years in the white house" C...536; see also... 388
- Liquors, alcoholic. See Alcoholic liquors
- Literary censorship. See Censorship, literary
- Literature, Russian. See Russia
- Little friend. W. Troy; MP............... 574
- Livesey, Mary E.
  - Mortgage loan from Federal land bank; C......408; see also C............. 537
- Livingston, Arthur; injustice to, at Columbia university. F. Landormy; C......... 591
- Loans, farm. M. E. Livesey; C.......408; see also C......................... 537
- London conference. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- London in 1914. L. Read; S.............. 150
- Long, Senator Huey P. See Louisiana
- Long Island Press. See Newspapers
- Longshoreman's strike. See San Francisco
- Lore, Ludwig
  - Socialist party, united front gains ground; S 714
- Lost horizons. J. W. Krutch; D........... 517
- Louisiana
  - Long, Senator, dictator; announces candidacy for presidency; EP............ 603
  - Long, domination of state; EP......... 227
  - Long, turns attention to debt moratorium and chicken stew; EP............... 577
  - "Revolution." A. Kendrick; S......... 207
- Low (cartoonist)
  - Airplanes, war; Ct.................... 260
  - Armament limitation, betting on; Ct.... 8
  - Business, big, on the warpath; Ct...... 120
  - Capitalist heaven; Ct................. 526
  - Dictators, high politics among; Ct...... 428
  - Dillinger; Ct 176
  - Europe, future of; Ct................. 64
  - European blocks; Ct.................. 202
  - European war, outbreak, in England; Ct 36
  - Food prices, soaring; Ct.............. 288
  - German isolation; Ct................. 730
  - Germany, disillusion; Ct.............. 148
  - Hitler's coup. Low; Ct............... 92
  - Naval conference; Ct................. 554
  - Naval limitation; Ct.................. 702
  - "New deal," something wrong; Ct...... 400
  - Wages and profits; Ct................ 372
- Loyalty oath for teachers. B. Hofrichter; C. 407
- Lutz, Alma
  - Women and wages; S..440; see also C.. 564
- Lynchings; Florida, C. Neal, negro, killed; EP 521

M

- M., M.
  - Elevator strike, New York city; S...... 624
- MacDougall, Curtiss D.
  - Coal price-fixing in St. Louis under NRA; S 183
- Macedonians, oppression of; EP........... 394
- Macnamara, John
  - Berry picker; S.....302; see also C.... 536
- Madame Bovary. W. Troy; MP........... 657
- Magazines, "little"; E.................... 117
- Maine; election, result; EP................ 309
- Malraux, André, and the individual. L. Abel; S 443
- Man of Aran. W. Troy; MP.............. 518
- Man of courage. W. Troy; MP........... 630
- Manchukuo; oil monopoly, Japanese; EP.... 659
- Marine workers, strike called off........... 596
- Marseilles assassinations; aftermath; E..... 466
- Marshall, Margaret
  - Textile strike; S 326

- Martin, Anne
  - Austin, Mary, tribute to; C.......... 409
- Marz, Clarence K.
  - On proposed liberal party; C.......... 739
- Mason, Lucy R.
  - Women and wages; C.......... 564
- Massachusetts; labor in, and review of "Women who work." S. K. Selekman; C.......... 325
  - Unemployment survey; EP.......... 464
- Mayer, Albert
  - Housing loans, cost of; C..479; see also 403
  - Housing program, need for; S......403; see also C.......... 479
- McBride, Charles
  - Protest against Hanfstängl, in Boston; C 480
- McHugh, Vincent
  - Clinical note; P.......... 220
  - Pari-mutuel; P.......... 234
  - Warning to the good; P.......... 192
- McLemore, James L.
  - Crawford case; C.....159; see also.... 17
- Mediation. See Labor
- Medical patents. See Inventions
- Medicine, socialization of; Canadian association's plan; EP.......... 633
  - Health insurance, movement for; E..... 663
  - Progress; EP.......... 396
- Memphis, Tennessee, votes for cheaper power. H. R. Fraser; S.......... 615
- Mencken, H. L.
  - Comment on Krutch articles on Europe.. 373
  - Liquor, legal, year of; S.......... 666
- Menon, V. K. Krishna
  - Labor militancy in India; S......293; see also EP.......... 283
- Merrily we roll along. J. W. Krutch; D... 460
- Merry widow, the. W. Troy; MP.......... 574
- Metal trades. See American federation of labor
- Mettee, Grace
  - San Francisco in strike time; S.......... 102
- Mexico
  - Campaign against reactionary church; EP 491
  - Church and state. C. Beals; S.......... 733
  - Strikes, regulation; EP.......... 338
- Mickelsen, Gunnar
  - Kohler myth; S.......... 187
- Militarism. See also Reserve officers' training corps
- Military training
  - Made optional at University of Minnesota; EP......3; see also C.......... 103
  - Reserve officers' training corps, abolition demanded. J. Cohen; C..........103; see also EP.......... 3
  - Reserve officers' training corps; appeal for California objectors. R. Baldwin; C.......... 132
  - Supreme court, United States, upholds compulsory training at land-grant colleges; EP.......... 697
- Milk; distributors defy NRA; EP.......... 660
  - Inter-state milk producers' association, election, and price situation; EP...... 31
- Milner, Lucille B.
  - Nazi murder of E. Mühsam; C.......... 741
- Milwaukee electric railway and light company strike. F. Higgins; S.......... 66
- Miners, coal. See Coal miners
- Minneapolis; strike. H. Solow; S......160; see also C......241; C.......... 271
  - Unionism wins in strike.......... 274
- Minnesota; class war in. H. Solow; S..... 743
  - "Red menace" in. E. Thane; S.......... 435
- Minnesota, University of; military training made optional; EP...3; see also C... 103
- Miracles. W. Troy; MP.......... 574
- Missouri. See Negroes
- Mitchell, James P.
  - Coddling the bums; S.......... 214
- Modern life; Dt.......... 738
- Money. See Currency
- Monkeys and men; E.......... 314
- Montana. See Copper
- Montross, Warren C.
  - Agricultural labors under "new deal"; S 303
- Mooney, Tom; supreme court, United States, grants hearing on habeas corpus writ; EP.......... 605
- Morals for men; E.......... 118
- Morro castle (steamship)
  - And after. O. G. Villard; S.......... 343
  - Fire; EP.......... 311
  - Inquiry finds negligence; EP.......... 492
- Morrow, Felix
  - Answering Mr. Chase; C..270; see also. 93
  - Hotel workers' defense; C.......... 132
- Morrow, Henry
  - Liberal party, need for; C.......... 712
- Mortgages
  - Guaranteed mortgage racket. H. Seidman; S......381; E.......... 369
  - Loan from Federal land bank, difficulties. M. E. Livesey; C...408; see also C.. 537
  - Title companies, fleecing of public; EP.. 338
- Moses, Robert. O. G. Villard; S.......... 427
  - Correspondence with J. A. Farley; EP.. 463
- Moskowitz, Charlotte
  - Commonwealth college prize essays; C... 132
- Motion pictures. See Moving pictures
- Moving pictures
  - (For reviews of pictures, see names of pictures; also Troy, W.)
  - Appreciation of, investigation; E....... 342
  - Censorship. See Censorship, moving pictures
  - Propaganda in. O. G. Villard; S...... 665
  - Workers, progressive, in revolt.......... 219
- Mühsam, Erich; murder by Nazis; EP...85; letter by L. B. Milner.......... 741
- Mules, Arkansas; Dt.......... 269
- Munitions of war
  - Du Pont, I., activities as manufacturer; EP.......... 58
  - Embargo on importation into Chaco not successful; EP.......... 115
  - Industries, nationalization needed; E.... 726
  - Investigation of industry; E.......284; E......313; EP......337; E.......... 699
  - Profits, according to B. M. Baruch; EP. 2
  - Prosperity for makers; EP.......... 577
  - Regulation and control of sale, proposals for; EP.......... 604
  - Sale, international control; proposed treaty drafted; E.......... 636
  - Trade, licensing, State department's plan. R. G. Swing; S.......... 639
  - Traffic, international. O. G. Villard; S. 371
  - Traffic, investigation. W. T. Stone; S.. 376
- Murphy, M. Farmer
  - Rainbow over the White house; S...... 40
- Music; Hindemith. K. Burke.......... 487

N

- Nadejena, Lydia
  - Children's books in Russia; S.......... 44
- Nation, The
  - Collective bargaining, stand commended. J. W. Warner; C...300; see also E.. 145
  - Des Moines readers asked to form club. T. Kain; C.......... 300
  - Philosophers, Nation's opinion on. S. Orlinick; C.......... 48
  - Scottsboro case, attitude toward; EP.... 661; see also C..........674, 712
  - Stewart, M. S., becomes associate editor; EP.......... 171
  - Swing, R. G., becomes member of board of editors; EP.......... 283
- National association for the advancement of colored people. See Crawford, G.
- National association of manufacturers; proposes labor disputes act.......... 716
- National crime conference; EP.......... 724
- National industrial recovery act
  - Blue eagles:
    - Blue eagles, two.......... 191
    - Harriman hosiery mills, deprivation and restoration.......... 191
    - Protest against loss of blue eagles; EP.......... 31
  - Codes on working hours and price-fixing. 275
  - Defense by Roosevelt, in radio speech; EP.......... 393
  - Donovan, John:
    - Discharge for acting as president of NRA employees' union; E......4; EP.....30; EP.....86; EP..... 170
    - Hearing; EP.......... 199
    - Picketing against removal; EP..... 59
    - Reinstated by national labor relations board; EP......255; E.......... 256
  - Gamble; EP.......... 143
  - Garment industry, protection for workers under code.......... 191
  - Harriman hosiery mills. See National industrial recovery board—Blue eagle
  - Labor. See Labor—National labor relations board
  - Labor codes defied by employers; EP..... 660
  - National labor relations board. See Labor
  - Negroes and the NIRA. S. La Follette; S.......... 265
  - Price-fixing. See Coal
  - Production control abandoned; EP...... 494
  - Reorganization; E......256; EP....... 393
  - Section 7-a:
    - Can labor enforce it? E.......... 60
    - Labor under; S.......... 744
    - Looks up.......... 218
    - Proceedings against Gulf refining company.......... 744
  - Silverman, A. G., discharge by Labor advisory board; EP.......... 30
    - See also National industrial recovery act—Donovan, John ”
- National labor relations board. See Labor; National industrial recovery act—Donovan, J.
- National resources. See United States
- National resources board, program; EP..... 723
- National socialists (Nazis). See Austria; Germany
- Naval conference. Low; Ct.......... 554
  - See also Japan
- Naval limitation. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Navies. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Nazis in America. See Germans in America
- Neal, Claude, lynched; EP.......... 521
- Negroes
  - Alabama. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
  - And the NIRA. S. La Follette; S..... 265
  - Lynchings. See Lynchings
  - Missouri; mistreatment in Pemiscot county court; EP.......... 367
  - Problem, discussion under auspices of International student service; EP.... 696
  - Scottsboro case:
    - Arrest of International labor defense lawyers; EP.......... 423
    - Controversy over counsel, and history of case; EP....464; EP....577; E....607; E.....635; C....647; EP.......... 661
    - International labor defense and case. A. Damon; C.........674; see also EP.......... 661
    - Nation, attitude of; EP....... 661, 712
  - Tennessee valley authority, place of negro in program; EP.......... 521
    - See also Crawford, C.
- Neumann, Henry; liberal party, need for; C. 711
- Neutrality, American, in case of war; EP... 723
- New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
- New England trotting meet. H. E. Stearns; S.......... 235
- New gossoon, the. J. W. Krutch; D........ 629
- New Guinea, discoveries in; Dt.......... 185
- New Jersey
  - Code and price-fixing; EP.......... 283
  - Injunctions.......... 355
  - Power, cost of. McA. Coleman; S, 588; see also C.......... 675
  - Red-hunt.......... 304
- New York City
  - Bus franchise, union and other provisions; EP.......... 59
  - Police brutality. W. Wilson; S, 181; see also EP, 142; EP.......... 724
  - Relief crisis; S.......... 213
  - Sales tax; EP.......... 659
  - Schools. See Schools
  - Unemployment relief. See Unemployment
- New York Deutsche Zeitung, on Dollfuss assassination; EP.......... 143
- New York state
  - Campaign, political; E.......... 425
  - Gubernatorial nominations; EP.......... 395
  - Reapportionment comes to front; EP.... 576
  - Reapportionment remote; EP.......... 114
- New York state economic council, reactionary proposals; EP, 169; correction........ 271
- New York title and mortgage company; indictment of directors; EP.......... 338
- Newark, N. J., Ledger. See Newspapers
- Newsboys; exploitation; EP.......... 2
- Newspaper guild, American. See Newspapers
- Newspapers
  - Advertising; publishers pay tributes to power; E.......... 117
  - American newspaper guild:
    - Campaign against, by San Francisco bay regions papers; EP.......... 696
    - Crosby, A. L., discharged by Staten Island Advance for joining guild; EP.......... 255
    - Disappoints Editor and publisher; EP.......... 396
    - National labor relations board, decision in case of D. S. Jennings of San Francisco Call-Bulletin; E... 699
    - Picketing at Long Island Press, and activity at Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger; EP.......... 114
    - Strike against Newark, N. J., Ledger; EP.......... 660
    - Wins victory in case of Jennings; EP.......... 660
  - Circulation not an index to American opinion; EP.......... 282
  - Headlines; Dt.......... 157
  - Rotogravures; E.......... 370
  - San Francisco strike; newspapers' help in breaking; EP.......... 141
    - See also Advertising; Freedom of the press
- Nobel prize for literature; awarded to L. Pirandello; EP.......... 577
- Norah O'Neale. W. Troy; MP.......... 574
- North Carolina needy, appeal for. G. Elliott; C.......... 713
- Norton, John K.
  - Finance, educational; S.......... 643
- Novack, George E.
  - Bellussi, A., case of; C.......... 384
- Novels, proletarian, investigation by L. Adamic; E.......... 700

Noyes, Peter Helmoop
  Business, big, seeks new friends; S.... 104
  Confidence, lack of; S 241
Nürnberg. See Germany

O

O'Donnell, William H. See Agriculture—Strikes
Ohio plan. See Unemployment
Oil; production, control; EP 143
  See also Manchukuo
Oil strike; dynamite found 274
Old-age pensions; Dt 563
  Townsend plan, for California; EP..... 465
One more river. W. Troy; MP 336
Onion workers. See Agriculture
Oregon, vigilante justice in. H. L. Gross; S. 742
Orlinick, Samuel
  On Nation's editorial on philosophers; C. 48
O'Ryan, John F., case of. O. G. Villard; S. 399
  Terrorist. W. Wilson; S, 181; see also EP 142
Our daily bread. W. Troy; MP 488
Output, control of. See Production control

P

Pacifism
  British trade union congress reverses attitude toward general strike in case of war; EP 310
  Women's international league for peace and freedom, congressional caravans; EP 395
Page Miss Glory. J. W. Krutch; D 692
Painted veil, the. W. Troy; MP 721
Papen, vice-chancellor von. See Germany
Paraguay. See Chaco war
Paris in August, 1914. J. Prevost; S....... 151
Parkways in the wilds. H. Broome; C...... 46
Party, new, liberal; organization of American circle. M. Granite; C, 646, see also C 711
Patents, medical. See Inventions
Peace; cause moves on. O. G. Villard; S.. 525
  See also Pacifism
Pemiscot county, Missouri. See Negroes
Pen and Hammer
  Nation's views on philosophers as described in Pen and Hammer bulletin. S. Orlinick; C 48
Pennsylvania; electoral contests; EP 311
  Politics; Pinchot re-enters; EP 423
Pensions
  Railway act held unconstitutional; EP.. 519
  See also Insurance, social; Old-age pensions
Perkins, Secretary Frances
  Mediator in steel strike; EP, 1; see also 9
  Business men and "new deal"; S...... 618
Personal appearance. J. W. Krutch; D.... 517
Petersburg nights. W. Troy; MP 392
Petroleum. See Oil; Manchukuo
Pharmacy. See Drug stores
Philadelphia; politics; EP 199
Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Photoplays. See Moving pictures
Picketing. See Labor unions; Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Pie in art, the; E 524
Pinchot, Amos
  Higher prices, plea for; C 299
Pinchot, Governor Gifford. See Pennsylvania
Pinero, Sir Arthur, death; E............... 664
Pioneering spirit, the. O. G. Villard; S.... 701
Pirandello, Luigi, wins Nobel prize; EP.... 577
Pittsburgh, university of. See Academic freedom Plays. See Krutch, J. W.; Theater, the Poems
  Being. R. P. T. Coffin 22
  Benediction in midsummer. M. Zaturenska 49
  Clinical note. V. McHugh 220
  I saw a man in the wind. H. Gregory.. 448
  Pari-mutuel. V. McHugh 234
  Poem. (To an infant born in times of great change). C. Calkins 220
  Sonnets. M. Van Doren 76
  To a snake in Eden. E. Scott 133
  Warning to the good. V. McHugh.... 192
Poetry; poem, definition of. L. Reis; S.... 106
Poland; and other powers; EP 339
  Minorities, treatment of; EP 339
Police
  And labor demonstrations. A Policeman; C 675
  Brutality; C, 508; see also EP, 493; EP 724
  New York. See New York City
  "Third degree' not used in Hauptmann case; E 396
Polier, Isidor
  International juridical association; work of; C 21
Political exiles, tragedy of. E. Goldman; S.. 401
Politicians' minds; EP 463
Post road. J. W. Krutch; D 720
Postal service. See Government employees
Potato hill farm, sage of. (E. W. Howe). E. Boyd; S 247
Pound, Roscoe; acceptance of German degree; EP 423
Power and power industry; Memphis votes for cheaper power. H. R. Fraser; S.. 615
  New Jersey power, cost of. McA. Coleman; S, 588; see also C 675
President vanishes, the. W. Troy; MP.... 750
Press, freedom of the. See Freedom of the press
Prevost, Jean
  Paris in August, 1914; S 151
Price-fixing; New Jersey code system; EP.. 283
  Under NIRA 275
    See also Coal
Prices, higher, plea for. A. Pinchot; C.... 299
Primary elections. See Elections
Prison, Christmas in. R. Baron; C 649
Prisoners, class-war, Christmas fund; C.... 713
Prodigies; Dt 709
Production control abandoned by NRA; EP. 492
Profit and wages. Low; Ct 372
Profiteers, war. See Munitions of war
Proletariat novels, investigation by L. Adamic; E 700
Propaganda. See Moving pictures
Prophets; Dt 673
Protestant church, German. See Germany
Protestant episcopal church, indorses birth control; EP 491
Public administration clearing house; not instrumental in cost-cutting, 271; see also EP 169
Public finance. See Finance, public
Public utilities; dark days; E 608
Public works; gift horses; E 426
Public works administration. See Housing
Pulitzer prize play; must deal with American life; E 468
Putilov's revisited. L. Fischer; S 348

Q

Quintuplets, Dionne; Dt 738

R

Radicals; in Washington, tired. R. G. Swing; S 639
Radicals; signs of union; EP 660
Radio; control, governmental; E 201
Railroads
  Government money for; E 369
  Pension laws. See Insurance, social
  Shop workers coerced into company union 716
  Speed, Union Pacific streamline train; EP 521
  Trains, streamline. O. G. Villard; S... 555
  Unions. See Labor unions
  Workers and the New deal 218
Ranson, Leon A., and C. H. Houston
  Crawford case; S, 17; see also C, 75 157-159
Ratcliffe, S. K.
  Labor outlook, England; S 39
Read, Leslie
  London in 1914; S 150
Reading. See Novels
Recovery, business. See Business depression
Red cross, discussed by J. Spivak in American Mercury; EP 576
"Reds." See Communists; San Francisco
Reichstag building fire. See Germany
Reis, Lincoln
  Poem, what is? S 106
Relief, unemployment. See Business depression; Unemployment
Republic steel corporation. See Steel and iron
Republican party
  Bourbons refuse to learn; EP 605
  Death; E 578
  Finds issues; E 88
  Plight of. O. G. Villard; S 637
  Rout. R. G. Swing; S 344
Reserve officers' training corps. See Military training
Resources, national. See United States
Respirator, Drinker. See Inventions
Revenge with music. J. W. Krutch; D..... 720
Revolution, world. L. Fischer; C 186
Riback, B. L.
  On discharge of New York city relief workers; C, 508; see also EP........ 493
Rice, Elmer, and the critics; E 580
Richards, I. A.
  Belief; S 71
Richberg, Donald, record on labor; E 727
Roads, gift horses; E 426
Roberts, John
  On Krutch articles on Europe; C 437
Roche, Josephine, appointment as assistant secretary of the treasury; EP 603
  Defeat; EP 338
Rolph, James, junior, name suggested for San Francisco bridge. W. Hogan; C..... 47
Roman catholic church. See Birth control
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  Administration
    And business. R. G. Swing; S.... 503
    Approval and disapproval; EP 605
    Balance sheet. F. R. Barkley; S... 155
    Business men and "new deal." M. Perkins; S 618
    Defense by president, in radio speech; EP 393
    Defied by industry; E 698
    Economic control, yardstick for "new deal." R. G. Swing; S 613
    "Gains" under; EP 253
    Hoover attack; E 313
    Maine indorsement; EP 309
    Measures; message on social reforms. M. F. Murphy; S 40
    Measures to combat depression forecast; EP 548
    Railroad workers and 218
    Results, after year and a quarter; E 33
    Roosevelt versus Roosevelt. R. G. Swing; S 667
    See it through. E. A. Filene; S.... 707
    Something wrong. Low; Ct 400
  Advisers. R. G. Swing; S 503
  And labor; president's greatest opportunity. O. G. Villard; S 259
  Bankers, address to; E 523
  Child labor amendment, president urges passage; EP 632
  Election results. O. G. Villard; S 581
  Far eastern policy; no light on; EP.... 141
  Social reforms, message on. M. F. Murphy; S 40
  Vacation; situation of country; E 33
Rorty, James
  Moving pictures, censorship; S, 124; see also C 212
  Relief business; S 206
  "Truce," labor; S 593
Rotogravures. See Newspapers
Rourke, Constance
  Ballad hunting; S 192
Rudeness; Dt 324
Russell, Bertrand; comment on Krutch articles on Europe 373
Russia
  Adherence to League of nations imminent; EP 282
  Agrarian policy success shown by discontinuance of bread rationing; EP 660
  Bolshevik revolution; seventeenth anniversary; EP 547
  Children's books. L. Nadejena; S 44
  Conditions, protest against. L. Lewisohn; C 20
  Conditions; trip around soviet union. L. Fischer; S, 500; correction 565
  Credit position; czarist debts and soviet trade; E 230
  Debt, compromise needed; EP 253
  Debt, negotiations at standstill; EP 282
  Economic conditions, improvement; EP.. 254
  Kirov assassination, and reprisals of government; EP 696
  Lenin, Trotzky, and world revolution. L. Fischer; C 186
  Leningrad, letters from. Laski; S.. 69, 100
  Literature; readers beginning to demand "consumer goods"; E 62
  Playgrounds and factories. L. Fischer; S 703
  "Purging." O. G. Villard; S 729
  Putilov's revisited. L. Fischer; S 348
  Young, at play. L. Fischer; S 128
    See also Franco-Russian relations
Russian-American relations; debts and claims, settlement; EP 197
  Debts to United States hold up trade; EP 575
Russian-Japanese relations. See Japanese-Russian relations
Russo, Frank A.
  Fascism at Columbia university; C 590
Ruttenberg, Harold J.
  Steel town, Aliquippa, Pennsylvania; S. 623

S

Saar basin, Nazi activity for plebiscite; EP.. 576
  Plebiscite; E 553
  Plebiscite campaign; EP............... 310
  Situation. R. Dell; S.........320; see also EP 310
  Situation improved; EP................ 695
Sacco-Vanzetti; anniversary; EP........... 227
Safety at sea. See Ships
Sailors. See Marine workers

Sailors of Cattaro. J. W. Krutch; D...... 749
Saint Nicholas, school for writers; E........ 728
Sales tax. See New York city
Salesmen, outside, plight of. H. C. Bennett; S 385
San Francisco bridge, name Rolph suggested. W. Hogan; C............. 47
San Francisco Call-Bulletin. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
San Francisco strikes
  Articles by M. A. De Ford; S.......65, 121
  City in strike time. G. Mettee; S..... 102
  Dock strike settlement................. 566
  Federal inquiry needed; E............. 397
  Fund for national guard raised; EP.... 493
  General; E 89
  Lawlessness of police; E....228; E.... 258
  Newspapers' help in breaking; EP...... 141
  "Reds" hunted; E.................... 116
  Saving the constitution. R. A. Emberg; C 324
  Sharpe, T., case of. L. Levenson; S... 272; see also S......243; C......... 410
  Responsibility for; EP................. 113
  "Silver lining." E. White; C.......... 352
San Jose, California, anti-red hysteria. J. Terry; S 161
Sarajevo, twenty years later; EP.......... 29
Scab city. See Jersey City
Scarcity, abundance of; E................. 173
Scarlet empress, the. W. Troy; MP....... 392
Scheyer, David
  Flop-house; S 216
Schools
  Finances, difficulties. J. K. Norton; S.. 643
  High schools, New York city, fascism in. W. H. Wolff and others; C.......... 590
  Move for aid, to help manufacturers of equipment; EP 170
  See also Academic freedom
Scott. Evelyn
  To a snake in Eden; P................ 133
Scottsboro case. See Negroes
Sea tragedies. I. Berkelheimer; C......... 439
Seabrook farms. See Agriculture
Seamen. See Marine workers
Seashore houses; Dt 102
Seasonal fruits; Dt 589
Section 7-a. See Steel and iron; National industrial recovery act
Section 7-b. See National industrial recovery act
Securities and exchange commission. See Stocks and bonds
Seidman, Harold
  Guaranteed mortgage racket; S.....381; E 369
Selekman, Sylvia Kopald
  On labor in Massachusetts, and review of "Women who work"; C............. 325
Sennett, Mack, biography of; E............ 524
Sharpe, Thomas, case of. L. Levenson; S.....272; see also S.....243; C.... 410
Shipler, Guy Emery
  Church and movies; C................. 409
Ships
  Safety at sea again. O. G. Villard; S.. .469
  Sea tragedies. I. Berkelheimer; C..... 439
  Subsidies, attack by Secretary Wallace; EP 254
  Subsidies; conspiracy. W. Adams; S... 262, 295; see also EP.............. 254
  See also Marine workers
Signs, roadside; Dt 45
Silk and rayon workers win strike......... 716
Silver; price, and buying power; EP....... 491
  Seizure by government; EP............ 197
Silver shirts, investigation of; EP......... 198
Silverman, A. G. See National industrial recovery act
Sinclair, Upton. See California
Sleeping clergyman, a. J. W. Krutch; D.... 486
Sloan, Alfred P., junior; opposes Roosevelt ,policies. P. H. Noyes; S............. 104
Small miracle. J. W. Krutch; D........... 418
Smith, Edith
  Chicago teachers, payment; S.......... 322
Smith, J. A.
  On proposed liberal party; C........... 738
Social economic planning, conference. M. L. Fledderus and M. van Kleeck; C..... 621
Social insurance. See Insurance, social
Social reforms, message on. See Roosevelt, F. D.
Social security in a hurry. R. G. Swing; S. 318
Socialism, new beginnings. J. P. Lash; S... 650
Socialist party; approach to communists; EP. 660
  New York state convention; right wing wins; EP......31; see also C........ 131
  United front gains ground. L. Lore; S. 714
Socialist student congress. J. P. Lash; S... 297
Solow, Herbert
  Haas, Father, attack and defense; C.... 352; see also 160, 273
  Minneapolis strike; S......160; see also C......241; C 271
  Minnesota, class war in; S............ 743
  Unionism, western; S.................. 622
South, the; workers organize. O. Carlson; S 353
South Dakota; method of dealing with "reds"; EP 311
Soviet Russia. See Russia
Space, finite and infinite; EP............. 661
  Jeans lectures; E..................... 633
Spain
  Crisis; EP 394
  Literature and the republic. A. Brenner; S 276
  Revolution—act three. A. Brenner; S.. 476
  Terrorism; E 727
  Uprising; EP 421
Special investigator, a
  Fascism at Columbia university; S..530; see also E....523; E....550; C..... 565
Spivak, John L., anti-Nazi activities; EP... 492
  Discusses Red cross, in American Mercury; EP 576
Spring song. J. W. Krutch; D............ 460
Statistics; Dt 437
Stearns, Harold E.
  New England trotting meet; S 235
  United States in August, 1914; S...... 154
Steel and iron
  Amalgamated association of iron, steel and tin workers, attempt to gain power under Section 7-a; Republic steel corporation case; EP 86
  Amalgamated association, conservatives win in election 566
  Labor, offer to, by United States steel corporation; E 634
  Salaries cut; EP 281
  Steel town, Aliquippa, Pennsylvania. H. J. Ruttenberg; S 623
  Strike, collapse. L. Adamic; S......9; see also EP........................ 1
  Weirton steel company, labor troubles; EP......520; EP 576
  Worker, G. Issoski, imprisoned as insane for union activities, released; EP..... 520
  See also Labor unions
Steffen, Roger
  Housing loans, cost of; C........479; see also 403
Stein, Gertrude, return to United States; EP 521
Stewart, Maxwell S.; becomes associate editor of Nation; EP 171
  Recovery, stability; S 291
  Stabilize dollar now; S................ 560
  United States and world recovery; S.... 316
Stocks and bonds; Kennedy, J. P., appointment as chairman of securities and exchange commission; EP 57
Stone, William
  Munitions of war, traffic in, investigation; S 376
Streamline trains. See Railroads
Strikes
  Alabama; state goes on strike. A. Kendrick; S 233
  Communists, work in strikes decried. V. W. Cather; C 324
  General, problem of. H. J. Laski; S... 179
  Government, United States, strike-breaker. C. E. Warne and L. Huberman; S.... 188
  Labor and industry; E..145; see also C. 300
  List 163
  Mexican, regulation; EP............... 338
  Movement to deny unemployment relief to strikers; EP...................... 141
  News of strikes, colored............... 190
  "Preparedness" to meet action by strikers; EP 142
  Relief administrations as strike-breaking agencies; EP 226
  "Settlement" and truce; E............ 398
  Strikers, feeding of, by Government; E. 285
  Unrest in many states; E.............. 116
  See also Agriculture; Aluminum company of America; Bridgeton, New Jersey; California; Cigar workers; Copper; Cotton-Textiles industry; Elevator men; General tire and rubber company; Gulf refining company; Hosiery workers; Hotel workers; Jugoslavia; Kohler company; Milwaukee electric railway and light company; Minneapolis; Newspapers; Oil; San Francisco; Silk and rayon workers; Steel and iron; Truck drivers
Studenski, Paul
  Finance, public. in the world crisis; S......429; E 424
Students, socialist, congress. J. P. Lash; S. 297
Subjects, editorial, danger in; Dt.......... 645
Subsidies, shipping. See Ships
Succession states. See Danube basin
Sugar; beet sugar industry; child labor in; EP 465
Suicide and the depression. M. A. De Ford; S 42
Supreme court, United States. See Military training
Swing, Raymond Gram; becomes member of The Nation's board of editors; EP.... 283
  Arms trade, licensing; S.............. 639
  Biddle, F. B., new head of Labor relations board; S....................... 639
  Borah, Senator, position; S............ 639
  Bureaucracy, in Tennessee valley authority case; S 405
  Capital on strike; S.................. 289
  Congress, new, issues before; S........ 582
  Coughlin, Father; S.................. 731
  Election campaign, last look at; S...... 529
  EPIC and the Ohio plan; S......379; see also C.......................... 479
  Finance, control of, yardstick for "new deal"; S 613
  Japanese-American relations; S......... 558
  League of nations, American membership; S 639
  Mediation, ghost of; S................ 474
  National recovery administration, slimming the; S 431
  New deal and business; S............. 503
  Radicals in Washington, tired; S....... 639
  Republicanism, rout of; S............. 344
  Roosevelt advisers; S 503
  Roosevelt versus Roosevelt; S.......... 667
  Social security; S 318
Syracuse university, yellow journalism and radicals. A. V. Fowler; C.......... 740
Szechuan. See China

T

Tariff, United States; Cuban reciprocity treaty, inequalities under; EP........ 253
Tax, business. See Unemployment relief—New York city
Tax, income. See Income tax
Tax, sales. New York city
Taxation. See Finance, public
Teachers
  Loyalty oath for. B. Hofrichter; C.... 407
  New York, appeal for. P. Gastwirth; C 185
  New York city, espionage over; EP..... 422
  See also Academic freedom
Tennessee valley authority, bureaucracy. R. G. Swing; S 405
  Negro's place in program; EP.......... 521
Terry, John
  Terror in San Jose; S................ 161
Textile strike. See Cotton-textiles industry
Thane, Eric
  Minnesota, "red menace in"; S........ 435
Theater, the; Pulitzer prize play, must be "native"; E 468
  Rice, E., and the critics; E............ 580
"Third degree." See Police
Thomas, W. E.
  Utopian society of America, defense; C. 299
  Good English; C..................... 103
Thompson, Dorothy, expulsion from Germany; EP 255
Thompson, J. Walter, company. See Advertising
Three songs about Lenin. W. Troy; MP.... 602
Thunderstorm. W. Troy; MP............. 419
Tight britches. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 364
Title and mortgage guarantee companies. See Mortgages
Tourian, Archbishop Leon; conviction of murderers ; EP 86
Townsend, F. E.; old-age pension plan; EP.. 465
Trade, foreign; increase apparent, not real; EP 659
Trade union congress, British, session. H. J. Laski; S 378
Trains. See Railroads
Transport, minister of. See United States
Trotting meet, New England. H. E. Stearns; S 235
Trotzky, Leon. See Russia
Troy, William
  Agonie des aigles, l'; MP.............. 721
  Barretts of Wimpole street, the; MP.... 419
  Battle, the; MP...................... 722
  Belle of the nineties; MP.............. 419
  British agent; MP 419
  Bulldog Drummond strikes back; MP... 336
  Captain hates the sea, the; MP......... 750
  Conversion of A. Gide; S.............. 444
  First world war, the; MP.............. 602
  Gay divorcee, the; MP................ 657
  Last gentleman, the; MP.............. 574
  Little friend; MP.................... 574
  Madame Bovary; MP.................. 657
  Man of Aran; MP.................... 518
  Man of courage; MP.................. 630
  Merry widow, the; MP................ 574
  Miracles; MP 574
  Norah O'Neale; MP 574
  One more river; MP.................. 336
  Our daily bread; MP................. 488
  Painted veil, the; MP................ 721
  Petersburg nights; MP................ 392
  President vanishes, the; MP........... 750
  Scarlet empress, the; MP............. 392

  - Three songs about Lenin; MP.......... 602
  - Thunderstorm; MP 419
  - World moves on, the; MP............. 336
- "Truce," labor. J. Rorty; S.............. 593
- Truck drivers' strike. See Minneapolis
- Truman, Harry S.; election to United States senate; EP 576
- Trust companies; finds America conservative; EP 282
- Tugwell, Rexford Guy, on abundance and scarcity; E 173
- Tugwell-Copeland bill. See Food and drug bill
- Turner, Doctor Joseph
  - On medical patents; C.........132; see also EP 57
- Turner, Ralph E. See Academic freedom

U

- Underhill, Frank H.
  - Canada, revolt in politics; S............ 671
- Unemployment
  - Permanency, probable, in United States; EP 170
  - Salesmen, outside. H. C. Bennett; S.. 385
  - Suicide, threatened; to be reported; EP.. 59
  - United States, 20,000,000 on relief; E... 200
  - United States, underestimated; Massachusetts survey; EP................. 464
- Unemployment relief
  - Bums, coddling. J. P. Mitchell; S...... 214
  - Flop-houses, Chicago; work for Civil works education service. D. Scheyer; S 216
  - Hopkins, H. L.; relief plan; EP....29; EP......575; correction 741
  - Insurance and relief; E............... 606
  - Insurance; dole plan; EP............. 29
  - Insurance, plan for; EP............... 723
  - New York city:
    - Business tax, proposed; EP........ 283
    - Discharge of relief worker for protest against police brutality. B. L. Riback and W. Hodson; C.... 508; see also EP 493
    - Relief crisis. I. Feinstein; S...... 213
    - Tax plan; EP 366
    - Taxation for relief of unemployed. D. Lasser; C 648
  - Ohio plan, and EPIC. R. G. Swing; S ......379; see also C 479
  - Relief agencies as strike-breaking agencies; EP 226
  - Relief, difficulties of construction men. R. A. Beens; C.................... 648
  - Strikers, movement to deny relief; EP.. 141
- Union Pacific streamlined train, record; EP. 521
- Unions, company and others. See American federation of labor; Labor unions
- United automobile workers national council. See Automobiles
- United liberal party. See Liberals
- United States
  - And world recovery. M. S. Stewart; S. 316
  - Conservatism found by Trust companies; EP 282
  - Finances; budget will not balance; E... 369
    - See also Finance, public
  - Government as strike-breaker. C. E. Warne and L. Huberman; S......... 188
  - In 1914. H. E. Stearns; S............ 154
  - Outlook. W. S. Wasserman; S........ 498
  - Resources, national, program of National resources board; EP 723
  - Social plan for; E 662
  - Transport, minister of, proposed; E.... 369
    - See also Russian-American relations
- United States chamber of commerce, blast against "subversive activities"; EP... 725
- United States congress against war and fascism; EP 422
- United States steel corporation. See Steel and iron.
- United textile workers of America. See Cotton-textiles industry
- Universities and colleges. See Academic freedom
- Utilities, public. See Public utilities
- Utopia incorporated. See California
- Utopian society of America; defense. W. E. Thomas; C 299

V

- Vacation, place for; Dt.................... 384
- Valentine, Commissioner Lewis J.; order to police to use brutality; EP........... 724
- Valley Forge. J. W. Krutch; D........... 749
- Van Doren, Mark
  - Sonnets; P 76
- Van Kleeck, Mary, and M. L. Fledderus
  - Social economic planning; C........... 621
- Vare, William S.; death; EP.............. 199
- Viereck, George Sylvester; Nazi propagandist; EP 85
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
  - Issues and men:
    - Baker, Newton D.; S.............. 7
    - Borah on the war path; S.......... 91
    - Cuban reciprocity pact; S.......... 287
    - Custer, General G. A., comment on life; S 701
    - European war, anniversary; S...... 203
    - European war, error, German, that cost war; S 610
    - Farley, James A., and the jobs; S.. 497
    - German character, strange; S...... 63
    - Germany, boycott of; S............ 315
    - Gruening, E., appointment; S...232; see also EP.................... 225
    - Hindenburg—patriot and traitor; S. 175
    - Hitler's "me und Gott"; S......... 119
    - La Follette, Robert M., junior; S.. 147
    - Morro castle (steamship) and after; S 343
    - Moses, Robert; S.................. 427
    - Munitions of war, international traffic; S 371
    - O'Ryan, John F., case of; S....... 399
    - Peace cause; S 525
    - Pioneering spirit, the; S........... 701
    - Propaganda in the movies; S...... 665
    - Republicans, plight of; S.......... 637
    - Roosevelt, President, and election results; S 581
    - Roosevelt, and labor; S............ 259
    - Russian "purging"; S............ 729
    - Safety at sea; S.................. 469
    - Sinclair, U., candidacy for governorship nomination; S.............. 35
    - Trains; S 555

W

- W., J.
  - Textile strike, the; S.................. 273
- Wages. See Labor
- Wagner, Joseph
  - Class-war prisoners' Christmas fund; C. 713
- Waldman, Louis
  - Corrects Nation's comment on New York state socialist convention; C, with editorial comment...131; see also EP... 31
- Wale, Fred
  - On proposed liberal party; C.......... 739
- Walker, W. Dacre; to receive British annuity for saving of life of Charles II. by ancestor; EP................ 143
- War, future; prospects in Europe; EP...... 171
  - Profits. See Munitions of war
- War, European. See European war
- Ward, Harry F.
  - Intervention in China by United States; C 712
- Warne, Colston E., and L. Huberman
  - Government, United States, strike-breaker; S 188
- Warner, J. W.
  - Commends The Nation's stand on collective bargaining; C................ 300
- Washington, dog days in. M. Adams; S.... 96
- Washington naval treaty. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Wasserman, William Stix
  - Liberal futility and a new approach; S.. 498
- Waterbury, Connecticut; workers and the code; EP 2
- Waxman, Jerome
  - On farm loans; C.....537; see also.... 408
- Weather; drought, ravages of; E.......... 145
- Wechsler, James A.
  - Congress aaginst war and fascism; C... 241
- Weirton steel company. See Steel and iron
- Welfare legislation. See Insurance, social
- Western literary messenger; material sought. E. W. Clement; C.................. 384
- Western unionism. H. Solow; C.......... 622
- What business men think:
  - I. Liberal futility and a new approach. W. S. Wasserman; S................ 498
  - II. The hand of improvidence. W. L. Garrison, junior; S.................. 562
  - III. Grab the torch, men of means! M. Perkins; S...................... 618
  - IV. See the new deal through! E. A. Filene; S 707
- Wheat; planning, international, difficulty in; EP 254
- White, Eliot
  - San Francisco strike, "silver lining"; C. 352
- White legion. See Ku klux klan
- Wichita, Kansas, conflict in. A. D. Carlson; S 534
- Williams, Chester
  - Not ejected from San Diego; C....410; see also 243
- Wilson, Walter
  - Herndon, case; S 127
- Wilson, Walter
  - O'Ryan, commissioner; terrorist; S..181; see also EP 142
- Wisconsin; party, new. H. M. Groves; S.. 122
- Wit and humor; E......................... 609
- Withers, William
  - Federal finance; S 505
- Within the gates. J. W. Krutch; D........ 546
- Wittenber, Jan; demand for release. National board, John Reed clubs; C.......... 47
- Wolff, Walter H., and others
  - Fascism in New York high schools; C.. 590
- Women
  - And wages. A. Lutz; S, 440; see also C, 564
  - Desires; meeting of International council of women. M. D. Cothren; S....... 184
  - Working. H. Kravif; C, 212; see also.. 80
  - See also Italy
- Women's international league for peace and freedom. See Pacifism
- Works, public. See Public works
- World in revolt, the, film, not reactionary. E. Lengyel; C, 212; see also........ 124
- World moves on, the. W. Troy; MP...... 336
- World revolution. L. Fischer; C........... 186
- World war. See European war
- Worthy, Morgan
  - On Krutch articles on Europe; C...... 437
- Writers. See Authors

Y

- Young, P. B., senior
  - Crawford case; C, 158; see also....... 17
- Yugoslavia. See Jugoslavia

Z

- Zaturenska, Marya
  - Benediction in midsummer; P.......... 49

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

- ABC of reading. E. Pound; B............ 458
- Abel, Lionel; R, 443, 514 (see also 591); 542 (see also 592); 684
- Abrams, Ray H.
  - Preachers present arms; B............. 108
- Adamic, Louis
  - Dynamite: The story of class violence in America; B..................... 248
- Adamic, Louis; R......................... 655
- Adventurous thirties, the: A chapter in the women's movement. J. E. Courtney; AN 168
- Alexander, R. S.; R..................26, 544
- Alexander the corrector. E. Olivier; B...... 194
- Amaranth. E. A. Robinson; B............ 457
- American ballads and folk songs. Collected and compiled by J. A. Lomax and A. Lomax; B......................... 514
- American farm policy. W. Gee; B.......... 51
- American farmer and the export market, the. A. A. Dowell and O. B. Jesness; AN. 54
- American legal records. Volume I; Proceedings of the Maryland court of appeals, 1695-1729. Edited by C. T. Bond and and R. B. Morris; AN............. 137
- American song: A book of poems. P. Engle; B 248
- American theater as seen by its critics, the. Edited by J. M. Brown and M. J. Moses; B......................... 717
- America's capacity to consume. M. Leven, H. G. Moulton, and C. Warburton; B 483
- America's capacity to produce. E. G. Nourse and Associates; B................. 108
- America's hour of decision. G. Frank; B... 653
- Amster, Leonard; R....................53, 390
- And quiet flows the Don. M. Sholokov. Translated by S. Garry; B.......... 50
- Anderson, Sherwood; R................... 49
- André Gide: His life and his work. L. Pierre-Quint; B.................. 444
- Angas, L. L. B.
  - Coming American boom, the; B........ 360
- Anne of England. M. R. Hopkinson; B.. 655
- Anteroom, the. K. O'Brien; B............ 544
- Anthony, Katharine; R................... 133
- Appel, Benjamin
  - Brain guy; AN....................... 168
- Appointment in Samarra. J. O'Hara; B... 220
- Architecture of the universe, the. W. F. G. Swann; B...................... 222
- Armstrong, Hamilton Fish. Europe between wars? AN......................... 168
- Art and the life of action. M. Eastman; B.. 687
- Art now. H. Read; B..................... 25

Index

Art of becoming a mother, the: The pregnant woman. P. Brown; AN....... 656
Asch, Sholem
  Salvation. W. and E. Muir, translators; B 451
Autobiography. J. C. Powys; B........... 626
Ayscough, Florence
  Travels of a Chinese poet. Tu Fu, guest of rivers and lakes. Volume II: A. D. 759-770; AN........................ 600

B

Baker, S. Josephine; R................... 719
Babouk. G. Endore; AN................... 545
Balletomania. A. Haskell; B............. 628
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R..............453, 653
Basket for a fair. L. Benét; AN.......... 690
Bates, H. E.
  Woman who had imagination, the; AN.. 252
Batho, Edith C.
  Later Wordsworth, the; AN........... 56
Beale street: Where the blues began. G. W. Lee; B 279
Beard, Charles A.
  Open door at home, the; B........... 625
Beebe, William
  Half mile down; B......686; correction of price: $5, not $3.50, Nation, January 2, 1935........................ 26
Benedict, Ruth; R.....................598, 686
Benét, Laura
  Basket for a fair; AN............... 690
Benjamin Rush, physician and citizen, 1746-1813. N. G. Goodman; AN.......... 600
Berdyaev, Nicholas
  Dostoievsky; B...................... 682
Berle, A. A., junior; R, 305 (see also C, 536)
Beyond Damascus. F. A. Spencer; B...... 599
Beyond the new deal. D. Lawrence; B...... 653
Birth control: Its use and misuse. D. D. Bromley; B........................ 719
Bisson, T. A.; R.......................307, 689
Black monastery. A. Kuncz. Translated by R. Murray; B...................... 357
Blackmur, R. P.; R..............220, 688, 717
Blagoyeva, Stella D.
  Dimitrov, A., biography; AN.......... 656
Blaine, James G., biography. D. S. Muzzey; B 452
Blanco, Antonio de Fierro
  Rico, bandit and dictator; B.......... 166
Blasio, José Luis
  Maximilian, emperor of Mexico; B..... 571
Blood and tears. B. Olden; AN............ 252
Bolitho, Sybil
  My shadow as I pass; AN............ 545
Bolitho, William, biography. S. Bolitho; AN. 545
Boyd, Ernest; R.......................... 52
Boyle, Kay
  My next bride; B................... 746
Brailsford, H. N.
  Property or peace; B................ 22
Brain guy. B. Appel; AN................ 168
Brenner, Anita; R; see letter.............. 47
Bromley, Dorothy Dunbar
  Birth control: Its use and misuse; B.. 719
Brown, John, biography. D. Karsner; B.... 416
Brown, John Mason
  Letters from green room ghosts; B.... 717
Brown, Porter
  Art of becoming a mother, the: The pregnant women; AN................ 656
Browne, Lewi
  How odd of God: An introduction to the Jews; B............................ 52
Bruce, Kate Mary
  Duck's back; AN..................... 54
Bryant, Arthur
  Samuel Pepys. The man in the making; AN 54
Bunin, Ivan
  Grammar of love. J. Cournos, translator; AN.......................... 361
Burke, Kenneth; R....................... 458
Burnett, W. R.
  Goodbye to the past; AN............ 572
Burnett, Whit
  Maker of signs, the; B.............. 416
Burnham, James; R...............50, 306, 682
Burning of the reichstag, the. D. Reed; B.. 193
Burtt, E. A.; R.......................... 748
Butcher, Harold; R....................... 627

C

C. P. Scott of the Manchester Guardian. J. L. Hammond; B................ 627
Cabell, Branch
  Ladies and gentlemen; B.............. 449
Calico shoes. J. T. Farrell; B........... 458
Carlyle in old age (1865-1881). D. A. Wilson and D. W. MacArthur; B....... 278
Carmer, Carl
  Stars fell on Alabama; B............ 49
Challenge to liberty, the. H. Hoover; B.... 456
Challenge to the new deal. Edited by A. M. Bingham and S. Rodman; B........ 453
Chamberlin, William Henry
  Russia's iron age; B................. 567
Chapin, Henry
  Leifsaga; AN......................... 691
Charles, Edward and Mary
  Indian patchwork; B.................. 417
Chase, Stuart
  Economy of abundance; article by author in reply to review by J. Strachey; S, 93; letter by F. Morrow; C......... 270
China, two books on; B.................. 307
China's red army marches. A. Smedley; B.. 307
Chinese renaissance, the. Hu Shih; B...... 250
Chinese soviets, the. V. A. Yakhontoff; B.. 389
Chinese testament, a. S. Tretiakov; B..... 278
Clay, Cassius M.
  Mainstay of American individualism, the. A survey of the farm question; B.... 51
Cohen, Elliot F.; R...................... 193
Cold journey, the. G. Z. Stone; B......... 390
Coleridge: Selected poetry and prose. Edited by S. Porter; AN................. 137
Collected poems. V. Sackville-West; AN... 656
Collier, John
  Defy the foul fiend; AN.............. 168
Coming American boom, the. L. L. B. Angas; B.......................... 360
Coming American revolution, the. G. Soule; B, 76; correction of price........... 749
Common faith, a. J. Dewey; B............ 358
Condorcet and the rise of liberalism in France. J. S. Schapiro; B.......... 597
Cool million, a: or the dismantling of Lemuel Pitkin. N. West; AN............... 112
Corey, Lewis
  Decline of American capitalism, the; B, 305; see also C.................... 536
Corey, Lewis; R......................248, 745
Corvo, biography, A. J. A. Symons; B..... 305
Courtney, Janet E.
  Adventurous thirties, the: A chapter in the women's movement; AN......... 168
Cowley, Malcolm
  Exile's return; B.................... 23
Craven, Thomas; R....................... 360
Cruden, Alexander, biography. E. Olivier; B. 194
Culture in the south. Edited by W. T. Couch; B............................ 110
Curtis, Charles P., junior, and G. C. Homans
  Introduction to Pareto, an; AN....... 516
Curzon: The last phase. 1919-1925. A study in post-war diplomacy. H. Nicolson; B 165
Cushman, Rebecca
  Swing your mountain gal; AN........ 691

D

D is for Dutch. T. Williamson; AN....... 545
Dabney, Virginius; R..................... 110
Darby, Hugh H.; R....................... 686
Daring young man on the flying trapeze, the, and other stories. W. Saroyan; B, 541; see also C..................... 645
Death and birth of David Markand, the. W... Frank; B, 542; see also............ 592
Decline of American capitalism, the. L. Corey; B, 305; see also C.......... 536
Defy the foul fiend. J. Collier; AN....... 168
Dennen, Leon
  Where the ghetto ends: Jews in soviet Russia; B......................... 655
Deutsch, Babette; R....................51, 687
Dewey, John
  Common faith, a; B.................. 358
De Wilde, John C.; R.................... 746
Dickinson, Goldsworthy Lowes, biography. E. M. Forster; B...................... 24
Dictionary of American slang, a. M. H. Weseen; B......................... 628
Dimitrov, A., biography. S. D. Blagoyeva; AN 656
Discrete series. G. Oppen; AN............ 84
Dobrée, Bonamy
  Modern prose style; B................ 626
Dostoevsky, A. Yarmolinsky; B........... 682
Dostoievsky. N. Berdyaev; B.............. 683
Douglas, Paul H.; R...................... 221
Dowell, Austin A., and O. B. Jesness
  American farmer and the export market, the; AN.......................... 54
Driving axle. V. Ilyenkov; B.............. 26
Duck's back. K. M. Bruce; AN............ 54
Duel. R. Fangen. Translated by P. Wiking; B 23
Duranty, Walter
  Duranty reports Russia; AN.......... 54
Dutt, R. Palme
  Fascism and social revolution; B...... 681
Dynamite: The story of class violence in America. L. Adamic; B............. 248

E

Eastman, Max
  Art and the life of action; B.......... 687
Economic history of the south. E. Q. Hawk; B 81
Economy of abundance. S. Chase. Article by author in reply to review by J. Strachey; S, 93; letter by F. Morrow; C 270
Edman, Irwin; R......................... 599
Eleven new cantos; XXXI to XLI. E. Pound; B.......................... 599
Ely-Estorick, Eric; R.................... 308
Empire in the east. Edited by J. Barnes; B. 109
Endore, Guy
  Babouk; AN......................... 545
England under Queen Anne: The peace and the protestant succession. G. M. Trevelyan; B......................... 655
Engle, Paul
  American song: A book of poems; B... 248
English journey. J. B. Priestley; B....... 249
Escape from the soviets. T. Tchernavin. Translated by T. Alexander; B...... 79
Essays in our changing order. T. Veblen; B 745
Europe between wars? H. F. Armstrong; AN 168
Executioner waits, the. J. Herbst; B, 514; see also 591
Exile's return. M. Cowley; B............ 23
Experiment in autobiography. Discoveries and conclusions of a very ordinary brain (since 1866). H. G. Wells; B.. 567

F

Fangen, Ronald
  Duel. P. Wiking, translator; B........ 23
Farrell, James T.
  Calico shoes; B...................... 458
Farrell, James T.; R..................... 308
Fascism and social revolution. R. P. Dutt; B 681
Father goose. The story of Mack Sennett. G. Fowler; E....................... 524
Faulhaber, Cardinal
  Judaism, Christianity, and Germany; B.. 224
Fay, Sidney B; R......................... 570
Fifty best books of 1934.................. 668
First year of the revolution, the. A. French; AN 749
Florinsky, Michael T.
  Saar struggle, the; B................. 746
Flynn, John T.
  Security speculation: Its economic effects; B 277
Folks, the. R. Suckow; B................. 454
Fontamara. I. Silone. Translated by M. Wharf; B.......................... 389
Foreground of American fiction, the. H. Hartwick; AN...................... 136
Forster, E. M.
  Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson; B...... 24
Forty days of Musa Dagh, the. F. Werfel; B 684
Forty-two years in the white house. I. H. (Ike) Hoover; B, 388; see also C.... 536
Foundry, the. A. Halper; B............... 306
Fowler, Gene
  Father goose. The story of Mack Sennett; E........................... 524
Frank, Glenn
  America's hour of decision; B......... 653
Frank, Waldo
  Death and birth of David Markand, the; B, 542; see also.................. 592
Freedom versus organization: 1814-1914. B. Russell; B........................ 448
French, Allen
  First year of the revolution, the; AN.. 749
Full flavour. D. Leslie; AN.............. 279
Functional affinities of man, monkeys, and apes. S. Zuckerman; AN........... 84
Fundamental laws of the Chinese soviet republic. Introduction by B. Kun; B.. 307

G

Gannett, Lewis
  Sweet land; AN....................... 250
Gee, Wilson
  American farm policy; B.............. 51
Gellert, Hugo
  Karl Marx' Capital in lithographs; he replies to review by A. Brenner; C... 47
Gengo, Kimi
  To one who mourns at the death of the emperor; AN 196
Georgian scene, the. F. Swinnerton; B..... 681
Gerhardi, William
  Resurrection; B...................... 541
German family. L. C. N. Stone; AN...... 54
Gide, André, biography; B................ 444
Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson. E. M. Forster; B............................ 24
Goodbye to the past. W. R. Burnett; AN... 572
Goodman, Nathan G.
  Benjamin Rush, physician and citizen, 1746-1813; AN.................... 600
Grammar of love. I. Bunin. Translated by J. Cournos; AN.................... 361
Great doctors, the. H. E. Sigerist. Translated by E. and C. Paul; AN....... 252

- Greenwood, Walter
  - Love on the dole; AN........ 361
- Gregg, Richard B.
  - Power of non-violence, the; B........ 718
- Gregg, Richard B.; R........ 417
- Gruening, Ernest; R........134, 571

H

- Hacker, Louis M.
  - Short history of the new deal, a; B..... 453
- Hacker, Louis M.; R........ 76
- Half mile down. W. Beebe; B......686; correction of price: $5, not $3.50, Nation, January 2, 1935........ 26
- Hallgren, Mauritz A.; R........109, 389
- Halper, Albert
  - Foundry, the; B........ 306
- Harding, Bertita
  - Phantom crown; B........ 571
- Hartwick, Harry
  - Foreground of American fiction, the; AN........ 136
- Harvest in the north. J. L. Hodson; AN... 362
- Haskell, Arnold
  - Balletomania; B........ 628
- Haskell, Douglas; R........ 597
- Hawk, Emory Q.
  - Economic history of the south; B....... 81
- Heard, Gerald
  - These hurrying years; B........ 357
- Hendel, Charles William
  - Jean-Jacques Rousseau, moralist; B..... 334
- Henri, Ernest
  - Hitler over Europe; B........ 107
- Herbert, A. P.
  - Holy deadlock; AN........ 252
- Herbst, Josephine
  - Executioner waits, the; B, 514; see also 591
- Herskovits, Melville J. and Frances S.
  - Rebel destiny. Among the bush negroes of Dutch Guiana; B........ 135
- Hibbard, Benjamin Horace; R........ 51
- Hitler over Europe. E. Henri; B........ 107
- Hitler—whence and whither? W. Steed; B.. 359
- Hodson, James Lansdale
  - Harvest in the north; AN........ 362
- Hogbin, H. Ian
  - Law and order in Polynesia; B........ 598
- Holy deadlock. A. P. Herbert; AN........ 252
- Homans, George C., and Charles P. Curtis, junior
  - Introduction to Pareto, an; AN........ 516
- Hoover, Herbert
  - Challenge to liberty, the; B........ 456
- Hoover, Irwin H. (Ike)
  - Forty-two years in the white house; B, 388; see also C........ 536
- Hopkinson, M. R.
  - Anne of England; B........ 655
- Horizons of death. M. Macleod; AN....... 690
- House in the hills, the. S. Ratel. Translated by E. Sutton; AN........ 26
- How odd of God: An introduction to the Jews. L. Browne; B........ 52
- Hoxsie sells his acres. An American novel in verse. C. La Farge; AN........ 54
- Hu Shih
  - Chinese renaissance, the; B........ 250
- Hughes, Langston
  - Ways of white folks, the; B........ 49
- Hutchins, Grace
  - Women who work; B, 80; see also C........212, 325

I

- I worked for the soviet. Countess Alexandra Tolstoy; B........ 567
- Ickes, Harold L.
  - New democracy, the; B........ 653
- Ilyenkov, V.
  - Driving axle; B........ 26
- In the dark backward. H. W. Nevinson; B........ 331
- Indian patchwork. E. and M. Charles; B... 417
- Introduction to Pareto, an. G. C. Homans and C. P. Curtis, junior; AN........ 516
- Isaac Newton. L. T. More; B........ 748
- It's up to us. J. P. Warburg; B........ 415

J

- James G. Blaine. A political idol of other days. D. S. Muzzey; B........ 452
- Japan in crisis. H. E. Wildes; B........ 689
- Jean-Jacques Rousseau, moralist. C. W. Hendel; B........ 334
- Jesness, Oscar B., and A. A. Dowell
  - American farmer and the export market, the; AN........ 54
- Jews in the modern world, the. A. Ruppin; B........ 52
- John Brown: Terrible "saint." D. Karsner; B........ 416
- Johnson, Josephine
  - Now in November; B........ 360
- Johnston, Sir Reginald
  - Twilight in the forbidden city; B....... 332
- Jones, Joseph M.
  - Tariff retaliation; B........ 195
- Journey into Rabelais's country, a. A. J. Nock; B........ 485
- Judaism as a civilization: Toward a reconstruction of American-Jewish life. M. M. Kaplan; B........ 82
- Judaism, Christianity, and Germany. Cardinal Faulhaber; B........ 224

K

- K., L.; R........ 628
- Kaplan, Mordecai M.
  - Judaism as a civilization: Toward a reconstruction of American-Jewish life; B........ 82
- Karl Marx' Capital in lithographs; author, H. Gellert, replies to review by A. Brenner; C........ 48
- Karsner, David
  - John Brown: Terrible "saint"; B...... 416
- Kaye-Smith, Sheila
  - Superstition corner; AN........ 26
- Kendrick, B. B.; R........ 53
- Kent, Frank R.
  - Without gloves; B........ 453
- Kenton, Edna; R........249, 305, 485
- Kronenberger, Louis; R, 458, 541 (see also C, 645)
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R......357, 415, 448, 541, 597, 681, 717
- Kuncz, Aladar
  - Black monastery. R. Murray, translator; B........ 357

L

- Labor fact book II. Prepared by the Labor research association; AN........ 250
- Ladies and gentlemen. B. Cabell; B....... 449
- La Farge, Christopher
  - Hoxsie sells his acres. An American novel in verse; AN........ 54
- Laing, Alexander
  - Wine and physic; B........ 51
- Larkin, Margaret; R........ 279
- Later Wordsworth, the. E. C. Batho; AN.. 56
- Law and order in Polynesia. H. I. Hogbin; B........ 598
- Lawrence, D. H.
  - Modern lover, a; B........ 483
- Lawrence, D. H., biography. F. Lawrence; B........ 483
- Lawrence, David
  - Beyond the new deal; B........ 653
- Lawrence, Frieda
  - Not I, but the wind; B........ 483
- Lawrence, Josephine
  - Years are so long; AN........ 112
- Lee, George W.
  - Beale street: Where the blues began; B........ 279
- Lee, Robert E., biography. D. S. Freeman; B........ 747
- Leifsaga. H. Chapin; AN........ 691
- Leslie, Doris
  - Full flavour; AN........ 279
- Letters from green room ghosts. J. M. Brown; B........ 717
- Leven, Maurice, H. G. Moulton, and C. Warburton
  - America's capacity to consume; B..... 483
- Levy, Beryl Harold; R........ 82
- Lewisohn, Ludwig
  - Permanent horizon, the; B........ 455
- Lewisohn, Ludwig; R........23, 451
- Lippmann, Walter
  - Method of freedom, the; B........ 76
- Livingston, Arthur; R........484, 626
- Lloyd George, David
  - War memoirs of David Lloyd George, 1916-1917. Volume III; B........ 570
- Loeb classical library. Silius Italicus; Punica, and Philo, volume V; AN........ 56
- Lore, Ludwig; R........107, 193, 224, 359
- Love on the dole. W. Greenwood; AN...... 361
- Lust for life. I. Stone; B........ 543

M

- MacArthur, David Wilson, and D. A. Wilson
  - Carlyle in old age (1865-1881); B..... 278
- Macleod, Norman
  - Horizons of death; AN........ 690
- Magpie: The autobiography of a nymph errant. L. Vidal; B........ 133
- Mainstay of American individualism, the. A survey of the farm question. C. M. Clay; B........ 51
- Maker of signs, the. W. Burnett; B....... 416
- Malraux, André
  - Man's fate; B........ 443
- Man with a bull-tongue plow. J. Stuart; B.. 516
- Man's fate. A. Malraux; B........ 443
- Manuscript of Shakespeare's "Hamlet" and the problems of its transmission, the. An essay in critical bibliography. J. D. Wilson; AN........ 516
- Markievicz, Countess
  - Prison letters; AN........ 196
- Marshall, Bruce
  - Prayer for the living; AN........ 362
- Matador. M. Steen; B........ 53
- Maximilian, emperor of Mexico. J. L. Blasio; B........ 571
- Maximilian, emperor, two books on; B..... 571
- McCarthy, Mary; R........167, 196, 416, 746
- McGreevy, Thomas
  - Poems; AN........ 691
- Mead, Margaret; R........ 686
- Melamed, S. M.
  - Spinoza and Buddha. Visions of a dead god; B........ 222
- Mencken, H. L.; R......165, 331, 450, 567, 628
- Method and theory of ethnology, the. P. Radin; AN........ 26
- Method of freedom, the. W. Lippmann; B.. 76
- Millay, Edna St. Vincent
  - Wine from these grapes; B........ 568
- Miles
  - Socialism's new beginning; B........ 135
- Miller, Max
  - Second house from the corner, the; B.. 249
- Milton, George Fort; R........390, 747
- Mississippi question, the. A. P. Whitaker; B........ 53
- Mitchell, Broadus; R........81, 456
- Mobilizing for chaos. The story of the new propaganda. O. W. Riegel; B....... 684
- Modern American prose. Edited by C. Van Doren; B........ 165
- Modern lover, a. D. H. Lawrence; B....... 483
- Modern prose style. B. Dobrée; B........ 626
- Molyneaux, Peter
  - What economic nationalism means to the south; AN........ 280
- More, Louis Trenchard
  - Isaac Newton; B........ 748
- Morgan, John Hunt, biography. H. Swiggett; B........ 390
- Morse, Robert; R........ 543
- Moulton, Harold H., M. Leven, and C. Warburton
  - America's capacity to consume; B...... 483
- Munro, Dana
  - United States and the Caribbean area, the; B........ 134
- Murdock, George Peter
  - Our primitive contemporaries; AN..... 136
- Muzzey, David Saville
  - James G. Blaine. A political idol of other days; B........ 452
- My next bride. K. Boyle; B........ 746
- My shadow as I pass. S. Bolitho; AN..... 545

N

- Naked truth, the, and eleven other stories. L. Pirandello. Translated by A. and H. Mayne; B........ 484
- Neff, Emery; R........ 278
- Nevinson, Henry W.
  - In the dark background; B........ 331
- New careers for youth. W. B. Pitkin; B... 193
- New deal, five books on; B........ 653
- New deal in action, the. S. C. Wallace; B.. 653
- New democracy, the. H. L. Ickes; B...... 653
- New frontiers. H. Wallace; B........ 653
- Newton, Isaac, biography. L. T. More; B.. 747
- Nicolson, Harold
  - Curzon: The last phase. 1919-1925. A study in post-war diplomacy; B...... 165
- Niebuhr, Reinhold
  - Reflections on the end of an era; B... 50
- Niebuhr, Reinhold; R........136, 358, 455, 718
- Nock, Albert Jay
  - Journey into Rabelais's country, a; B.. 485
- Noguchi, Yone
  - Ukiyo-ye primitives, the; B........ 77
- Not I, but the wind. F. Lawrence; B.... 483
- Nourse, Edwin G., and associates
  - America's capacity to produce; B...... 108
- Now in November. J. Johnson; B........ 360
- Nuhn, Ferner; R........360, 483

O

- O'Brien, Kate
  - Anteroom, the; B........ 544
- O'Hara, John
  - Appointment in Samarra; B........ 220
- Olden, Balder
  - Blood and tears; AN........ 252
- Olivier, Edith
  - Alexander the corrector; B........ 194
- On the Volga. P. Romanof; B........ 308
- Open door at home, the. C. A. Beard; B... 625
- Oppen, George
  - Discrete series; AN........ 84
- Origins of modern Spain, the. J. B. Trend; AN........ 196

Our mysterious life glands and how they affect us. W. J. Robinson; AN...... 572
Our primitive contemporaries. G. P. Murdock; AN........................ 136

P

Pareto, an introduction to. G. C. Homans and C. P. Curtis, junior; AN....... 516
Parkes, H. B.; R.......................249, 655
Patterns of culture. R. Benedict; B....... 686
Pepys, Samuel; biography. A. Bryant; AN.. 54
Permanent horizon, the. L. Lewisohn; B... 455
Phantom crown. B. Harding; B........... 571
Philo. Volume V. Translated by F. H. Colson and G. H. Whitaker; AN.... 56
Philosophy of Spinoza, the. Unfolding the latent process of his reasoning. H. A. Wolfson; B..................... 222
Pierre-Quint, Léon
    André Gide: His life and his work; B.. 444
Pirandello, Luigi
    Naked truth, the, and eleven other stories. A. and H. Mayne, translators; B............................ 484
Pitkin, Walter B.
    New careers for youth; B............. 193
Plastic redirections in 20th century painting. J. J. Sweeney; B............. 360
Pleasures of poetry, the. First series, Milton and the Augustan age. Second series, The romantic revival. Third series, The Victorian age; B............... 307
Poems. T. McGreevy; AN................ 691
Poems and sonnets. E. Walsh; with a memoir by E. Moorhead; B......... 688
Polakov, Walter N.; R.................. 108
Pound, Ezra
    ABC of reading; B.................. 458
    Eleven new cantos: XXXI to XLI; B.. 599
Power of non-violence, the. R. B. Gregg; B 718
Powys, John Cowper
    Autobiography; B.................... 626
Prayer for the living. B. Marshall; AN... 362
Preachers present arms. R. H. Abrams; B.. 108
Priestley, J. B.
    English journey; B.................. 249
Prison letters of Countess Markievicz; AN.. 196
Property of peace. H. N. Brailsford; B.... 22
Proud and the meek, the. J. Romains. Translated by W. B. Wells; B............ 513
Proust, Marcel
    Remembrance of things past. With introduction by J. W. Krutch; B......... 653
Punica. Silius Italicus. Translated by J. D. Duff; AN...................... 56

Q

Queeney letters, the. Edited by the Marquis of Lansdowne; B.................. 415
Quest for Corvo, the. An experiment in biography. A. J. A. Symons; B...... 305
Quest for security, the. I. M. Rubinow; B.. 221

R

R. E. Lee. D. S. Freeman; B............ 747
Racial myth, the. P. Radin; AN.......... 26
Radin, Paul
    Method and theory of ethnology, the; AN 26
    Racial myth, the; AN................ 26
Rameses to Rockefeller: The story of architecture. C. H. Whitaker; B......... 597
Ratel, Simonne
    House in the hills, the. E. Sutton, translator; AN......................... 26
Read, Herbert
    Art now; B......................... 25
Reality and illusion. R. Rothschild; B..... 78
Rebel destiny. Among the bush negroes of Dutch Guiana. M. J. Herskovits and F. S. Herskovits; B................ 135
Rebel raider, the: A life of John Hunt Morgan. H. Swiggett; B............... 390
Reed, Douglas
    Burning of the reichstag, the; B....... 193
Reflections on the end of an era. R. Niebuhr; B.......................... 50
Reis, Lincoln; R..................23, 78, 222
Remembrance of things past. M. Proust. With introduction by J. W. Krutch; B 653
Resurrection. W. Gerhardi; B............ 541
Rice, Philip Blair; R........332, 568, 599, 747
Rico, bandit and dictator. A. de Fierro Blanco; B......................... 166
Riegel, O. W.
    Mobilizing for chaos. The story of the new propaganda; B................ 684
Robey, Ralph
    Roosevelt versus recovery; B.......... 453
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
    Amaranth; B........................ 457
Robinson, William J.
    Our mysterious life glands and how they affect us; AN................. 572
Rock and shell. J. Wheelwright; B....... 418
Rolfe, Frederick William (Baron Corvo), biography. A. J. A. Symons; B...... 305
Rolland, Romain
    World in birth, a; B................ 543
Romains, Jules
    Proud and the meek, the. W. B. Wells, translator; B...................... 513
Romanof, Panteleimon
    On the Volga; B.................... 308
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, administration, five books on; B.................. 653
Roosevelt versus recovery. R. Robey; B... 453
Roth, Joseph
    Tarabas. A guest on earth; B....... 717
Rothschild, Richard
    Reality and illusion; B.............. 78
Rourke, Constance; R.................. 166
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, moralist. C. W. Hendel; B........................ 334
Rowland, Benjamin, junior; R........... 77
Rubinow, I. M.
    Quest for security, the; B........... 221
Ruppin, Arthur
    Jews in the modern world, the; B.... 52
Rush, Benjamin, biography. N. G. Goodman; AN.......................... 600
Russell, Bertrand
    Freedom versus organization: 1814-1914; B 448
Russia's iron age. W. H. Chamberlin; B.. 567

S

Saar struggle, the. M. T. Florinsky; B.... 746
Sackville-West, V.
    Collected poems; AN................. 656
Salt, Sidney
    Thirty pieces; AN.................. 691
Salvation. S. Asch. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B........................ 451
Samuel Pepys. The man in the making. A. Bryant; AN....................... 54
Sapir, Edward; R...................... 135
Saroyan, William
    Daring young man on the flying trapeze, the, and other stories; B, 541; see also C.............................. 645
Schapiro, J. Salwyn
    Condorcet and the rise of liberalism in France; B......................... 597
Schapiro, Meyer; R..................... 25
Scott, C. P.; biography. J. L. Hammond; B 627
Second house from the corner, the. M. Miller; B.......................... 249
Security speculation: Its economic effects. J. T. Flynn; B....................... 277
Seldes, George; R...................... 684
Selekman, Sylvia Kopald; R, 80; see also C 212, 235
Sennett, Mack, biography. G. Fowler; E... 524
Sex life of the unmarried adult, the. I. S. Wile, M. D.; AN................. 749
Shakespeare, William, works; AN.......... 692
Shanks, Edward
    Tom Tiddler's ground; AN............ 280
Shih, Hu
    Chinese renaissance, the; B........... 250
Sholokov, Mikhail
    And quiet flows the Don; B.......... 50
Short history of the new deal, a. L. M. Hacker; B......................... 453
Shuster, George N.
    Strong man rules; AN................ 749
Sieveking, Lance
    Woman she was, the; AN............. 112
Sigerist, Henry E.
    Great doctors, the. E. and C. Paul, translators; AN.................... 252
Silius Italicus
    Punica. J. D. Duff, translator; AN... 56
Silone, Ignazio
    Fontamara. M. Wharf, translator; B... 389
Smart set anthology. Edited by B. Rascoe and G. Conklin; B................. 680
Smedley, Agnes
    China's red army marches; B......... 307
Smedley, Agnes; R...................250, 332
So red the rose. S. Young; B............ 167
Social cost of industrial insurance, the. M. Taylor; AN....................... 82
Socialism's new beginning. Miles; B...... 135
Soule, George
    Coming American revolution, the; B, 76; correction of price.................. 749
Spencer, F. A.
    Beyond Damascus; B................ 599
Spinoza, B., two books on; B............ 222
Spinoza and Buddha. Visions of a dead god. S. M. Melamed; B................ 222
Stars fell on Alabama. C. Carmer; B..... 49
Steed, Wickham
    Hitler—whence and whither? B....... 359
Steen, Marguerite
    Matador; B.......................... 53
Stewart, Maxwell, S.; R...........22, 195, 278, 360, 415, 483, 567, 625
Stocking, Collis; R...................... 277
Stone, Grace Zaring
    Cold journey, the; B................ 390
Stone, Irving
    Lust for life; B..................... 543
Stone, L. C. N.
    German family; AN.................. 54
Strachey, John; letter by S. Chase in reply to Strachey review of Chase's "Economy of abundance"; S, 93; letter by F. Morrow; C...................... 270
Strong man rules. G. N. Shuster; AN.... 749
Stuart, Jesse
    Man with a bull-tongue plow; B....... 516
Suckow, Ruth
    Folks, the; B....................... 454
Superstition corner. S. Kaye-Smith; AN... 26
Swann, W. F. G.
    Architecture, of the universe, the; B... 222
Sweeney, James Johnson
    Plastic redirections in 20th century painting; B........................ 360
Sweet land. L. Gannett; AN............. 250
Swiggett, Howard
    Rebel raider, the: A life of John Hunt Morgan; B....................... 390
Swing your mountain gal. R. Cushman; AN. 91
Swinnerton, Frank
    Georgian scene, the; B............... 681
Symons, A. J. A.
    Quest for Corvo, the. An experiment in biography; B..................... 305

T

Tapley, Roberts; R...................... 543
Tarabas. A guest on earth. J. Roth; B.... 717
Tariff retaliation. J. M. Jones; B........ 195
Taylor, Maurice
    Social cost of industrial insurance, the; AN 82
Tchernavin, Tatiana
    Escape from the soviets. T. Alexander, translator; B...................... 79
Ten introductions. Edited by G. Taggard and D. Fitts; B.................... 747
Thesaurus of slang, a. Compiled and arrange by H. N. Rose; B.................. 331
These hurrying years. G. Heard; B....... 357
Thirty pieces. S. Salt; AN.............. 691
Threshold and hearth. M. Zaturenska; B... 332
Tin soldiers. R. Wohlforth; B............ 80
To one who mourns at the death of the emperor. K. Gengo; AN............ 196
Tolstoy, Countess Alexandra
    I worked for the soviet; B............ 567
Tom Tiddler's ground. E. Shanks; AN... 280
Travels of a Chinese poet. Tu Fu, guest of rivers and lakes. Volume II: A. D. 759-770. F. Ayscough; AN....... 600
Trend, J. B.
    Origins of modern Spain, the; AN..... 196
Tretiakov, Sergei
    Chinese testament, a; B.............. 278
Trevelyan, G. M.
    England under Queen Anne: The peace and the protestant succession; B..... 655
Trilling, Lionel; R...................... 24
Troy, William; R.............357, 444, 514,682
Tu Fu, biography. F. Ayscough; AN....... 600
Twilight in the forbidden city. Sir R. Johnston; B........................... 332

U

Ukiyo-ye primitives, the. Y. Noguchi; B.... 77
United States and the Caribbean area, the. D. G. Munro; B................... 134
Upton Sinclair anthology, an. With a preface by U. Sinclair. Compiled by I. O. Evans; B....................... 308

V

Van Doren, Carl; R...................449, 681
Van Doren, Dorothy; R.................. 454
Van Doren, Mark; R.....50, 389, 514, 626, 653
Van Gogh, Vincent, novel on. I. Stone; B.. 543
Veblen, Thorstein
    Essays in our changing order; B...... 745
Vestal, Stanley
    Warpath; AN........................ 136
Vidal, Lois
    Magpie: The autobiography of a nymph errant; B......................... 133
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R, 80, 108, 165, 331, 388 (see also C, 536); 416..... 452
Vivas, Eliseo; R......................222, 334

W

Wallace, Henry
    New frontiers; B.................... 653
Wallace, Schuyler C.
    New deal in action, the; B........... 653

Walsh, Ernest
  Poems and sonnets; with a memoir by E. Moorhead; B.................... 688
Walton, Eda Lou; R....248, 307, 418, 457, 516
War memoirs of David Lloyd George, 1916-1917. Volume III; B............. 570
Warburg, James P.
  It's up to us; B..................... 415
Warburton, Clark, M. Leven, and H. G. Moulton
  America's capacity to consume; B..... 483
Warpath. S. Vestal; AN................. 136
Ways of white folks, the. L. Hughes; B.. 49
Webster's new international dictionary of the English language; B................ 450
Wells, H. G.
  Experiment in autobiography. Discoveries and conclusions of a very ordinary brain (since 1866). H. G. Wells; B.. 567
Werfel, Franz
  Forty days of Musa Dagh, the; B...... 684
Weseen, Maurice H.
  Dictionary of American slang, a; B.... 628
West, Nathanael
  Cool million, a: or the dismantling of Lemuel Pitkin; AN................ 112
What economic nationalism means to the south. P. Molyneaux; AN.......... 280
Wheelwright, John
  Rock and shell; B.................... 418
Where the ghetto ends: Jews in soviet Russia. L. Dennen; B................. 655
Whitaker, Arthur Preston
  Mississippi question, the; B............ 53
Whitaker, Charles Harris
  Rameses to Rockefeller: The story of architecture; B..................... 597
Wildes, Harry Emerson
  Japan in crisis; B.................... 689
Wile, Ira S., M. D.
  Sex life of the unmarried adult, the; AN 749
Williamson, Thames
  D is for Dutch; AN.................. 545
Wilson, David Alec, and D. W. MacArthur
  Carlyle in old age (1865-1881); B...... 267
Wilson, J Dover
  Manuscript of Shakespeare's "Hamlet" and the problems of its transmission, the. An essay in critical bibliography; AN 516
Wine and physic. A. Laing; B............ 51
Wine from these grapes. E. St. V. Millay; B 568
Without gloves. F. R. Kent; B............ 453
Wohlforth, Robert
  Tin soldiers; B....................... 80
Wolfson, Harry Austryn
  Philosophy of Spinoza, the. Unfolding the latent process of his reasoning; B.. 222
Woman she was, the. L. Sieveking; AN 112
Woman who had imagination, the. H. E. Bates; AN......................... 252
Women who work. G. Hutchins; B, 80; see also C..........................212, 325
Wordsworth, William, biography. E. C. Batho; AN........................ 56
Works of William Shakespeare, the; AN.... 692
World in birth, a. R. Rolland; B......... 543

Y

Yakhontoff, Victor A.
  Chinese soviets, the; B................ 389
Yarmolinsky, A.
  Dostoevsky; B........................ 682
Years are so long. J. Lawrence; AN...... 112
Young, Stark
  So red the rose; B.................... 167

Z

Zaturenska, Marya
  Threshold and hearth; B............. 332
Zuckerman, S.
  Functional affinities of man, monkeys, and apes; AN...................... 84

50475

The Nation
FOUNDED 1865

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 4, 1934 No. 3600

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1

EDITORIALS:

General Johnson: Strikebreaker 4
Revolt Within Germany 5
Advertising-as-Usual 5
Adolf's Court Jester 6
ISSUES AND MEN. THE SHAMELESSNESS OF NEWTON D. BAKER. By Oswald Garrison Villard 7
CARTOON: RECKLESS JACK, THE DEMON PLUNGER. By LOW 8
THE STEEL STRIKE COLLAPSES. By Louis Adamic 9
THE BALKANS SWING TO FASCISM. By John Gunther . . . 13
THE DROUGHT AND THE AAA PROGRAM. By Benjamin Horace Hibbard 15
THE CRAWFORD CASE: AN EXPERIMENT IN SOCIAL STATESMANSHIP. By Charles H. Houston and Leon A. Ransom 17
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 19
CORRESPONDENCE 20

BOOKS:

Being. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin 22
Socialism Faces a Changing World. By Maxwell S. Stewart . . 22
The Religious Note. By Lincoln Reis 23
Perpetual Adolescence. By Ludwig Lewisohn 23
Politics and the Liberal. By Lionel Trilling 24
Intuitive Form. By Meyer Schapiro 25
The Factory as Hero. By R. S. Alexander 26
Shorter Notices 26
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 28

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

WHEN HEARINGS were being held on the preliminary steel code just about a year ago, Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, did not hesitate to challenge the steel companies, to call unequivocally for higher wages, shorter hours, and fairer relations between steel workers and their employers. She pointed out that "by some oversight" the steel companies had neglected to provide for the complete abolition of child labor, that the seven-day week and the twelve-hour day could still be permitted under the provisions of the code for an average work week over a six months' period, and in general she brought up an array of facts and displayed a quality of firmness and courage which seemed to indicate that the new deal for labor under the NIRA was more than windy declarations which had no actual content. That was in August, 1933. Today we find Miss Perkins chosen by President Roosevelt as mediator between the steel unions and the Steel Institute. As Louis Adamic shows in his article in this week's Nation, the rank-and-file insurgents in the unions have been persuaded by their leaders and by the Administration to call off their strike and accept a plan of conciliation whose tone is considerably milder than the proposals advanced when talk of a steel strike was first begun. The union proposal, in effect the President's proposal, is the creation of an impartial board to consider violations of the steel code, provision for elections to determine by whom the workers shall be represented, and further provisions that, once workers' representatives have been duly chosen, they shall have power to negotiate with the employers in disputes over working conditions.

NO DIRECT ANSWER to these proposals has as yet come from the steel men. Miss Perkins explains that she prefers to be thought of as a "moderator" rather than a mediator, that she has submitted the union proposals without recommendation and is now waiting for the counterplan of the employers. But if the latter have so far made no formal reply, they have made an informal one by indicating in every way possible their complete intransigence in the whole question of negotiations with the workers. When discussions about the strike call were in progress, they refused to meet with union representatives; they have repeatedly reiterated their uncompromising hostility to the closed shop and to recognition of the union; they have strung barbed wire in front of the steel mills, have supplied the commissaries with emergency cots and food supplies, and have engaged a well-known strike-breaking agency to be on hand to conduct a successful job of scabbing in the event of a strike; and when a World-Telegram reporter, Talcott Powell, went to Gary to look around a bit while there was still a prospect that a strike would be called on June 16, he was arrested by company police and was just saved from a police "work-out" by the timely intervention of a friend. In other words, Miss Perkins as "mediator" or "moderator," no matter which, has a tough job ahead of her. She has a tough job because the steel companies are determined to pursue to the last ditch their hostility to the union, because the plans offered by both sides so far are completely irreconcilable, and, much more important, because to date the Administration has given no evidence that it will attempt seriously to enforce the provisions of the NIRA which are embodied in the union plan. The Budd and Weirton cases among others have demonstrated the weakness of the government's position. With all the good-will in the world toward labor—and Secretary Perkins has demonstrated that she has that good-will—she can make the steel companies retreat only by a show of force. So far the force has been sadly lacking. But if the steel settlement, when it comes, suits the steel companies and not the workers, it will be sad proof that the Administration at Washington from Mr. Roosevelt down has been hog-tied by industry and is without the strength—if it has the will—to break loose.

YIELDING to rank-and-file pressure, William Green has grudgingly consented to the formation of a United Automobile Workers National Council—a first step toward forming "one big union" of automotive workers. Among the members of the Council is Thomas Ramsey, the A. F. of L. union leader in the recent strike of the Auto-Lite workers at Toledo. At the Detroit conference a militant group demanded immediate formation of an auto-workers industrial union and passed sharp resolutions attacking General Johnson and Dr. Leo Wolman, of the Automobile Labor Board, and blacklisting the latter from future service as an NRA mediator. Among the charges are that the board has complacently permitted the manufacturers to entrench the company unions in preparation for another crisis, which is bound to come during the next high-production period of the industry. Clearly, the obsolete craft-union organization of labor under the A. F. of L. is cracking up; most of the "federal" unions chartered since the NRA are in effect local industrial unions and the demand for integrating them into international industrial unions has come with equal insistence from workers in the rubber, radio, and other industries. Moreover, Mr. Green is steadily being driven into an anti-government position. As a labor politician, obliged alternately to placate government, the heads of the craft unions, and the growing militancy of the rank and file, his role becomes increasingly difficult.

INDUSTRIAL NEW ENGLAND looks on as union organizers and manufacturers gird themselves for the impending struggle for control of the 25,000 employees in the factories of Waterbury, Connecticut. Thus far the NRA has fiddled, and the employers—the Waterbury Clock Company specifically—have called the tune; as usual, the tune is company unions "elected" by a vote of 10 per cent of the workers, some of whom cast ballots for Mickey Mouse. Under the code proposed by the Clock Manufacturers of America, which was not adopted, wages were set at $14 weekly for men and $12 for women. As evidenced by the company's statement, what the workers have received during the past year averaged slightly more than $7 a week for a forty-hour week. In the course of the wrangle with the NRA authorities, Mrs. E. M. Herrick, acting chairman of the Regional Labor Board, stated that the company, "while seeking protection from unfair trade practices, has neither joined the NRA, nor is it willing in good faith to bargain until forced to do so by signing the industry code." Some of the Waterbury factories are under the NRA; significantly, the chairman and two members of the code authority for the brass and copper-goods industry are presidents of the three outstanding factories in the city. Recently, influenced by the organizing activities of the International Association of Machinists and the undercover attempts of polishers and buffers to build a union, the leading factories announced a 10-per-cent wage increase. Both sides will probably mark time during the summer, but if the employers continue their present intransigence, a first-class battle is in prospect for the fall. Contemplating this prospect, Waterbury may recall the 1920 strike when the workers fought a pitched battle with the police and militia. This time the workers are if anything more determined, the employers have learned nothing, and the NRA has yet to prove that it can either persuade or compel them.

THE NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS, in proposing a change in that section of their code which relates to the licensing of newsboys, have informed a waiting world that selling papers is not child labor at all. Of course not; and permitting children to work in the beet fields from sunrise to sunset isn't child labor either; and for children to pick the sharp shells off shrimps until their hands get sore isn't child labor. If you don't believe it, ask the beet growers and the owners of the shrimp canneries. Not so many years ago mine owners would have assured you that for children to pick coal in the dark ten hours a day wasn't child labor, but a lot of people have rather contradicted that, so the mine owners don't say it any more. The publishers are still saying it about the newsboys: Just honest, helpful work, bustling around getting rid of papers before and after school and as late in the evening as boys are permitted to work; they add to the family income by doing it and grow up to be great big captains of industry, all of whom, as we know, started as newsboys at the bottom rung of the ladder. The only fly in the beautiful salve put out by the publishers on this subject is a statement of Lewis E. Lawes, warden of Sing Sing Prison. Mr. Lawes expressed his regrets at not being able to attend the hearings on the newspaper code and added:

> I consider it very important as bearing on juvenile delinquency. It has often been said that some of our finest citizens have made their start in life through selling newspapers. In my opinion, these same men had sufficient character, even in their boyhood, to withstand the hard knocks, the temptations, and the bad associations that are a definite part of the life of a newsboy, especially in the metropolitan districts. . . . Recently I had a census taken here in Sing Sing to determine the number of inmates who had sold newspapers in their youth. . . . Of the 2,300 men, over 69 per cent had done so. . . . These figures support my contention, based on nearly thirty years experience, that juvenile delinquency and so-called criminal tendencies are largely the result of detrimental influences and associations that can often be corrected. The use of youngsters below the age of fourteen in selling newspapers, particularly in cities, is not at all calculated to correct such conditions.

No, selling papers isn't child labor; it's education—and Sing Sing is the college at which a lot of the students finally arrive.

"BARUCH WOULD BAN 'Big' War Profits," are the headlines in the New York Times, over a report of the address of Bernard M. Baruch, chairman of the War Industries Board during the World War, at the graduation exercises of the Army Industrial College. Significantly, Mr. Baruch was talking not pacifism, but preparedness. After first declaring his allegiance to the profit economy in war as in peace, Mr. Baruch demanded "the recapture of all profits in bulk made by industries engaged in war supplies, above a small and reasonable return on the moneys invested." Why? First, because if the war profiteers are unchecked, the civilian morale, which according to Napoleon is two-thirds of the battle, is endangered; second, because the war inflation of the debt and its subsequent payment in deflated dollars is likely to bring about a collapse of the capitalist economy. Mr. Baruch points out that our total war expenditure was $39,000,000,000 in terms of 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 dollars, whereas in terms of the purchasing power of 1930 dollars it would have been not more than $15,000,000,000. He doubts that we could stand another such doubling of the burden. Quite evidently what Mr. Baruch is concerned with is the problem of making war safe for capitalism, the latter being in his mind an absolute value transcending such utopian concepts as peace, in which he puts little trust. "National economics," says Mr. Baruch, "are more highly organized than ever before, and all on the basis of offense or reprisal. . . . Airplanes and navies are being increased, and from some far distant places we can faintly hear the tramp of increasingly greater masses of men under arms." The dilemma, then, is that the uncontrolled profit motive drives these competing capitalist states into war; but during war, the profit motive must be controlled so that capitalism may not destroy itself during and after the war which it has made. This sort of thing goes under the name of realpolitik, whereas the attempt to prevent war by the socialization of capitalist countries—this is just millennial day-dreaming!

THANKS TO Mrs. Anna Alson Determan, the University of Minnesota, on whose Board of Regents she sits, has done the truly fine thing of placing military training on an optional basis. Beginning next fall, freshmen and sophomores at the third largest State university, who prefer not to waste valuable time pursuing the art of mass killing, will be free from the compulsion to do so which has existed since the founding of the university eighty-three years ago. One of the newer regents, Mrs. Determan took the common-sense view that the university should require no more than is required by the Morrill Act, particularly since mandatory drill has been the cause of continual controversy and unfavorable publicity. If the rapid rise of sentiment against compulsory R. O. T. C. at land-grant institutions is any criterion, the action of the Minnesota regents will give fresh impetus to the stand for optional training which the University of Wisconsin took twelve years ago. Indeed, only last month the faculty at the University of Missouri, by a 2-to-1 vote, asked its Board of Curators to make the military course a matter of choice. The Missouri curators, however, listened to the professional patriots instead of to the League of Women Voters, the St. Louis Social Justice Commission, and scores of other disinterested organizations, and Missouri will continue with its compulsory R. O. T. C.

BOSTON HAD ANOTHER tea party a few weeks ago to welcome the Nazi propaganda ship Karlsruhe. To be precise, there were two tea parties. At the first one, Governor Ely and Mayor Mansfield received the Hitlerite "good-will" gesture very cordially. The second meeting was sponsored by the Boston Committee to Aid Victims of German Fascism, supported by a number of other anti-fascist organizations, including the Marine Workers' Union and the Irish Workers' Club, and was attended by several hundred Harvard, Radcliffe, and Massachusetts Institute of Technology students. According to the report of an official investigating committee, signed by Professors Arthur N. Holcombe, Ralph Barton Perry, and William Ernest Hocking, the police drove the demonstrators off the lot where they had assembled, and kicked, cuffed, and clubbed with indiscriminate fury. Twenty-one persons were arrested and three of them were slugged after they had reached the station house, one of them, at least, into unconsciousness. At a farcical trial before Judge Sullivan fifteen students and workers were given sentences totaling ninety-three months in jail. The sentences were appealed, and the International Labor Defense charges that the prosecution and the court maneuvered to postpone the hearings until essential student witnesses should have left the State. The hearing is now set for the July session of the Superior Court, and the immediate struggle of the defense is to secure a postponement until fall, when the students will again be available. This brew of Nazi nastiness and police sadism, stirred with the unforgotten leavings of the Sacco-Vanzetti case, is what the descendants of the Puritan Fathers are invited to sip at Beacon Hill tea parties.

CUBA CONTINUES to be a source of perpetual embarrassment to the State Department in its efforts to formulate a liberal policy for the Caribbean. Scarcely had the new treaty abrogating the Platt Amendment been announced when riots broke out in protest against the Department's hand-picked protegé—President Mendieta. Then, as a further token of ingratitude, a Cuban commission recommended the repudiation of the $60,000,000 which the Chase National Bank had advanced to Machado, on the grounds that the debt had been improperly contracted and that "the government should not impoverish its people to pay unjust profits to foreign capital." The fact that United States imports from Cuba have declined from $264,000,000 in 1925 to a scant $58,000,000 in 1933 makes it evident that Cuba could ill-afford to continue full payments on its obligations to this country, except on the basis of a drastic change in our commercial policy. While the recent reduction of half a cent in the duty on sugar is a step in the right direction, it has been virtually nullified by the quota restriction which permits imports only up to three-fifths of the average volume of the 1927-31 period. On the political front, the semi-fascist ABC has withdrawn from the cabinet, and even Mendieta's own Nationalist Party is reported to be wavering in support of the present regime. If the expected happens, and Mendieta is overthrown by the more radical elements in the island, the State Department will do well to practice what it preaches—complete non-interference in Cuban affairs.

THE RESIGNATION OF GRACE ABBOTT as head of the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor terminates thirteen years of peculiarly enlightened service in that capacity. Miss Abbott has been connected with the bureau since 1917, when at President Wilson's request she became director of the Child Labor Division, where she administered the first federal child-labor law, later declared unconstitutional. Before her appointment to head the bureau in 1921, Miss Abbott was adviser on the War Labor Policies Board and secretary of the Children's Commission of the First International Labor Conference. Frances Perkins, long her friend and lately her associate as Secretary of Labor, in a statement calling Miss Abbott "one of the most distinguished women in America," describes in glowing terms the quality of her administration:

> The bureau is increasingly effective largely because Miss Abbott has insisted upon its development in the direction of contacts directly with the people affected by the problems studied. The reports, the advice, the progress emanating from the Children's Bureau under her leadership have raised the standard of life for the children of this Republic immeasurably, and there are thousands of people who will not be able to join in any public expression of gratitude who nevertheless owe enormous benefits in their own lives to the intelligence, character, force, and social-mindedness of this great woman!

With this moving tribute it is impossible not to agree, and to regret at the same time that such a person is leaving the public service. Miss Abbott has been appointed Professor of Public Welfare at the University of Chicago.

General Johnson: Strikebreaker

GENERAL JOHNSON has discharged the president of the NRA Employees Union, John Donovan, attached to the Labor Advisory Board staff. From all accounts Donovan was an efficient, conscientious worker. He had worked for the board on major codes; he had recently been appointed alternate to William Green on the Industrial Relations Board for the lumber code.

The circumstances of the discharge were simple: Donovan headed a committee which waited on the Administrator to protest the earlier dismissal of Mrs. Nancy Luke, a stencil cutter. The committee gained its point; Mrs. Luke was reinstated. But the chairman of the committee, less fortunate, was sacked. Asked to explain, the General retreated into generalities—"inefficient, insubordinate, and absent from duties without leave." The General then passed the matter on to Dr. Gustav Peck, Donovan's immediate superior, who backed up these charges, without bothering to go into details. A day or two later, the General hinted to Mr. Babcock (head of the American Federation of Government Employees, which is now pressing for Donovan's reinstatement) that Donovan was guilty of the dire, secret sin of being "leftist."

The whole affair is a tragic caricature of the story of Section 7-a. Dismissal of the local union president has been the favorite device for smashing unions ever since the American workers were gulled into the belief that the government stood behind their efforts at labor organization. Invariably, the boss charges the union president with "talking too much," with "slacking on the job," with "dropping the monkey wrench." Invariably, too, the foreman swears that what the boss says is true.

Unfortunately for General Johnson, his record with respect to trade unions is all of a piece. On his own admission he was responsible for the inclusion in the automobile code of the "individual-merit" clause, an open attempt to draw whatever teeth were in it out of Section 7-a. By a last minute tactical coup, he sought to exclude John Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, from the code authority of the bituminous coal industry. The election he devised to settle the Budd strike was incredible: The company union sympathizers merely had to abstain from voting in order to express their preferences, so that the trade-union workers, in self-defense, were forced to boycott the referendum.

Consider the General's performance on the occasion of the threatened automobile strike last March. He told the union leaders they were mistaken in going to the National Labor Board for help; they should have applied to the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce! There is also good reason to suspect that the settlement of March 25—President Roosevelt's feat of "social engineering"—was contrived by the General, working hand-in-hand with the automobile employers.

Together with Mr. Richberg, General Johnson has taken opportunity to negate and oppose the National Labor Board's theory of industrial democracy. Thus, on February 3, Messrs. Johnson and Richberg collaborated in drafting an interpretation of the President's executive order of February 1. This order spoke of the "representatives who are selected by a vote of at least a majority of the employees voting, and who have been thereby designated to represent all the employees eligible to participate—for the purpose of collective bargaining." By some miracle of transcendental logic, Messrs. Johnson and Richberg construed this to mean that minority groups were entitled to negotiate separate collective agreements. Thus they sought to save the day for the company union.

In his handling of the threatened steel strike a few weeks ago, General Johnson surpassed himself. He went into conference with the leaders of the Iron and Steel Institute. He came out of it with the proposal that the workers submit themselves to a board authorized to supervise the operation of company-union plans. This proposal he put before workers on the verge of open revolt because of the refusal of the employers to deal with their trade union! No wonder, then, that even President Roosevelt saw the light at last. He turned over the labor troubles of the steel industry to Secretary of Labor Perkins.

But there is more to the case than General Johnson's obvious prejudices. The Donovan case is a symptom of the organic disease that has afflicted the Labor Advisory Board for more than a year. Here was a board whose principal function should have been to introduce collective bargaining into the making and enforcement of codes. Its chairman, Dr. Leo Wolman, entered upon his duties with the reputation of being a labor economist sympathetic with trade-union ideals. Inside of a year, the economist of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers had won a reputation for being "safe" and "sound" with every anti-union industrialist in America. As for the other members of the Board—Messrs. Green, Hillman, Lewis, and so on—they were A. F. of L. union leaders. Their interest, accordingly, has been in stirring their own pots, in bargaining code concessions for their own unions. With the customary astigmatism of our trade-union leaders, they have shown no concern whatever for the great mass of unorganized workers.

Significantly, John Donovan was a labor adviser on codes for such industries as lumber and paper whose workers are mainly unorganized. From all that can be learned of him, he was anxious to bring the benefits of collective bargaining to these workers, energetic in his efforts to do so, and outspoken in his opinions on the subject. So far, the members of the Labor Advisory Board have shown themselves apathetic to Mr. Donovan's fate, although Mr. Green has stated that he has "no reason to doubt his efficiency." Is this apathy to be explained by the indifference of the board members to any activities which might disturb the snug little bargaining game they have been playing with the NRA?

Thus the Donovan discharge becomes a challenge to the decency and integrity of the Labor Advisory Board. He stands for the cause the board members are supposed to represent: collective bargaining for all wage-earners. If the Labor Advisory Board has any ideals and courage, it will ask for Donovan's reinstatement. If it cannot get that reinstatement, then the board should go to the President and declare: Either General Johnson leaves or we do.

Revolt Within Germany

THE more we study Vice-Chancellor Von Papen's attack upon Hitler and Hitlerism the more astounded we are. The gravity of the crisis it provokes is attested not only by the suppression of Von Papen's speech in the German press, but by General Goering's address of June 18 to the Prussian State Council. To the council he admitted this: "I hear so often that confidence is fading and discontent is growing and, when one examines the state of affairs, one must recognize the fact that many reasons for dissatisfaction doubtless exist. We must take care that we do not lose contact with the people. . . . It is necessary that the people should feel that we are looking after them."

Von Papen went extraordinarily far in his attack, not only upon personalities and the radical wing of the Hitler regime but upon the theory of Hitlerism itself. He declared that it would be "a mortal sin, both from the human and the statesman's point of view, not to say what must be said at this decisive juncture of the German revolution." He denounced the muzzling of the press, and declared that the "rich treasure of confidence which the German people bestowed upon it [the government] is in danger." He added that the government knew all about the "untruth, ungentlemanliness, and arrogance" which in certain quarters are marking the revolution, and then made his frontal attack. "The statesmen and politicians," he said, "can reform the state, but not life itself . . . not all life can be organized because then it would be mechanized. The state is organization; life is growth." This is obviously complete treason to the whole Nazi doctrine.

This speech marks the beginning of a battle between reactionaries, with the Prussian Junkers and the great industrialists on one side and National Socialism on the other. Both the landed gentry and the industrial overlords are fundamentally opposed to the "self-made" Nazis, with their noisy exhibitionism, their fantastic religious ideas, their unorthodox economics. Even Nazi brutality and repression, except when directed with accurate aim at the parties of the left, have been distasteful to the gentlemen of the extreme right. Both reactionary groups contributed to Hitler's campaign funds and hoped that they had taken the Nazis safely into their own camps. Hitler surrendered to big business every vestige of control over the financial and industrial organization of the nation and over the destinies of the German workers. He similarly surrendered to the Junker landlords. His fine schemes for dividing the great estates, putting people back on the land, and thus creating a new class of small, independent farmers were quickly forgotten. Instead the landowners received substantial subsidies, and President Hindenburg's country estate was restored to him, freed from its scandalous burden of unpaid taxes and debt. But the Nazi technique of repression was more difficult to control and direct. It operated against the just and the unjust alike; which is to say that along with Communists, Socialists, and Jews, both censorship and terror were turned upon Protestants and Catholics and all the elements in the various military organizations who refused to be coordinated.

Discontent has increased and become more vocal as Germany's economic situation has grown worse. It has penetrated even into the ranks of the army and it emanates from both the right and the left. A rumor was recently printed in the New York Times to the effect that a stormy conference had lately taken place between Chancellor Hitler and Ernst Roehm, in the course of which Roehm warned his chief that the Storm Troopers were "getting restless about what they considered reactionary policies of the government and that unless those policies were changed he could no longer guarantee the conduct of the Storm Troops." Von Papen's speech constitutes the direct, authoritative expression of the disaffection of the right. Hitler is obviously adopting the role of moderator among his quarrelsome supporters. He refused to accept Von Papen's resignation while urging him at the same time to endure the verdict of the censorship.

Probably the most intelligent Nazi analysis of the present crisis was contained in the speech of General Goering cited above. After discussing the existence of discontent and its causes, Goering flatly asserted that the government must choose between a "second revolution" and the ruthless repression of organized disaffection. The "second revolution" he referred to would be the complete establishment of National Socialism, and it is this course, and all manifestations that point toward it, that Von Papen has attacked so ably and so courageously. The fight is between his conception of government—aristocratic, monarchist, and reactionary—and the rowdy, pseudo-radicalism of Hitler.

The battle will not be a brief one nor gently fought, if it really comes to open conflict. The people may actually be called upon to take sides with one or the other of the two great national heroes, Hitler and Hindenburg, although they have so little to gain in the choice of masters thus presented to them. At any rate it will be a genuine test of Hitler's capacity as a statesman and fighter. It is one thing to be a silver-tongued orator and the world's greatest showman, and another to deal with a far-reaching revolt in your own ranks.

Advertising-as-Usual

CONSUMERS, hearing the bang of the speaker's gavel signaling the adjournment of Congress, may well have felt as the automobile workers felt when they heard the Administration's plan to sell them down the river at Detroit. A year ago Professor Tugwell made a gesture in their direction in the form of a new food-and-drug bill; other Administration gestures were embodied in the Consumers' Advisory Board of the NRA, the Lynd recommendation of a Consumers' Standards Board, and the Consumers' Counsel of the AAA. Today consumers are warranted in asking whether at any time these gestures were seriously intended, for when faced by the furious opposition of press, radio, advertising, and patent-medicine and other manufacturing interests the Administration backed down again and again on every crucial issue.

The Tugwell bill, first whittled and then emasculated with the connivance of Senator-doctor-ad-man Copeland, was finally pigeonholed, and received only a four-line post-mortem in the newspaper obituaries of the Congress. The members of the Consumers' Advisory Board alternately fought General Johnson, practiced submissive "statecraft," presented belligerent reports, resigned, threatened to resign, didn't resign. The members of Frederic C. Howe's Consumers' Counsel fought harder if anything, but found themselves progressively robbed of jurisdiction over the more important codes.

As if to celebrate the victory of advertising-as-usual the Advertising Federation of America opened its annual convention in New York the day Congress adjourned. President Kobak, who a few months ago was enlisting the American Legion to fight any form of constructive consumer legislation, read a letter from Mr. Roosevelt praising the conspicuous service of advertising in "presenting sound interpretations of the purposes and objectives of the recovery program." Secretary Wallace, who was present in person, declared that he had no quarrel with advertising as such—it had done a splendid job—and congratulated the ad men on their "exceedingly broad-gauged attitude." "You believed strenuously in truth," said this plenipotentiary of the New Deal, "and your slogan was 'Truth in Advertising.' You believed in that from the very bottom of your heart. . . ."

There followed other heart throbs: a fantastic "trial" of advertising in which a battery of advertising men, sales managers, and so on defended themselves, with a little fake cross-examination, over a national network; a speech by C. M. Chester, president of General Foods Corporation, in which he declared menacingly that "the heads of communism, fascism, and other isms have invaded even our official government circles"; a sales talk by Dr. Henry C. Link, secretary of the Psychological Corporation, in which he described the scientific fervor which professional psychologists were consecrating to the cause of advertising "research." Commenting editorially on the convention, Printers' Ink declared that "the correction of advertising's ills must come from within advertising itself," and suggested that perhaps advertising, like baseball and the movies, needs a "czar" or two—one for the publishers and one for the broadcasters.

Out of this deluge of business and political buncombe the consumer can perhaps extract a small drop of negative comfort. The advertising men have learned nothing and forgotten nothing; they are furiously against telling the truth, not merely to consumers, but to each other; they can be trusted to increase by every means in their power the growing public disgust with advertising and with the supine surrender of both the press and the government to the dictation of business.

Will the Tugwell-Copeland bill be resuscitated next fall? One rather hopes not; an altogether fresh start is needed, with Senator Copeland out of the picture. But certainly the consumer movement will grow in strength and clarity. At the convention of the Association of American Advertising Agencies in May, Alice L. Edwards of the American Home Economics Association presented convincing evidence of a consumer ground swell coming up through the women's clubs. Consumers' Research continues to gain subscribers. Cooperative Distributors, which was started on a shoestring a year ago, is now well-established with a turnover which increases geometrically from month to month. Organization of the consumer interest with respect to both policy and program is of course badly needed. One can only hope that the Throttlebottoms are convinced by this time that the Administration won't or can't help except as they organize and bring to bear effective pressure at Washington.

Adolf's Court Jester

We were not among those who thought that Dr. Ernst Hanfstängl should be excluded from the United States for "subversive activities," "moral turpitude," or anything else. It seemed to us then that the revival of these categories was more dangerous to decent government than anything the doctor was likely to do at Harvard, and we have seen no reason for changing our opinion since his arrival. If one may believe the accounts published in the newspapers, Hanfstängl has been pretty silly—sillier even than the average "old grad" at a class reunion is expected to be—but he has not been anything worse. On the whole, therefore, we are glad he came, because it is always good to know that—as the Elizabethans used to say—the Devil is an Ass.

Before his arrival there was a growing tendency to represent Hanfstängl as a "glamorous" figure. He was a very close associate of one of the men of the hour and no one knew just how great his influence was. Since he played the piano it was assumed that he must be some sort of universal genius—perhaps, indeed, the ideal Nazi, combining a taste for blood and iron with a virile understanding of the purest of the arts. If Putzy had only maintained a dignified silence, the legend might well have grown, but from the moment of his arrival it became all too plain that he was a natural clown who could not possibly resist the temptation to make a fool of himself.

Whether maliciously or not, the reporters who follow him about have not rested content with frequent references to his great wit; they have also insisted upon giving examples of it, and the examples have been without exception so very sad that not even a prince of the blood could reasonably hope to raise a laugh with the best of them. Wearing a sweet pea in his buttonhole, he remarked uproariously that, strange as it might seem, the gardener who had cared for the flower was named "Frost," and when he was shown a column against him by Heywood Broun he achieved this magnificent comeback: "Broun would ask me about the book burnings, hey? Well, tell him that his book has not been burned and that he should stop being such an old sour belly." He observed that the "sweet children" of his classmates met him with a "look of admiration and—what shall I say—stupefaction."

Such a man can hardly do much to promote the cause of a romantic religion of violence. You cannot successfully uphold the holy ideal of racial purity or successfully justify the righteous murder of Jews by being a regular fellow with a sentimental attachment for dear old Harvard; neither can you pass off atrocities as merely the result of a boyish prank. Moreover, Hanfstängl is obviously deflating his own legend in a highly satisfactory way. Some thought he was the Richelieu of the Nazi movement, Hitler's trusted friend and adviser. It is obvious now that he cannot be more than Adolf's court jester, and if what he has given here is a fair sample of his quality, a very sorry one. Had the protesters had their way and shut him out, he would be by now a sinister figure with a real hold on the popular imagination. By letting him in, democracy has come off very well indeed. Our own clowns—Jimmy Walker, for example—are better, and Jimmy never had more than a local job.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

The Shamelessness of Newton D. Baker

WHEN the World War broke out I organized almost at once a "League to Limit Armaments." It started with a bang. About the first acceptance I got was from Newton D. Baker. The membership was distinguished, for the horror felt at the first terrible news had not yet been displaced by angry and bitter and deluded partisanship for one side or the other. People then placed the blame upon the huge armaments of all the European nations.

That scene in a private dining-room of the Railroad Club in New York came back to me the other day when I read in the newspapers that almost my first member of the short-lived league had appeared before the House Military Affairs Committee to demand the immediate increase of the United States Army by 2,063 officers and no less than 47,000 men. But he wasn't satisfied with that. He told the committee that "he could not imagine an army less than five times the present size of ours having the slightest effect on the military policy of any other nation. It is a waste of public money to have an army that is anything less than adequate." He then went on to admit that at the end of the war to end war he had urged Congress to establish at once an army of 500,000 men as the necessary force, but that Congress had been "wiser and luckier than I" in not granting his request of that time. That did not prevent him, however, from assuring Congress on May 28, 1934, that 14,063 officers and 179,063 men were the exact number of men we need in our army now to preserve our country intact. Not 170,000 nor 180,000 but exactly 179,063. All your militarists know exactly how many ships and men will save us.

Then this great statesman and ex-member of the League to Limit Armaments reminisced. He who had made such eloquent speeches as he drafted young Americans to their death in 1917, with the solemn promise to them and their parents that if they would only go out and die this war would end war and make the world safe for democracy, now recalled that at the end of the war "it was reasonable to suppose that another would break out. We had the Thirty Years' War as an example. The most able historians thought that the Armistice marked the end of an episode, and that a fresh grouping of nations would again attempt war." So there you have it. Just when Woodrow Wilson was congratulating the country that we had ended war and were about to make over the world, when we were burying the Unknown Soldier with such pomp and ceremony because he had laid down his life to do away with armaments, Newton Baker, in consultation with "the most able historians," was convinced that all that he and the chief he still reveres had said to the American people about the purposes of the war was just so much bunk and hokum.

But the recent works of Newton Baker do not end with his testimony before the House committee. Two weeks later he delivered the commencement address at West Point, just before handing the commissions to the largest class that ever graduated. Did he devote that speech to a demand for the reform of one of the costliest, worst-run, and most inefficient educational institutions in the world? He did not. He went back to the past again. He said:

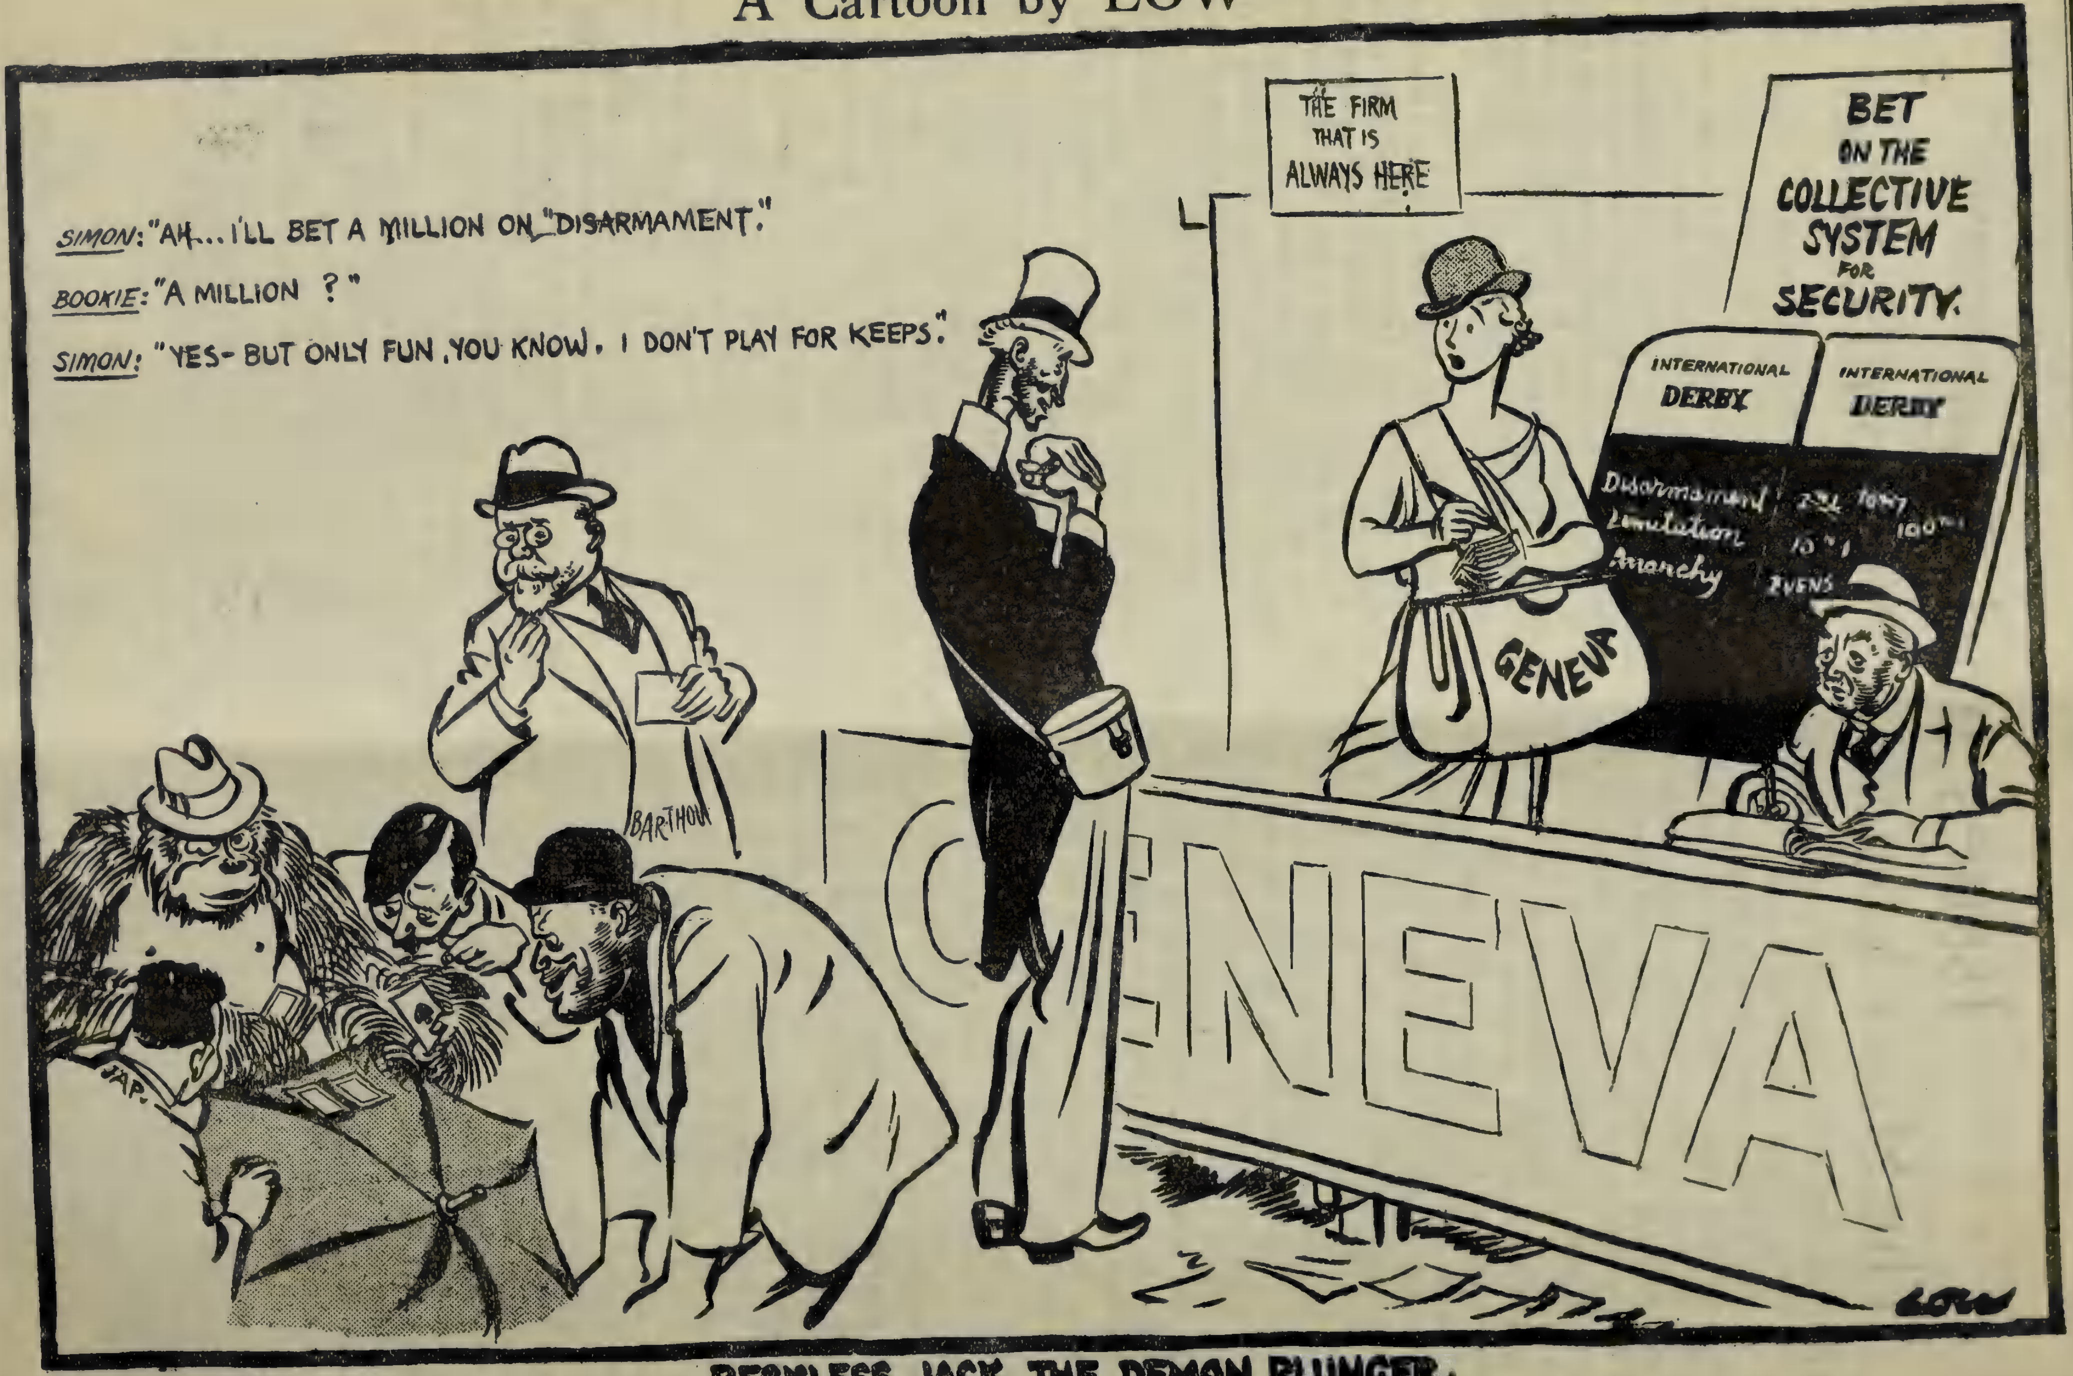
> Democracy is the most perfect form of government ever devised by men, and the most difficult. We can have it only as long as we are worthy of it. One country after another in Europe has bundled up all the authority of government and taken it away from the people and handed it to some despotic form of dictatorship or dictatorial oligarchy. It is not because they undervalue democracy but because democracy is possible only to highly educated people.

So here we have the final and lasting truth. Here we have the exact reason why the Germans, admittedly the most highly educated people in the world, have abandoned democracy. Here we have the exact reason why the Americans, with their shamefully high percentage of illiteracy, have made as much of a success of democracy as they have. When Newton Baker talked drivel of this kind, perhaps he thought that he must talk down to the intellectual level of West Point. If not, he has certainly undergone a sea change in his mental processes. I am aware that many people will ask: "Can't you let a man honestly and sincerely change his mind on a matter as grave as that of armaments?" But the trouble is that Newton Baker has changed his mind all along the line. From having been an ardent disciple of Tom Johnson in his efforts to free the people from corporation domination, he has become the lawyer and chief counselor of the Van Sweringens, one of whom is under indictment for some of his activities in connection with the brothers' financial overlordship of Cleveland. The man who was a reform mayor of Cleveland, ready to starve for his ideals, is now one of the leaders of the party machine and a rich man, as the result of having thrown overboard those youthful ideals.

But nothing seems to be so shameful as his admission that the slogans which he and Woodrow Wilson used to put us into the war were pure bunk intended to deceive. He does not even pretend that they were honestly mistaken or misled. He admits that he knew it wasn't going to be a war to end war when he was giving his allegiance to that doctrine. I heard him make his eloquent speech at the Madison Square Garden convention in which he told how it had wrung his heart to the depths to tear American boys away from their parents and send them to their deaths. He did it so well that men all around me wept. Why did he not tell us then that the war slogans were bunk? If he lives long enough and fascism comes to America, I will bet one hundred to one that he will come out for it and assure us that while democracy "is the most perfect government ever devised by men," we can have it no longer because, in his judgment, we are not worthy of it.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



SIMON: "AH... I'LL BET A MILLION ON "DISARMAMENT."
BOOKIE: "A MILLION ?"
SIMON: "YES- BUT ONLY FUN, YOU KNOW. I DON'T PLAY FOR KEEPS."
THE FIRM THAT IS ALWAYS HERE
BET ON THE COLLECTIVE SYSTEM FOR SECURITY.
INTERNATIONAL DERBY
INTERNATIONAL DERBY
Disarmament
Limitation
Anarchy
EVENS
GENEVA
BARTHOU
JAP.
GENEVA
LOW

RECKLESS JACK, THE DEMON PLUNGER.

Copyright by The Nation and Inter-Europa Press. Reproduction in the United States forbidden.

The Steel Strike Collapses

By LOUIS ADAMIC

Pittsburgh, June 20

FOR two weeks or longer, large sections of the American people of all classes stood on their toes, tense with hope or apprehension or both, watching—through the poorly focused telescope of the daily press reports—the onrush of developments in the threatened strike of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, with its 230 lodges or unions in the various steel-producing centers of the United States. For days, toward the middle of June, it looked—through the aforesaid telescope—as though a strike in the country's basic industry was inevitable at midnight June 15, or soon thereafter; and numerous persons everywhere believed that it probably would be one of the bitterest, bloodiest, most consequential class-war battles ever fought in America.

The special "strike" convention of the A. A., called for Thursday, June 14, was considered so important that on Wednesday, the thirteenth, some of the country's foremost newspapermen rushed into Pittsburgh to cover the situation, and simultaneously there arrived also a flock of excited mediators, conciliators, observers, spies, and other such factotums sent out by federal offices in Washington and by the governments of the various steel States, notably Pennsylvania. Many of these persons believed that a strike was almost certain within two days, and, once called, was likely to become the spark for a bloody social revolution. With Toledo still fresh in their minds, they expected labor, employed and jobless, all over the United States to rise against capitalism, unemployment, company unionism, the New Deal, and what not.

Yet less than twenty-four hours later the strike idea completely fizzled out, and Mr. Green, it immediately appeared, was not the only, nor even the chief, factor in this fizzling out; while less than a week subsequently, as I write this, it is obvious that the idea of a nation-wide steel strike in mid-June had been doomed to a tragic end from its inception, six weeks before.

And thereby, it seems to me, hangs an immensely interesting and significant tale, worth telling, I think, in some detail because it so clearly mirrors the whole contemporary labor situation in this country, and also because it is likely soon to have a sequel which will be difficult to understand without a knowledge of what really happened in the steel-labor situation during the past few months.

To begin at the beginning, the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers is one of the oldest bodies affiliated with the A. F. of L. It came into existence fifty-seven years ago, when a group of highly skilled metal workers seceded from the old Sons of Vulcan. Until very recently it never was anything more than a collection of fraternal benefit lodges of the "aristocracy of labor" in the steel, iron, and tin (mostly tin) industries, and a convenient stepping-stone for its so-called executive officers who had ambitions (and most of them had) for political and economic self-advancement. One president of the A. A. left his office to become secretary of the American Tin Plate Company, then United States Consul at Birmingham, England, and finally a business man in Pittsburgh; another became inspector of immigration in New York; a third, a Republican Congressman; a fourth, a Republican city councilman in Pittsburgh; a fifth, secretary of the steel manufacturers' association on the Pacific Coast.

During the last forty years no one could possibly have accused the outfit of being a labor movement. Its central office was nearly always on good terms with the managers of most of the mills. It never made any effort to organize the industry. Several of the local lodges, composed exclusively or mainly of highly skilled wrought-iron and sheet-metal men, have been recognized by otherwise anti-union bosses and have wage-and-hour contracts with them. The organization played a semi-strike-breaking role in the great steel strike of 1919.

Its present president is a fattish, drooling, loose-lipped, watery-eyed old codger in his late seventies, M. J. Tighe, familiarly known as "Old Mike" or "Grandmother" Tighe. He has been with the organization from its birth. A typical old-time trade-union bureaucrat, he is profoundly ignorant of the forces now operating in the world or in the country; he is narrow, fussy, old-womanish, but, as he lately demonstrated, deeply experienced in the official trickeries and "practical trade-union politics" long since perfected by leaders in A. F. of L. affiliates. In his official duties Tighe is ably assisted by the secretary-treasurer, Louis (Shorty) Leonard, a round, compact little fellow, somewhat younger than the president but also an old-timer in the outfit, with a loud Fourth of July voice and an inexhaustible supply of labor blah-blah; to me fully as objectionable, both as a person and as a labor-union official, as Tighe. Ed Miller and Tom Gillis, the two vice-presidents, are essentially of the same type. All these men draw a salary ("and expenses") they could not conceivably hope to receive in any other racket except by some fluke, and they naturally think a great deal of their positions and want to keep them.

For fourteen years the A. A. was on the toboggan. By the middle of 1933 its membership had fallen to 4,700, of whom fewer than 3,000 were paying their dues. Then the New Deal came, with its Section 7-a in the NIRA, which gave the nearly 500,000 steel, iron, and tin workers in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Indiana, Michigan, Maryland, Alabama, Kentucky, California, and elsewhere a sudden and powerful impulse to unionization. Tens of thousands of workers, full of old Hoover-era jitters and new Roosevelt-inspired hope, were asking, "Which union can I join?" Communist organizers were in the field with their Steel and Metal Workers' Industrial Union. A good many men joined that organization. At the same time the Iron and Steel Institute, under the direction of Arthur Young (now getting $40,000 a year for his work), started its big push for company unions. Sincere, if none too intelligent, would-be leaders of non-Communist but radical independent unionization movements appeared among the steel people. And there were lively stirrings in several lodges of the A. A. The leaders of these locals appealed for advice and help to the central office of the A. A. in Pittsburgh. They wrote letters and went to the office in person. They telephoned "Old Mike" and wired "Shorty" Leonard. But the "executive officers" did nothing for three months, until some of the lodge presidents threatened to start organizing what possibly might turn out to be a new union movement in the steel industry.

Then, in September, 1933, largely to stop the growing Communist and other independent-radical movements, "Grandmother" and "Shorty" decided—possibly, as the Communists maintain, on the urging of Iron and Steel Institute agents—to send out three dozen "organizers," most of whom were unemployed old-time trade unionists, friends of the central office, with no experience as organizers. These men received considerable salaries (and expenses), although in most cases their sole qualification was that they wrote a legible hand; but that was enough, for all that was necessary was to fill out union cards for the thousands of men who eagerly stood in line to be signed up.

The only aggressive organizer for the A. A. was Mrs. Cornelia Bryce Pinchot, the Governor's wife, who had no connection with the union. She is a rich woman with red hair and an overabundance of nervous energy who gets more thrill out of labor agitation and strike picketing than out of bridge and society and has, besides strong political ambitions for her husband and herself, a few vague notions that something is wrong with our social system. She attracted vast crowds of steel workers and their wives and spoke at scores of meetings in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia, urging the men to sign up and get behind the NIRA and the President. But the A. A. "executives," apparently, were anything but enthusiastic about the help the lady was trying to give the organization. They sent no one to her mass-meetings to sign up the men. The old fogies in the central office were beside themselves with fear of what was happening to their hitherto nice, quiet old outfit, and soon after starting the organizing "campaign" they began to do everything in their power to restrict its success.

But, despite all this, in less than two months the A. A. had more than 125 new lodges, many of them called by such names as the Blue Eagle Lodge, Recovery Lodge, and Nira (or Arin) Lodge, and its membership was increased from 4,700 to anywhere from 60,000 to 100,000. Nobody knows yet what the new total is. The central office so far has made no real effort to find out. The officials in that office know that, whatever it is, the number is too high for the good of the organization as they want it to continue.

In short, the old, dying A. A. suddenly bulged out into a vast organization, a great, virile new body full of raw, undisciplined, undirected strength and spirit, with but a few sick old cells here and there, and, alas, with the same old head, the same senile "executive" officers, utterly lacking in real brains, in knowledge of what is going on in the country, in honesty and social vision. Suddenly the big, healthy body and the small, hollow head were at violent cross-purposes. But for some time the body didn't realize that. It merely felt very strong and very uncomfortable, and anxious to be doing something.

Toward the end of 1933 the situation began to clarify itself a bit. Several men of the new element and a few older but more or less progressive fellows who had helped to bring in the new ones began to feel that there were two factions in the organizations, sharply opposed one to the other. They started to refer to themselves as the Young Boys, and to the old-timers in power and the old craft lodges, which supported the central office, as the Old Boys. The Young Boys were, for the most part, the presidents of the newly formed industrial lodges and the newly elected district chairmen, who—to the great annoyance of the central office—gradually began to act as spokesmen for the new element in its differences with the Old Boys—differences which rapidly increased both in frequency and bitterness. Unlike the leaders of the Old Boys, they were actual steel workers employed in mills, unless lately discharged for rank-and-file union activities; none of them received any salary from their lodge treasuries, and some of them covered even their expenses on union business out of their own pockets; some of them were still in their early and middle twenties, small-town boys, "little men," with scant education and less natural ability or experience as labor-union leaders and politicians.

For months these new leaders and would-be leaders talked among themselves, and plotted against the Old Boys and against one another, for there was a good deal of suspicion and jealousy among them. They hardly knew one another, and several wanted to be the big leader. But as time passed they became united on one point—action. The entire rank-and-file element, growing conscious of its overwhelming numerical strength in the A. A., wanted action. Thousands of workers on signing up with the A. A. lodges paid no initiation fees or dues, promising to pay when the union started to do something for them. Having been fooled before, they did not trust the A. A. or the rank-and-file leaders.

The matter of union recognition was on everybody's mind. Lodge presidents asked the A. A.'s central office what they could do. "Old Mike" and "Shorty" stalled; they didn't know. So some of the lodge leaders took the matter into their own hands. They visited the Pittsburgh NRA office. No result. They wrote letters to Washington. No answer, or they received printed material on what a wonderful thing the NRA was for labor. A few went to Washington and called on the A. F. of L. and National Labor Board, not once, but four and five times. They talked with Senator Wagner and other New Dealers and demanded elections in the mills. The National Labor Board stalled, promised them action, but for a month, two months, nothing happened. The gentlemen in the A. F. of L. urged patience. The boys tried to see the Secretary of Labor, "Ma" Perkins, as they called her, who some months before had been in the steel region and had seemed interested in the steel people, but most of them got only as far as her assistant, Mr. McGrady. No result anywhere, no satisfaction. Washington was full of fuss and fury which had no relation to the steel workers of America. Bill Spang of Duquesne, one of the lodge leaders who journeyed several times to Washington, finally came to the conclusion that Roosevelt, evidently, had not meant what he signed in the NIRA and in all probability was afraid of the iron-and-steel gang. Bill made a report to that effect to his lodge and the leaders of other rank-and-file lodges. NRA, he said, meant "National Run Around" for the workers, and Washington was "a labor college where a working stiff like me can get an education like he can get nowhere else."

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The rank-and-file boys, like workers in many other industries throughout the land, rapidly developed a strike mood. In this mood, in mid-April, the rank-and-file delegates, still lacking a real leader, assembled with the Old Boys in the annual convention of the A. A. in the Elks' Hall in Pittsburgh. They had a clear two-thirds' majority over the Old Boys, and Tighe and Leonard were at their wits' end. The Young Boys shouted, "Action! Action!" The Old Boys, trying to wear them down, stretched the convention by various parliamentary tricks, with which the new men had no acquaintance, to more than two weeks. To no avail. "Action!" There is a bar in the Elks' Hall and there was some drinking, which made the Young Boys even stronger for action. The end of it all was that they passed a resolution with the so-called seven-point program, which included the call for a national steel strike in the middle of June if the bosses refused to grant the union's demand for recognition and collective bargaining before then. No strike plan was outlined for the eventuality that the bosses did not recognize the union. The Young Boys invented no way to make the Old Boys in the central office prepare the organization for the big walk-out. They merely appointed a committee of ten to get busy about the matter as soon as possible.

Tired from the long sessions both in the hall and at the bar, the committee did not meet till May 20. After much squabbling among themselves, on the twenty-second, they formed a "strike committee of five" and demanded of the executive officers that one of the committee be allowed to take a desk in the central office and work on strike preparations. Tighe, Leonard, and their colleagues, having, in the face of the Young Boys' now patent ineptitude, regained their composure, said, "Nothing doing!" Then the whole committee of ten, duly appointed in the convention, asked the executive officers for a conference on the morning of May 26. When on that day the committee arrived at the A. A.'s central office, only the janitor was there to receive them. This made the Young Boys "pretty sore" and they began to call the old-timers Yellow Dogs, while the latter, in turn, began to refer to the rank and filers as Greenhorn Goats.

On the suggestion of a journalist friend of theirs, a group of Greenhorn Goats then journeyed to Washington to ask for an interview with the President. They meant to tell him that they were about to call a strike to help him fetch the steel trust to book, and ask him to accept their aid—the aid of the workers in the steel industry—and meet the issue squarely. "We will shut down the mills," they wished to say to Mr. Roosevelt, "until the steel magnates sign before you their acceptance of the law and actually begin collective bargaining with our unions." They did not expect to get any results. The real idea was to get publicity for the strike. But though they did not get to the President, they were received by everyone else of any importance in the NRA, scared a lot of people, caused much discomfort in the White House and the A. F. of L. building, engaged in a hot exchange of insults with General Johnson, and before departure signed a sizzling open letter to the President which landed them on the front pages of all important papers in the country. They said, in effect, that they were going back home to call the strike. In all this they were coached by friendly journalists.

The Iron and Steel Institute announced it never would recognize the A. A. or any other outside union, and proposed a plan similar to that in effect in the automobile industry, which the boys scorned. Meanwhile, William Green called Tighe to Washington, and the Old Boy, by now quite sure of his ground again, smiled as broadly as his old face permitted, talked with General Johnson and other big people there, and let the Greenhorn Goats do what they liked. Then—very probably with the full approval of the A. F. of L. panjandrums, who were in touch with the National Labor Board, Miss Perkins, and the White House—he announced that he would reconvene the delegates of the last annual convention and let them decide what the organization would do in the matter of the threatened strike.

And on June 14, when the A. A. convention met again two floors above the luminous Elks' barroom in Pittsburgh, large sections of the American people raised themselves as high on their toes as possible, and glued their eyes closer to the poorly focused telescope of daily press reports. They expected hell to break loose within a couple of days. They didn't know (neither did I) that the whole thing was practically cut and dried, and that, save for an unlikely slip-up, the boys would not call the strike.

When the delegates reconvened, most of the Greenhorn Goats were for calling the walkout, if for no other reason than that they could see no other way out. But many of them, when on the way to the convention, had already begun to develop serious misgivings about such an action. Some of the mills were armed. Because of this the men's wives had begged them not to call the strike. And with times so hard, how many workers would really walk out at their call? It probably was true, as it was generally said, that the bosses would welcome a strike at this time; it would give them an opportunity to beat down the workers' militancy during a slack in production. All these and similar considerations were heavy on the Young Boys' minds. On the other hand, they figured, if they didn't strike, they'd get nothing.

At the opening of the convention the most aggressive of the strike-minded Greenhorns had in their hands copies of two resolutions—one calling the strike and setting up the strike machinery, the other calling upon the A. F. of L. for financial and moral support. But the Yellow Dogs running the convention from the platform gave them no chance to present them. Parliamentary trickery was utilized to the utmost. They killed time on the rules of procedure. Who was to be admitted besides the delegates? Resolutions. Amendments. Amendments to amendments. Which confused the inexperienced boys, made them feel like "a bunch of damn fools." Then serious difficulties with roll call. More resolutions. Amendments. Amendments to amendments.

Finally, at 11:30, they adjourned till 3:30 to "fix up the roll call," but actually, of course, to stretch the convention, to give William Green time to see President Roosevelt between one and two and to come to Pittsburgh. At 3:30 a squabble over credentials. Pointless, time-wasting resolutions. Delegations were asked to report whether or not the bosses had recognized their respective unions. A Slovak priest, one of the few "guests" in the hall, made a long speech urging the boys, with several of whom he had some influence, to postpone the strike. Then it was announced that word had been received from Washington that William Green, the great leader of organized labor in America, blah, blah . . . was coming to Pittsburgh to address the convention tomorrow, and meantime his brotherly appeal to the boys was to keep their shirts on. Convention adjourned.

Confused, their spirit down, uncertain what would be the best or most sensible thing to do, some of the Young Boys proceeded to get drunk, much to the glee of "Grandmother" Tighe, a teetotaler who generally frowns upon hard liquor. I do not mean to say that any considerable number of the delegates got drunk, but several of those who did were leaders, and the fact that they incapacitated themselves for leadership the next day tended further to demoralize those who stayed sober. Only a few newspapermen knew of this, and they were kind enough not to tell about it. I mention it because it is so important. It is a lesson to rank-and-file labor leaders in steel as in other industries.

By the time Mr. Green arrived, the strike idea was practically dead. Then he dug the grave for it; the boys themselves, half-consciously, half-unconsciously, buried it. From the Old Boys' and Bill Green's viewpoint it all worked to perfection, just as they had hoped it would when plotting the whole show, perhaps as long as a week before. Bill Green stepped before the boys as a "fellow-worker," a "miner," and begged them to be calm and not allow their judgment to give way to their feelings. But many had no judgment or feelings, except bewilderment, in the matter. Several of them had katzenjammers; a few were in their cups during Mr. Green's speech and throughout the rest of the day. He proposed a peace plan which he was sure President Roosevelt would accept and support. As a matter of fact, it was essentially the President's own plan, which, as Mr. Green spoke, was on the way to Congress to be made (as it was made) law. When Mr. Green finished, Shorty Leonard and the other Yellow Dogs leaped to their feet and led the applause. The convention promptly accepted Mr. Green's proposition and "postponed" the strike call till the end of June. Telegrams were sent to the lodges telling the workers, tens of thousands of whom were ready to strike at midnight, to stay put.

The farce was carried still farther. The final important question was: Who will present President Green's plan to President Roosevelt? There was a little squabbling over that. Then someone rose and said, "Boys, let's show we have confidence in our executive officers, who all these years, blah, blah. . . . Let's authorize them to take our proposition to Washington." This was quickly seconded, and Old Mike put up the motion for a vote so quickly that the majority, when they lifted their hands, had no idea what they were voting for. The hands were not counted. Passed! Shorty Leonard whispered a joyous remark to Old Mike, who grinned cynically, and a few hours later one of the other Old Boys remarked, "Now we got 'em where we want 'em. Now we'll teach 'em discipline."

Immediately after the conclusion of the convention I spoke to one of the more intelligent of the young militants. He said, "I feel like Carnera must of felt last night." Others, even among the sober ones, told me they didn't know exactly what had happened. "Things were done so fast." I overheard a conversation of two Young Boys. One said, "The strike is only postponed, ain't it?" "Yeah, I guess." "Have we, I mean the Young Boys, any authority left to call the strike in case we don't get what Green said we want?" "Damn' if I know. Don't think we have." "Well, I guess we sold ourselves out." A third young fellow, a little drunk, who stood by listening, said, "Nuts!" and walked off.

Bewilderment, bewilderment. I had a feeling, in that dismal hall, that I was witnessing the whole essential tragedy of American labor. On the platform, surrounded by reporters, Old Mike drooled away: "We're not Communists . . . no, not Communists. We're trade unionists. I'm a highest type of trade unionist. . . . Strike? Haw-haw! There ain't gonna be no strike. All over! We ain't a strike organization. . . . I'm tired, boys, nothin' else to say, nothin' to say, boys. Haven't had a bite all day, now it's midnight. Good-night, boys."

The sense of tragedy deepened in me during the ensuing few days as I motored through the steel towns in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia, and talked with "leaders" and ordinary members of A. A. lodges. Bewilderment. None knew what had really happened in Pittsburgh or what would happen in Washington.

One thing is sure, as sure as anything nowadays: there will be no national steel strike this summer. There may be one or two "wildcat" strikes, à la Toledo, but even that is a remote possibility. Whether or not there will ever be a steel strike or a respect-commanding steel-labor organization depends on many things, but mostly, perhaps, on the ability of the rank-and-file leaders to realize what happened to them at the convention, what happened immediately after the convention, and what may, will, or should happen this summer and next fall; and on their ability, too, to regain their lost morale by honestly admitting their shortcomings so far, and trying to improve themselves for future work and to communicate that morale to their membership. They should try to realize as soon as possible the following things:

1. That no matter whom the President may appoint to the board to determine who shall represent steel labor in collective bargaining, the dice will be loaded against any real workers' union; and that should a real union win the election in a given mill, the bosses will not recognize it but will turn the matter over to the courts, where it will be hung up for months and possibly for years.

2. That William Green and the whole A. F. of L. oligarchy, in their actual function, are closer to the interests of the Roosevelt Administration and, ipso facto, of the employers than to the interests of labor; and that the plan Mr. Green brought with him to Pittsburgh was not his plan but the President's and General Johnson's.

3. That even if Mr. Green and the A. F. of L. send thirty organizers and a $200,000 organizing fund to the steel region, as Mr. Green promised they would, steel will never really be organized; that fully to organize steel, if they could, would be against their interests, their nature; that if the A. F. of L. makes any attempt to organize steel, it will be largely frustrated in jurisdictional disputes. (Important jurisdictional disputes are already pending in the A. A., which has all but stopped organizing unorganized workers. And why hasn't the A. F. of L. tried to organize steel long before this?)

4. That the future of American labor lies only in clear struggle, not in playing along with social workers like President Roosevelt and Secretary Perkins, who appear to consider the United States one vast settlement house in which everything should be nice and peaceful; that in that struggle, as things stand today, there is no time to lose.

In September of this year the A. A. has general elections. Here will be the rank and filers' first big opportunity. Will they be able to oust the Old Boys? Will they, meantime, continue organizing their local lodges, apart from any A. F. of L. "organizing," and thus prepare themselves, at least in part, for a national strike in October, when production will be at its height? Will they, in the event of such a strike, be able to join hands with other labor movements in the industry, including the Steel and Metal Workers' Industrial Union? And will they, eventually, be able to overhaul the A. A. and make it a straight industrial union, and develop social vision, which any American labor movement, to be worth anything, must, of necessity, have in the future?

[A second article by Louis Adamic, The A. F. of L. and Company Unions, will appear in an early issue.]

The Balkans Swing to Fascism

By JOHN GUNTHER

Vienna, June 1

THINGS would be much easier for democrats and liberals in this part of the world if all fascism were equally black. An apologist for the new military regime in Bulgaria might make out a pretty good case for the Georgieff government, in that (a) among its members are some genuine idealists, survivors of the old "Sveno" group, (b) it replaces a parliamentarism shockingly sterile and corrupt, (c) above all, it enters office pledged to wipe out the terrorist Macedonians of Ivan Mihailoff, whose bloody career on the Bulgar-Jugoslav border has been a disgrace to Europe the past ten years. Again, it calls itself a "middle" fascism, with one Agrarian (extreme left) in the Cabinet, and by assuming office it probably forestalled a coup d'etat by Professor Tzankoff, an extreme fascist and Prime Minister during the 1923 white terror.

Be this as it may, the Georgieff government deserves no support from liberals. One should not succumb to the temptation to describe it gently. The terrible lesson of the Dollfuss dictatorship in Austria, which began as a "middle" government, should not be forgotten; no "middle" fascism can withstand the internal forces which constantly press it farther and farther right; a "middle" fascism is a contradiction in terms; it begs support from democracy, then crushes it, just as a "right" fascism does. The Georgieff government has humiliated the king, split the army, and aroused dangerous false hopes in the people. The Agrarian Cabinet Minister, Zacharieff, is a demagogue and turncoat. And it is extremely unlikely that, no matter what its intentions may be, the government can do anything to Mihailoff except temporarily annoy him.

The Macedonian problem is one of those insoluble tragedies that make permanent mincemeat of the Balkans. "Macedonia" was split by the Balkan wars and the 1919 peace treaties between Bulgaria, Jugoslavia, and Greece. Ever since, a secret terrorist organization, the I. M. R. O., has kept the triple frontier bleeding, hoping thus to agitate the return of Jugoslav Macedonia to Bulgaria. Mihailoff set up a secret government which collects taxes, enforces "order," maintains its own "law" courts. He has never been arrested for the simple reason that no Bulgarian patriot wants him arrested. Every Bulgar is a Macedonian under the skin.

The Macedonian problem is Bulgaria's only trump card vis-a-vis Jugoslavia; only by the promise to call off Macedonian terrorism has Bulgaria any quid pro quo to offer the Jugoslavs. The Georgieff government, it is true, has strong personal hatred of Mihailoff, because several of its moving spirits are Protgueroffists, members of the rival Macedonian faction. Even so, vigorous action against the Mihailoffists is almost out of the question.

Jugoslavia greeted the first news of the Bulgarian putsch jubilantly. It was known in inside circles that King Alexander had persuaded King Boris to try his hand at a palace coup, so that the two kings could work together for a Bulgar-Jugoslav rapprochement; when later information reached Belgrade that the events of May 19 were not engineered by King Boris but were inflicted on him by the army, Jugoslav enthusiasm cooled considerably. Jugoslavia badly wants better relations with Bulgaria. It has a high opinion of the Bulgarian army, and in case of war with Italy, Bulgarian neutrality, if not Bulgarian aid, would be essential to Jugoslav strategy. The Bulgar-Jugoslav frontier is 700 kilometers long and difficult to defend. Fighting Italy or Hungary, the Jugoslavs don't want the Bulgars to come in by this back door. Jugoslavs and Bulgars are, moreover, first cousins, and Jugoslavia has always dreamed of a great united South Slav state, stretching from the Adriatic to the Black Sea and the Aegean. Finally, Jugoslavia has certain ambitions in regard to Greek Salonika, and Jugoslavia and Bulgaria, if allies, would normally tend to work together against Greece.

The Bulgars want rapprochement, too. Bulgaria's present isolation is complete. She is hemmed in by states which gained territory at her expense and which are not always inclined to be too friendly. The recent Graeco-Turk pact, which was directed against Bulgaria, served to make friendship with Jugoslavia doubly attractive. Most important of all, Bulgaria thinks that a rapprochement with Jugoslavia would improve the miserable state of the suppressed Bulgarian minorities in Macedonia.

Prospects of rapprochement were blasted, however, by the Balkan Pact, signed in January between Jugoslavia, Turkey, Rumania, and Greece, the four states by which Bulgaria is encircled. The Jugoslavs did not have much enthusiasm for this pact. Rather, they wanted it, and wanted direct bilateral rapprochement with Bulgaria, too—but you can't marry two pretty girls at the same time. Now, luckily, the pact is a dead letter, because Greece (after dragooning the others into it) refused to ratify except with reservations destroying its validity. Now the way is open for Bulgar-Jugoslav rapprochement once more. The chief obstacle is Macedonia, and always will be, so long as the Mihailoff gangsters are alive.

The Bulgarian coup d'etat brings, indirectly at least, the question of Nazism in the Balkans to the fore. In every Central European and Balkan country imitation Hitlerites are blooming. In Hungary the arrow-cross, symbol of the blue shirts of Deputy Soltan Mesko, has, so Mesko claims, 400,000 adherents. People in Budapest say that Mesko is crazy; but so did people in Munich say that Hitler was crazy, ten years ago. In Jugoslavia the Jugoslavenska Aktia has about 80,000 members who wear the "Kossova cross." In Rumania there are at least three distinct fascist organizations, one of which, the Iron Guard, is coming to be the dominant political force in the country; it is overtly Hitlerite, with its members wearing a modified swastika and green shirts; its terrorist leader, Codreanu, is a violent anti-Semite fanatic. In Czecho-Slovakia there are, of course, some 3,500,000 Germans, half of whom have probably felt the swastika itch. In Bulgaria there is the Svogor of Professor Tzankoff, with at least 50,000 organized men. Albania, Greece, even Turkey, have their overt or secret Nazi groups. Hungary, Rumania, and Jugoslavia, moreover, contain upwards of 500,000 minority Germans apiece—Nazis by original sin, so to speak.

Czecho-Slovakia is the country in the Little Entente least likely to go Nazi, even though it contains more Germans than the others. The reason is that Hitlerism threatens the very foundations of Czecho-Slovak existence. Czecho-Slovakia is indissolubly bound to a pro-French, anti-German course. Neither in Rumania nor in Jugoslavia is the issue quite so clear. It would be a grievous overstatement to say that these countries have "deserted" France and are already in German hands, spiritually; nevertheless, powerful temptations to an eventual pro-German trend are manifest, especially if the international situation develops in Germany's favor.

Take Rumania. Its chief crop is grain, and Germany is potentially its inevitable market. France and Rumania's partners in the Little Entente are able to buy very little Rumanian grain. Germany can buy it all. Again, Rumania's chief worry in foreign policy is the Bessarabian problem. Rumania seized Bessarabia, the rich province adjoining the Ukraine, after the war, and ever since has mortally feared an attempt by Soviet Russia some day to get it back. Rumania's chief supporter in foreign policy has been France. But now France is an ally of Soviet Russia. Therefore Rumania feels that France is no longer as dependable a friend as heretofore in support of her Bessarabian claims. Again—a point that should not be forgotten—King Carol is a Hohenzollern, and has always had pro-German tastes.

The Iron Guard, the chief fascist organization in Rumania, has thoroughly terrorized the country, from the King down. It murdered Duca, the Liberal Prime Minister, in December; its leaders, including even Codreanu, got off scot-free. The Iron Guard has corrupted and infiltered the army; it has strong influence within the National-Peasant Party; its finger beckons toward the royal palace. Its members are "idealists" (Balkan for "terrorists"); they aim at the "spiritual regeneration" of Rumania (apparently by killing the Jews); they are violent nationalists, which means that most of the leaders are Greek, Hungarian, Ukrainian, or Gipsy in origin. They have, above all, a beautiful red flag to get perpetually mad on—the comely person of Magda Lupescu, the King's mistress, who is Jewish. If a revolution comes in Rumania, it will be largely Madame Lupescu's innocent fault.

Jugoslavia too has been much perturbed by the phenomenon of Hitler. Like Hungary and Rumania, it is overwhelmingly an agrarian country, and Germany, with 65,000,000 customers, is, or should be, its best market. Like the Rumanians, the Jugoslavs are, after all, in the business of nationhood for what it brings them; and once they are convinced that Germany, not France, is the strongest Power on the continent their economic sympathies with Germany are bound to find political expression. Germany is not yet as strong as France. Let Germany prove her prowess by, say, taking Austria—which is one of the supreme reasons that Hitler wants a victory in Austria so badly—and both Rumania and Jugoslavia will rock in dismay, admiration, apprehension, and perhaps—eventually—will accept German "protection" and "support."

Jugoslavia has an enemy—Italy. Everything that tends to weaken that enemy is good for Jugoslavia. Politics in the Balkans are not, alas, built on the principles of neighborly love; rather they are a calculated series of cancelations of mutual hates. It would be too much to say that Jugoslavia actively would like to see Anschluss between Austria and Germany even though Anschluss would gravely weaken and embarrass Italy by bringing strong Prussians instead of weak Austrians to the Brenner Pass. Anschluss would be a mortal blow to Czecho-Slovakia, Jugoslavia's ally, and it would bring directly to Jugoslavia's frontier, as to Italy's, a block of 75,000,000 Germans. But Jugoslavia is nearer sympathy to Anschluss than any other European country. "We would not fight to keep Hitler out of Austria," a high official told me in Belgrade the other day. "If, on the other hand, Italy invaded the Tyrol, we would have to enter Carinthia." This, be it noted, would mean fighting against Italy—on Germany's side.

The Jugoslavs are inclined to be bored at times with the Little Entente. They feel that it exists largely for the benefit of Czecho-Slovakia, and that Rumania, to say the least, is unreliable. The Jugoslavs are the chief military pillar of the Little Entente and would have to bear the brunt of any struggle in which it was engaged. Jugoslavia was tempted into the Balkan Pact largely to have another alignment in its pocket if the Little Entente broke up.

Hungary, it seems, is on the fence. Hungarians respect the latent power of Germany. But they have no great desire to have Germans as their immediate neighbors. Anything that weakens Czecho-Slovakia is beneficial for Hungary; therefore Hungary might be expected to welcome Anschluss. But General Gömbös, to date at least, has thoroughly committed himself to a pro-Austrian, pro-Italian policy.

Meanwhile in Austria, the real focus of the whole struggle, the Dollfuss dictatorship miserably attempts to put its half-baked fascism into force. The corporative constitution, superimposed on the people by a masterpiece of hypocritical and sophistic "legality," is one of the most reactionary documents in the world. The Socialist tenements, models of benevolent paternalism, are to be mortgaged. Vienna, containing one-third of the population, is to be "represented" in the new federal diet by two members out of fifty-nine. Absolutism, parochialism, clericalism rule the country. Austria "saves" Europe from Hitler, but Austria is seething; and around Austria—and beyond—Hitlerism purrs and bubbles.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Drought and the AAA Program

By BENJAMIN HORACE HIBBARD

Madison, Wisconsin, June 20

A SUPPORTER of the cheaper-dollar issue in 1900, on finding the second Bryan campaign less thrilling than the first, asked the Great Commoner whether or not he himself still believed in Free Silver with the same fervor as in 1896, and received the answer, "If I had known the Lord was going to solve the money question, I wouldn't have tried it myself." The cyanide process of recovering gold from low-grade ore had taken much of the punch out of arguments to the effect that gold was desperately and permanently scarce.

The New Deal based substantially all of its program and procedure during the first year, as it had its 1932 promises, on the assumption that the primary and abiding trouble with agriculture was overproduction. Little or nothing was said concerning the significant fact that production per capita had not, in recent years, shown any tendency to increase. There has, in fact, been a per capita decrease over the past six or eight years. This does not mean, however, that there has not been a surplus. A surplus is strictly a relative matter. When there is too much, one may as well call it a surplus as resort to more involved or elusive terms. From the standpoint of any producer, a surplus exists when his stock on hand will not sell for a price sufficient to keep him in business, enable him to meet his obligations, and permit him to maintain his standard of life. It is not necessary that buyers refuse to take his produce off his hands. For example, the dairy output has been about normal for some years. All that has been produced has been consumed. Hence the contention that there has been no surplus is, on the basis of quantity alone, quite defensible. Demand usually equals supply. The difficulty comes in a wrong interpretation of demand, and at the same time a failure to understand the nature of supply. Demand consists primarily in buying power. It is measured in dollars rather than in appetites. On the other hand, supply consists more directly and significantly in the quantities offered than in the actual quantity in existence. In the case of most agricultural commodities, the sales from the farm are comparatively prompt, taking place within the season or the year, with many products which must be sold from day to day. Few farm products other than cotton, wheat, and tobacco are piled up in storage to any great extent.

An oversupply then, does not so much mean an unused surplus as it means too low a price. The low price means either the buyers' response to superabundant offerings, as seen in the potato market when there are more potatoes grown than can be used, no matter how low the price, or in the world's sugar market, with offerings in 1930 almost double those of twenty years earlier. But in most products there has been no such spectacular increase in output. The supplies have been within bounds so far as most agricultural output is concerned. The bidding for this product has been weak, not because of unusual supplies, but because of the breakdown of demand. In the first place, Europe would not, and could not, take our normal exports because of the limited means by which we permitted payments to be made for them. We wanted the cash, and got it. Then we lent, in one form or another, the value of our exports to the foreign buyer, until the debts, public and private, owing from foreign countries and citizens to us ran into the tens of billions of dollars.

With our heads buried in our own surpluses, we became surplus-minded, and set the whole force of the government, through the AAA, at work to reduce the excess of production to the vanishing-point. The farmer was told in statistical figures from the federal bureaus, and in figures of speech from higher up, that his salvation lay in reduction, not in production. The foreign market outlet was not forgotten. It was remembered, but with despair only.

And now, if the Democrats had known that the Deity was going to take care of the surplus, they wouldn't have spent such quantities of effort and money in trying it themselves. What is more, if they had had a bit of faith and courage in trading with our former customers across international boundary lines, they would not have put a thousand times as much effort into reduction of output at home as they put into the effort to restore foreign trade during their first year in control. The reduction of the surplus, however, was their main objective. Outside the cotton belt the fight to reduce the surplus has now, all at once, taken on the aspect of an army, girded for battle, and finding only Quaker guns confronting it. The drought reaches from New York to the Basin States, and includes everything north of the Ohio River. Within this area is found the great bread-basket of the nation. Wheat will be little over half a crop. The feed grains, with the possible exception of corn, will hardly make over half a crop, while hay and pasture are rated still lower. A prospect such as this would, five years ago, have sent prices upward with a bound, while now it has created but a mild stir among buyers. Of course, the bins are not empty, nor will all of them be so at the end of the present crop season. We shall have wheat beyond the normal carry-over of ten years ago still on hand a year from now. The people are not going to starve, nor yet, so far as can be seen at present, will they be called upon to pay pre-war parity prices for very many farm products. An influence which would have sent prices to a much higher level than mere price parity with a five-year pre-war base is held firmly in leash by the straitened circumstances of the buyers. The reduced output will, of course, have the effect of increasing prices. Some examples are already evident. But without waiting to see whether or not the prices are going up much or little, the government must return to its time-honored job of advising farmers with respect to the best "catch" crop to plant, the latest date for planting soy beans or millet with the hope of a crop, and whether or not any crop whatever, without restriction, may be planted on the rented acres.

The men at Washington guiding the fortunes of the AAA are clever enough, as they put the great machine into reverse gear, to state that planning does not, of course, mean going always in one direction. In April it looked as though we needed reduction of output ranging from 10 to 50 per cent of the leading crops and products. In May they were hesitant in making concessions to the drought-stricken districts in the way of easements respecting contracts signed. In June it appeared that outside the cotton belt, where the privilege of using the rented acres was most liberal from the start, restrictions were no longer to apply, as first prescribed.

From the standpoint of a lesson in social control, the drought comes at an unfortunate time. We had made a nation-wide appeal to the farmers asking that they conform to the plans and views of the group. It was, and is, a gigantic plan. There was much difference of opinion as to the degree of conformity to rules which was to be expected of three million farmers scattered over three million square miles. The plan followed was, ostensibly, voluntary, but almost before it was given a trial, the voluntary features were eliminated from the biggest single venture, that of the control of cotton. However, this was a case of voluntary compulsion. Those who had volunteered to come in voted almost unanimously that those who had not volunteered should be brought into camp. A similar modification of the wheat program was under way, but was headed off by the drought. Coercion, as thus far developed, not only applies to those who failed to sign contracts, but likewise applies to the quantity of goods which may be marketed by those who had agreed to acreage control. The test of the voluntary phase of control, such as was in progress in the corn-hog program, bid fair to be extremely important. It was a major effort at social control, without force—probably the greatest undertaking of its kind ever known in the world. At present it is largely in abeyance.

Planning for agriculture did not begin with the New Deal. It had, for example, been prominent in our land policies almost from the first. We planned to settle the wilderness, and sold wild land at "ten shillings" per acre. We hastened the settlement by giving quarter sections away as homesteads. We modified the homestead law to facilitate the settlement of the semi-arid plains. We drove out the cattlemen and tore up the grass in the interest of a higher civilization. We irrigated with government money when private capital was no longer available because of the judgment against the ventures. In all of this we did, however, leave the individual to his own devices except on a few occasions, as, for example, when the government granted seed loans during the seven lean years, thus enabling the settler to survive on his own through the seven (never consecutive) fat years.

In this connection appears the most hopeful phase of the newly planned agriculture, which is the proposal to take millions of acres of submarginal land out of cultivation and turn them back to a use for which they are fitted. Toward the fulfilment of this program the drought has made a valuable contribution. The present tragedy of the short-grass country with its wheat farmers has impressed itself on the nation as never before. With twelve million pounds of soil dropped into New York City alone by a three-day wind, little further argument should be needed. Our statesmen will agree with the cowboys and the Indians that the dry land should not have been broken up. The story is told of a party of public men working on the wheat front during the war. They were on an Indian reservation in Montana, conferring with an Indian chief regarding the extension of the wheat acreage. As they sat in the sagebrush eating lunch, a small whirlwind crossed a tract of land already plowed, carrying a black column of dust hundreds of feet into the air. The educated Indian turned to the white men and said, "You call that merely a whirlwind, but my religion is different from yours. To me it is a message from the Great Spirit saying, 'You ought not to have plowed up this ground.' " And a member of the party retorted, "The Great Spirit was right."

We are never thankful for the plagues visited upon us by nature, and as individuals we are reluctant to accept the clear-cut verdict to the effect that we should cease fighting against heavy odds, playing, as it were, against loaded dice. The repossession by the government of some of the land which should never have been in private hands, at least not without restrictions as to use, may be greatly hastened by the drought. What to do with the unfortunate persons who must move out of these areas has not been determined, and is not easy of determination. But since nothing can be much worse than their present plight, the chances of improvement are excellent.

Another good lesson we should get from the drought is that, since such widespread distress is to be expected now and then, we should have an organization able to cope with it adequately and promptly. The AAA product-curtailment forces were turned almost instantly into a drought-relief army greatly to the advantage of the people in need of help. The drought, with its 20 to 50 per cent reductions in output, will make our proposed reductions, half as great, look small. We will learn something as to the influence of supply on price, and conversely will have clearer ideas concerning surpluses. It may be that something in the nature of widespread crop insurance will be found feasible, and henceforth be used to soften the blows of calamities such as the present drought is proving to be for many farmers. The crop-benefit or land-rental payments now being made assume the aspect of insurance, although not designed as such. Insurance covering crop yields has, through other channels, made little progress.

We shall be forced to appreciate to some extent at least the results of reduction of output on employment. More farmers will be looking for work. The railroads will have less to do. The mills will grind smaller grists; the merchants will have smaller stocks. In general, there will be less work to do. We may be driven a little faster than we anticipated toward a self-sufficient nationalistic basis, but in advancing inadvertently toward the goal we hoped to reach by orderly and rational steps, we are likely to find difficulty in holding the ground gained. Already there is a widespread feeling that the drought has given the AAA a knockout blow. It is indeed more than doubtful that the reductions in farm output planned by the New Deal, outside the cotton control, had they been carried through to the letter, would have resulted in an added farm income of importance. A more drastic reduction under rigid control could, presumably, force higher prices, as the drought results may prove. But next year we shall have to argue the case over again from the beginning. Output can be controlled, over any period of years, such as a decade or less, through control of acreage, and prices can be influenced by quantity of produce. On the other hand, the providential reduction of this year's farm output will emphasize the truth that prosperity and plenty are more fundamentally and happily related than are scarcity and price.

The Crawford Case

An Experiment in Social Statesmanship

By CHARLES H. HOUSTON and LEON A. RANSOM

THE National Association for the Advancement of Colored People always insists that cases tentatively proposed to it satisfy two tests before it will handle them: (1) Is an injustice about to be perpetrated upon the individual because he is a Negro; (2) Does the case involve principles or policies affecting Negroes generally. It entered the George Crawford case on this basis.

Prior to Crawford's arrest in Boston on January 12, 1933, certain rumors had gained currency in Virginia that Crawford was not the real murderer of Mrs. Agnes Boeing Ilsley and Mrs. Mina Buckner in Middleburg on January 13, 1932, but that he was to be sacrificed to cover up the guilt of a white man. When the press reported that Crawford had been arrested in Boston and was held for return to Virginia, the national office of the N. A. A. C. P. requested Butler R. Wilson of the Boston bar, president of the Boston branch of the association, to investigate.

The report from Boston on January 20 was that Crawford denied all guilt, that he had a complete alibi; that he had come to Boston from Virginia about September 5, 1931, and had not been out of the city until long after January 13, 1932, the date of the murders; that the Virginia authorities were on their way to take Crawford back and that Mr. Wilson was going to resist. Rendition hearings were begun before S. D. Bacigalupo, Assistant Attorney-General of Massachusetts, on January 25, Crawford being represented by Mr. Wilson and J. Weston Allen, former Attorney-General of Massachusetts.

The national office sent Helen Boardman, who had made several noteworthy investigations for the association, to Virginia. Her primary assignment was to get the temper of Loudoun County, in which Middleburg was located, and determine the risk of a lynching if Crawford was returned. Miss Boardman incidentally picked up certain information casting doubt on Crawford's guilt, and about February 3 reported this back to the national office.

Basing its action on the Boston alibi, which was supported by witnesses, Miss Boardman's report, and the further story from Boston that Crawford had already been a martyr to Virginia injustice—having been sentenced in Richmond about 1925, so the story went, to nine years in the penitentiary for receiving some cartons of stolen cigarettes—the national office in good faith released its publicity proclaiming Crawford's innocence of the Middleburg murders and calling on its friends to support its fight to prevent Crawford's return to Virginia.

The decision of the Governor of Massachusetts to return Crawford to Virginia, the writ of habeas corpus issued by Judge Lowell, and the subsequent proceedings in the federal courts are well known and need not be repeated. Until October, 1933, when the United States Supreme Court refused to hear the case, all the energies of the association and counsel were directed toward keeping Crawford in Massachusetts. It was October before further investigations could be started in Virginia, and before counsel had free access to Crawford to check with him the various facts discovered. By that time the case had achieved an international notoriety, and the association had become committed to it beyond any possibility of withdrawal.

When counsel began to investigate the case in Virginia and check their investigations against Crawford's story and the Boston reports, an entirely different picture began to appear. No criticism whatever is made or intended of the conduct of the case in Boston. Messrs. Wilson and Allen made a devoted, able fight for Crawford with the information and material which were available. They simply did not have the information which the authors of this article later obtained in Virginia. Likewise no criticism is made or intended of the report turned in by Miss Boardman; but it happens that in the time available to her Miss Boardman was unable to talk to the persons who possessed direct information about Crawford's presence in Virginia. She did not talk with any of the Virginia Negroes, or with the Washington police who were called in by the Loudoun County authorities to investigate the case.

Whereas the Boston story had featured Crawford as taking a nine-year sentence for receiving stolen cigarettes in order to save a sister from prosecution, the court records in Richmond disclosed that Crawford was a second offender. He had been given three years in 1921 for receiving stolen goods. He had escaped in May, 1922, and the November following had been caught and sentenced in Richmond to five years for larceny of diamond rings from his employer. Three years had been added for the previous escape, and two more years for his being a second offender. He had been discharged in 1930 under a commutation of sentence for saving the life of a prison guard named B. A. Coleman, of Lynchburg, Virginia.

The Boston alibi had placed Crawford in Boston continuously from about September 5, 1931, straight through January 13, 1932. But it began to develop from friendly colored people that Crawford had returned to Virginia before Christmas, 1931, and had been in and around Virginia from that time up until the time of the murders. It has been suggested that these witnesses were under duress; but they certainly did not appear to be under any duress, and in at least one instance the colored boy who talked with counsel had previously refused to divulge his information to the prosecution.

Counsel have been criticized because they spent most of their time trying to discover what evidence the prosecution had against Crawford and because they left the investigation of the Boston alibi to the last. But the Boston alibi had already been investigated and presented at the rendition hearing in January and February, 1932. Any change in the terms of the alibi would have been ground for suspicion. Crawford brought the Boston alibi back to Virginia with him just the same as if he had wrapped it in a package and carried it in his hand. On the other hand, counsel had to investigate the evidence of the prosecution in order to develop their theory of the defense.

As a matter of fact, at the end of November, 1933, two weeks before the trial, Mr. Ransom and James G. Tyson of the Washington bar, who with Edward P. Lovett, also of the Washington bar, assisted in the defense, went to Boston to check up on the alibi and on Crawford's alleged confession, and to make a general investigation. Through a misunderstanding which can hardly be laid at their door, they failed to see two alibi witnesses who had given important testimony at the rendition hearings, and who still persist in their original testimony that Crawford was in Boston on January 13, 1932. But against the accuracy of their memories there are three objective facts which tend to show that Crawford was in Virginia:

1. On Christmas eve, 1931, the Ilsley cottage in Middleburg was entered and a gold watch stolen. In January, 1932, shortly before the murders, Crawford turned up in Lynchburg at Coleman's home and pawned this same watch to Coleman for the price of a bus ticket to Richmond. Coleman produced the watch at the trial, but upon the defense objection that the watch referred to a separate, unrelated crime the court ruled the watch out of evidence and did not permit the prosecution to identify it.

2. About 4 a.m. on the night of the murders two Negroes abandoned a Ford car on the Virginia side of the Potomac River just outside of Washington, D. C. This was Mrs. Ilsley's car. It was taken to the Washington police headquarters, and when it was searched, a note indisputably written by George Crawford was found on the floor. Further evidence tended to establish that Crawford had written the note two days before the murders. Criticism has been made that the Washington police did not find the note on the first search of the car, and that counsel did not bring this out on cross-examination. But what difference did that make if it was actually Crawford's note, written under the circumstances which counsel knew it had been written under? Counsel saved the force of their cross-examination for the crucial things which could really affect the decision of the case either in the trial court or on appeal: the unconstitutional exclusion of Negroes from the grand and petit juries; the testimony of the pathologist who claimed he had found Negro skin under Mrs. Ilsley's nails; the confession which was the missing link connecting Crawford with the crime itself.

3. Crawford's clothes were discovered in Washington, D. C., where he had abandoned them when he fled from Washington after the murders. Counsel went to the place where Crawford said he had stayed, obtained the clothes, and still have them in their possession.

The prosecution produced nineteen witnesses who testified to seeing Crawford in Virginia between December 24, 1931, and January 13, 1932. The majority of these had had intimate contact with him, such as riding in the same automobile or sleeping in the same house. Counsel had interviewed six of the most important of these witnesses in advance of the trial; and either from these six or from conversations with Crawford were able to anticipate what the others would testify to. There were only two witnesses in the entire case whose testimony was a surprise to counsel, and these two were successfully impeached.

Upon the facts as developed from their own investigations and conferences with Crawford, counsel decided not to offer the Boston alibi, but to rest their strategy on forcing the prosecution to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt and on taking advantage of every reversible error made by the court. In counsel's opinion the court made four errors, any one of which would have served to justify an appeal: (1) The court erred in ruling that qualified Negroes had not been unconstitutionally excluded from the grand jury; (2) from the petit jury; (3) in admitting Crawford's "confession"; and (4) in not striking out all the evidence of the prosecution on the ground of variance from the charges in the indictment. But the jury returned a verdict of guilty with imprisonment for life; the court entered sentence; and counsel failed to appeal. Why?

In the first place Crawford did not want to appeal. It was his case and his life. He did not get into the mess in order to raise the constitutional issues; and if he was unwilling to gamble with his life to challenge further the issue of jury discrimination in Virginia, quite frankly that was his business. When the question was asked whether he wanted to take the chance on the outcome of another trial if the first sentence was reversed on appeal, he stated that counsel could use their own judgment so long as he did not have to take a chance on the electric chair. As Crawford's counsel, the authors of this article took their orders from him.

It was counsel's best judgment that on a second trial Crawford would probably get a death sentence. The trial had been a great nervous strain on the county and State, and had been expensive to them in more ways than one. Most persons in the county felt that Crawford had been extremely lucky in escaping the chair on the first trial. For Crawford to have demanded a second trial in order to challenge the jury issue would have put him in the position of not letting well enough alone. It would have taken him off the defensive and placed him on the offensive against the county. This would have had its inevitable, silent, psychological effect. If Crawford had wished to appeal or if he had received the death sentence, counsel would have appealed and fought the case to the end, because then Crawford would have had everything to gain and nothing to lose; but with a life sentence it was different. Crawford's private, personal interests dictated winding up the case as quickly as possible.

The question remains whether the N. A. A. C. P. was justified in being a party to the compromise. In deciding this question it should be remembered that the decision whether to appeal involved not only questions of law but also question and good-will of the dominant majority. The law itself the very existence of the N. A. A. C. P. is that the Negro can attain full citizenship and equal rights only with the cooperation and good-wil of the dominant majority. The law itself is a powerful weapon, but it has certain definite limitations when it comes to changing the mores of a community. A decision that Negroes had been unconstitutionally excluded from the grand jury which had indicted Crawford would not have cured the situation for the future if the dominant group in Virginia had made up its mind that it would use every subterfuge and force to nullify the decision. As early as 1879 in "Ex parte Virginia," the United States Supreme Court had authoritatively proscribed the action of Virginia authorities in excluding Negroes from State juries; but Virginia had ignored the decision and the practice persisted. Consequently the problem before the N. A. A. C. P. was not simply to force the issue, but to force it in such a way as to provoke the minimum amount of resistance.

There were indications at the time of the Crawford sentence that the practice of excluding Negroes from juries in Virginia was breaking down. Since Judge Lowell's decision they had begun to appear in divers counties throughout the State. In Fredericksburg in the preceding summer, Judge Coleman had fined a white farmer for contempt in refusing to serve on a grand jury with a Negro. In the Crawford case it is true that Crawford had been indicted, tried, and convicted by white juries from which counsel is convinced Negroes had been unconstitutionally excluded, but these juries had been fair and Crawford had received justice in fact, if not in law. Anyone who insinuates that Crawford was framed in Virginia does not know the facts.

Furthermore, Judge McLemore, who had tried the Crawford case, although he refused to set the white juries aside, had actually made a finding that there were Negroes in Loudoun County qualified for jury service, and had expressed the hope that in the future the matter would be settled to the satisfaction of all concerned. It was a real question whether from the standpoint of the ultimate objective of getting Negroes on juries in all the counties of Virginia it was better to force the issue in the Crawford case or to leave the Crawford case where it was as a token to the State that the N. A. A. C. P. raised the jury issue only in the interests of substantial injustice, and did not raise it as a shield to protect guilty Negroes from the penalties of the law.

Within sixty days after the Crawford case, in Judge McLemore's home county, 15 Negroes had been included on a panel of 175 jurors, the first Negroes to be included since 1902; and the practice has been spreading in other counties. Most significant, there has been no public resentment. The leaders of public opinion in the State say this is due in no small measure to the trial and outcome of the Crawford case.

Again, the N. A. A. C. P. had to consider the question of local community relationships. As an outside organization the N. A. A. C. P. had to calculate carefully how far it was justified in turning the county upside down and then walking out on the local Negroes, leaving them in their weakness to catch the full force of community resentment. Sometimes in major social movements it may be necessary to sacrifice the peace of a community in the greater interests of the whole, but the decision should be made after great deliberation. When the Crawford case opened, the community was tense and hostile. The Negro population was so apprehensive that adequate living accommodations for counsel could not be obtained. Counsel had to commute back and forth from Washington to Leesburg every day of the trial. Yet when the case closed, the atmosphere had completely changed, and both white and colored now report race relations in the county better than ever before. These facts cannot be ignored, especially when it is known that over almost unanimous protest counsel had refused to ask a change of venue and had insisted that the trial be held in Loudoun County where the murders had been committed, under the principle that the real test whether Virginia could give Crawford a fair trial was its ability to give him such a trial in the county where the crime had been committed and where feeling was most inflamed.

It has been stated that Virginia rushed Crawford to a plea of guilty to the Buckner case after a feature article had appeared in the Norfolk Journal and Guide in which Crawford had denied his guilt and claimed a frame-up. The truth is that the arrangements for the plea had been made before the article appeared. When Crawford was confronted with the article, he denied having authorized it; but even then counsel would not take the responsibility of pleading him guilty. He was advised that he did not have to plead guilty and could have a trial if he wanted it; but of his own free will he declined a trial and entered his plea.

In appraising the conduct of the Crawford case it is necessary to consider both the immediate and the long-range objectives. It is impossible to reach a conclusion in vacuo. The thoughtful reader should project himself right into the community and courthouse in Leesburg, with the responsibility of making a decision which will mean peace or discord to the human beings who will have to live there after he has gone, and should try to anticipate the repercussion of his decision throughout the State five, ten, fifteen years hence.

In their disposition of the Crawford case counsel were not trying to establish any universals. They were dealing with a concrete case in a concrete way. The Scottsboro cases present quite different factors in a different setting; the same for the Elaine, Arkansas, riot cases (Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U. S. 86—1923), although there counsel pleaded the six defendants guilty to a less serious charge by way of disposing of the cases after the United States Supreme Court had ruled that the previous conviction under mob domination violated due process of law.

Virginia knows that the N. A. A. C. P. has not dropped the jury issue. It knows that the N. A. A. C. P. is in the fight to stay until every Virginia Negro enjoys all the rights, powers, and privileges of every other citizen of the Commonwealth; but it also knows that the N. A. A. C. P. program is to foster rather than to destroy interracial cooperation, mutual confidence, and good-will.

[In last week's issue Helen Boardman and Martha Gruening criticized counsel's defense of George Crawford and the attitude of the N. A. A. C. P. toward the case. This article is Mr. Houston's and Mr. Ransom's reply.]

In the Driftway

SEEKING communion with his fellow-man, in the large and in the raw, the Drifter recently elected to travel by bus from Washington to Pittsburgh. The bus, so the Drifter had been informed, is a highly democratic conveyance for several reasons. First, it is relatively uncomfortable; second, it has a warm human smell, blended of gasolene, Fleur de Lys, and what Listerine is supposed to be good for; third, the narrow aisles and the common endurance of physical distress induce a breakdown of that quasi-hostile suspicion with which your typical American confronts his world. In short, so the Drifter had been informed, a train load of people is just a crowd, whereas a bus load is a party. The Drifter is still mulling over that party in his mind. Everything was exactly as described, only more so: the jolts, the smells, the furtive, tentative efforts at human converse and intimacy. Yet on the whole, the Drifter cannot remember a comparable experience of moral and spiritual isolation and defeat.

PERHAPS it was the hundred-and-twenty-horse-power steel-and-rubber personality of the bus itself that subdued and saddened us all. Theoretically, we had employed the bus and its driver to take us somewhere, and we all had sundry frail and dubious reasons for going wherever we were going. Actually, the categorical imperative of the bus overawed us. Beneath the steady rebuke of its roaring, sixty-mile-an-hour manifest destiny, the outcries of a drunken woman in the rear grew gradually fainter. The Drifter's seat companion, a middle-aged and loquacious woman, cut short her triumphant exposition of her indubitable respectability, glared at him, and edged over to the window. The Drifter, too, was silent. When he mounted this Juggernaut he had some idea of rising, clearing his throat, and making a little speech. "Brothers and sisters," he would have said, "we are all Americans. And we are all in the same bus. Let us, then, be aware of each other, look kindly at each other, and take counsel. . . ."

* * * * *

THE Drifter didn't say that, or anything. Instead, he listened to the intestinal rumblings of the monster that was bearing him over the May-green ridges of the Alleghenies, with a honk at the darkened fields of Gettysburg, a splatter of exhaust gas fouling the fragrance of the spring night, blurring history, humanity, and nature in a whirl of irrational, mechanical necessity. The Drifter even derived a certain masochistic pleasure out of his surrender to the categorical imperative of the bus. But in the morning, after a night's sleep, he felt differently. Next time he will try a smaller, slower bus, perhaps, but he will yet make that speech.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Klan Revives

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It has been a matter of common knowledge that the Ku Klux Klan and kindred organizations have shown a vital interest in fighting against the International Labor Defense, and an active, violent opposition to the defense this organization has afforded the Scottsboro boys, Angelo Herndon, the sharecroppers of Alabama, as well as other working-class defendants not only in the South but in every part of the country. On numerous occasions I. L. D. offices in Atlanta, Birmingham, and other places have been raided and wrecked by these organizations. Such raids have never resulted even in "investigations" by police, and in many cases there has been good reason to believe that the police uniform was hidden under the nightshirts.

Heretofore, the connection between police and state authorities and these fascist organizations has been apparent enough, but in most cases an official organizational link has not existed openly. The latest move of the White Legion in Birmingham, however, indicates that this link, which in an earlier period put open Ku Klux candidates in the highest public offices, is being revived. A realignment of forces, a reorganization of them, and an attempt to consolidate them are being made.

Not only is the White Legion the main support of Bibbs Graves in his candidacy for Governor of Alabama, not only are its main planks anti-red and for the execution of the Scottsboro boys, but the organization has opened a campaign admittedly aimed at barring I. L. D. lawyers from the defense of the Scottsboro boys and other prisoners. The campaign, a direct attack on the constitutional right of defendants to an attorney of their choice, is for the passage of laws described as intended to prevent out-of-State attorneys from "embarrassing our courts" (the quotation is verbatum). This campaign is linked with the gubernatorial campaign of Graves, one of the two leading candidates. The Associated Press states in a dispatch that "the drive . . . apparently was aimed at the International Labor Defense sending attorneys into the State to defend the Scottsboro Negroes . . . and to appear in another case that led to the lynching."

The "lynching" referred to is undoubtedly that of Dan Pippen, Jr., and A. T. Harden, at Tuscaloosa, last August. Only the I. L. D. and its attorneys showed, through intensive investigation, how clearly this case was a frame-up. It was this exposure that impelled the authorities—who, we have charged, were directly involved—to hasten the lynch process by the murder of the two defendants, after driving the I. L. D. attorneys out of town. Even further proof of the frame-up was given when the accidental survivor of the lynching, Elmore Clarke, the third defendant, was released last week following a nolle pros.

A companion law would, as described by the Associated Press, prevent employment of any teacher in State-supported schools and colleges "who is directly or indirectly connected with, or in sympathy with, atheism or communism." As the desperate struggle to secure the freedom of the Scottsboro boys continues, the issues involved become constantly broader and clearer, and its political aspects in the fight for democratic rights for Negroes and for white workers as well are increasingly apparent.

This latest move of the main organization behind a Democratic gubernatorial candidate is one which should arouse the opposition of thousands of individuals—lawyers, intellectuals, and others—previously unenlightened regarding the breadth of the issues involved in Scottsboro. Of those among your readers who are stirred by this new call to action against fascism in America, against lynching and against the roots of lynching—discrimination—we ask that they give voice to their opposition to these proposed laws wherever they are, by word of mouth, by letters to editors of newspapers, by the writing of articles (our records in the Scottsboro case are available to those who need background material), by individual protests and stimulation of protests from organizations of every shade, directed to Mr. Graves at his Birmingham campaign headquarters and to the State legislature of Alabama.

New York, May 30 LOUIS COLMAN

A Liberal Protests

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

"The good old cause," as Whitman used to say, impels me to write you this letter. In your current issue Louis Fischer asserts that in Russia "life grows easier." That may be so. But the obvious implication of his caption, namely, that life is tolerable in Russia, is clearly disingenuous. Glibly he glides about amid certain figures in order that no one shall examine them critically. Have you done so? Do you see to it editorially that your readers do? He tells us (1) that a worker's average income is approximately 140 rubles a month; (2) that in the ordinary cooperatives where citizens make purchases on their ration cards, these cooperatives selling only bread, meal, potatoes, herrings, sugar, a man would have to spend roughly one ruble a day or thirty rubles a month for bread enough to keep alive on. At the commercial stores where butter costs thirty-five rubles a kilogramm this average Russian evidently cannot buy anything. If he is lucky enough to belong to the small ruling class of this "classless" society, he may, however, purchase supplies more reasonably. How reasonably? Mr. Fischer, who must have an idea, slurs the question by saying "one must first ascertain" what reduction this aristocrat receives in the "closed factory cooperatives." Let us suppose that he receives a reduction of 50 per cent. Then he will pay (if he can) 12 per cent of his monthly income for about two pounds and two ounces of butter and 15 per cent for a little over a pound of tea and so on. In other words, the most favored class in Russia barely subsists; the vast majority of the 160 millions live on the bleak and naked edge of hunger.

On the back cover of the number of The Nation which contains Mr. Fischer's article on how much "easier" life is in Russia, there is a full-page advertisement of the Soviet American Securities Company. I do not draw the inferences that you would draw concerning similar phenomena in the "reactionary" press. But it wouldn't surprise me at all if certain "reactionaries"—a pejorative term nowadays applied to anyone whose critical intelligence is not to be taken in by so-called Marxian babble—will make the observation and draw the inference.

You used to stand four-square for the good old cause of liberty, which is eternal and unchanging, of humanity, which knows no compromise. You resist fascism and subtly sabotage that resistance by exercising no criticism upon the barbarism in which the ration-card of non-proletarians (I quote Mr. Fischer) permits them to have only one-half of the miserable quantity of the miserable food of which the "worker" gets the insufficient whole; a barbarism in which, in other words, you and I and that innumerable company of men and women of all lands have created all the values of civilization, would be brutally starved into seeming to accept that Marxian materialism which is one of the most puerile of the many superstitions that have disgraced mankind.

The fascists offer us their Koran or the sword; the Marxians offer us their Koran or the sword. Are there no free minds left who will choose the sword in either case? Well, I do. And you, unless you are faithless to all for which you have stood —you should.

Burlington, Vt., June 12 LUDWIG LEWISOHN

The International Juridical Association

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your issue of June 13 you referred to a brief drawn up under the auspices of the American Civil Liberties Union, charging former Governor Rolph with murder for refusing to prevent the San José lynchings. May we call your attention to the fact that the brief was prepared by the research staff of the International Juridical Association, at the request of the Union.

Our research, in the form of briefs, memoranda, consultation, and advice, has been used by many of the organizations and individuals concerned with rights of aliens, Negroes, political minorities, and labor. They include the International Labor Defense, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, farmers, teachers, labor unions, and attorneys scattered throughout the country.

We have just completed two years of publication of a monthly bulletin reporting the developments in our field and analyzing them from the point of view and with the technical advantage of highly trained socially-minded lawyers. All editorial and research work is done without compensation.

New York, June 8 ISIDOR POLIER,
Executive Director

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

☐ FILMS ☐

AMKINO's First Showing in America
IN THE LAND OF THE SOVIETS-1934
MAY DAY IN MOSCOW (only complete showing)
The Kolkhoz (the collectives)
Snow and Ice Carnival
The Chelyuskin Expedition
Stalin & Gurki Auto Plants
The Kara Kum Expedition
Moscow 1934, etc., etc.
ACME THEATRE 14th St. and UNION SQ. | Midnight Show Every Saturday Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

☐ BOOKS ☐

Seventh Printing
THE NATURE LOVER'S KNAPSACK
By Edwin Osgood Grover
"All the best that poets have said about Nature:—selected with discriminating taste."—Boston Transcript.
$2.50
THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY
393 Fourth Avenue New York

☐ ANTI-FASCIST BULLETIN ☐

WHAT IS ACTUALLY GOING ON IN GERMANY TODAY?
That there is unrest brewing in Germany today is becoming more generally known.
How deep is the discontent?
What is the basis for the conflict and what is the outlook for a break in the Nazi leadership?
To what extent have the anti-fascist activities in Germany developed?
Has there been a let-up in anti-Semitic repression?
What is the role of children under Hitlerism—both the Hitler Youth and the children of anti-fascists?
How are anti-fascist women treated?

These questions and others are answered in the current issue of the MONTHLY BULLETIN (Vol. I, No. 12) by FACTUAL ACCOUNTS sent by our own correspondents.

MOST OF THE INFORMATION CONTAINED IN OUR BULLETINS DOES NOT APPEAR IN ANY OTHER PUBLICATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

Originally, the bulletins were issued to the members of the American Committee of the International Relief Association, but demands for material contained therein have been so extensive that we have decided to put the MONTHLY BULLETIN on a subscription basis at $1.50 a year. ALL SURPLUS ABOVE THE ACTUAL COST OF ISSUE IS ADDED TO THE RELIEF FUND FOR THE VICTIMS OF FASCISM.

American Committee
INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION
Room 401, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
Oswald Garrison Villard, Chairman Freda Kirchwey, Treasurer
Sterling D. Spero, Secretary

Freda Kirchwey, Treasurer
American Committee, International Relief Association
Room 401, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
Enclosed is $________for a________year(s) subscription to the MONTHLY BULLETIN issued by the American Committee of the International Relief Association. I enclose an additional contribution of $________toward the fund for the relief of victims of fascism, without regard to race, creed, or politics.
NAME________________
ADDRESS________________

Books

Being

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

He kept a house beneath a hill,
Lonelier than a whippoorwill;
His panes were bare of any shade;
Clamming was his only trade.
The spruces came up to his house,
He was quiet as a mouse;
He had no garden and no friend,
He did not borrow things or lend,
Never in all his silent life
Had he found room for any wife
Of his own or other men's;
He'd never kept as much as hens.

He could dig clams with the best;
He always wore a blue serge vest
When he was turning up the flats.
Naturally, he had some cats,
Two big old tommies, sleek and sunny,
The color of white-clover honey.
They were a family of three,
Contented as a squash-vine bee.
Snug and still between the tides,
They followed the sun around the sides
Of the fish-house, lost, unseeing,
Busy with the work of being.

Socialism Faces a Changing World

Property or Peace. By H. N. Brailsford. Covici-Friede. $3.

FOR Socialists, as well as for liberals who pride themselves on their realism, the events of the past few years have furnished cause for a serious searching of hearts. The crushing defeat administered to British Labor in 1931, followed by the triumph of reaction in Germany, Spain, and Austria, has rendered belief in an evolutionary trend toward collectivism extremely difficult. Indeed, many observers see fascism rather than socialism as the next step in social development. Under these trying circumstances, a book from the gifted pen of H. N. Brailsford, the noted publicist of the British Labor Party, is especially to be welcomed. Its timeliness is enhanced by the fact that in content, if not by intention, it is a direct reply to the challenge to direct action laid down by Strachey in "The Coming Struggle for Power." And like the latter, it is a book which no one who presumes to have an intelligent view of contemporary affairs can afford to ignore.

At the outset Mr. Brailsford surveys the peril in which democracy finds itself today, analyzing in some detail the reasons for its collapse in Russia, Italy, and Germany. This he finds to be due primarily to its inherent limitations in the face of difficulties, internal or external, which call for swift and drastic action. It is not a matter of chance that parliamentary procedure has failed to adapt itself readily to the needs of the modern world. The framework of existing democracies, with their systems of checks and balances, was specifically designed to harmonize with the economic structure of laissez faire. As that economic doctrine has decayed, artificial devices have become necessary in order to keep the political superstructure intact, and in times of stress even the most staunch democracies have dispensed with their constitutional safeguards. In the sense of popular self-rule, however, it is doubtful whether genuine democracy ever existed. Throughout the past century property has contrived by devious means to retain its seat at the controls, irrespective of drastic changes in the political mechanism. From a realistic standpoint, it must be admitted that the parliamentary system has served as an effective instrument for perpetuating middle-class domination, though it is possible that it may yet be remodeled to meet the requirements of a new social order.

The demise of laissez faire is not the outcome of any catastrophic change in the process of production. Passive wealth, in the form of fixed-interest-bearing securities, coupled with the growth of trusts and cartels, has caused a gradual crystalization of the economic structure so as to prevent an easy adjustment to altered conditions. But the real reason that our society cannot enjoy the vast potential wealth within its reach lies in the disequilibrium between consumers' income and the volume of production, the result of unspent profits in the hands of the owning class. Liberals would remedy this dislocation by providing for state interference in the economic process for the purpose of limiting profits. This Mr. Brailsford holds to be basically unsound. As illustrated by the vicissitudes of the New Deal, the lure of profits is necessary if the capitalist mechanism is to be made to function. Thus the goal of each unit of business would appear to be in fundamental conflict with the interest of society, a contradiction which cannot be reconciled until business is subordinated to the requirements of social well-being.

An even more telling criticism of the liberal position is to be found in Brailsford's analysis of the collapse of all organized efforts to eliminate war. Because of the jealousy with which national sovereignty is safeguarded, no machinery has been created for dealing with the underlying causes of international friction: the League is powerless, for example, to adjust world price levels, to organize the market for primary products, to coordinate the international flow of goods and capital, to regulate the movements of populations, or to formulate adequate labor legislation. At the core of the problem of sovereignty, moreover, lies each nation's claim to exclusive control of its military power. The French plan for a reorganization of armies around an authoritative League is merely a device to stereotype the ascendancy of France on the basis of the Versailles pact, while the MacDonald draft convention calls for substantial concessions on the part of all except the British Empire. Nothing short of a world federation vested with a monopoly of power, Mr. Brailsford assures us, will suffice to guarantee the preservation of peace.

Mr. Brailsford does not suggest that nations strip themselves of the means of resisting predatory force: merely that they organize a system of cooperative defense which most of them profess in theory. But an industrial society which starves its domestic market must go pioneering for an outlet for its surplus; and while it is doubtful whether property ever consciously desires to see the nation with which it is affiliated involved in a destructive war, little objection is offered to minor conflicts with so-called backward countries if they promise new opportunities for trade and investment. The faster the empires of today move toward economic self-containment, the stronger will be the pressure to embark on adventures of this type. Perhaps the most stubborn obstacle to effective disarmament is the necessity of holding the market for vested interests once it has been won by the sword. Imperialism, wherever it is found, is based on the relationship of creditor to debtor, supported by all the resources of military power. Even where property is ready to consent to a scaling down of armaments, it cannot permit a weakening of the relative power of the great empires.

While there is little in Mr. Brailsford's penetrating analysis of present-day society to which the realistic observer could take serious exception, non-Socialists will be baffled at times by the solicitude shown for the institutions of democracy. After having portrayed the ruthlessness with which property dominates every aspect of modern life and the ease with which it adapts itself to direct fascist action when threatened in any manner, the author declares that "if Socialists cannot . . . win the assent of a majority of the electorate to a change in system, they could not hope to carry it out successfully during the trials of a period of transition." Despite the obvious economic dangers involved in shifting back and forth between capitalism and socialism, he would "allow Tories, Liberals, and MacDonaldites to organize and agitate" while attempting the transfer of power that leads to socialism. Out of fairness, one should recall that these lines were probably written before the tragic events at Vienna last February. But even on the basis of developments in Italy and Germany, it is difficult to understand how he could assume, even as a working hypothesis, that there will be time to educate the majority of the population to the advantages of socialism before the final sacrifice on the altar of Mammon is consummated. MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Religious Note

Duel. By Ronald Fangen. Translated from the Norwegian by Paula Wiking. The Viking Press. $2.50.

IF loftiness of pretension or urgency of theme alone were sufficient to compose a novel, then Ronald Fangen's "Duel" would merit not only the applause of Sigrid Undset but our own as well. To be told that our days are insignificantly spent, that the life of this world at its best may greet its end with no more than a gesture and at its worst exalt death above life, is to be told important truths of which, perhaps, we cannot be too much reminded. The medium of this message, however, should be worthy of its subject and in "Duel" it is not.

Dr. Klaus Hallem is a middle-aged Norwegian country surgeon, much touched with frustration and envy. Subject to violent fits of depression since youth, he is possessed with death. Fate in the person of his wife, however, and of George Roiter, has hitherto intervened to prevent so vain a release. George Roiter, professor of jurisprudence at the University of Oslo and internationally famous, is in part the cause, though the unwitting cause, of Hallem's defect. He is the opposite of the latter. Not only is he brilliant and successful, he appears to be the repository of all virtue as well. Hallem cannot but compare himself to the latter, and in the comparison endeavor, unsuccessfully, to exalt himself. The shadow of Hallem lies across the life of Roiter, too, but to Roiter his friend is—or so he thinks—an object of pity to be saved. In the end we learn that Roiter's pity has been in reality pride. It is a vice, not a virtue, which is discovered at once to us and to Roiter, who in virtue of this recognition is saved. For he dies in the realization of his fault and with the name of Christ on his lips.

The revelation is unconvincing. We cannot believe that one so kind, so sensitive, so thoughtful has been touched with what, after all, is the first of the deadly sins. We cannot, at least, believe this in virtue of the book itself; Fangen has given us no sign by which the fault might be indicated. For the rest, "Duel" is symbolic in the large Scandinavian manner. There is woman, the eternal mother, and there is the eternal conflict in our nature; but these truths are conveyed to us through no convincing situation. There is no sensibility through which the reality of the symbolism might be established, unless we except the dreary, turgid conversations, or rather monologues, with which Fangen would favor us. Obviously it is the author in his proper person who speaks, since all the characters talk alike.

It is distracting and tedious to observe the progress of implausible characters through implausible situations. The tedium is greater if we cannot observe at all. The situations are nothing actual, they have no verisimilitude. The characters do not speak in part, and no situation suggests or is suggested by any other. Fangen imposes upon our faith; he would give us, not the evidence of things seen, which we desire in a work of the imagination, but of things unseen. By his ipse dixit Fangen convinces us of nothing, though this would appear to be the object of his endeavor, it may be unconsciously. What his characters think, what they say, comes not from them, but from him. In the end we know them for nothing but an encumbrance to his theme, the vanity of self. It would have been simpler for Fangen and for us if his sermon had been delivered directly.

LINCOLN REIS

Perpetual Adolescence

Exile's Return. By Malcolm Cowley. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

ARRESTED emotional development creates a perpetual dissatisfaction with reality in any of its phases. Not that reality is rigid or static. But it has for such a being as man in such a world as the present so-and-so many modes, so-and-so many possibilities that are dictated by the psycho-biological character of the race. Now if you cannot reconcile yourself to any of these modes and possibilities; if you are always looking for an "outside" and a "beyond" and an "otherwhere" and place hope and the chance of contentment in that inaccessible region, you and your generation are bound to be, as Mr. Cowley declares his to have been, a "lost generation."

There is not a detail in Mr. Cowley's book that does not echo and reecho this powerlessness to do anything with reality. Take a simple example which, however, goes far to explain some of the literary antics of certain members of his generation. He complains that at school and college he was taught a "standardized Amerenglish as colorless as Esperanto." Now the great literary languages, while not ceasing to change from age to age, have all tended to be standardized within a given age, and men of real talent have never had any difficulty in expressing their originality within the intelligible idiom of their age. The dialect writers, the users of Mr. Cowley's "local idiom," have been few and these "local idioms" have themselves—Burns's Scotch, Mistral's Provençal, Reuter's Plattdeutsch—been highly standardized. To come to the immediate present. Standardized French has not prevented Paul Valéry from being an original and powerful stylist; standardized German did not prevent the dead Rainer Maria Rilke or the living Thomas Mann from creating a lyrical and a narrative style as precise as a treatise on syntax and as fresh as an African dawn. Standardized "Amerenglish" has, to come home at last, in quite recent years been no bar to the creation of two lyrical styles as sound, as beautiful, as individual, as those of Elinor Wylie and Robert Frost. But one must have talent.

One must also know creatively, if not analytically, the "position of the artist in society," namely, that of one who must speak, who must be heard, whose burning secrets must be communicated to his fellow-men, to mankind, quite irrespective of the sociological or economic structure within which he lives, so that the son of a manumitted slave under a military despotism

(Horace) and a stable-keeper's son in Georgian England (Keats) and a small capitalist's son in an eighteenth-century provincial German city (Goethe) all knew what the artist's necessity and function were and didn't substitute social analysis for their work. They, by the way, as well as all the other important writers in the whole history of literature, belonged to or rose into the middle class of society—the class between the undifferentiated mass and the lusters after power, whether military, political, or industrial—so that the observation of Mr. Cowley that "the middle class was beginning to dominate the world of letters" contains as many errors as it does words.

But no such considerations occurred to Mr. Cowley or his contemporaries. If they were "lost," they were above all lost to the past, to the historic experience of mankind. Neither the work nor the example of any great, of any inclusively human writer is quoted in this book. Literature began, according to it, with the French symbolist poets, very charming writers in their little second-rate way, and blossomed in two eccentrics of genius, Joyce and Proust, and in two very talented men, T. S. Eliot and Paul Valéry, who quite obviously invented their theory of literature as an extremely superior Chinese puzzle to cover their own creative sterility.

Next came, according to Mr. Cowley, in the experience of himself and his fellows, Dada and sur-réalisme, that is, the total disdain of and flight from both life and literature as both in their everlasting and fundamental character exist. "Man and nature and human life" were not good enough for this generation and so, like the late Harry Crosby, to whose dismal and sordid career Mr. Cowley devotes his warmest and most eloquent pages, they lost them all.

The epilogue can be predicted by any student of the contemporary scene. Rightly repudiating the fascist plunge back into tribalism Mr. Cowley, with more moderation and good sense than many of his fellows, makes his Utopia of escape the Communist plunge back. He cannot (I use him here as symbol of his generation) stand on his own feet and utter his message. He seeks the mother womb, the dark, undifferentiated sea at the beginning of things. He wants to drown in the mass. He has never learned to accept "man and nature and human life." He must away; he must escape; he must disappear. It is, in sober fact, the dregs of old-fashioned romanticism. "Da wo du nicht bist, da ist das Glück." To which Goethe had already made the sovereign answer: "Here or nowhere is America." "Their real exile was from society itself," Mr. Cowley writes of his friends and himself. No, their exile was from maturity and humanity. Of this exile, their expatriation and their stylistic antics and their general querulousness (to be forever differentiated from creative indignation) are the unconscious symbols.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Politics and the Liberal

Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson. By E. M. Forster. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

IN the epilogue to his life of his friend, Mr. Forster allows Mephistopheles to question whether Dickinson merits the dignity of a biography. And when Mr. Forster has conceded that perhaps Dickinson was neither a preeminent writer nor a practically effective man, he proposes to justify his book by demonstrating the admirable quality of Dickinson's personality. The refinement and charm of that personality no one will deny; but the justification of Mr. Forster's book rests on something firmer and broader—on Dickinson's being representative of a temper of the human mind and the impasse which that temper has reached.

What that temper and its impasse are may best be stated by quoting from a letter which Dickinson wrote about his "A Modern Symposium." Today that polite series of speeches by upper-class political leaders and theorists of all beliefs from Tory to Anarchist is, with its disregard of classes and interests, a scene from another world. But even in 1905 it seemed remote from reality and Dickinson felt called upon to explain his purpose.

> . . . practical politics involves fighting, and the object of such a book as mine, as it was Plato's long ago, is to raise the mind above the fighting attitude. There lies here obscurely the great problem of the relation of ideals to passion and interests which I do not seem able clearly to formulate.

This confusion never, apparently, left Dickinson. In terms of his personal life it is easy enough to see how it arose. At Cambridge he was attracted to mysticism and studied Plotinus. The high-minded, Ruskinian "social view" of the 1880's penetrated the mysticism; he turned to Plato, who, with Shelley and Goethe, formed his youthful views and influenced him throughout life. The three poets fostered in him a finely humanistic political attitude, but one whose overtones of mysticism provided him with his belief in "ideals"—as divorced from "passion and interests." Throughout his life he seems to have maintained a half-belief that truth was absolute and could be apprehended whole.

The essentially religious culture of unorthodox mysticism which was so strong in England, and America, in the nineteenth century, and of which Plato, Shelley, and Goethe were so integral a part, the culture which Matthew Arnold well exemplifies with his "disinterestedness," his "best self," his turning from economic reality, was eventually Dickinson's intellectual undoing. Not his alone, however, for he represented the fate of a large section of the intellectual class. The whole basis of the liberal-humanitarianism of the intellectuals of his generation was the divorce it made between "ideals" and "passion and interests." But since no such divorce exists in politics, "to raise the mind above the fighting attitude" was not to give the minds of this generation a higher function but to betray these minds into becoming the tools of the interests they truly hated.

Politically, Dickinson began as a Carlylean Tory, but he moved left through the years to become a Socialist, apparently of the "Modern Symposium" variety. However, his only strong political feeling was for the League of Nations. Never a pacifist—he was almost jingo during the Boer War, and but for his age he would have enlisted in 1914—he was nevertheless moved by the spectacle of the World War to a consuming hatred of all war. Before he retired to the melancholy silence of a peaceful old age he completed his study of pre-war diplomacy, "International Anarchy." "Anarchy"—so vague a concept—was to him the cause of the great slaughter, and the only hope was "organization." The economic causes of the diplomatic anarchy he did not see or did not stress; the League of Nations—which he had been urging and whose name he is said to have coined—he conceived to be the only bulwark of the world against a recurrence of war.

The League was an "ideal" set against passions and interests. But history moved his "ideal" aside—disclosing the ugly passions and interests which it hid. The inevitable failure of the League ideal was the defeat of Dickinson and of the whole attitude that was merely liberal-humanitarian. Dickinson and the other men who held it were men of good-will whose remoteness from reality, interests, and forces allowed them to serve unwittingly the predatory and the evil-willed.

Mr. Forster has so understandingly portrayed this attitude and the temper of the middle-class mind that embraces it because they are largely his own. As a novelist, however, he has had the advantage of his political colleagues. Although the future does not belong to his kind of novel, ethically based on individual "understanding" and "tolerance," in personal life these virtues are still real. In political life, however, history has proved them to be catchwords that becloud reality in the service of the worst "passion and interests."

LIONEL TRILLING

Intuitive Form

Art Now. By Herbert Read. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

MR. READ is concerned not so much with "art now"—in the sense of present conditions of painting, patronage, tendencies, conflicts, and values—as with the defense of an abstract art and an art of pure fantasy, which are unintelligible to most English and American readers. He values modern art as a pure art, produced by a pure sensibility, and wishes to detach his subject from everything but its own special principles. Despite his conception of modern art as "independent of any sentiments external to its nature," Mr. Read says very little about the paintings themselves. The book is richly—and somewhat incoherently—illustrated, but contains no detailed analyses of the aesthetic structure and qualities of individual works. On the contrary, the greater part is given over to explaining how pure art arose and to the philosophy and psychology behind these products of unconditioned sensibility.

Where Mr. Read attempts to characterize the various kinds of modern painting, he resorts to formulas borrowed from German descriptions of older arts and to polar oppositions like sensational and intuitive, organic and mechanical, Nordic and Latin, form and expression, and the like, which are applied with a bewildering unclarity. In identifying "intuitive form" with "subconscious symbolism" ("the artist projects subconscious symbols which everyone's [!] subconscious immediately accepts") he defines intuitive form, in paraphrase of Mr. Fry, as a "concretion of some kind representing a vague and even a vast field of subjectivity—which was," adds Mr. Read, "precisely our definition of symbolism." Everyone's subconscious, to which this sentence is evidently addressed, will not accept these definitions or precise identifications. Nor will artists trust Mr. Read's sense of pictures when he describes the work of Matisse as symmetrical and architectonic; or when he tells us that the German work of Grosz "can only be accepted in a mood of spiritual asceticism"; or that the Byzantine is a "geometric type of art," and that the "essence of the latter is that it is in no way organized."

The historical chapters show no grasp of the conditioning circumstances under which modern art emerged and no will even to confront them. Mr. Read falsely infers that because art has been the work of individuals for the last 250 years, the development of art must have been independent of social contexts or purposes, as if individuals lived outside society and worked for themselves alone. But even in the latter case they would constitute a peculiar society which must affect the nature of their art. He does not inquire into the content of this individual art, since "the content of art has nothing to do with the nature of the aesthetic process itself." The abstraction of an aesthetic process here, which becomes more important than the work itself, is of a piece with Mr. Read's abstraction of an unconditioned sensibility, or of genius as the essentially aesthetic force, and, later, of a kind of pure nuclear personality, independent of experience, as the rock-bottom reality in art. He believes that in abstract art the real kernel of personality is expressed, whereas in art which exhibits a content the personality of the artist is masked by the personality of the content. While it is true that any scratch drawn by a human hand shows personal characteristics, it is absurd to suppose that a work from which all reference to common experience has been excluded is necessarily more personal than a work dealing with experience. It may be more private, but it is not therefore more personal. The degree to which a work is personal depends not on the subject matter as such but on the nature of the artist's participation in it. Besides, the personal has no value in itself; and, to turn Mr. Read's argument against him, the personal is valued according to its content.

Like other conservative aesthetes Mr. Read identifies social purpose or values in art exclusively with the service of religion. Hence his incapacity to understand that rococo, neo-classic, romantic, realistic, and impressionistic painting, like the preceding religious arts, were valuable to certain social classes in their own day, and that each had a specific content arising from the interests and mode of life of these classes, and that these contents exercised an active influence on the formal character of the styles. The private fantasy of modern painters is itself a content conditioned by the artist's experience. And Mr. Read himself wistfully acknowledges the limitations of this content when he says that if it became necessary, the great abstract modern artists could make cathedrals. They will have been prepared for this task, if not by their present practice, at least by Mr. Read's efforts to identify them with the mystics. But despite the intellectualized spirituality of modern art, Mr. Read in an unguarded moment states that "form and rhythm after all resolve into questions of visual comfort," and elsewhere, that the history of art is simply "the history of seeing."

The modern way of seeing is the result of a revolutionary break with the past. Such revolutions are somehow latent in art; they occur every hundred years or so, or with every generation, and are caused by the inherent diversity of the human spirit. The revolution is also due to the discovery of the genetic method in the study of historical and primitive arts, and to changes in the theory and philosophy of art. The painters appear to be, in the one case, sensibilities with unpredictable mutations, in the other, progressive historians and philosophers. But in another context he quotes approvingly the theories of Semper (1860), who reduced art forms to the interplay of material, technique, and function, and tells us that the method of Semper (which was long ago found inadequate to explain historical development) "must lead to a much better comprehension . . . of the conditions which determine forms throughout history . . . the conditions, we might add, which are determining forms today." None the less, not a word from Mr. Read on technical, material, or functional changes in modern art.

We learn finally in still another part of the book that art changed because life as a whole changed. "The inner world of the imagination becomes more and more significant, as if to compensate for the brutality and flatness of everyday life." In order to give the modern escape the appearance of a universal historical phenomenon, Mr. Read identifies the modern "geometrical" style with the geometrical styles of the past and asserts that all of them arose as reactions from an unpleasant, uncontrollable nature or civilization, as efforts to overcome flux and uncertainty. He accepts Worringer's fantastic picture of primitive man as a spirit fleeing with anxiety the bewildering mobility of phenomena, but the abstract forms arising in modern art as a work of personal fancy, and embodying peculiar attitudes generated in modern social relations, cannot be like the abstract forms created in primitive industry as ornament or in ancient religious life as permanent, impersonal symbols. In the older forms—synthetic schemes, an effort to obtain clarity, a simple order and completeness; in the modern—a deliberate striving for analytic decomposition, for a unique informality, for cryptic involvement, endless subdivision, and irregular parts.

Mr. Read offers his book as a contribution to "the science of art." Judged as such, it is shallow and inaccurate, a pretentious pastiche of German writing.

MEYER SCHAPIRO

The Factory as Hero

Driving Axle. By V. Ilyenkov. International Publishers. $2.

THE author of "Driving Axle" calls it "A Novel of Socialist Construction." It is a just description. This account of a critical period in the development of a large locomotive plant differs in precisely the measure of that subtitle from the many novels of factory life that have appeared during the last year or so on both sides of the Atlantic. Strikes, battles, poverty, unemployment, the heat, the tension, the monotony, the merciless noise of the workshops were the themes of those tales. And still they come. Some are better than others, a few are very good indeed, but not one of them is cheerful reading. Struggle against all but overwhelming odds is the note of all.

"Driving Axle" is not by any means unremittingly cheery either. It too is the history of ceaseless struggle—against the stupidity of some, the laziness and indifference of others, the deliberate sabotage of a wicked few. But the fruits of the struggle are clear. Men are broken, die, come to promotion, quarrel, are reconciled, but the life of the plant goes on, and through all these happenings, tragic and otherwise, the knitting together of men of diverse character and education into one cooperative unit turning out first-class work for the Soviet proceeds steadily.

Ilyenkov's treatment of his theme reminds one of a story of Kipling's that deserves not to be forgotten, "The Ship That Found Herself." In this story a ship goes on her first long voyage, and the various parts of her, creaking, groaning, protesting against the unimagined strains that fall upon them as the huge vessel gets under way, begin after a time to function properly in their relation to each other. So in "Driving Axle" Platov, who has been away to study as an engineer and comes back to superintend the work of the men he formerly worked side by side with, finds his position difficult. Some are suspicious, some are resentful, while the engineers who have been there much longer are also inclined to give him a chilly welcome. And in the shadows the sinister group of saboteurs watch to see how dangerous he will be to their plans.

These villains of the piece are the blot on the novel, artistically speaking. They are so stagy that they creak as they move, in marked contrast to the reality of the other characters. "Driving Axle" is not a great novel. It is frank propaganda, mainly for home consumption, a sort of twentieth-century Communist version of the cautionary tale dear to our great-grandfathers. But it is tingling with life, and with hopeful and forward-looking life. For all its propaganda it does not in a single instance sentimentalize the workers it describes, but paints them with an admirable clear precision not devoid of humor. There is legitimate and unforced pathos, too, in such episodes as that of the dumb misery of the simple worker, Zaytsev, who, having with infinite pains worked out plans for an idea that has come into his head to save the wear and tear on a certain part of the machinery, finds that one of the engineers, who has pooh-poohed his notion, has adapted it and announced it as his own.

It is not difficult to understand with what interest workers in engineering shops all over the Soviet Union would read "Driving Axle." They would find their own problems, their own crises, their own types mirrored there. Readers outside the U. S. S. R., however, will also find the book extremely informative. Apart from its gallery of portraits, it conveys with real power, the more impressive because it is rather a cumulative effect than a definite exposition by the author, that self-forgetting devotion to an impersonal idea which is the basis of Communist life. The formidable drive of that devotion, which is swiftly becoming one of the main factors in contemporary history, will be better understood by those who have read Ilyenkov's novel and pondered its significance.

R. S. ALEXANDER

Shorter Notices

The House in the Hills. By Simonne Ratel. Translated from the French by Eric Sutton. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Two stories run through this novel: the one, of Isabelle Durras, forced by her husband's absurd vanity and childish jealousy of their son to harden into a symbol of defiant motherhood; the other, the plaintive, delicate tale of the Constant-Nymph child, Isabelle's niece, the Little Crow. Mademoiselle Ratel writes with a quiet competency that fails her only in the introduction of two dei ex machina, the revengeful servant, and the hysterical would-be lover. After a hundred pages of a neat blend of fantasy and realism, melodrama rears its unnecessary head and the story of Isabelle suffers an eclipse. The figure of the Little Crow emerges as the chief personality, a tender, moving sketch of a too wise, too sad little girl. The translation is good, conveying both the author's easy, pleasant gifts for characterization and sentiment without whimsy, and the impression that, while crowned with one of France's many annual literary awards, the book is more a promise than an achievement.

Superstition Corner. By Sheila Kaye-Smith. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

This book, written in Sheila Kaye-Smith's accomplished style, seems thin beside the novels for which this author is best known. This is Kate Alard's story and Kate is Catholic in the times when the Catholics were persecuted by Elizabeth in England. But the reconstruction of Elizabethan characters, of Elizabethan England is sketchy. And Kate herself hardly warrants the reader's sympathy. There are vivid scenes and bits of dramatic action, but the book as a whole is not one of the author's best.

The Method and Theory of Ethnology. By Paul Radin. McGraw-Hill Publishing Company. $2.50.

The Racial Myth. By Paul Radin. Whittlesey House. $1.50.

These two books are both criticisms—the first, of the theories and procedures of Dr. Radin's fellow-anthropologists, the second, of theories of racial endowment which are anything but scientific, but which have persisted in our thinking for untold centuries. The first is a book written essentially for students of social theory; the second is again to be contrasted with it in that it is a work that should have the widest circulation. The principal portion of Dr. Radin's critique of ethnological theory analyzes the method and underlying concepts behind the work of Professor Franz Boas and certain of his students, particularly Kroeber, Lowie, Goldenweiser, and Sapir. Though analytical evaluations of the work of one's colleagues is the mark of a healthy, growing science, it must be confessed that the author's strictures on Professor Boas's work do not quite come off, for since his criticisms are directed mainly at the work of the students of Professor Boas, it is these, rather than he, who are actually most severely attacked. The book suffers from two serious defects: the particular works of these men held up for criticism are, in the main, early and in many instances outmoded products of the scholars he discusses; and the section of the book devoted to considering the theories of European anthropologists leaves much to be desired from the point of view of thoroughness of presentation. In the book on race, after showing how, through the ages, a sense of superiority has marked the thought of people after people, Dr. Radin comes to a consideration of the "Nordic myth," which, he concludes, is but a socialized compensatory mechanism of "the confused late comers" on the historic stage. Showing how, from the days of the Stone Age, contributions have been made to our civilization by

PUBLIC LIBRARY

□ RESORTS □ □ RESORTS □ □ RESORTS □

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N·Y·

Explode Your Holiday
Fire Crackers
at
Green Mansions

Special 5 Day
July 4th Weekend

Compinsky Trio
Pauline Koner
Green Mansions Theatre
Private Golf Course
Lake and Tennis Courts
Write or Phone
157 West 57th St., N. Y. C.
COlumbus 5-6346
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

MOON HILL ON SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS

HOTEL COMFORTS—
Country Club Atmosphere

JULY 4th Week End
FIVE Full Days $27.50

Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary laws.) Families accommodated.

Write for Booklet "N"

Sarah Solomon, Man. Director
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y. 11 W. 42 St., Penn. 6-1720

JEANETTE PRISAMENT, M'g. Dir.
Presents

MAMAKATING PARK INN - - -
In the Heart of Shawangunk Mts.
on Beautiful Masten Lake
WURTSBORO, Sull. Co., N. Y.
Tel. Monticello 603

All Sports & Entertainment

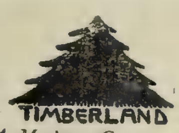
Super-Special July 4th Offer
Good Only June 29th to July 8th
$18.50 and up
ANY 5 DAYS (after dinner)

15th Season
WESTERN VIEW FARM
An Inn unique in its hospitality

On a mountain top only 2⅓ hours from New York
Rates: $8.00 a day by the day, $7.00 a day by the week; $6.00 a day by the month; $5.50 a day by the season.
Service a la mode Continentale
Address: Edward G. Ohmer, New Milford, Conn.—Telephone, New Milford 440.
From all over the world [illegible] this Farm's clientele

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn.
On Lake Housatonic, 70 miles from New York
Beautiful surroundings. Tennis, boating, bathing, fishing. Excellent meals. Rates $3 per day, $18 per week. Derby 639-2. Also bungalows for rent.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake. Splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Guests met at Lake George. $18.00 and $20.00. R. J. Venton.



The Rare Charm
Of An Intimate
Congenial Group

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
Booklet on Request

33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7663

July Rate $29.50
Superior Cuisine
Round Trip Fare $8.50
by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
[illegible]th SUCCESSFUL SEASON

Uncas Lodge
"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.
- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

JULY 4th WEEK-END
Five Full Days—Special Rate, $15
Rate Per Day, $3.50
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

Come to
COOKS FALLS LODGE
COOKS FALLS, N. Y.
R. R. ROSCOE Tel. Roscoe 2 F 13
All sports, including beautiful new swimming pool
SPECIAL RATE
Either end of the week, ending or beginning JULY 4th—5 days $15.00
Stop at the Best Spend the Least

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey
Golf, riding, tennis, all outdoor activities, 150 acre estate, private lake, beautiful country. Excellent food, spacious house, log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Central Railroad of N. J. or Pennsylvania to Red Bank.
Management Mascha and Hyman Strunsky
Telephone Atlantic Highlands, 264

CAMP ANNISQUAM

ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

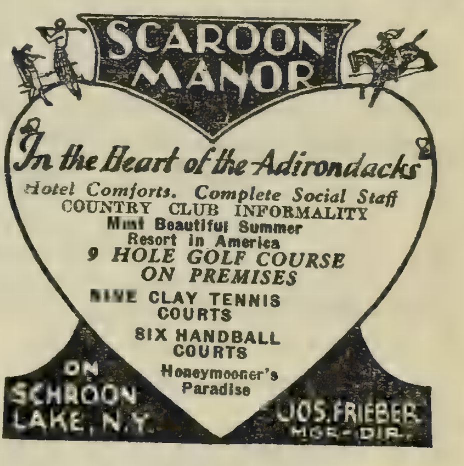
Charming
UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

THE MARY GUERIN INN
On the Shore of Martha's Vineyard Sound
VINEYARD HAVEN, MASS.
Excellent Food, Wonderful Sailing, Bathing, Fishing, Tennis, Golf, Hunting, Riding, Motoring. Rates Reasonable.

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG
N.Y.

Booklet "N" on Request
City Phone
VAnderbilt 3-9874

AN ADIRONDACK CAMP
of the
BETTER TYPE
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports.
ECHO LAKE TAVERN
WARRENSBURG, N. Y.



SCAROON MANOR
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
JOS. FRIEBER MGR.-DIR.

Hotel Comforts. Complete Social Staff
COUNTRY CLUB INFORMALITY
Most Beautiful Summer Resort in America
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
FIVE CLAY TENNIS COURTS
SIX HANDBALL COURTS
Honeymooner's Paradise

BREEZEMONT
A resort of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.

Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

ZINDOREST PARK
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 300
Formerly a millionaire's estate of 150 acres, beautifully landscaped. Tennis. Handball courts. Swimming, boating, fishing. Many [illegible] attractions. Saddle horses on premises. Nearby golf. 1½ hours Erie R.R. or auto. Open all year.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship. Wholesome food. Tennis.
THE HIL-BERT HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
H. Friedberg Mahopac 953

A RESTFUL and delightful vacation place only 31 minutes by express from Penn. Station. One of the finest beaches on the Atlantic. Delicious, simple, wholesome food. Rieber's Cottage, Belle Harbor, L. I. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

BARLOW FARM
On Candlewood Lake, Sherman, Conn.
Charming colonial house, modernized, sixty acres woodland. Berkshire foothills. Russian cuisine personally supervised by Nina. Weekly [illegible] $16. Weekend [illegible] daily. Information, City Phone MAine 4-8276.

RESORTS

CAMP MILFORD
KENT . CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.
A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests.
July 4th Week End
FIVE GLORIOUS CAREFREE DAYS $22.50
DAILY RATE $5
Weekly Rates JULY & AUG. $27.50
Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N.H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates
1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PENNSYLVANIA 6 - 7842

WHAT'S NEW AT
UNITY HOUSE
FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA
N. Y. Office: 3 West 16th Street
J. HALPERN, Manager M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager

A Vacation Message to NATION Readers—

UNITY HOUSE offers superb facilities for play and relaxation, and the gala programs featuring many famous artists have become increasingly popular. Many new facilities this year for sport and play. $25.50 per week—July and August. Reduction to Union members. Owned by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

Special for
JULY 4th
5 Gala Days . . $20

A galaxy of great talent, with nature vieing with artistic achievement. Saturday night: TOSCHA SEIDEL, Violinist. Sunday night: STEVEDORE COMPANY. Tuesday night: MOLLY PICON. And many other artists for your entertainment including: Milman Trio, and Siberian Singers.

CAMP COHAWOPA &
SUMMER INSTITUTE
at Lake Mohegan, Crompond, N. Y.
GOOD ROOMS — EXCELLENT FOOD — WATER AND LAND SPORTS
Daily lectures on current Social, Economic and Political Problems. Staff lecturers; Walter E. Peck, V. F. Calverton, Sidney Hook, Oliver Carlson, A. J. Muste, Alfred Bingham, James Rorty.
Write for Booklet or Make Reservations
Room 702, 112 E. 19th St., N. Y. C.
Phone ALgonquin 4-9058

July 4th
"American Revolutionary Traditions"
V. F. Calverton
A. J. Muste
July 7th-8th
"Outlook and Policies of American Revolutionary Groups
Alfred Bingham, Ludwig Lore and Walter E. Peck

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS, WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
FOURTH OF JULY WEEK-END (5 days) $20
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

folk belonging to all racial groups, he then assesses the nationalistic development in Europe which began with the sixteenth century, the "pan-European achievement" of the nineteenth century—with again the proper stress on the manner in which all European types contributed to this achievement—and ends with prognostications concerning the future. His final conclusion is that, in terms of the lines of historical development that can be envisaged at the present time, a world confederation "that is cosmopolitan in the broadest sense of the term" must ensue.

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS ADAMIC lived and worked in the Monongahela steel region when he first came to America and has written about the steel workers in "Dynamite" and "Laughing in the Jungle." His latest book is "The Native's Return."

JOHN GUNTHER is the Vienna correspondent of the Chicago Daily News.

BENJAMIN HORACE HIBBARD is professor of agricultural economics at the University of Wisconsin.

CHARLES H. HOUSTON and LEON A. RANSOM were counsel for the defense in the trial of George Crawford. Mr. Houston is vice-dean of the Howard University Law School.

MAXWELL S. STEWART is an economist on the staff of the Foreign Policy Association. He is the author of "The Inter-Allied Debt: An Analysis."

LUDWIG LEWISOHN is the author of "Expression in America" and "An Altar in the Fields."

LIONEL TRILLING is a member of the English Department of Columbia University.

MEYER SCHAPIRO teaches the history of art at Columbia University.

RESORTS

CAMP WHITE LAKE
White Lake, N. Y.
Hotel and Camp for Adults
Large social staff, all indoor and outdoor activities, wholesome food, dietary laws strictly observed. Low rates.
Special Rates Fourth of July
Tuesday evening to Sunday evening—$17.50

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY

I WOULD like to get in touch with a young man or woman with college education, spirit of adventure, to help me, financially as well as intellectually, to edit an English paper in Persia. Anyone interested please write Box 442, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED: Woman, experienced, loyal, complete charge child two years—business couple—light housekeeping—refined home—permanent. State salary desired and full details. Box 443, c/o The Nation.

PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

J. G. EDMONDS, LITERARY AGENT. First novels, stories wanted. No advance charges. 108 West 85th St., N. Y.

POSITIONS WANTED

YOUNG man, student of music, wants position chauffeur, pianist, typing, or anything—country or city. Box 439, c/o The Nation.

WANTED: Vacation, in exchange for services by attractive Phi Beta Kaptive, liberated for month of July. Box 441, c/o The Nation.

☐ PERSONAL ☐

HAVE YOUR BODY GET THE BENEFIT OF SUN, LIGHT AND AIR IN A NUDIST ORGANIZATION
Women or men of good character may join. Swimming pool and gym in city and summer camps. Reasonable rates. Write or 'phone for literature or an interview.
THE SUNBATHERS
171 W. 80th St., N. Y. C. 'Phone ENdicott 2-1308

SCIENTIST, thirty years old, wide cultural interests, fond of outdoor activities, radical, idealist, would appreciate the friendship of a girl with similar tastes who is located in or near Chicago. Box 444, c/o The Nation.

INSTRUCTION

RUSSIAN SIMPLIFIED for beginners. Specially planned instruction for students of medicine, chemistry, physics, biology, engineering, by general science visiting teacher. Box 401, c/o The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX — NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 11, 1934 — No. 3601

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 29

EDITORIALS:

- The Nazi Blood Bath 32
- Farewell, Mr. Roosevelt 33
- The Paradox of Birth Control 33
- The Movie Boycott 34

ISSUES AND MEN. UPTON SINCLAIR STARTLES CALIFORNIA. By Oswald Garrison Villard 35

CARTOON: ENGLAND DECLARES WAR—ALL-STAR PRODUCTION. By LOW 36

BACK TO THE "OLD DEAL" IN HOUSING. By Carol Aronovici . 37

THE LABOR OUTLOOK IN ENGLAND. By S. K. Ratcliffe . . . 39

RAINBOW OVER THE WHITE HOUSE. By M. Farmer Murphy . 40

THIS WAY OUT: SUICIDE AND THE DEPRESSION. By Miriam Allen De Ford 42

CHILDREN'S BOOKS IN SOVIET RUSSIA. By Lydia Nadejena . 44

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 45

CORRESPONDENCE 46

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 48

BOOKS:

- Benediction in Midsummer. By Marya Zaturenska 49
- Paying for Old Sins. By Sherwood Anderson 49
- Neither Gogol nor Tolstoy. By Mark Van Doren 50
- Religion and Pessimism. By James Burnham 50
- Must Farmers Be Prosperous? By Benjamin Horace Hibbard . . 51
- In Need of a Purge. By Babette Deutsch 51
- The Dilemma of the Jews. By Ernest Boyd 52
- American Episode. By B. B. Kendrick 53
- A Prodigal Book. By Leonard Amster 53
- Shorter Notices 54

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

TWENTY YEARS AGO as we write the heir to the Austrian throne and his duchess were already dead in Sarajevo, murdered by the assassin's bullet by which an era also died. The Nation, commenting editorially, in its issue of July 2, 1914, on the assassination, felt that it marked the disorganization of the Austro-Hungarian empire but added "that there is no good reason for believing that Austria will be deflected from the general line of policy and of imperial development which she has been pursuing." In addition to the Sarajevo murder, The Nation made editorial mention of Mexican intrigues, interest on capital, Jack London's letters in Collier's, the theater season of 1913-14 which had been a season of farce and light sentiment, in contrast to the corresponding season in American life, "one of business depression, I. W. W. demonstrations, child-labor agitation, minimum-wage agitation, and tenement-house improvement agitation." The following week's issue contained only a mention of the time and place of the arch-duke's funeral. The lighted fuse had not yet traveled the whole way toward the bomb which was to explode all over Europe and was to hit the United States and Asia as well. On the whole, people were occupied with other matters than with the assassination of even a grand-duke. But for some years afterward the consequences of that assassination were to occupy them fairly completely, and while we might at one time have presumed to think that the final bill for Sarajevo had been settled, today it appears that the account is still open. On June 28, 1934, the anniversary of the murder, bombs were bursting throughout Austria, some of them probably aimed at the Premier of France; in France on the same day a British military party visited Soissons, purely for "social" reasons, it was insisted, although the visit followed a similar jaunt to England the week before, by the French chief of staff; it was announced that France as well as Germany is preparing to fight with gas as well as disease germs; the British have declared themselves on the necessity of a large naval increase; and the American navy, for the first time in sixteen years, has lately been assembled in impressive formation in the Hudson River. In other words, Sarajevos may be happening all around us; we did not recognize them in 1914, we may not recognize them now. But we have done nothing, in the intervening two decades, to prevent a recurrence of what almost destroyed us.

IT WOULD BE NICE, said Harry L. Hopkins, federal Relief Administrator, the other day, if a lot of the people who now cannot find work in cities should move to the country. They could have a little cottage "bought at a fair price so that the purchaser will not be loaded so deeply in debt that he can't get out"; they would spend part of their day tending their own gardens on their own land; the rest of the time they would spend working in some small nearby factory which by a government miracle had arisen to take care of just such an industrial emergency. And Mr. Hopkins is right; it would be nice. His scheme for the deurbanization of our population to take care of what seems to him now a permanent relief problem would certainly provide a happy life for the community dwellers who managed to live in their little debt-free houses and work in their little factories. What it would do to the farmers whose produce these self-sufficient ex-urbanites would no longer buy, or the factory workers whose product they would now make themselves is, of course, another question and one which seems not to have occurred to Mr. Hopkins. His accompanying suggestion of unemployment insurance is a far sounder one. A genuine system of unemployment insurance would do much to carry the unemployed worker through the worst horrors of an industrial slack, and it would be relief that he had earned a right to by his own industry. It is a pretty irony that the "dole" which threw Mr. Hoover into hysterical protests of its un-Americanism, and which might, if it had been in operation under his Administration have saved the government many hundreds of millions of dollars, is now thoroughly respectable and is mentioned with approval not only by the federal administrator of relief but by the President of the United States himself.

THE SANCTITY of the American home is the traditional premise of American life, the theme-song of politicians, the grail for which moral and economic reformers struggle and bleed. American business yields to none in defending this sanctuary which, indeed, business is organized to serve, improve, and adorn—at a profit. Most of the 2,500 delegates who attended the recent convention of the American Home Economics Association in New York probably accepted these premises and attempted gallantly to reconcile them with certain obstinate facts. At least half the homes of America are precariously maintained at or below the minimum subsistence level largely by a growing though quite inadequate public expenditure for direct and indirect relief. These "extra-economic families," as Professor Walter Pitkin recently called them, escape the solicitude of the higher salesmanship, because business cannot make a profit out of them. Second, the solicitude of government, as Professor Paul Douglas pointed out to the delegates, has made the consumer-housewife the chief victim of the price-raising policies of the NRA; when government has attempted to serve the consumer directly, through the passage of a better food and drugs law, the setting up of a Consumer Standards Board, the insertion of grading and standards provisions in the codes, and so forth, government has been rebuked and defeated by the superior solicitude of business. This triumphant solicitude was evidenced by an abundance of advertising displays and literature which gave the convention a little of the atmosphere of a county fair.

BY BOMBING the first train to pass from Mukden to Peiping since 1931, Chinese partisans have sought to call attention to Nanking's shameful capitulation to Japan on the long-standing railway controversy. Stung by the failure of the Power to recognize "Manchukuo," the Japanese have been centering their efforts for the past year on the attempt to force China into what might be construed as de facto recognition. This they hoped to achieve by a series of steps, of which the opening of through train service and the restoration of normal postal relations were to be among the first. But although Chiang Kai-shek himself has been openly pro-Japanese, public opinion in general has been bitterly opposed to rapprochement with Japan. Consequently the issue has been allowed to drag along for months, with the Chinese inimitable in their capacity for evasion and procrastination. Meanwhile, however, the North China government has been increasingly staffed by members of the notorious, pro-Japanese Anfu clique, which the students had driven from power in 1919 on the charge of selling out to the enemy. Through the influence of this group an agreement has been reached to reopen the Sino-Japanese Exchange Bank at Tientsin, and for refunding one of the unrecognized "Nishihara loans." This northern government also appears to have played a decisive role in settling the railway question. While these concessions have aroused vigorous resentment in South China, the reaction has been somewhat tempered by Japan's warning that it will "be forced to take necessary steps" unless disturbances in Southern Fukien are immediately curbed.

AFTER ELEVEN MONTHS of unsuccessful effort to bring the gospel of industrial democracy to anti-union employers, the National Labor Board has at last been abolished. It will be replaced by the newly created National Labor Relations Board, an adjunct of the Department of Labor. With this change, the government apparently abandons all intention of enforcing Section 7-a with firmness, vigor, and dispatch. The new board will not even be empowered to mediate or conciliate in labor disputes; that will be reserved to the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor. It will have no authority to force reluctant employers to "recognize" trade unions or to negotiate agreements with a union that truly represents the employees. According to the text of the executive order, the board's decisions will be void of sanctions and of any punitive power. On the positive side, the board will be authorized to "investigate" labor disputes; to order and conduct elections of employee representatives for collective bargaining; to hold hearings and issue findings of fact on charges of 7-a violations; finally, to act as a coordinator and court of last review for labor boards established in individual industries and regions. Significantly, the other executive agencies of the government are asked to "keep hands off" any dispute over which the Labor Relations Board assumes jurisdiction, and must accept the board's findings of fact as conclusive. This means the definite removal of the NRA from further intervention in labor disputes, and the future exclusion of General Johnson's strike-breaking tactics. But the new board, it is to be feared, will have limited scope, and will function, in essence, as an "omnium gatherum" for petty disputes. Such major disputes as occur will be handled by the special boards already established in the big industries: automobile, iron and steel, bituminous coal, cotton textiles, wool and silk textiles, construction, graphic arts, newspaper publishing, and others.

JOHN DONOVAN, whose discharge by General Johnson was reported in The Nation last week, has not yet been reinstated. Instead the axe has fallen on still another head: that of Dr. A. G. Silverman, chief statistician to the Labor Advisory Board. In part, Silverman's recent "indefinite suspension without pay" arose out of the identical context of circumstances as the Donovan discharge. Silverman, who belonged to the same bloc as Donovan, believed fervently that the Labor Advisory Board should devote all its energies to promoting collective bargaining. Moreover, he did not hesitate to speak his mind about higher-ups in the Board who, he thought, took Section 7-a lightly. In part, however, Silverman's suspension was the outgrowth of a personal feud between himself and Dr. Gustav Peck. Silverman had been assigned to prepare a statistical report which Sidney Hillman, board member, was to present at a hearing on proposed amendments to the cotton garment code. Silverman was instructed, so he contends, to prove a thesis: that it was desirable, in the interests of reemployment, to shorten the code hours. His study, unfortunately, pointed toward different conclusions: that there had been substantial non-compliance with such hours and wages as the code already specified. Despite pressure to do so, Silverman refused to doctor the data. This led Peck to issue a statement in which he threatened with discharge a certain unnamed member of the staff who had prepared a "lousy" report which had to be revised "in toto." Silverman issued a counter-statement in which he charged that Hillman and Peck were perverting the professional integrity of the Board's experts in order to serve personal ends. The suspension followed immediately thereafter. Peck, in announcing the suspension, ignored the issue of professional integrity. He thought it "outrageous" for the newspapers to give publicity to the "unsubstantiated charges of a mere clerk." (Silverman was formerly on the faculty at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and served as a statistician for the National Bureau of Economic Research.) The formal ground for the action was insubordination, in that the statistician had given out a statement without first submitting it to his superiors.

MAYOR FRANK O. HAGUE, of Jersey City, was once a policeman, and he still has the policeman's viewpoint on such heinous crimes as labor picketing. His edict forbidding picketing and his treatment of the strike sympathizers who have been patrolling the Miller furniture factory—19 have been arrested, including Alfred M. Bingham and Corliss Lamont—is certainly not conducive to the exercise of legal labor privileges, and the American Civil Liberties Union is well-advised to test this case, as it is doing. In his many years as mayor (and, incidentally, Democratic boss of New Jersey) Hague has boasted that his city is free of all crime and racketeering and that labor racketeers in particular have been driven out. This is amusing when one remembers Mayor Hague's friendship for and patronage of Theodore M. Brandle, the ousted building trades czar, who was a labor racketeer if there ever was one. Mayor Hague, in fact, is recognized by bona-fide union leaders as a union-buster, while his city is known all through the East as "Scab City, N. J."

THE SHUTDOWN of the Harriman Hosiery Mill in Tennessee in protest against its loss of the Blue Eagle on April 20, is a patent instance of blackmail. If the NRA gives in to the mill's contention that punishment should not be administered because punishment hurts, then Section 7-a might as well be struck out of the Recovery Act for all the meaning it will have south of the Mason-Dixon line. The Blue Eagle was removed on the basis of the recommendation of the now-defunct National Labor Board. By unanimous decision, the Board found the management guilty of violating Section 7-a "by entering negotiations in bad faith with the definite intention not to make any agreement with the representatives of its employees." Behind this recommendation lay a distressing story of trickery and evasion. In July 1933, the hosiery workers' union sought to organize the mill; some thirty wage-earners, all of them active union members, were forthwith discharged. After the strike began on October 26, 1933, the management immediately imported strikebreakers from the surrounding countryside. Following their return from a hearing before the National Labor Board on January 4, 1934 a number of strike-leaders were jailed by virtue of an injunction granted by a pliant State court. The mill consistently refused to bargain through to a bilateral agreement with the union officers. It took the position that it sufficed to post such wage schedules as the management intended to observe. Just before the recent shutdown, which threw 653 wage-earners out of work, some 300 strikers were still locked out. When the Blue Eagle was removed, the management of the mill instigated certain merchants of Harriman to threaten the return of their NRA emblems in a mass protest. No sooner had the mill shut down than Fred Held, officer of the international union, was kidnapped and hustled out of town. Unfortunately, the NRA seems ready to compromise the issue. It is now engaged in negotiations which will lead to the return of the Blue Eagle in the event that the mill agrees to reemploy some 50 of the 300 workers locked out.

THE DISTRESSING PROBLEMS of the dairy farmer, many people used to believe, would long ago have been solved if the farmer himself had anything to say or do in the matter. But the results of the election of directors of the Inter-State Milk Producers' Association, made public in Philadelphia last week, proved that in that instance the farmer failed utterly to seize his opportunity of capturing control of the organization, a marketing cooperative accused of being the tool of the large distributors. Thirteen new directors were to be elected, for an area including parts of six Eastern States (Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia) and the thirteen standpat candidates won completely over the thirteen put up by the insurgent Allied Dairy Farmers' Association. Since the election, recriminations and opprobrium have been hurled upon the farmers for their inertia. But the true story goes a bit deeper. The farmers were frankly afraid of losing their markets if they voted against the hand-picked directorate. This cooperative, like nearly all others, is absolute master of the farmer's destiny and if it chooses to exploit him in favor of the distributor, there is really nothing he can do about it. It is obvious that the dairy farmer cannot help himself; he must be helped by the federal government. But marketing agreements, production control, and price-fixing attempts at stabilization have failed. The Administration must go further and place the whole dairy industry on a public utility basis. It is to be hoped that the Federal Trade Commission will so recommend, as the result of the investigation it has been assigned to make.

THE RIGHT WING of the Socialist Party had its way at the New York State convention and even the editors of the Daily Worker will find it difficult to exaggerate the absurdity of its performance from the Marxist point of view. Led by Louis Waldman, they repudiated the "left" pronouncements of the Detroit national convention and elected a solid right slate of fifteen members of the State Committee. James Oneal, who could have had the nomination for United States Senator, withdrew in the interest of Norman Thomas and "harmony," while Charles Solomon was nominated for Governor. On the balloting each of these running-mates voted firmly against the other. In key-noting the program of his triumphant machine Mr. Waldman declared "We must repudiate the proposal to give loyal support to any person who comes in conflict with the law on account of anti-war activities." When a few scattered cheers greeted the announcement that there had been a "revolution" in Germany, Mr. Waldman reminded the convention that "this is a Socialist convention, and cheers for a revolution are not in order." The convention adjourned after passing a resolution emasculating the "left" phraseology of the Detroit declaration of principles. It seems probable that New Jersey, Pennsylvania, California, and Massachusetts will take similar action. Paraphrasing Lenin, what the Socialist Party seems to be suffering from is "infantile rightism," the focus of the infection being New York and the Jewish Daily Forward.

The Nazi Blood Bath

THE amazing and bloody news from Germany means the beginning of the end of the Nazi rule—at least in its original form. Doubtless Hitler and Goering by their wholesale murders have fortified themselves for the moment and may hold on to their power by terroristic methods for some time to come. But their prestige is tremendously shaken; they can no longer pose as supermen with a united Germany behind them. At their doors lie the deaths of men killed "while resisting arrest" or "attempting to escape," and others "who killed themselves." Not pacifists or Communists or Social-Democrats or Jews this time, but men of their own crowd, comrades in uniform murdered in a St. Bartholomew's night as unexpected as it is horrifying, and some of them portrayed to their countrymen by Hitler himself as being caught in unprintable orgies of sex perversion.

All of this will come as a terrific shock to the deluded German people. For a year and a half every loud speaker has blared forth the assertion that the country was overwhelmingly behind the Leader; that peace and concord were reestablished; that all disorderly elements had been imprisoned or expelled; that everyone was united upon a great constructive platform conceived by an archangel to restore the country to its rightful position among the nations of the earth. Now they read of a massacre for which one must go to Italy in the Middle Ages or to the annals of some South American Republic for a parallel. They are learning not that the rebel elements were Communists or elements long opposed ot the Hitler regime, but, so far as they were members of the Brown Shirt army, close followers of Hitler who have been his confidants and aides. They are certainly shocked to read of the killing of an ex-Chancellor, General von Schleicher, and his wife, and to read from Hitler's own pen that many of his followers have been paying for celebrations and dinners and dissipation out of public or Nazi funds—they who charged the Social-Democrats, whom they ousted from office, with wholesale peculation and corruption! Plainly it is impossible to overestimate the tremendous psychological effect of these happenings which no censorship could conceal. The great bulk of the Germans are still peace-loving and law-abiding. What will they not say to the shooting down of a score of Nazi leaders without trial? It can not be written down this time as Jewish propaganda or the invention of foreign atrocity-mongers. Certainly the worst charges ever made against the Communists did not include such cold-blooded dispatching of men in opposition.

That all this will rouse a deep feeling of doubt and fear among millions of heretofore credulous Germans is obvious. It will further unsettle business conditions, injure the tourist traffic, render worse the currency situation, and generally make more difficult the efforts of those who are trying to head off iminent economic collapse. It will enormously encourage the Catholic opposition. But the greatest damage is to Hitler himself. At one blow it shows him to be a knight of the revolver and not divinely inspired to lead by the nobility of his example and his teachings. Moreover, it deprives him of his influence in foreign affairs—at least the world will wait now to see whether this "little corporal" lasts or not; and whether he will not soon yield his office to a military dictator or to a royal prince. Germany will be lucky, indeed, if it escapes a bloody civil war. With bitter disillusionment the German public will reject the lie that, as Dr. Goebbels said only a few weeks ago, the "new spirit" of the revolution had filled "the entire German people."

Obviously the clash between the left-wing elements and those of the right-wing was inevitable. Hitler had furnished plenty of circuses and some bread—but not enough. Beyond driving out the Jews, crushing all his political opponents, and wiping out the States, he had carried out none of the reforms which he had promised his supporters. Many of them really believed that he meant to give them a national socialism stopping only short of communism itself. When he admitted ex-Communists to the Nazi ranks, he insured the continuance of the demand for the radical measures, such as nationalization of the banks and all the trusts and the breaking up of the great estates, to which he was pledged. Now he has written in blood his choice; he has gone to the right. But here his troubles have not ended. Into which camp of the right will he move?

We only know that he has won a moment's breathing space. But it can only be a moment, for behind him stands the unescapable economic situation which no amount of official falsification can conceal; the moratorium on all debt payments; the unbalanced budget; the paralyzing drop in exports; the international boycott; the exhaustion of the gold reserve; the disappearance of the foreign currencies necessary for the purchase of indispensable raw materials; the steadily sinking standard of living in the face of rising agricultural prices certain to be enhanced by the alarming drought; and finally the marked decrease in the national income. Nothing in Hitler's career ever gave promise that he could master a situation like this. It gives his big business masters and the Junkers the weapons they need to turn upon him.

From his sick-bed at Neudeck the aged Hindenburg has telegraphed Hitler and General Goering his "profound thanks" for their energetic action in suppressing the plotters. Von Papen, who appears to have had cognizance of both the "right" and "left" conspirators, but not to have committed himself fatally to either, was at first held prisoner in his home, under the protection of a special Reichswehr guard. As we go to press it is reported that he will be replaced as Vice Chancellor by General Goering, and that the ineffable Goebbels, who barely escaped involvement in the conspiracy, will become ambassador to Poland.

Von Blomberg, head of the Reichswehr, has pledged the loyalty of the army, which indeed got everything that it wanted when Hitler furloughed the Storm Troopers and rejected their demand to be amalgamated with the armed forces of the German state. The French press feels that Hitler is in a stronger position than ever; the English press is skeptical. The prospect is for further bloody "cleansings" of the storm troops, and perhaps for sporadic revolts of the disorganized, leaderless, and unarmed German workers; this to be followed by a military dictatorship, with Hitler's position as tool and figurehead becoming more precarious.

Farewell, Mr. Roosevelt

THOSE millions of us who listened to your goodbye address to the country on June 28, listened in silence and with mixed feelings. You asked us to compare our present state—of security, of employment, of income—with our state fifteen months before, and to judge, on the basis of this comparison, the relative merits of the New Deal. About three and a half million of us, if we had had a chance to answer, could have told you that we had found a job during the year, either on public work or in private industry. Some of us who rank as businessmen (our numbers are not easy to discover) could have told you that we are finding things better—enough better to account for a leveling up of of the general business index figure for the whole country from 58.5 to about 80.4. The rest of us would have had to confess that materially life is not much more satisfactory than it was in March 1933. The 10,000,000-odd who are still unemployed are just as unemployed as ever; in fact our hoarded resources, if we ever had any, are still further diminished, so that we need more help than we did a year ago. The result of this is that almost a million more of us are on some sort of dole this spring than last, despite the drop in unemployment. Those of us who are working are not receiving better real wages than when you first instituted your program of increasing our purchasing power. Between March 1933 and March 1934 our wage level was raised by 9.7 per cent but meanwhile the cost of the things we must buy went up 9.3 per cent, not as much as you hoped it would but enough to wipe out almost the whole value of our small apparent gains.

We wage-earners have another bone to pick with you, too. What about collective bargaining? It is in the law, but where is it in practice? You either cannot or dare not enforce your own law against bosses as strong as the steel and automobile men. Section 7-a of the NIRA is a taunt to you and to us; it might better never have been written into the law. In any case, since you asked us, we who are organized workers do not feel that we are better off than we were a year ago; and those of us who are unorganized see little hope of becoming organized. You said that the Administration stood behind us, but when we turn around we find instead gas bombs and injunctions and notices to quit.

Those of us who are farmers are even worse off. While prices of farm products have gone up, the cash income of farmers this May was exactly the same as it was a year ago. We can buy much less, however, because the price of the commodities farmers must buy has gone up 18.6 per cent. It is true that you have distributed some 815 millions to us through various agencies, including many millions as rewards for cutting down our production. These loans and doles were absorbed like water falling on parched ground; and our gratitude sprang up like corn. But now where are we? Many of us have lost half of the remainder of our product through drought and we face the future with only the assurance that we shall have to be supported by more and bigger doles. The drought was not your fault, or Secretary Wallace's. We mention it only to emphasize our plight as compared even with a year ago and to point up the difficulties inherent in any attempt to solve the economic problem by throttling production rather than organizing distribution. The drought was, we suspect, God's answer to the theory of creating an artificial scarcity in order to increase prices.

Well, Mr. President, we hope that you will have a good vacation. You deserve and need it. You have worked hard and faced terrific obstacles. Some you have successfully eluded, but you must often have felt balked and irritated by the difficulties thrown up in the way of your plans. For we believe that you honestly want to change the economic system of our country into one which, miraculously preserving the benefits of competition, will also provide security and decent living and working conditions for everybody. Some of your aims you have partly achieved, but more of them—the most fundamental and controversial—have foundered and sunk under a sea of apathy and resistance and outright sabotage.

Your farewell speech the other night, Mr. Roosevelt, was perhaps the least effective you have made to us. You were on the defensive and you sounded so. But your voyage should help to crystallize the picture of American life. You can throw off the unreal optimism that pained us the other night and accept and acknowledge the mistakes of your Administration. You can estimate the strength of the forces that are ranged against your success, discover on your way back across the country the true state of our needs, and then tackle the confusion of government with new clarity and determination. A sea change is what you and we both need.

The Paradox of Birth Control

DID you know that the Senate had passed the birth-control bill? It did—for five minutes, while Pat McCarran, the Catholic Senator from Nevada, was taking a nap. When he woke up he demanded a reconsideration of the vote, which meant that the Senators would have had to go on record, for and against. This they were unwilling to do, so Mrs. Sanger's bill, which had been favorably reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee, was once more put to sleep.

But did you know that the Catholic Church had come out for birth control? It has. Why, then, did Senator McCarran oppose the bill? Because the Catholic version of birth control is not Mrs. Sanger's version. The Catholic version, while letting down the moral bars to the practice of birth control, still prohibits the use of contraceptives.

Quite recently, there appeared two little Catholic books, "The Rhythm" and "The Sterile Period in Family Life," in which women are told how they may have sexual intercourse without having a baby. One of these books is published with "ecclesiastical approbation" and the other with the "Imprimatur" of Patrick Cardinal Hayes. They are permitted to circulate freely through the mails by the Post Office Department, although Postmaster General Farley is a Roman Catholic. Under the birth-control bill, if passed, only physicians would be permitted to circulate such literature. But Mr. Farley's office goes the limit by permitting the birth-control method approved by Rome to be sent by laymen to laymen, regardless of sex, age, or marital condition. With the appearance of these two books, practically every argument of the Roman Church against birth control falls flat. What happens to the Catholic argument that knowledge of contraception will endanger the morals of the unmarried, when Catholics themselves are spreading wholesale a method of birth control which is sold over the counter or sent through the mails to anyone? The approved Papal method requires only a simple knowledge of the so-called sterile period in the menstrual cycle. As the president of the District of Columbia Medical Society reminds us, this method may be employed by any misguided girl parked in an automobile on any lonely road; whereas the recommended clinical method requires personal examination by a qualified physician and the preparation, time, and place which are best secured by married life.

The Catholic Church, if it liked, might justify its approval of the "sterile period" method of birth control on the ground that it doesn't work. At least it may be said unhesitatingly that it doesn't work as well as the recommended clinical method; first, because the indicated period of abstinence is not likely to be observed except by exceptionally well-disciplined people; second, because the period of relative sterility cannot be accurately determined.

Significantly, the earlier Catholic argument that contraception would result in underpopulation is abandoned in "The Rhythm." It is admitted that economic and social conditions are the determining controls of population growth, regardless of the means that may be employed. The democratic practice of contraception replaces more wasteful and disorganizing means of population control such as abortion, infanticide, celibacy, sex irregularities, needless infant and maternal mortality, and war.

The widespread practice of contraception has enabled Holland to increase her population at a faster rate than any country in the world with a comparably high standard of living. Moreover, Dr. William F. Ogburn and Dr. Warren S. Thompson, two distinguished members of the President's Committee on Social Trends, have discovered that birth control increases the proportion of married couples with respect to the total population.

The case for birth control is proved and, with 16,000,000 persons on relief and 10,600,000 wage earners unemployed, the need for birth control is overwhelming. These families have a birth rate 48 per cent higher than their more fortunate neighbors. Dr. Raymond Pearl of Johns Hopkins, in an exhaustive study for the Milbank Foundation, reaches the conclusion that "the national policy of prohibiting the free dissemination of accurate scientific information about birth control methods is adding definitely and measurably to the difficulty of the problem of poverty and unemployment with which our children and grandchildren will have to deal."

The present federal laws against birth control tie the hands of the medical profession and drive the distribution of contraceptives underground; the bootlegging of fake methods makes for tragedy and endangers public health. There are approximately 1,000,000 abortions in this country each year; 30,000 women die as a result of pregnancy or abortion, and 200,000 infants die or are born dead.

To the challenge of these ominous figures, the Catholic Church has answered with a new and indefensible evasion. Congress must return a better answer than that next fall. It must pass the birth-control bill.

The Movie Boycott

THE latest moral crusade against the movies appears to be gaining momentum. Many Protestant organizations have joined what was originally a Catholic movement to boycott theaters exhibiting improper films and, as Congress closed, certain rumblings began to be heard among statesmen glad of an opportunity to come out flatly against something as friendless as vice. The movies are, goodness knows, guilty enough, and on the surface, at least, there is nothing objectionable in the proposal that those who do not like what the theaters have to show should stay away en masse. Nevertheless, we doubt if the movement will actually accomplish very much for the simple reason that its effect is so completely negative. It merely tells Hollywood one more thing not to put into the films; it offers no concrete suggestions to a harried industry which has been forced into making an infantile salacity its stock in trade, largely because it is forbidden to deal with nearly everything else.

In the first place the Hays organization—trying desperately to please the international market as well as 10,000 different native women's clubs—has frowned upon anything containing the vestige of an idea because every idea is bound to offend someone. There is scarcely a single intellectually or artistically respectable novel or play in the whole range of literature which does not contain something offensive to the local prejudices of some place between Kansas City and Shanghai, and the films go all the way from one to the other. "Nana" is made respectable for the American market and then banned in France as a travesty on a national possession. What would be patriotic in one country is plain sedition in another, and anything with the slightest emotional or intellectual significance is dangerous because somebody somewhere is going to find it so. The movies cannot really interpret morals, manners, economics, or politics. What in heaven's name is left them except a kind of brainless, simpering, hypocritical salacity?

The magnates of Hollywood are not emissaries of Satan seeking whom they may destroy. They are, on the contrary, business men of rather limited imagination eagerly seeking for a common denominator, and so far unable to find anything except legs, questionable jokes, and bedroom stories which seem to possess the requisite universal appeal. Even the public is not wholly to blame. The trinity enumerated above is not the only thing it can agree on from China to Peru. But it is about the only thing that every public everywhere finds more or less interesting.

One remedy would be to let down the bars a little in America. If the movies were given the freedom now enjoyed by the play and the novel to treat serious things seriously; if the ostensible moral were not always required to be so completely conventional; then the very competition of serious themes might well reduce somewhat the number of merely salacious spectacles. But even that would not solve the problem created by the fact that the industry as now organized must appeal to everybody everywhere. Common denominators are terrible things and the common denominator of the whole vast international movie audience is lower than the common denominator of each of fifty different groups would be.

Issues and Men

Upton Sinclair Startles California

UPTON SINCLAIR has written me a pleasant note to the effect that he had read my tribute to Josephine Roche, adding: "I'm not a bit jealous. But it happens that our movement also is important and you ought to tell The Nation's readers about it. When you were out here, you said nobody thought that I would get the Democratic nomination. Today you would be correct if you would say that nobody thinks anything else. I do not know a single political observer who has said anything but this."

Well, Upton Sinclair would have been justified in reminding me more severely. I have been remiss in not again calling attention to his candidacy and to the extraordinary run he is making for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. While I do not agree with him about the extent of the favorable opinion as to his chances—the New York Times Los Angeles correspondent speaks of his victory as a "possible contingency"—there can be no doubt that his candidacy has gone like wild-fire. Arthur Caylor, writing in the San Francisco News, declares that one prominent Democrat is willing to bet that if the election were held now Sinclair would poll more votes than Senator McAdoo did in the Roosevelt landslide. The Republicans are equally worried because they have just as many unemployed as have the Democrats, and each of the old-line parties is blaming the other for not having taken notice of the Sinclair prairie fire until it had gotten away from them. They were saying in April that Sinclair hadn't a chance for the nomination, having neither a political organization nor money. There they were wrong, too. Sufficient money has poured in—not all that he would like to have by any means—and if any of our readers should wish to help they would be doing a most welcome and worthwhile deed. But I do not think that his success will depend upon having a few thousand dollars more or less. In the 1923 election the British Labor Party began work utterly hopeless because of the lack of funds. Only Harold Laski declared that they didn't need much money and ought not to have a lot. He pointed out that the party had a rich bank to draw upon in the enthusiasm of the young men and women of the labor ranks, which, being unpaid, is worth infinitely more than the paid labor of party hacks and heelers who usually give about fifty cents' worth of work on the dollar.

So I believe Upton Sinclair's campaign has gone on with very little reference to the amount of money put in. His gospel has spread because even in California people are ready for a new deal, eager for new teachings, ready to listen to Sinclair as a Democrat when they would not hear him as a Socialist. The plain people of California have been much more ready for a change than the big-business gentlemen who own California have known or been willing to admit. I even found in the conservative organizations that I addressed in that State last winter an astounding readiness to listen to things that I have been saying ever since the war, but which I wouldn't have been asked to say before those organizations five years ago. There is deep unrest in many portions of the State; the great harbor-workers' strike is in its second month; the workers in the Ojai and Imperial valleys, held down by brute force, are more nearly at the breaking point than ever before; the unemployed in the southern portion of the State are still extremely numerous and there are groups like the school teachers that are really ready for a radical change. These are some of the explanations for Upton Sinclair's startling run.

Of these facts the most interesting is that Sinclair is making such a bid for the governorship upon the Democratic ticket. It shows again, in my judgment, that there is no hope for the Socialist Party in the United States. Upton Sinclair can offer the same goods on the Democratic ticket, and have a market for his wares. He would not be listened to under the Socialist flag. Of course, to the Socialists, he seems a traitor; but they themselves split so seriously at their recent convention that this summer will tell whether the two wings will be able to continue to work together or go their separate ways. A rose by any other name may smell as sweet, but a radical program in the United States makes a lot more headway under any other name than socialism, and Sinclair has been realistic enough to recognize this fact and to act upon it.

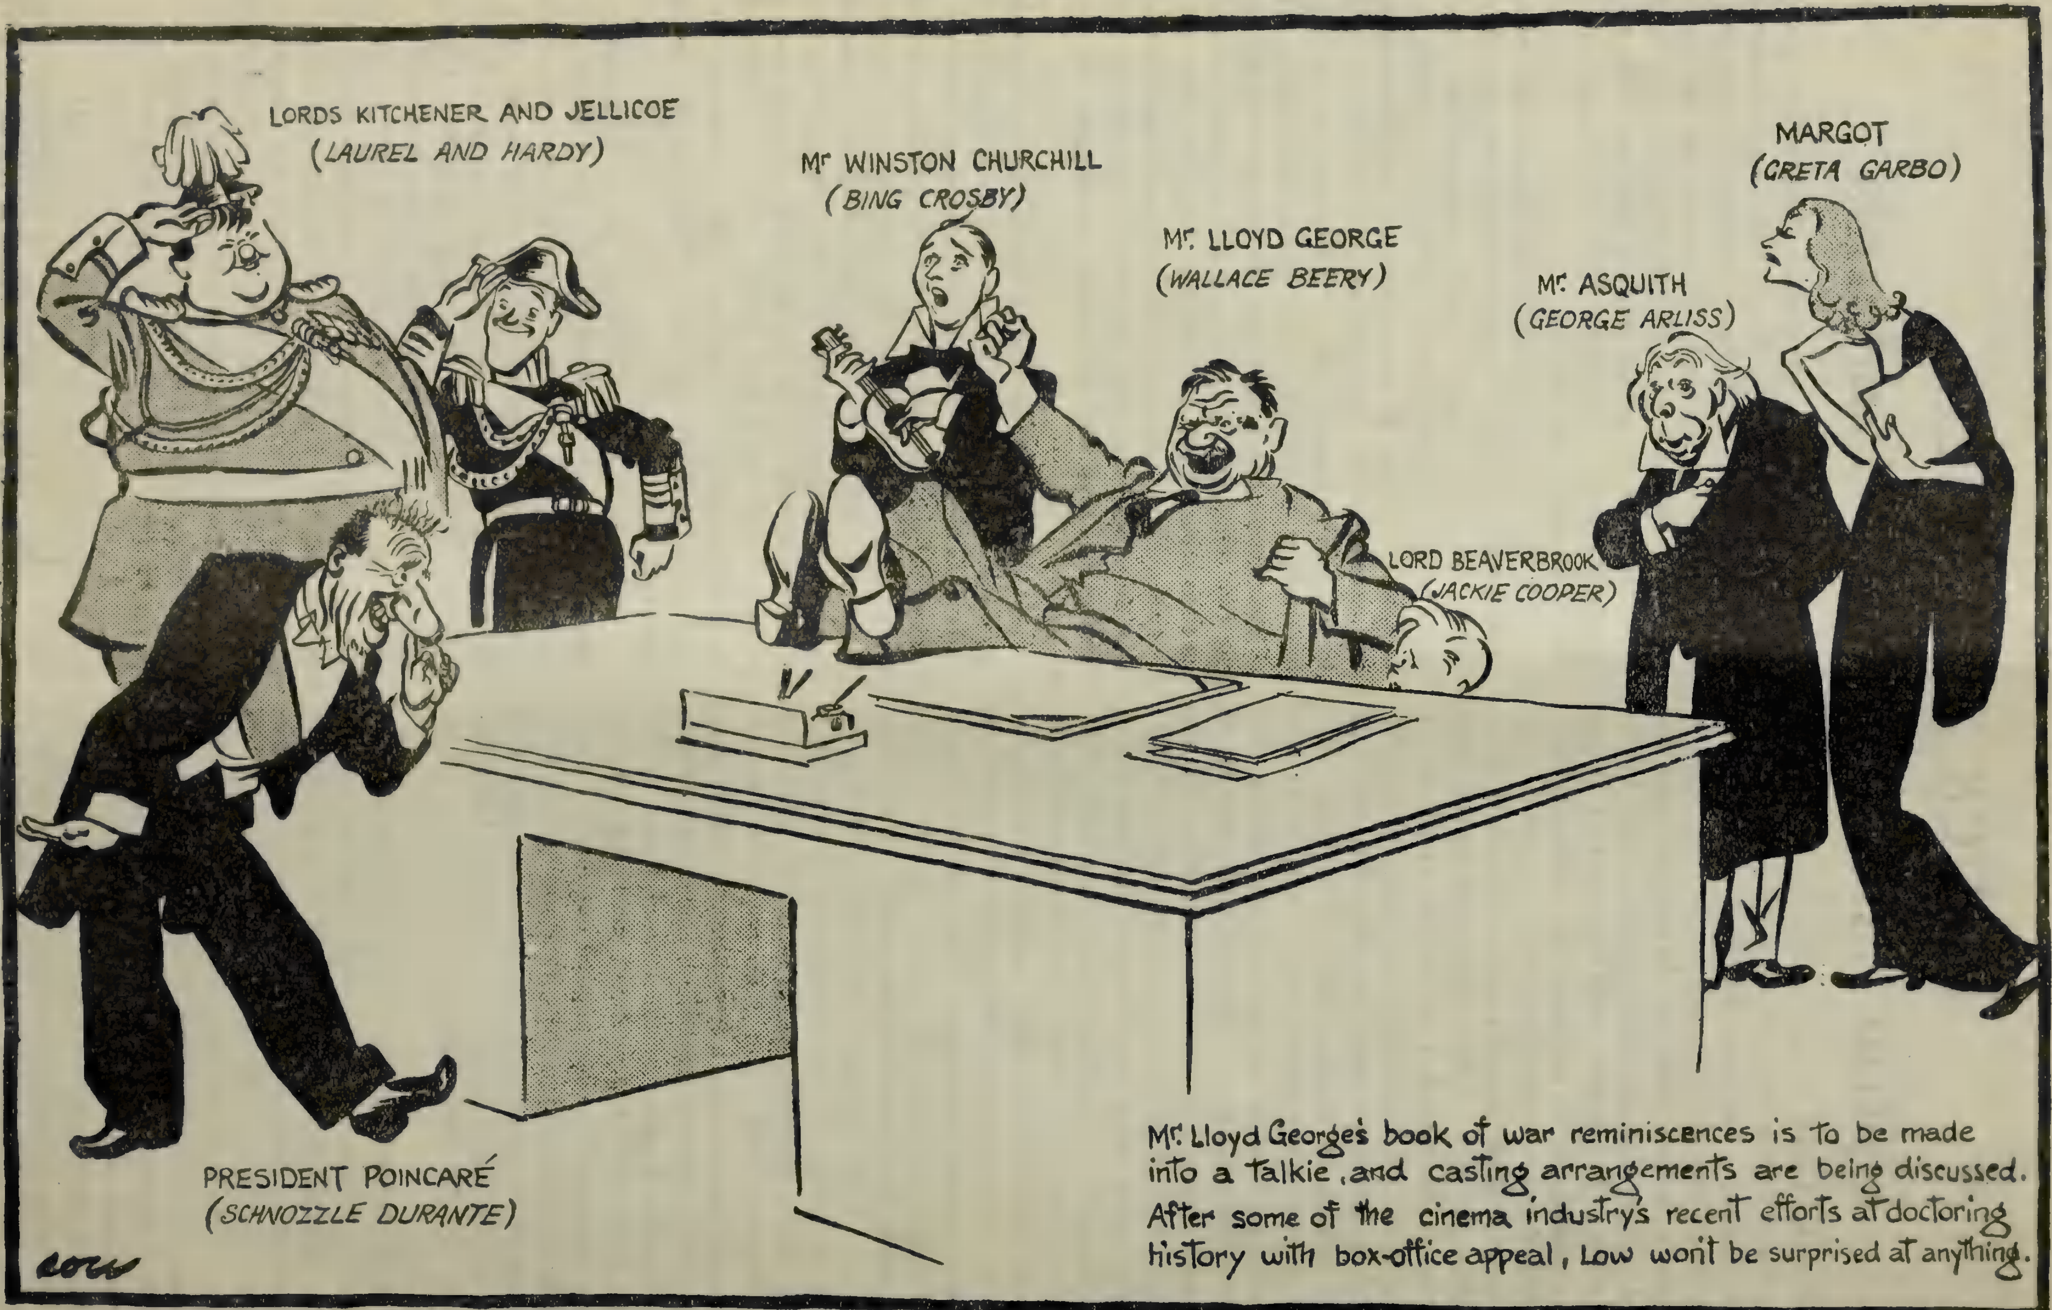
If Upton Sinclair wins the Democratic nomination there will be a battle for fair with all the big-business Democrats flocking together with the Republicans to try to keep him out of the governorship. All the forces of privilege will come together to head off the Socialist in the garb of a Democrat. It will be a struggle which the whole country should watch and I have no doubt that the Roosevelt Administration will throw itself behind Sinclair, even at the risk of having the Simeon Fesses, the Mark Sullivans, and the William Wirts make use of the opportunity to insist once more that the Roosevelt Administration is really a Bolshevik one.

"End Poverty In California" is Sinclair's slogan, which abbreviated gives the word EPIC, and this his campaign may well turn out to be. Innocent men in prison will have a friend in the capital, and if he won't have something to say about the suppression of liberty in the southern portion of California, I shall miss my guess. I know that there are many people who doubt his executive ability. That would have to be proved. There are others who fear his trustfulness, his readiness to believe what he is told whatever the source, and a certain inaccuracy in reporting. These might hurt his efficiency as a governor, but they would be, I am convinced, accepted cheerfully, if they should develop, as the price for having at Sacramento a man of unfailing industry in the cause of the people, who has shown a devotion to the welfare of the masses surpassed by none.

Oswald Garrison Villard

PUBLIC LIBRARY

A Cartoon by LOW



LORDS KITCHENER AND JELLICOE
(LAUREL AND HARDY)
Mr WINSTON CHURCHILL
(BING CROSBY)
Mr. LLOYD GEORGE
(WALLACE BEERY)
Mr. ASQUITH
(GEORGE ARLISS)
MARGOT
(GRETA GARBO)
LORD BEAVERBROOK
(JACKIE COOPER)
PRESIDENT POINCARÉ
(SCHNOZZLE DURANTE)
Mr. Lloyd George's book of war reminiscences is to be made into a talkie, and casting arrangements are being discussed. After some of the cinema industry's recent efforts at doctoring history with box-office appeal, Low won't be surprised at anything.
LOW

1914 — ENGLAND DECLARES WAR — ALL STAR PRODUCTION.

Copyright by The Nation and Inter-Europa Press. Reproduction in the United States forbidden.

Back to the "Old Deal" in Housing

By CAROL ARONOVICI

IN the spring of 1933 social workers, slum dwellers, and the millions of families living in sub-standard homes joined with the building-industry promoters in a chorus of praise of the new deal in housing. Something that looks like a housing program had been inserted in the National Industrial Recovery Act. It was to render the double service of salvaging the bankrupt building industry while it saved hundreds of families from living in the slums.

Under the provisions of the recovery act a Housing Division was created as part of the Public Works Administration. This division was placed under the direction of Robert D. Kohn, a natural leader, a man with broad experience in large-scale building and with a social point of view. It was not long, however, before the vested interests in existing housing raised a cry of unfair competition with legitimate business. Secretary Ickes, to allay this opposition, stated that loans were to be made "only on such projects as are at the present time beyond the reach of unaided private enterprise. Therefore there is no possible danger of competition between government and private industry." But Mr. Ickes was in error; he did not realize that the vested interests of the building industry were threatened, and by the very type of housing that the Housing Division was to promote.

The Housing Division from the very outset was handicapped by the great volume of plans submitted, by the failure of the Public Works Administration to set up satisfactory standards for granting loans, and by the absence of funds and machinery necessary in establishing building standards consistent with existing needs and resources. Mr. Ickes being himself wholly without technical or social knowledge of the essential requirements of low-cost housing, made the task of the director difficult and the final abandonment of the Housing Division inevitable.

As the Housing Division was set up essentially as an instrumentality for developing limited-dividend housing schemes with federal aid, the question of interest rates and amortization periods on federal loans was destined to be the chief factor in establishing rental rates and, in consequence, the level of the income group to be housed in the new dwellings. The 4 per cent interest rate and the twenty-five to thirty-five years of amortization required on loans soon proved that the lower-income groups had no chance of profiting by the new deal in housing. Practically all of the projects approved and finally financed were to rent for around eleven dollars a room, which is about twice the rentals paid under normal economic conditions by self-supporting wage-earners' families, even in New York City where rentals are high. The schemes actually under construction at present, with the exception of those in Atlanta, Georgia, and in the Virgin Islands, were necessarily of the type in which the competition is greatest in the open market. The objection to public financing of this type of housing was therefore well taken. The banks, the insurance companies, the mortgage companies, the building-and-loan associations, and other lending institutions which hold about seventeen billion of the twenty billions of dollars of home mortgages in the United States were thus provided with ample ammunition with which to fight the housing program, if such it may be called.

As far back as October 28, 1933, Mr. Ickes became convinced that "isolated action on the part of individuals" could not be depended upon to initiate comprehensive housing and slum-clearance projects. The next step was therefore the creation of the Federal Housing Emergency Corporation as an executive arm of the PWA, under which a real program of lower-income-group housing could be initiated and carried out either directly by the PWA or through private agencies. This new corporation and its broad purposes were criticized with characteristic vigor by Representative Hamilton Fish of New York as a "concrete example of the socialistic tendencies of the new deal," while the United States Chamber of Commerce was willing to accept the new corporation provided it undertook only "demonstration projects for income groups for which new housing has not hitherto been constructed."

Just how much the opposition to new low-rental housing continued to obstruct the effort to carry out even demonstration projects is only a matter of conjecture. It seemed strange, however, to those interested in the social aspects of housing, that soon after the Federal Housing Emergency Corporation came into being the low-cost housing program was switched to slum clearance and slum clearance alone. This change was made despite the fact that slum clearance is the most complex, the most time-consuming, and the most costly type of housing. No provisions were made for re-housing the families during slum reconstruction nor was any change made in the interest and amortization rate on loans in order to absorb the higher cost of slum clearance as compared with low-cost housing on open land. It is true that under the law a grant of not more than 30 per cent of the cost of labor and materials could be made by the federal government on municipally built and managed housing projects; it was only recently that any indication of the advisability of grants was made public.

Faced with the failure of the housing program the Administration was forced to seek ways of putting the building industry to work without running athwart the mortgage interests, while at the same time using the psychological value of home promotion as a driving force. Thus the National Housing Act was evolved and driven through Congress in its last days. This heralded piece of legislation is in no sense of the word a national housing act. Its more appropriate title would be "A National Mortgage and Loan-Stabilization Act." A brief analysis of the essential provisions of the act will reveal its general purposes.

The first part of the act provides for the creation of a "home-credit insurance corporation" which will insure advances for housing modernization up to $2,000. It also provides insurance for amortized mortgages for old and new owner-occupied homes up to $20,000 in total investment. At the last minute a provision was inserted which provides insurance for large-scale housing up to $10,000,000 per project. For the first time in the Administration's housing efforts, provision is made for statistical and economic surveys "for the development of housing" and the possible evolution of a more modern and equitable mortgage system. In the second part of the National Housing Act the creation of national mortgage associations is authorized, presumably with the idea that mortgage capital might thus better operate under federal supervision. A Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is created and made mandatory through the provisions of the third part of the bill, while the last part is devoted to amendments to the law creating the Home Loan Bank, giving it powers to function as a central-discount and mortgage-security control agency.

As legislation in mortgage finance the act has certain merits. Its application may entail delay because of the complex machinery which it sets up and the conflict which it may encounter in various States where mortgage laws are at variance with the provisions of the new federal law.

But let us see how this new law will affect the housing problem in terms of low-rental dwellings for the lower-income families. From the point of view of housing finance, the law provides that interest rates may be fixed at from 5 to 6 per cent or less and that the levy for insurance on mortgages is to be around 1 per cent. If large-scale housing is to be undertaken, this rate of interest with the additional levy for insurance cannot produce low-cost housing. Even with tax exemption and mass production it has been found that the 4 per cent interest rate required by the RFC, with land cost at a minimum consistent with urban realty values, necessitates a rental of about ten to twelve dollars per room. This obviously does not mean low-rental housing. Langdon W. Post, chairman of the New York City Housing Authority, was quoted recently as saying: "I think we can build decent houses that will rent for five dollars per room per month with a combination of federal money, State money, city money, and private capital. We can include private capital—the traditional and instinctive thing in America—if the owners of that capital will forget all about 6 per cent interest or even 5 per cent interest. They will have to be content with 2 per cent interest in gilt-edge investment guaranteed by State and city bonds." With federal bonds paying more than 3 per cent interest, backed by the credit of the United States, it is hard to conceive or investors venturing upon housing projects paying 2 per cent and only insured at from 60 to 80 per cent of the investment. If it is impossible to obtain money at 2 per cent, it will be quite impossible to develop low-cost housing schemes.

While the provision for insuring loans on large-scale housing projects was inserted in the National Housing Act at the last minute, the main emphasis is upon renovation and construction of owner-occupied dwellings. A maximum of $2,000 is to be protected by insurance when loaned for renovation purposes and a maximum of $20,000 is fixed for loans on new construction. Owner occupancy is required for all insurance. This limitation carries us back to the old slogan of home ownership, so fashionable during the Administration of President Hoover, which tied up the savings of so many families now struggling against foreclosure. As a means of improving the condition of slum buildings the $2,000 renovation limit will have no results in improving the condition of slum dwellings, as most dwellers in slum and sub-standard housing are not home owners. Assuming, however, that families living in sub-standard houses also are owners, it is obviously quite unreasonable to expect them to borrow money at 5 or 6 per cent, thus assuming additional burdens in carrying and insurance charges, when they are hardly able to pay the present instalments on their obligations. In addition they must expect that any additional improvements will provide nearly bankrupt municipal governments in many parts of the country with a first-class excuse to levy additional taxes.

The loans on new construction which can be obtained at 5 or 6 per cent under government mortgage insurance will, of course, encourage a certain amount of building, but at this rate of interest plus the mortgage insurance, the inadequately housed low-income families will find it impossible to carry the obligations which such loans would entail. It is unlikely that these loans will result in a great amount of construction; the housing market is already so demoralized and overstocked that better terms could be made by the purchase of existing dwellings than by the building of new homes. This is particularly true in view of the fact that under the NRA a successful effort was made to increase wage scales and the cost of materials.

When objection was raised to the bill on the ground that labor and material were too high it was intimated that an effort would be made to obtain the cooperation of labor in cutting present wage scales in exchange for steady employment. It was also intimated that quantity use of material might result in lower costs. Nothing however has been said about reducing the wages of capital, the most expensive ingredient in housing reform. No cut in wages which would make the work worth doing would approach in value to the home owner the advantage of a 2 per cent interest rate.

Senator Wagner hailed the National Housing Act as a new charter of the home owner against unrestrained avarice. After outlining the bill in one of his radio talks he said: "All this is to be accomplished through the medium of private business, aided by government if necessary, but encouraged above all to stand upon its own feet and contribute as it has in the past the largest share to American prosperity." Here, indeed, is the New Deal fully Hooverized, the home owner doing his bit for American prosperity and private business. It is, of course, understood that the National Housing Act does not take the place of the NRA, the PWA, or the National Housing Emergency Corporation. These are still capable of functioning as the instrumentalities through which a really low-cost housing program might be created. But before the National Housing Act was enacted into law Mr. Ickes hastened to dismantle the Housing Division by transferring most of its personnel to the Emergency Housing Corporation, although refusing to accept the resignation of Robert D. Kohn, its director. The explanation of this refusal is shrouded in implications and innuendoes intended to draw a red herring across the Administration's failure to face a problem which the debt-ridden German, English, Austrian, and other governments have long ago skilfully handled on broad lines of social responsibility.

There is ample legislation and there are ample resources at the disposal of the American government to make low-cost housing one of the cardinal factors in our economic recovery, but if we are to accomplish anything worthy of the name of a national housing program it must be handled with more vision and determination. None has been displayed by the sadly overburdened Secretary Ickes.

The Labor Outlook in England

By S. K. RATCLIFFE

London, June 10

SINCE the formation of the National Government three years ago the political stagnation of England has been such that the stirrings of the present season have an illusory look of revival. One reason for these activities, slight enough in themselves, is quite simple. The leading members of the Cabinet are getting anxious about the future. They know there is nothing worse for a government than the mistake of overstaying its welcome, and they realize that the general election may come within twelve months. The Liberals announce that, although they are in full opposition to the government, they could not enter into a working arrangement with Labor, even if Labor would agree, which it emphatically will not. That chapter is closed, and its closing is politically important. None of the by-elections so far has given a clear indication of public opinion. The recent contest in West Ham on the eastern rim of London cannot be cited as an exception. It left Fenner Brockway, leader of the I. L. P. remnant, with a poll of 748 votes and a forfeited deposit. But that is merely an illustration of what happens when a once active left-wing organization is split into fragments.

Before coming to the general Labor-Socialist outlook, I will mention without comment three special features of our present situation. The first is the devastation wrought in the political Labor movement by the defection in 1931 of Ramsay MacDonald and Philip Snowden. The second is the emergence of the Socialist League, as a left-wing brigade under the only leadership which, at the moment, enjoys the advantage of provocation and the consequent front page. And the third is the still incalculable black-shirt crusade of Sir Oswald Mosley, which, among other things, as Professor Laski noted the other day, is gaining working-class recruits in certain districts of the distressful North. Our generation, Hitler reminds us, has rediscovered the power of the platform. Mosley is the only prominent man in England who is exploiting it today.

A review of the by-election results would not lead a supporter to the National Government to fear a coming victory for Labor. Any government starting with a huge parliamentary majority expects to lose seats. Labor so far has won a few only; and if the present practice of running two or more Socialist candidates in a constituency is to be continued, the National Government may come within hailing distance of the general election with its great body of members in the House not materially reduced. This maintenance of its parliamentary strength is all the more notable because Mr. MacDonald and his colleagues are without supporters in the popular press. Believe it or not, explain it how you will, here is the fact: there is no single daily paper with a big circulation which is not persistently attacking the government. The present-day position of the British press, in respect of political and national issues, is an unresolved puzzle.

When Mr. MacDonald went over to the enemy he left no successor. This fact was universally admitted. George Lansbury is the nominal leader of the small Labor membership in the Commons. He is 75 years old, and has been absent this year with a broken limb. Arthur Henderson has never been leader, and he is retiring. His place as secretary of the party and director of the machine will probably fall to Arthur Greenwood, Minister of Health in the last Labor Cabinet. He dislikes the House of Commons, and says so frankly. Herbert Morrison, ablest of the metropolitan group, is absorbed in municipal affairs. No other member of the Labor Cabinet can be named as a possible leader: it would be impossible to overstate their ineligibility for the first place; and there is no man prominent in the trade-union world who could head the party in the country. This leaves us with the chairman of the Socialist League, who at present commands the largest measure of press and platform publicity.

Sir Stafford Cripps, son of Lord Parmoor and nephew of Mrs. Sidney Webb, has been solicitor-general. He is a very successful lawyer and an able parliamentarian. He has leapt to the front and is continually in the news by reason of his outspoken declarations of purpose and method. He was the first parliamentary Socialist to announce that if or when the Labor Party returned to office it would use its majority to carry an inclusive emergency powers act for the establishment of a socialist system. From the chair of the Socialist League conference in May Sir Stafford reaffirmed his view, and the resolutions adopted at Leeds are definite as to the steps in the program, to be attained under a five-year plan. "Forward to Socialism" is the manifesto of the League. It is the most challenging document to come out of British Labor since Sidney Webb, sixteen years ago, caught the attention of the world with the logic and eloquence of "Labor and the New Social Order."

Capitalism, say the authors of this pamphlet, moves inexorably towards an ever deepening crisis, and we may be nearing the last opportunity for the people of Britain to use their democratic rights. "The goal is socialism. The time is short. There is no halfway house." What then of the positive program? The Socialist government must secure undisputed control over the vital weapons of economic power. This is stated as an essential prelude to the socialization of industry and its planning. The first positions to be won are finance and the land, while an early political task will be the sweeping away of the House of Lords. Among urgent remedial measures are slum clearance and workers' housing, an enhanced scale of unemployment relief, the abolition of the means test, a forty-hour week, and pensions of $5 a week at the age of 60. The emergency powers act will be available towards the socialization of finance and transport, and the taking over of the mines, electricity, and power. The league proclaims the end of all reformist efforts, and calls upon the party executive for a lead in putting the whole weight of the movement behind the militant policy here outlined.

One needs no more than ordinary knowledge of the Labor movement and the electorate in order to realize that the league and its manifesto mean an increase of the party's difficulties, and a sharpening of the divisions within its own ranks, rather than the making of a united front. The mass of the Labor vote is held within the trade unions and the cooperatives, and large sections of these are far from the positions taken up by Sir Stafford Cripps and his associates. Moreover, since the rise of fascism and Nazism there has been a continuous insistence, in resolutions and in the speeches of prominent Labor men, upon the democratic and parliamentary character of British Labor. Every time any one of the older leaders speaks, he comes out against dictatorship in language that is altogether pleasing to Stanley Baldwin as leader of the Conservatives, while Mr. Baldwin on his own part pays tribute to the unions and the workers' benefit societies as bulwarks of the true democracy.

The spokesmen of the Socialist League are earnest in explaining that they do not mean dictatorship or the suspension of Parliament; but every time Sir Stafford Cripps speaks or grants an interview the press underlines his stronger statements, and Labor moderates urge that he ought to be disciplined. H. N. Brailsford, in the most brilliant book as yet produced by the English left wing ("Property or Peace?"), makes a powerful defense of the Socialist League method as an inevitable enforcement of the majority will. His argument, I do not doubt, will carry far. But I am considering here the prospects of Labor in relation to the political factors, to the groups and personalities of the Labor movement itself and the nature of the electorate as displayed during the past decade. And with these things in mind it does not seem possible that the program of "Forward to Socialism" can contribute to a Labor victory in the general election of 1935. True, the party is fast recovering its voting strength. The resentment against the National Government is a rising tide. The position of the Prime Minister under the heel of his Tory colleagues becomes every day more anomalous. But to say these things is not to say that the Labor Party will improve upon its position of 1929 and so achieve power as well as office. Upon the evidence now available, however, there would be nothing extravagant in the guess that after the general election Labor may again be the largest party in the House without a clear majority. That would bring the old dilemma once more: to accept office, or to decline it? The party officials assume that Labor would, without hesitation, decline. The left-wing view, I take it, is that the party leader, whoever he may be, must be ready to face the challenge: to form his Cabinet, shape his policy in bold outline, and upon defeat in the Commons or the Lords, go the country on it. This or something like it is what the first Labor-Socialist Prime Minister would have to do, whatever the size of his party in Parliament. Unless he should have a mind to follow the example of the MacDonald Labor Cabinets; and that, we may be sure, is out of the question.

Rainbow Over the White House

By M. FARMER MURPHY

Washington, July 2

WHEN President Roosevelt sent his message on social reforms to Congress on June 8 it was everywhere appraised as a brilliant political move. In this communication the President briefly commended Congress for the work it had already accomplished, expressed his appreciation of it, and then passed swiftly on to speak of the plans he had in mind for the future. "Among our objectives," he said, "I place the security of the men, women, and children of the nation first." And, being a little more specific, he asserted that for the consideration of the Seventy-fourth Congress there would be advanced "three great objectives, the security of the home, security of livelihood, and the security of social insurance." These it seemed to him were "a minimum of the promise that we can offer to the American people."

What more cheering word, the experts asked, could be carried to the discouraged or dissatisfied millions throughout the country than that? Was there ever a better talking point for Democratic candidates up for reelection? Constituents might complain of the NRA, of the AAA, or of the effect of this or that New Deal measure, but the candidates could brush all that aside and direct their gaze to the rainbow over the White House!

The reasoning seems perfectly sound, yet the very fact that it is sound carries the implication that the things which have so far been done have failed to fill the bill. They have not at any rate brought about that feeling of security for which the masses long or it would not be necessary to promise it for the future.

This is not to deny the truly remarkable accomplishments of the Roosevelt Administration. Like Sheridan at Cedar Creek President Roosevelt turned a retreating, discouraged, and panicky army about and set their faces to the front. By a few bold strokes gallantly executed he changed the attitude of the whole nation from one of despair to hopefulness. Included among these acts were reforms which had been proved and were struggling for expression and others which were in the nature of radical experiments. The power-development project, the truth-in-securities law, the banking-reform act represented only wholesome changes in existing conditions. But the National Industrial Recovery Act and the Agricultural Adjustment Act were new in conception and their consequences incalculable.

But what some believed they saw then and what the sponsors did not see was that the National Recovery Administration's purposes and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration's purposes were mutually antagonistic. And in the crumbling of the NRA which has been going on for several months its original critics find justification for their position. The broad purpose of the NRA was to add to the total purchasing power by shortening hours of labor and increasing wages. It is easily seen that to attain this object it had to be supposed that the industrialists, who had greedily exploited the public for several decades, would become Christians over night and meet the increased cost of production out of their usual profits and accumulations. To induce them thus to act in the general interest the anti-trust laws were suspended for their benefit in order that they might "cooperate." If the industrial world did not meet the increased cost of production out of profits at the previous rate, but tried to recapture the whole of it through higher price and increased profit, then it is obvious that no addition would be made to the sum total of purchasing power but all the increased cost would come out of the public.

It did not take long to demonstrate that this was exactly what the business community proceeded to do. Their cooperation was solely for their own advantage and not for the general welfare. They combined among themselves to raise and fix prices and they manipulated wage scales so that as many workers as possible were thrown into the minimum-wage class. The result has been no increase in total consuming power, complaints about high prices, and endless labor disputes. From the start there has never been a vigorous, determined attempt on the part of the NRA to enforce labor provisions of the codes. Temporizing has been the rule. In every big crisis from the time he gave in to the automobile manufacturers up to the present General Hugh S. Johnson, the administrator, has not cracked down but has himself cracked up.

The problem of the AAA as seen by its administrators was to shorten or eliminate the spread between the price of things the farmer had to sell and the price of things he had to buy. This had become disastrously wide and every increase in tariff rates on agricultural commodities, which the farmer vainly imagined would help him, was matched by a corresponding increase in the tariff on manufactured products, so that even if the farm tariff was effective the disparity remained. The AAA therefore set out to raise the price of farm commodities, in almost every one of which there was a surplus, by a series of plans to restrict production. As an inducement to cooperation by the farmers, in addition to the expected higher prices, rentals or bonuses for the acreage withdrawn were paid. Whether owing to these efforts alone or to these efforts in connection with other natural causes, the price of most farm products has risen and the spread has been slightly lessened. But there has been no substantial gain because, just as in the case of the tariff, the farmer's gain is almost wholly nullified by the higher prices the industrialists obtain through the NRA.

Failure to see to it that these two great experiments having to do with the largest divisions of the national economy should harmonize and work toward a single end may be excused on the ground that they were initiated at the very outset of the Roosevelt Administration when the times were critical and quick action was necessary. Besides, they could not reasonably be abandoned without a chance for fair trial. But between the special session of Congress when they were put into effect and the convening of the regular session in January this year six and a half months elapsed in which it would have been possible to take account of stock and work out a coordinated plan.

Such a scheme however was not presented. Many useful measures were passed by the session just ended. The law regulating stock exchanges will correct serious abuses, the housing plan will assist home owners and remove some of their worries, the revenue act will do away with certain forms of income-tax evasion. The tariff act will give the President, who is fond of fishing, the exhilaration of angling for a world trade which no longer exists. But none of the laws passed went to the fundamentals of the situation. Hence persons who are wholly friendly to the Administration and in full sympathy with the broad humanitarian purposes enunciated by President Roosevelt are asking why the things he now holds out as promises to be fulfilled by the next Congress could not have been got ready for the one which has just expired so that valuable time should not have been lost. Bills covering some of them were already in committee.

The ideas contained in the suggested program are basic. They go to the root of the trouble—security in home, in living, and in old age. But will the means to attain this end be formulated with such care and thoroughness as to exclude the confusion and conflict that have attended the numerous experiments inaugurated during the past year? This is a question which is worrying those who entertain nothing but good will for the Administration, and the reason for it is to be found in the record.

It is now everywhere admitted that the problem of production has been solved and that the acute problem remaining to be solved is that of providing consuming power to balance production. Yet as far as this Congress is concerned it is a question to which no serious forward-looking attention has been given. All the talk has been of stimulating industrial production. Although the banks are choked with funds which they can't or won't lend, a bill was passed at the last session of Congress providing more than $500,000,000 additional money for loans to industry through the Federal Reserve Banks and Reconstruction Finance Corporation. More is added to too much. It was pretty well demonstrated by reports of retail sales, which are regarded as a good index, that the Civil Works Administration and the AAA through its bonuses were the only operations which gave substantial impetus to business; therefore the failure to devote more attention to the stimulation of consumption is rather surprising. The CWA and the AAA bonuses were antidotes for the higher prices created by the NRA and by the AAA's own crop-restriction plans. But the CWA as such was abandoned and the fundamental task which it had been performing of providing more consuming power was thrown back upon direct-relief agencies.

No intelligent person of humanitarian impulses would think for a moment of a relapse into the old order. All in that category welcome and acclaim President Roosevelt's recognition of the vital need of security—the removal of the deadly fear of want which oppresses so many millions of human beings—and they ardently desire to go forward with him. But they hope he will pull together into an orderly system the disjointed operations now in force before he is overwhelmed by the confusion and cross-purpose.

Likewise it is hoped that his three great objectives, "security of the home, security of livelihood, and the security of social insurance," will be reached by methods which take into account the entire social and economic structure so that the plan may work without friction and the results may endure.

[This is the first of a series of Washington letters to be contributed during the next two months by various observers of the national political scene. The next article, by Mildred Adams, will discuss the effects of the New Deal on the social and psychological atmosphere of Washington.]

This Way Out

Suicide and the Depression

By MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD

A MAN whose little boy was dying in Pasadena tried in vain to borrow ten dollars from the Brooklyn police to telephone the child and let him hear his father's voice once more. A week later he was found asphyxiated in a lodging-house room, a letter on his lap from his wife telling of the child's death. . . . "I have walked the streets for days trying to find employment. I have been cold and hungry so long I am at the end of the trail," a man wrote to the coroner just before he took poison. . . . Two jobless brothers who had been cut off from relief funds for three weeks and had eaten practically nothing turned on the gas and were found unconscious by the police. . . . The father of nine children, with no food in the house, spent his last fifty cents for poison. . . . An unemployed longshoreman walked a hundred miles for a promised job, only to lose it; rather than return to face his family he jumped in front of a moving train. . . . Two American artists in Paris who could not pay their bills slashed their wrists and were found dead. . . . An eighteen-year-old girl who had to leave college and then could not find a job went to the country and shot herself. . . . A jobless musician tramping the roads in December in Colorado took off his clothes and tried to freeze to death. . . . A girl of seventeen whose fiance, an unemployed plumber, had been forced for the third time to postpone their marriage, took poison and died as the New Year came in. . . . "I know my wife needs me, but under present conditions she will be better off without me," wrote a jobless restaurant worker (whose young wife had had to leave her own position because of approaching motherhood), just before he jumped seven floors to the street. . . . A broker who had lost his family's fortune as well as his own in the stock market sat before a mirror and put a bullet through his brain. . . . An official of a big oil company shot himself; a month's search failed to find any property for his widow. . . . An unemployed clerk borrowed the key to a woman friend's apartment to go and cook himself a meal; instead, he turned on the gas. . . . A stenographer, thirty-five years old, out of work for two months and penniless, died horribly by soaking her clothes in benzine and setting fire to herself in a vacant lot. . . . A hospital maid lost her job; her husband, a cook, had long been out of work; she hanged herself. . . . An actor shot himself, leaving a note stating that he was out of funds and employment. . . . A man of fifty-five, his fortune gone, unable to find work for nearly a year, killed himself by running directly in front of a speeding ambulance. . . . A former millionaire, who used to make tires for Henry Ford, shot himself in his laboratory. . . . A couple lost all their savings in an automobile-camp venture; on Christmas Day the wife took poison and died. . . . A boy evicted from his room for non-payment of rent died in the police station of poison. . . . An unemployed school teacher took his portable phonograph to a park, turned on the "Moonlight Sonata," and slashed his wrists. . . . On a body fished out of San Francisco Bay was found this note: "This is just the case of an old man, seventy-six years, very sick and in terrible pain, and also very poor. I am trying to reach some hospital. If I cannot, I will try to go out the other way." A postscript told the story: "The hospital said 'No.'" No one claimed his body.

These are "depression suicides," traceable entirely to the present economic crisis. Dr. Frederick L. Hoffman states categorically: "During periods of financial and industrial distress the suicide rate invariably shows a tendency to increase"; and goes on to prove it by correlative tables of business failures and suicides from 1900 to 1926, as well as by his later annual reports. Dr. Louis I. Dublin confirms this; he says that the rate fluctuates with the business cycle, decreasing in times of prosperity and increasing in hard times. A study of suicides in Seattle, published in the Unemployed Citizen, presented figures indicating that though there were about 70 per cent more suicides in the county in 1932 than in 1929, those ascribed entirely to economic and financial causes were nearly four times as many. Edmund Wilson noted the same tendency in a study made in San Diego in 1931. Some surveys, such as that of the New York Health Department, seem to show no such close correlation; but Hoffman's statistics, covering the country as a whole and for long periods, on the whole bear out his and Dublin's contention. As Dr. Ruth Shonle Cavan says in her book, "Suicide," "when the crucial situation cannot be resolved in some way which permits the person to continue to lead an efficient, normal life, the force of the thwarted interests may lead to types of behavior which are injurious"—or fatal.

Dr. James M. Williams, in his recent work, "Human Aspects of Unemployment and Relief," published through the University of North Carolina but based on conditions in New York State, remarks especially upon the coincidence of increases in unemployment and suicide. He gives several case histories, one of which is especially revealing:

> A young man went to the public-welfare office of a large city for assistance and was told that he would be given work relief. The man remarked that he had an injured side and could not do that work. An investigation disclosed that he had shot himself and was only recently out of the hospital. . . . The manager reproached him for being so lacking in backbone as to try to take his life, and the young man replied: "I determined to kill myself rather than come to this."

We all suffer in one way or another from the depression, but we do not all kill ourselves in consequence. Therefore it becomes of interest, if we are to do anything to prevent the increase of suicide, to discover just what kind of people do find death the only way out of their difficulties. With this in mind, for a year I have made a study of all reported suicides and attempted suicides in a large Western city. (This city is situated in a State where attempted suicide is not a criminal offense, and hence there is no effort to hide unsuccessful attempts; these, of course, bear as directly on the problem, so far as motivation is concerned, as do the—perhaps more fortunate—successful efforts.) The analysis of the data thus secured reveals some very significant findings.

There are in my collection 252 suicides and attempted suicides. Giving the other side in every case the benefit of the doubt, 83 of these, or about 32½ per cent, are specifically and obviously due to the current depression. They include men and women long out of work and frequently penniless, the wives of jobless men with hungry children, people who have been prosperous and have lost everything, a few old people unwilling to become dependents. I have classified them as to sex, age, and occupation.

In general, in Europe and America, from 25 to 33 women kill themselves to every 100 men. In the 252 cases of my study about 46 per cent were women; I ascribe this figure primarily to the fact that I have included unsuccessful attempts. Apparently women are not so efficient as men in committing suicide; and I also suspect that a good many girls swallow a little poison or turn on the gas when they are pretty certain of being discovered in time. This tendency probably accounts also for the fact that among the 169 cases not attributable to the economic situation—mainly the effects of illness or of that strange disease called love—women actually made up 57 per cent of the total. In the strictly depression cases 27 per cent were women, rather below than above the general average. As William J. Fielding puts it, "Plain, unvarnished misery drives many people to suicide, and women for various reasons seem to bear misery better than men." I should add that in the State under study men outnumber women by 107.6 to 100, the ninth highest rate in the nation.

In America during recent years the incidence of suicide has tended to rise regularly with older age-groups up to the very aged. The average age of suicides of both sexes in New York State in 1924 was 45. The figures in my study show an average age of 42.5 for all the cases (these included a boy and a girl of 15, but also a woman of 83 and several over 75), with the low average of 40 for the non-depression suicides, and the rather high one of 46.6 for the depression suicides. This correlates well with the age-groups of the general population of the States, which, like the general population of the country, shows its greatest population in the age-group 35 to 44, but which has a smaller proportion of children than many States, the second most numerous group being 45 to 54. The general impression gained from the survey is that depression suicides occur mainly in two age-classes: first of all, middle-aged or elderly people who have no hope for future employment; second, quite young people who meet nothing but rebuffs and discouragement as they begin to face life.

The occupation analysis is also most interesting. It may be summed up in a brief table, omitting about 1 per cent who were students (naturally, non-economic suicides or attempts), and classifying non-self-supporting women according to the economic or social status of their husbands or nearest relatives.

	Common Laborers	Skilled Workers	Business and Professional
Depression	35	17	48
Non-depression	45	15	39
All cases	41	16	42

This indicates one thing very clearly: it is not the skilled workers who are killing themselves because of unemployment; it is not the common laborers; it is the business and professional people. The rate for the professions, especially for medicine and law, has always been high in all places; but the rate in most business occupations in good times is low. As Dr. Cavan says: "People may be inured to poverty; they may be born and bred to poverty. . . . [They] became pauperized, they became accustomed to living on the ragged edge and perhaps depending on charitable agencies for relief. To such people poverty presents no crisis." Yet it is true that even such people in times of great depression show an increase in the suicide rate; S. de Jastrzebski, formerly Assistant Registrar General of Great Britain, remarks that "the rate for unoccupied males in England and Wales is enormously greater than for those who are occupied." But as a whole the breaking-point comes when people who have been accustomed to comfort are reduced to extreme hardship, with the added connotation of personal failure, bred into us by our training in "rugged individualism." Dr. Ruth Burr, in her chapter on suicide in the symposium "Our Neurotic Age," sums it up by saying:

> Those who have always lived in poverty accept their condition more philosophically than those who have had much more and are then suddenly deprived of the means of keeping up to former standards. In the United States, where the standard of living has been higher, it is more difficult for individuals to adjust to the present economic crisis. . . . The present economic instability is a threat to all regardless of the individual's status.

Such a crisis exacerbates other conflicts, emotional, domestic, or personal. The wife of a man whose case I studied taunted him about a physical defect; he rushed out of the room and swallowed poison. He had been jobless for months and left his widow penniless; any extra trifle was simply too much. Very few suicides have merely one definite cause; if there are such, they are the cases motivated by loss of employment, hunger, and deprivation. In an unfortunately wide experience of suicide among my own friends and acquaintances, I have always been able to adduce a number of reasons for the act. Usually suicide is a cumulative response. For this reason, doubtless many of the cases I included in the non-depression group were actually due in part to economic worries and hardships; without these factors the given actuating cause might have operated in some other way.

In other words, when we ask what kind of people kill themselves in a depression, the only answer is, "Our kind." These men and women were for the most part native-born Americans of native parentage; the typical suicide of this group was above the average in education and training, in early middle age, married, in fairly good health, not notably neurotic or unstable, judging from the kind of work he had done and his quiet and calm arrangements for death. Very few were drunkards, still fewer could be suspected of insanity except by theologically minded people who consider all suicide insane as well as blasphemous. But in general the suicide was a man of sensitive, though not unbalanced, make-up, who had worked hard and well, had achieved some success and prosperity, had been unemployed for a long time, and had reached an age when his intelligence made it plain that he was henceforth unemployable. There would have been no use in telling him that our social system is rotten, ripe for change, and that better days are coming afterwards. He was too old to fight or to wait.

To claim that every suicide is an example of diseased egoism, of a desire to cause pain to others and avenge the subject's own suffering, is not true. There are suicides which are a kindness to others; many suicides represent the only solution of what one girl in her last note called "a deplorable situation." An obscure man, who may himself be dead by now for all I know, wrote this to the correspondence column of a newspaper:

> Most of these people have taken their lives after definite planning. They have looked at their predicament from all angles. They found no solution save one. And they took it. . . . It is much easier to prohibit the sale of firearms than to look for the real cause and try to remedy that. We refuse to consider the endless pacing of streets in search of work, the pitiful conditions of hungry children, the quiet acquiescence of sick mothers, the loss of small fortunes. . . . Too many temporary relief measures and not enough attempt to remedy the basic evils is our trouble.

And when our "trouble" gets beyond our private means to cope with it, an appreciable number of us will—whatever the psychoanalysts may have to say about our ultimate hidden motives—decide that no one is ever cold, or hungry, or homeless, or in despair when he is safely dead.

Children's Books in Soviet Russia

By LYDIA NADEJENA

I WENT with a teacher and one of his pupils, a lad from the Chukchi tribe of North Siberia, to the government bookstore. The boy was going home to the Arctic regions, and was bent on taking some books back with him. Two years of study at the Leningrad University for Northern Peoples had whetted his own appetite for books, and his little friends at home, who had also learned to read, kept writing to him asking him to bring "lots and lots" of new books with him.

Churka, the Chukchi boy, was excited. He looked eagerly for the right books both in Russian and in his native tongue. His teacher and I were excited too. We thought of how those jolly, colorful books would travel first by train for three long weeks, and then on sleds hauled by dogs hundreds of miles on and on into the north, beyond the Arctic Circle. What fun for the Chukchi children, who until recent times had never in all the history of Russia been taught to read a book, who very likely had never even set eyes on one.

Suddenly Churka cried out: "That's it!" And he showed us a book, "Hunting," by the well-known artist Lebedev. It is just a picture-book with no text of any kind, but Lebedev's illustrations are so brilliant and clear, so full of life and movement, that any printed commentary would be superfluous. The subject is treated ethnologically—hunting as it is practiced by various people in different lands; and the whole book is calculated to make the most vivid appeal to the adventurous spirit and imagination of young readers, especially to those whose very existence depends on hunting. Churka was delighted. He knew his people would like this book. In it they would see themselves hunting and be able to compare their ways with those of the hunters of other lands.

He found another book, "Yesterday and Today," by Marshak, Russia's best modern writer of verse for children. It is illustrated by the same artist, Lebedev, and it contrasts the oil lamps, pens, inkwells, and tallow candles of yesterday with the electric lights and typewriters of today. Churka wanted a travel book, too, and he picked out Marshak's delightful story "The Mail," which shows in a very amusing and informing fashion the journey of a letter which tried to catch up with a man who was traveling round the world. Missing him in Leningrad, Berlin, London, and Brazil, the letter finally reached him when he had returned to Leningrad. The salient characteristics of each country are brought out with delicate humor. The verses have the simplicity and clarity of folk-songs. Churka put aside that book together with another bearing the irresistible title "Travels of Charlie Chaplin," which teaches the child-reader various means of communication, and is illustrated in a vivid and most amusing way by G. and O. Chichagovs.

Since 1917 children all over Russia have been "looking for books." And Soviet educators and teachers, the best writers of children's stories and verse, and many of the foremost artists have been busy creating a new juvenile literature. It was only after a period of experimentation that they realized what the children needed. They found that Soviet children, like all other children, take a healthy interest in happy, not sentimental, truly dramatic stories; they want stories that deal with realities, not fantastic and remote bed-time tales.

In tracing the growth and evolution of juvenile literature in Soviet Russia since the revolution one is at once struck by the progress in child education. In 1914-15 only 4,793,398 children were being taught in Russian elementary schools of all categories; now there are more than 24,000,000 pupils. There are 7,000,000 children in various pre-school institutions, which were hardly known in pre-revolutionary Russia. In three years, 1929 to 1931, the number of new works published for children increased from 70 to 500. And the demand for children's literature is so great that from time to time it even produces a shortage of paper. The records of the "Gosizdat" (State publishing house) show that some children's books with a first impression of from 10,000 to 50,000 copies were rapidly sold out in the course of a few days in cities like Moscow or Leningrad alone. In fact, the demand for children's books became so imperative that a special state publishing house for juvenile literature was lately founded, having a definite program, and organized according to subject matter and the readers' age.

The development of this genre littéraire has followed all the vicissitudes of the great struggle in Russia. Immediately after the revolution came a complete repudiation of the old "juvenile literature"—stories with a moral purpose, which dealt mostly with such themes as jealousy, infidelity, deceit, and knavery, and too often failed to present them in terms the child could understand. Even the ancient fairy tales and Russian folklore were excluded. During the civil-war period the professional writers of those days endeavored to reflect in their books for juveniles the actuality of that crumbling and chaotic environment. Soon, however, they began to realize that such literature represented a blundering misuse of revolutionary material, in which grown-ups chose their own themes and served them up to the child without regard to his psychology and sensibilities. The Soviet child simply was not "taken" by this kind of literature, and it was the realization of this fact that brought about in great measure a reversal of method and a new slogan. Instead of "literature for children," Soviet Russia must create "children's literature." When Maxim Gorki was asked what was the most desirable type of children's stories, he replied that the stories must be told in a way that was amusing to children, not to grown-ups, and that to make a story or a book amusing for children "we must realize that we ourselves have much to learn from the children."

In order to learn from the children it was necessary to establish a proper contact with them. This was done through the Soviet Literary Guild, which has a special section for juvenile literature. Authorities in various fields of science were invited to participate. Specialists supplied correct informative material; to make this material readable and appealing to the child, the collaboration of outstanding professional writers and artists was obtained, with admirable and novel results.

It is important to realize that the authors of children's books in Soviet Russia are not detached and isolated writers, obliged to please publishers who are concerned mainly with the question whether or not a book is marketable. The only object is to please the child. Soviet authors gather in the Children's Section of the Literary Guild, where each author reads his individual work; then it is discussed from the point of view of its subject matter, the form in which it is presented, its language, its illustrations. Sometimes after a series of readings and heated, typically Russian discussions, the new work, ready for publication, is taken to various schools, to so-called "juvenile-literature matinees." There the author reads the book to groups of children of various ages, notes their reaction, and discusses it freely with them. Having learned the children's reactions, he then completes, corrects, or recasts his book accordingly. And these juvenile literary matinees are not dry, laboratory experiments in psychology; they are gay and amusing performances in which the children take a very active part.

In Russia vital contact has been set up between authors and children. Soviet pedologists and authors have learned many things from children and have drawn some valuable conclusions. They have realized that it is just as important for the Soviet child to learn how to use his imagination as it is for him to learn how to measure things. They also soon found out that in order to appeal to a child's mind, a book or a story dealing with a popular scientific theme must be not merely correct but also artistic and moving. Realizing the importance of creating literature of this kind, the authorities "mobilized on the children's literary front"—to use the characteristic Soviet phraseology—not only the best Soviet pedologists, writers, and artists, but also engineers, chemists, doctors, and technological specialists of every kind.

The eager and earnest search for an adequate children's literature has finally brought about the readmission of the old classics and folk-tales of Russia, whose rich yet naive language, striking use of metaphor, and imaginative qualities are now again fully appreciated in Soviet Russia. In order to broaden the mental horizon of Soviet children and give them knowledge of the world at large and of life in foreign lands, a great many foreign classics have been published lately, including the work of such authors as Jules Verne, Charles Dickens, and Fenimore Cooper.

Especially brilliant results have been achieved in illustrated poetry for children. This may be seen at its best in the combined works of the poet Marshak and the artist Lebedev, or in the works of Chukovsky and Annenkov, in Charushin's animal books illustrated by the author, and in many other poetic stories, in which the text illustrates the pictures or vice versa.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter believes in signs. They often reveal the essential characteristics of a people or of a countryside more clearly and much more amusingly than the guidebooks do—making exceptions of course for such a billboard as the Drifter recently encountered in New England. It was so enormous that it hid from his view practically all of the State of Rhode Island which is said to be very lovely. By studying signs the traveler can learn very quickly the habits of a nation, particularly the bad habits which are always the most interesting to the folks back home. A homely old maid alone in France could bring home tales that would set the town by its ears if she but made a careful—and not too innocent—study of French signs, especially those beginning "Défense de—." And her tales would be fairly accurate even though they covered only one aspect of French life. For obviously the behavior forbidden by signs is that which is habitual and common, or the signs would not be necessary—and by the same token no independent people is to be restrained from their habitual and common behavior merely by signs. A list of a nation's signs would more or less coincide with a list of its native customs.

* * * * *

CONSIDER, for instance, the lurid and bizarre picture a Frenchman could take home after a similar careful study of American signs. He would discover that we are a nation of spitters, that we like to smoke in subway stations, that we dump rubbish where the most beautiful view is to be had, that we steal flowers and dig up the grass in public parks, that we feed the animals in zoos even though it may make them sick, that for some reason we stick our arms and heads out of street-car windows and park in front of fire hydrants. Our driving habits are perhaps the most insane of all. We pass cars on curves and never willingly slow down at street intersections, though we may have read in our newspaper (which we have just dropped on the sidewalk) that something like 33,000 people are killed every year in automobile accidents. And the Frenchman might be as amazed as the Drifter was upon discovering the sign that hangs over a counter full of slippery fish in one of the foreign sections of New York City. It reads: Please Do Not Handle the Goods.

* * * * *

IT is a good game, this game of signs. The Drifter has been playing it for years. He finds an amusing or a sad or an intriguing new sign almost every week, and they are all enlightening. On his recent foray into New England, though he missed Rhode Island, he found several signs that gave him something to think about. He became deeply interested in the character of a filling-station proprietor in Connecticut. The filling station was once a barn and it is still surrounded by hundreds of acres of peaceful, sparsely settled pastures, wood, and meadow-land, all of which lent piquancy to a home-made sign which offered what may be Yankee hospitality in large black type: FREE PARKING. He found out what a low opinion New Bedford has of motor tourists by reading the rather testy sign posted on the outskirts of that ancient town of whales and sea captains. "New Bedford," it announces, "Has Narrow Streets, Short Blocks, Blind Corners. Drive Slowly." And the Drifter could not leave the subject of signs without mentioning his favorite, and famous, example which never fails to expand his mind and excite his imagination. It is that sign in Siasconset on a road leading down to the sea which reads: "South Gulley Road. Spain: Portugal: 3,000 Miles."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

In Defense of Pharmacy

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The article, What Is Left of the Drug Business, by Oscar Lerner in your May 23 issue is unrecognizable as part of a series of articles on the professions and the depression and contains several glaring errors of fact.

"The Costs of Medicines" by Rorem and Fischelis, published in 1932, gives the number of chain drug stores as approximately 4,000 by 1929. "The Merchandising of Drug Products" by Paul Olsen, published in 1931, gives the number of chain drug stores as approximately 4,000, therefore, showing no appreciable growth during the first part of the depression. Olsen further states that 40 per cent of the chain drug stores are operated or controlled by four companies, the L. K. Liggett Company, the Walgreen Company, the Whelan Drug Company of New York, and the Peoples Drug Stores of Washington. In the last year Liggetts, largest chain of them all, the Whelan Drug Company, the Owl Drug Company, largest drug chain on the Pacific Coast, and the Mayflower chain all have been in bankruptcy while the total sales of the Peoples Drug Company for the first eleven months of 1933 show a decline of 4.5 per cent from the same period of 1932. How can Oscar Lerner say that chain drug stores have grown during the depression?

"The Costs of Medicines" says that the number of new students entering pharmacy courses annually has been nearly uniform in the past ten years and that the number of graduates is approximately 2,700 per annum. One new graduate to every 45,000 population is surely not any more than enough to take care of the death rate. Further, in 1932 the majority of colleges of pharmacy changed over from a minimum three-year course to a minimum four-year course, which means that next year there will be no graduating classes from these schools. Where is this evidence of "grinding out graduates"?

Defining the status of the druggist, Oscar Lerner says: "One can only say that he is a professional man with virtually no profession to practice." Every graduate of the School of Pharmacy of George Washington University for the past seven years is employed or owns his own pharmacy. The complete class of 1933 of Purdue School of Pharmacy has found work in several congenial branches of the drug industry. In Birmingham, Alabama, a man who is not a druggist at all conceived the idea of opening a drug store which does nothing but fill prescriptions and after a few years he is filling 75 per cent of all the prescriptions in his town. In Calumet, Michigan, Clarice Abrams, a young girl only two years out of college, is making a big business success of a prescription shop on the second floor of a building.

What Is Left of the Drug Business discussed a business, not the profession of pharmacy. Those who have degraded pharmacy to the level of a self-serving business now complain about the depression as all other business men do. They have brought it on their own heads for business is a competitive game of profit-making and not a cooperative way of promoting human welfare, while the first function of pharmacy is a promotion of human welfare.

New Haven, Conn., June 25 H. J. FULLER

The Wilds, Parkways, and Dollars

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The public press of June 14 carried the announcement that the location of the proposed connecting highway between the Shenandoah and the Great Smoky Mountains National Parks, carrying an estimated cost of $54,000,000, had been determined by the committee appointed by Secretary Ickes, and that it awaits his approval.

Knowing that certain advocates of the parkway have pressed for a location upon the crest or near-crest of the Appalachian Mountains for the entire distance, I am moved, lest the committee's recommendation be for the high-level route, to voice the protests and counter-recommendation of a large body of nature lovers and conservationists who would keep the upper slopes of this range inviolate.

There is no accessible wilderness in Eastern America comparable in its extent, or in its primeval character, to this range. Those who would escape the din and rush of the machine age must plunge deeply into some natural environment. They know that they must place miles between themselves and the last house, railroad, and highway before the insulation becomes complete and the spell and peace of the wilderness can be felt. Those who have experienced this know the blasting effect of roads upon the wilderness, and that the "wilderness" seen from the motorcar is but the shell of the wilderness felt from the footpath. The form remains, but the intimate, fresh, pulsating throb of the wilds is gone.

The finest flower of the wilderness is necessarily its heart, that portion farthest removed from its antipode, the world of man. A skyline highway not only destroys the finest of the primeval heritage, but, in shooting civilization through its middle, halves the pitiful remnants of these pioneer solitudes which have been left us.

For the motorist an unending succession of wide-flung views grows terribly monotonous. I am convinced of this and it was the conclusion of a high official of the National Park Service after studying the reactions of tourists in the Western parks. A high-level route would be dangerous, with fog in all seasons, and sleet and snow in winter.

Without advocating a route through the Great Valley of eastern Tennessee, but citing it because it is more familiar to me, I know that in the park-like expanses of its wide valleys and lower slopes, with its winding, crystalline rivers, its exquisite scenes of pastoral quiet and its sudden vistas of the great, blue uplift of the mountains themselves, there is a vast and bewitching beauty, containing all the "ambuscades and surprises" of the hill country. This valley region has already been marked by man, and a magnificent parkway, routed to reveal its beauty, would enhance, and not ravage, its loveliness.

The initial cost of a skyline highway is staggering, when it is remembered that there are thousands of communities still in the mud. Here is proposed a luxury road of concrete while many are yet denied gravel, and other half-completed road projects languish for lack of funds. The upkeep which would be borne by the Park Service would be huge, and in the days of balanced budgets which lie ahead, might be met at the expense of primary services for the prevention and suppression of forest fires, which always confront this agency.

The fate of one of the few remaining Eastern wildernesses lies in the hands of Secretary Ickes.

Knoxville, Tenn., June 23 HARVEY BROOME

Hearst Would Honor Local Boy

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Hearst's eminent San Francisco Examiner comes to the front again by demanding that the citizens of California name the magnificent San Francisco Bay Bridge, now far along in its construction, after the late Governor "Jimmy" Rolph. The Examiner is devoting an absurd amount of space to its civic crusade to offset the Chronicle's (opposition) attempt to erect some sort of a granite statue in Golden Gate Park in memory of the same local boy who made (pretty) good.

For the citizens of California to name their prize monument to mankind's ingenuity after Mr. Rolph would be one of the silliest bits of "progress" ever accomplished in the commonwealth. Rolph, a third rate politician at best ("those glorious citizens of San José . . . I should turn loose all kidnappers to face a similar fate . . ."), deserves, perhaps, a nice statue in the park. But the name of the great span should remain "The San Francisco Bay Bridge," something that both Native Sons and fellow Americans will understand in fifty years' time.

San Francisco, June 8 WILLIAM HOGAN

Free Jan Wittenber

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Jan Wittenber, prominent artist and one of the founders of the Chicago John Reed Club, is held in Southern Illinois on charges of conspiracy to overthrow the United States Government. Together with ten others who were arrested for organizing the unemployed, he is held under the Illinois criminal syndicalist law which has been on the statute books since the Palmer red raids.

Wittenber was arrested on May 31 and beaten and dragged out of the courtroom. He is on the fifth day of a hunger strike against the vicious treatment and exorbitant bail.

The prisoners will remain in jail till November, when the Grand Jury meets, unless a protest campaign frees them. Telegrams demanding their release should be sent to Sheriff Saathoff, Hillsboro, Illinois, and to Governor Horner.

New York City, June 23

NATIONAL BOARD JOHN REED CLUBS
Joseph Freeman, Louis Lozowick, Oakley Johnson, Hugo Gellert.

Hugo Gellert to Anita Brenner

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

No, my book, "Karl Marx' 'Capital' in Lithographs," does not make Anita Brenner "feel the need to partake in the action of the formula 'Workers of the world unite'." Certainly it did make her hysterical in your issue of June 27. A better balanced reviewer might have tried to prove her assertions. In this book, thousands of pages of Marx's monumental work are reduced to sixty. It is obvious that these selections would either qualify or disqualify me on the basis of concrete proof—the printed word. But Miss Brenner shies clear of this opportunity. Therefore her remark that "this is a job that requires clear political thinking, a thorough, realistic historical knowledge . . ." is a boomerang. Since I'm restricted, space does not permit me to do more than point out several of the most glaring untruths which characterize her review.

She says: "Gellert believes that to be a Marxist automatically solves every intellectual problem—I have heard him say this." Not true! I do not believe that—therefore I never said it. Further, "If Hugo Gellert were not a Communist he

RACIAL ARTS OF LOVE

PRIVATELY PRINTED

MATURE READERS
AND COLLECTORS OF
AMATORY CURIOSA
OF ALL RACES
SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE
OF BOOKS ON
SCIENTIFIC SEXUALIA
ANTHROPOLOGICAL
ESOTERICA
UNEXPURGATED CLASSICS
EXOTICALLY ILLUSTRATED
MAGICA SEXUALIS

LIMITED EDITIONS

All FALSTAFF scientific and anthropological Books on the Love Relations of Mankind are enthralling and highly informative documents by authorities of international repute. That is why the FALSTAFF list of permanent subscribers reads like a "Who's Who" of America's Sophisticated Intellectual Aristocracy.

FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. 10-NA, 230 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Please send me free illustrated catalogs of Amatory Curiosa.

City .... State ....
Address ....
Name .... Age

would be a successful commercial illustrator." Why the "if"? When he did do commercial work, his drawings were reprinted and exhibited as outstanding examples of commercial art. That is what Miss Brenner would call "successful," is it not?

Besides architecture (skyscrapers) there is another field of art activity in which the United States excels: advertising propaganda. And everyone knows, save an art critic pumped full of aesthetics, that its primary requirements are, precisely, the "mastery of propaganda technique . . . and the ability to translate . . . into telling concepts and designs."

The love of lithograph crayon and the gusto with which it is spread over the crispy surface is "flashy, academic technique" for Miss Brenner. And when she jumps to the "catacombs" and then back again to the "magazine covers" of today, she is plainly rattled. She cannot fit the work into the musty old art-catalogue.

A propos "the forcing of peasants off the land . . . Gellert draws a full page picture of a pair of sheep!" Most readers have imagination. I thought that a picture of the aim and result of the expropriation sufficed. However, let Miss Brenner turn three pages in the same chapter and she will find a picture of a peasant family in the process of eviction; the home burning, the Scot tiller of the soil swears vengeance.

"Marx describes the brutal subjection of the American and other aborigines; Gellert draws a full-sized Christ on a cross!" Is that all? Miss Brenner would do well to look again. I wish I could reprint that picture. It shows a sword. On its hilt a crucified human. The sword's point drips with blood. The implication—Christian colonial expansion at the point of the sword.

We who "wear the uniform of Stalin's Red Army" cannot hope for competent criticism from a Trotzkyite. But is accurate and reliable reporting too much to expect? Miss Brenner, who juggles words so glibly about "science—comprehension and mastery of historical, sociological, and psychological principles," can neither hear nor see straight! The ultra-revolutionary palaver of a lady writer of the New York Times coupling me with Rivera "with one foot on the other side of the barricades," is too absurd for consideration.

New York, July 2 HUGO GELLERT

Philosophers Again

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

We were interested to see the editorial in the June 6 issue of The Nation referring to the brief sketches on philosophers in a recent Pen and Hammer bulletin.

The Nation calls itself an organ of liberal opinion. We wonder how it can do this and yet honestly maintain that the intellectual should stand on every side in controversial issues. Do you believe intellectuals should be fascists as well as liberals or Marxists? The title of the bulletin article, Philosophical Serenity, was ironical. The article, we think, clearly indicated that philosophers have not shown this serenity, this impartiality—that they are in fact participants in social conflicts and nearly always on the side of vested interests.

It is precisely because the philosopher, far from showing aloofness, indorsed the violence of imperialist war, and, to quote your words, showed "a sad lack of that sense of fair play, that reasonable perspective, even of that simple decency which it is the special function of the intellectual to encourage," that we pointed out the shockingly reactionary role of those who professedly "contemplate all time and all existence." Instead of maintaining, as you seem to allege that we maintained, that the intellectual "is to concern himself with public affairs only when he happens to be on a particular side," we wrote that the philosopher's "speculation represents the social position of the philosopher and his attempt to maintain his traditional status in the face of a changing society."

The Nation unmistakably implies that the philosopher should know the truth but should not do anything about it. Would The Nation itself practice such a doctrine? We are attacking conventional philosophers not for their serenity or lack of serenity, but for their frequent social ignorance—which deprives them of the very function The Nation allows them—and their defense of any institution because it is traditional. The Nation may deny the class struggle, but when philosophers suspect that "justice and social equilibrium demand inequality and concentration of power and the submission of the masses" (Jeffery Smith, Journal of Philosophy, March 1, 1934, p. 128) they show both that they clearly recognize the class struggle and on which side they stand.

To sum up, we maintain that philosophers, in embracing materialism or idealism, or any other "ism," in advocating this or that view of the world and man, are in their own way taking part in social conflicts, upholding or attacking the existing order, and that when they come to act or speak openly they are expressing the consequences of their philosophy and hence of their basic social attitudes.

New York, June 10 SAMUEL ORLINICK,
Pen and Hammer Philosophy Committee

Contributors to This Issue

CAROL ARONOVICI has been engaged in housing and town-planning work for about twenty-five years. At present he is lecturer on urbanism and housing at the Columbia University School of Architecture and director of housing-research projects under the auspices of the New York Housing Authority.

S. K. RATCLIFFE, British publicist and lecturer, is a regular contributor to the London Spectator.

M. FARMER MURPHY is a Washington correspondent of long standing, formerly of the Baltimore Sun.

MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD is a California newspaperwoman.

LYDIA NADEJENA, formerly art editor of Russky Golos (New York), is a frequent contributor to that newspaper.

MARYA ZATURENSKA is a New York poet who will shortly publish a volume of verse to be entitled "Threshold and Hearth."

SHERWOOD ANDERSON, author of "Winesburg, Ohio," "Dark Laughter," and other works, edits the News in Marion, Virginia.

MARK VAN DOREN is well known as critic, editor, and poet.

JAMES BURNHAM, professor of philosophy at Washington Square College, New York University, is one of the editors of Symposium and the author of "Philosophical Analysis."

BENJAMIN HORRACE HIBBARD, author of "Marketing Agricultural Products," is professor of agricultural economics at the University of Wisconsin.

BABETTE DEUTSCH is a poet and critic whose most recent book is "Mask of Silenus: A Novel About Socrates."

ERNEST BOYD is an editor of the American Spectator.

B. B. KENDRICK is professor of history at the North Carolina College for Women, and is coauthor with Louis M. Hacker of "The United States Since 1865."

LEONARD AMSTER is at work on a novel.

Books

Benediction in Midsummer

By MARYA ZATURENSKA

Peace on the walls, peace on the air you breathe,
O little house who breasts the dark midsummer,
Bright on the threshold, graceful on the door,
Enter, O cool-eyed peace and stay forever.

Your holy city build with silver walls,
With music let all voices slowly enter,
Pervade the walls, like sunlight and like rain,
Cool the parched heart that yearns for quietness.

Seal up the windows, and in every room
Leave your inviolate sign, so there will be
But light and hope with courage ever-shining
And summer moving to a perfect end.

Paying for Old Sins

Stars Fell on Alabama. By Carl Carmer. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

The Ways of White Folks. By Langston Hughes. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

CARL CARMER went to Alabama a bit too anxious to please. He is so sunny and good-natured about everything from grits and collard greens to Scottsboro that it rather makes your bones ache. These Alabamans are so persistently and so confoundedly cute, even in their cruelties, the old aristocracy is so aristocratic and the niggers so niggery. Thank you kindly. Hand me the Bill Faulkner.

Sample, page ninety-three: "We had planned a few days' tour before the visit Mary Louise had planned was to begin. An hour or so after we had started we had seen the red-gold of the dust turn to white. Below that white surface black soil—the Black Belt from whose dark and fertile land rose pillared glories with names that are poems—Rosemont, Bluff Hall, Gainswood, Oakleigh, Farmdale, Snow Hill, Tulip Hill, Winsor, Chantilly, Athol, Longwood, Westwood, Waldwie."

Poems man? You do not make words poetic by asserting they are poetic. Where is your poetry?

The book promises well. There is poetry in the title and the foreword excites. And then, too, Farrar and Rinehart have made the book well. Physically it is beautiful and Mr. Cyrus LeRoy Baldridge has made some drawings that are charming, but for me the book doesn't come off. I have already seen that some critic has said that it was not made for home consumption and I think he is wrong. I think the Southerners will love it, particularly the professional Southerners of New York and Chicago. Mr. Stribling you are quite safe. This man will never steal your Alabama from you.

Nerts, say I. All this fuss because some Alabama farmer invites you to supper. It always did annoy me, this business, some Yank going South. No one shoots him. A Negro woman brings a cup of coffee to his bed in the morning. He eats hot bread. The hotel rooms are dirty. Now he is off. . . . "Oh this gorgeous land, home of old romance," etc., etc. Not that it isn't all true enough, if you could get below Alabama life, down into it. . . . Indiana life for that matter . . . what makes people what they are, the real feel of the life around you, get down into you, become a part of you and come out of you.

I don't think Mr. Carmer does it. He skirts it now and then and when he becomes what he really is, a very competent gatherer-up of names of fiddlers' tunes, collector of folk tales told by others, etc., the book begins to have real value. He should have confined himself to that work. The man is not a story teller.

And, as I have said, this other business, this damned half apology before Southerners for being born a Northerner, this casualness about Southern cruelty. There is an innocent school teacher taken out to a tree and hanged because he had a relative who was a murderer. "Give me a cigarette. Let's go down to Mary Louise's house. These Alabamans are so cute, don't you think."

There is one favorite Southern tale I didn't find in the book. It is about the white farmer who came down to the cross-road general store. Several other white farmers lounging about. "Well," he says, "I killed me a nigger this morning." Silence. He yawns. "Boys," he says, "I bet you that nigger will go three hundred pounds." To make his book quite perfect, Mr. Carmer should have got that one in. It is so cute.

"The Ways of White Folks" is something to puzzle you. If Mr. Carmer goes one way, Mr. Langston Hughes goes another. You can't exactly blame him. Mr. Hughes is an infinitely better, more natural, story teller than Mr. Carmer. To my mind he gets the ball over the plate better, has a lot more on the ball but there is something missed. Mr. Carmer is a member of the Northern white race gone South, rather with jaws set, determined to please and be pleased, and Mr. Hughes might be taken as a member of the Southern colored race gone North, evidently not determined about anything but with a deep-seated resentment in him. It is in his blood, so deep-seated that he seems himself unconscious of it. The Negro people in these stories of his are so alive, warm, and real and the whites are all caricatures, life, love, laughter, old wisdom all to the Negroes and silly pretense, fakiness, pretty much all to the whites.

It seems to me a paying for old sins all around, reading these two books. We'll be paying for the World War for hundreds of years yet and if we ever get that out of us we may still be paying interest on slavery.

Mr. Hughes, my hat off to you in relation to your own race but not to mine.

It is difficult. The difficulties faced by Mr. Hughes, as a story teller, are infinitely greater than those faced by Mr. Carmer. Mr. Carmer has but to take the old attitude toward the American Negro. "They are amusing. They are so primitive." If you go modern you go so far as to recognize that Negro men can be manly and Negro women beautiful. It is difficult to do even that without at least appearing to be patronizing. You begin to sound like an Englishman talking about Americans or a Virginian talking about a Texan. Even when you don't mean it you sound like that.

The truth is, I suspect, that there is, back of all this, a thing very little understood by any of us. It is an individualistic world. I may join the Socialist or the Communist Party but that doesn't let me out of my own individual struggle with myself. It may be that I can myself establish something between myself and the American Negro man or woman that is sound. Can I hold it? I am sitting in a room with such a man or woman and we are talking. Others, of my own race, come in. How can I tell what is asleep in these others? Something between the Negro man and myself gets destroyed . . . it is the thing D. H. Lawrence was always speaking of as "the flow." My neighbor, the white man, coming in to me as I sit with my Negro friend, may have qualities I value highly but he may also stink with old prejudice. "What, you have a damn nigger in here?" In the mind of the Negro: "Damn the whites. You can't trust them." That, fed constantly by pretense of understanding where there is no understanding. Myself and Mr. Carmer paying constantly for the prejudices of a whole race. Mr. Hughes paying too. Don't think he doesn't pay.

But story telling is something else, or should be. It too seldom is. There are always too many story tellers using their talents to get even with life. There is a plane to be got on—the impersonal. Mr. Hughes gets on it perfectly with his Negro men and women. He has a fine talent. I do not see how anyone can blame him for his hatreds. I think Red-Headed Baby is a bum story. The figure of Oceola Jones in the story, The Blues I'm Playing, is the most finely drawn in the book. The book is a good book.

Sherwood Anderson

Neither Gogol nor Tolstoy

And Quiet Flows the Don. By Mikhail Sholokhov. Translated by Stephen Garry. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

SHOLOKHOV'S long novel concerns itself with a Cossack village during the awful decade of 1910 to 1920. Awful is the word, whatever is going on; whether the civil war at the close, the war with Austria and Germany between 1914 and 1917, or the "peace" which infests Tatarsk at the beginning. It is most particularly in his handling of ante-bellum Tatarsk that Sholokhov shows himself to be a modern author, contemporary with Gorky, Reymont, Caradoc Evans, and William Faulkner; for his Cossacks have neither the nobility nor the picturesqueness with which Gogol and Tolstoy endowed their creatures of the far South. He has made them wholly bestial; they love, work, brawl, drink, and stink like some race of animals hitherto unknown either to history or to fiction. Their tempers are so uniformly ungovernable that a burst of rage comes finally to have no more effect upon the reader than good deep breathing would have in the hero of a novel more moderately constructed. And their passions are so regularly aroused that such an act as Natalia's cutting her throat with a scythe—unsuccessfully, so that thereafter she is wry-necked—passes as the most ordinary sort of incident.

The Cossacks may like this. I do not know. But I suspect that Sholokhov is merely being one of those authors who feed their readers, as Wordsworth once put it, on "gross and violent stimulants," and who rely upon the almost certain presence of enough cruelty in any reader's disposition to keep him watching and listening while men get sliced to pieces and women stamped on. The method does not pay, at least in the present instance. For after 250 pages of peacetime brutalities there are 300 pages of wartime atrocities to stagger through, not to speak of sundry slaughters incidental to the Revolution; so that throughout the last quarter of the narrative one is jaded, one is ashamed, and drearily watches death reap Russia.

If it were plain that Sholokhov had manipulated the reader into this weariness through a desire to show him how freshly the winds of a New Day could blow thenceforth and forever, then Sholokhov would have justified his monotony. But there are two reasons why such an intention must be doubted. One is that the horrors pile right on to the end—the Reds are equally bloody with the Whites, and so far as I can see they are equally perverted. Sholokhov really likes wholesale executions, I think. The other reason is that the New Day as we feel it here brings only the feeblest breeze. Sholokhov does his duty; he is doctrinaire in the right places; he introduces whenever necessary the dedicated Worker who understands what history is all about and says so at great length. But he does not know how to do such things convincingly. The revolutionary dialogues are dull, and the heroes who have read Marx are quite mechanical. Listen, for example, to the saintly Anna as she explains to the saintly Bunchuk why it is that they two must think more steadily about mankind than about their love.

> How poisonous and petty seems any care for the achievement of one's own individual little happiness at the present time! What does it signify in comparison with the uncompassable human happiness which suffering humanity will achieve through the revolution? Isn't that so? We must be wholly absorbed into this struggle for liberation, we must . . . fuse with the collective group and forget ourselves as isolated parts.

It may be the translator who nodded there, but I suspect the novelist of having fallen into a deep sleep. He was not interested in Bunchuk and Anna. He was interested in Gregor, Piotra, Natalia, Aksinia, Dunia, Daria, Stepan, and Pantaleimon Prokoffievitch—in these and their animal natures, and in the animal things they did. So may the reader be interested in them, at least up to the point which has been indicated. When the book is not strained it is vivid beyond most books, and when it is not sensational according to the vogue it manages to say a great deal about the Cossacks which must not have been said before and which, since it is said brilliantly, will therefore become part of the permanent record. As a revolutionary novel "Tikhi Don" seems to me a failure; as a novel it seems to me as good as it can be in view of the fact that it was not written by a wiser man for a sounder generation.

Mark Van Doren

Religion and Pessimism

Reflections on the End of an Era. By Reinhold Niebuhr. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is a kind of twentieth-century Savonarola. The parallel is more than superficial. A professor is the nearest metropolitan equivalent to a quattrocento monk. The Union Theological Seminary is no doubt as close as New York can come to San Marco. Like Savonarola Mr. Neibuhr is a striking figure and an impressive orator. And, most important, his message, transmitted to the idiom of our day, is the same: purity in religion and radicalism in politics. Doubtless he will not end by burning. We do things differently. But if his radicalism goes much farther he is fairly sure to lose his job. (We no longer take reform in religion so seriously.)

The specific content of Niebuhr's thought can be traced more accurately to the generation after Savonarola. Niebuhr rests his analyses on Machiavelli's view of human nature and a cleansed version of Luther's view of religion. From these foundations the present essays proceed to survey our time and the issues confronting us. They are not by any means so sustained and coherent an attempt as "Moral Man and Immoral Society." However, in everything he writes Niebuhr drives so much more deeply than our myriad surface critics that he is always worth reading.

The book is hard to summarize. The leading thesis running through it may be roughly outlined as follows: Our era is doomed. It will die, not by any gradual dissolution, but in a series of violent and dreadful catastrophes. The technical conditions of human life in modern society demand the socialist organization of society, and this will inevitably come about. All liberal beliefs in gradual progress on the basis of the existing order are therefore bankrupt, are no more than the rationalizations of privilege. Politically, Marxian communism is the only tenable position. But ethically and spiritually, communism retains some of the shreds of liberalism. For though it asserts a realistic pessimism in estimating the possibilities of the present order, it nevertheless keeps a utopian optimism in believing that perfect justice will be embodied in the coming socialist society.

Perfect justice will never be embodied in human society. The dark springs of nature and impulse in individual men are multiplied cumulatively in human collectives, and are guaranties against the full realization of social justice. Therefore profound insight must add to radicalism in politics what Niebuhr calls religion. By religion he means an intuition of the absolute, in which perspective it becomes clear both that perfect justice and love can never be historically realized and that the ethical paradox involved in this impossibility is yet acceptable to the human spirit.

It is hardly possible that modern society will allow this Savonarola to rule a city, and he would almost certainly fail as sadly as his predecessor failed. But it is perhaps more necessary now than ever before that there should be at least a few men to write so steadfastly and uncompromisingly, facing the present without succumbing to it wholly. It is not always easy to remember that our day, too, is an episode.

JAMES BURNHAM

Must Farmers Be Prosperous?

The Mainstay of American Individualism. A Survey of the Farm Question. By Cassius M. Clay. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

American Farm Policy. By Wilson Gee. W. W. Norton Company. $1.50.

THE same general ideas dominate these two books. Both authors believe that agriculture is the fundamental, or most fundamental, phase of economic life. Both recognize the individualism of farmers, and fail to find its counterpart in other walks of life, by which they arrive at the conclusion that the main and last hope of maintaining our liberties lies in the country as opposed to the city. Clay argues this openly and at length; Gee rather implies, or takes for granted, the same view. Both authors assume at least—Gee does not stress it—that in the interest of general prosperity, agricultural buying power must be restored. Both give more or less adequate sketches of past agricultural history and its vicissitudes. While both appear to be favorably disposed toward the New Deal, Professor Gee expresses a real faith in it; Mr. Clay does not.

"The Mainstay of American Individualism" is some three times as voluminous a book as "American Farm Policy," and at the same time a much more ambitious one. Although Mr. Clay disclaims the purpose of writing a book on agricultural economics, he nevertheless dips into a very large part of the agricultural economist's subject matter, and shows either a lack of agreement or an unfamiliarity with the economist's beliefs. This may not be a very serious consideration, since the main purpose of the book is not that of a reference work but rather that of the presentation of a thesis—namely, the view that capitalism is in danger of dissolution, and that a strong farmer class may be able to save it. Even so, it is unfortunate that so many doubtful or incorrect statements and implications found their way into the book.

That agriculture is fundamental to civilization is no doubt beyond the realm of argument. That because of its elemental significance it plays the role of Atlas in supporting all industry and its prosperity is more than doubtful. If industry cannot prosper with agriculture in the dumps, how did it manage to get along so well from about 1878 to 1892? Or again, how account for the unprecedented industrial prosperity from 1922 to 1929? Surely, the farmers did not have much share in the good things of either period. The statement that agriculture led the way downward to the depths of the depression is by no means defensible in the sense implied. Moreover, "restoring the lost balance between . . . farm and factory" is not subject to simple and certain interpretation.

The one requirement that industry makes upon agriculture is that the latter furnish food and certain materials of manufacture for the use of it and its constituents. That agriculture must be paid any given amount for the services is unproved by theory or facts. Urban groups may flourish at the expense of farm groups. Indeed, they have on more than one occasion. Too much exploitation might upset the political machinery, as Mr. Clay suggests. However, it remains to be proved that industry, if it wants to prosper, must promote and guarantee the prosperity of the farmer. Industry might prosper were the farmers slaves—that is, if they were passive enough to be slaves fully and openly, instead of merely allowing impositions to continue.

Mr. Clay states emphatically, and repeatedly, that low prices lead the farmer to produce more. Professor Gee agrees. This would be significant if true, but in spite of some superficial evidence pointing in that direction it simply isn't true. There has been little change in the aggregate acreage of crops in ten years, and no material change in production during the past five years of depression. Per farmer-worker there has been, mainly owing to technique, an increase in output.

Mr. Clay's discussion of taxation is not convincing. He says, "High taxes are part of a vicious circle which leads to increased production in bad times." Taxes may cause production to increase or decrease. The statement is made that taxes tend to be reflected in high rental values. How taxes on land can be shifted is not clear, but Mr. Clay thinks "almost every kind of tax, except individual income taxes and inheritance taxes can be shifted." Land taxes, not to mention certain others of importance, are rather serious omissions from non-shiftable taxes. Mr. Clay's book deals with complex economic subject matter, and is full of faults so far as economics is concerned. Nevertheless, the question of the survival of individualism is the main one at issue, and the treatment given the subject is both stimulating and challenging.

BENJAMIN HORACE HIBBARD

In Need of a Purge

Wine and Physic. By Alexander Laing. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

THE title of this book is taken from the concluding lines of Elinor Wylie's dedication to "Trivial Breath." The poem, it will be recalled, records Mrs. Wylie's inalterable affection for her native tongue, and it is a similar emotion that has prompted the author of the present work to write these ornate verses and earnest essays.

Mr. Laing is rendered uneasy by an experimentalism that seems to him to end in a blind alley. He regards Gertrude Stein as "completely of her period, a bizarre offshoot of social forces that had all gone very much a-gley," and Joyce as a sturdy pioneer in a region that promises small rewards. He asks us to recognize that English is a middle-aged language, and that we cannot restore its youth by artificial means. Admitting that artists should be free to develop their unique forms of expression, he pleads with less creative writers and with all educators, whether or not they belong to the teaching profession, to be slow to accept the innovations of genius, to stand firm against the debasement of the language by the mob, and, by a rigorous attention to good usage, to preserve the heritage of English literature and to sharpen the instrument of communication. Mr. Laing recognizes that formal education offers an author little but "incentives to a valuable disgust," but he believes that the artist can take care of himself, and insists on the necessity for a stricter discipline in the classroom so that the mass of future readers may have a nicer sense of language than, under the present anarchic conditions, they can acquire. He distinguishes between the language of action and the language of thought, and suggests a reform of education which would take account of this difference, leading the child from the natural vocabulary of action to "the scientific vocabulary of contemplation," and leaving him, at the end of his schooling, "with a flexibility of command over speech suited to the level of culture in which he is likely to spend his life." Finally, he begs that teachers, instead of surrendering before the vulgarization of language through the radio and the talkie, take advantage of these new implements of education. Mr. Laing's object all sublime is, by such control, to eliminate the Walter Winchells and discourage the objectivists, while giving ample scope to the Ogden Nashes and the James Joyces.

There is something to be said for Mr. Laing's suggestions, but he seems all too hopeful of a change in the structure of our society which would make it possible to realize them. What chiefly disturbs the reader, however, is the fact that Mr. Laing's taste inclines strongly toward such writers as Roy Campbell, Edna Millay, and Hervey Allen, rather than toward writers who uphold the tradition with greater dignity or who build upon it with more originality and vigor. Further, his own style, now lush with metaphor (often mixed), now stiff with abstractions, and subject to Coleridgean divagations, makes one doubtful of his authority in the matters so near his heart. If his prose is stilted, his poetry is reminiscent, overly ornamented, and burdened with an allegorical meaning that is only clear after one has read his essays. If he were to take a dose of his own "physic," purging his style so as to reduce its present bloated aspect, and thereafter indulge in a dash of "wine," so as to enliven his discourse, he might find a more responsive audience for ideas that merit consideration.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

The Dilemma of the Jews

The Jews in the Modern World. By Arthur Ruppin. The Macmillan Company. $5.

How Odd of God: An Introduction to the Jews. By Lewis Browne. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

BOTH of these books should be read by everyone who undertakes to discuss the practical problems raised by those recurrent outbursts of anti-Semitism of which that in Hitler Germany is the most recent. Each is written by a Jew and an authority on the history of his people, and both works are free from hasty judgments and the hysteria engendered by events of the moment. Mr. Ruppin's is designedly a scholarly and statistically documented volume; Mr. Borwne's, while covering the same ground on a smaller scale, is couched in more general and more popular terms. Both authors face the same questions and reach, more or less, the same conclusions. Neither is very optimistic in his conclusions nor offers any immediate solution of the problem.

The first difficulty is to determine who is a Jew. In these days of universal agnosticism, faith in the Jewish religion is no test. Despite the "Aryan" experts, blood is no criterion, for there are Negro Jews in Abyssinia and New York City, and Indian Jews in Cochin, on the Malabar coast. In London there is an "Association of Christian Hebrews," which has begun to settle in Palestine and insists upon its unity with the Jewish people. Racially the Jews are a mixture of the Alpine and Mediterranean type and have "no racial characteristics peculiar to the Jews only," according to Mr. Ruppin. "In various proportions the racial components of Jewry enter also into the racial composition of other European and Asiatic nations." With the Armenians, for example, "racial characteristics which are considered 'typically Jewish' are even more marked than with the Jews."

The second difficulty is that the Jews are excessively urbanized, yet they are migratory, with the result that they differentiate themselves from all other races by having no roots in the soil, but expose themselves most readily to de-Judaizing influences by living in large urban centers. One-eighth of the Jewish population of the world lives in New York, one-third of world-Jewry in English-speaking countries, and 40.2 per cent in Slav countries. Of the total Jewish population of the world, 15,846,000, Mr. Ruppin states that 11,200,000 live in the United States, Poland, Russia, and Rumania. It is the fate of the Jews in these last three countries which chiefly preoccupies Mr. Browne and Mr. Ruppin. The changes in the American immigration laws have seriously affected them, Hitler Germany has greatly complicated the situation, and Zionism, in which both authors believe, cannot possibly cope with the surplus population thus represented. Both authors accord grudging recognition to the only country which has made anti-Semitism a crime, which refuses to recognize any religious or racial distinctions, save in so far as territory has been allotted to Jews as to other varied elements of the Russian people who wish to establish their own communities. Mr. Browne is non-committal, while Mr. Ruppin's preface (by a colleague, L. B. Namier) almost expresses the hope that there will arise an ultra-nationalist, anti-Semitic communism, which will deprive the Chosen People of their new grievance, to wit, that Russia has solved the Jewish problem in the only way it can ever be solved. The objection to the Soviet method of, of course, its hostility to all established religion, including Judaism.

Here we come to the crux of the whole matter. Intolerance is essentially the product of religious conviction. Since attachment to his religion is the one thing that sets the Jew apart from his fellow-citizens, it is peculiar that Jewish leaders insist upon this differentiation, and then express surprise if the Gentile world holds aloof or is definitely hostile. Assimilation is, as Mr. Ruppin conclusively proves, ever on the increase. It is a natural and normal process and will finally do what Russia has done by decree. This is deplored by most of the spokesmen of Jewry. They want to eat their Judaistic cake, then have the Gentile cake of non-discrimination. Since orthodox Jews discriminate against goyim in the most pointed manner, it is only human that the latter should retort in kind. One cannot raise and encourage barriers, and then protest against the consequences. If the offal-eating, non-kosher Gentiles were a similar minority in a Jewish country, maintaining all their Christian paraphernalia, however medieval, they could not reasonably expect to be accepted on terms of equality by the community.

Like the clergy of other denominations, the rabbis have a vested interest in keeping alive the superstition that an assimilated Jew is a renegade and not a Jew. By the same token, Bernard Shaw is a renegade and not an Irishman because he is not a Catholic. Dr. Ruppin's pages are packed with evidence that, once he ceases to practice his religion, the Jew becomes indistinguishable from other people of his own type and general stage of social development. Jewish patriots and anti-Semites are at one in their detestation of this phenomenon, as the Jewish abuse of Soviet Russia proves. The former insist upon differences and then disclaim responsibility for the consequences, sometimes tragic at others merely unpleasant, which inevitably follow separatism. In Palestine, or any other region exclusively occupied by Jews, they are obviously at liberty to emphasize every tradition which marks them off from the Gentile world. But, seeing that the very nature of Judaism makes it unlike any other Western religion in its practices and observances, and in view of its exploitation to foment self-consciousness, it is perfectly evident that it must always set apart those who believe in it. Those who so fiercely resent assimilation must face the consequences of discrimination. The latter is bad enough, in all conscience, in those countries where no opportunities for the former are offered. ERNEST BOYD

American Episode

The Mississippi Question. By Arthur Preston Whitaker. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.50.

IN this book the author concerns himself with the period between 1795 when Spain granted American citizens the privilege of free navigation of the Mississippi and the so-called "right of deposit" at New Orleans, and the purchase of the Louisiana territory by the United States from France in 1803. The fact that the volume was published for the American Historical Association is a guaranty of its scholarly character; but it does not follow that it is likewise dry-as-dust. On the contrary the style is lively, even humorous in places, and the narrative is interesting. The unifying theme is found in a quotation from the Spanish Minister, Godoy, "You can't lock up an open field." American pioneers, land speculators, merchants, and politicians would not be denied by the decadent Spanish monarchy on the one hand nor the over-reaching French Empire on the other. The charge that we were party to a crime in that we bought stolen goods from Napoleon when we purchased Louisiana Professor Whitaker does not take very seriously. He shows that Spain ceded Louisiana willingly to Napoleon, hoping that the latter would turn the province into a buffer between the expanding American democracy and Mexico. That Napoleon was willing to sacrifice it to "larger ends" was our good fortune. Most Americans would agree that the cause of "progress" was well served by the transfer. The conviction that we would have gotten it sooner or later anyway was expressed as early as 1803 by Governeur Morris who wrote "I knew as well then [1787] as I do now that all North America must at length be annexed to us—happy, indeed, if the lust of dominion stop there." This line of reasoning runs that since "manifest destiny" had to be served it was better and cheaper for all concerned for us to purchase the (stolen?) territory from Napoleon than eventually to have acquired it by conquest from Spain. Who can say?

B. B. KENDRICK

A Prodigal Book

Matador. By Marguerite Steen. Little, Brown, and Company. $2.50.

MISS STEEN'S "Matador" is a curiously prodigal book. It is the author's tenth novel and the product of an expert pen and a fecund mind. Therein lie its many virtues and its one fault: that it is too abundant, its clothes too numerous for the skeleton Miss Steen has chosen to dress. After all, as the title suggests, its subject is a highly specialized one. The bull ring, the city of Granada, an ex-matador and his family, offer limitations and definite restrictions. Miss Steen employs a prose style that is an effective instrument in her hands but, as it is played, one that gives off the full, rich music of a large orchestra rather than of a quartet whose chamber-music the specialized or localized novel would lead one to expect. However grateful one may be for a book of such varied interest, one is likely to feel that Miss Steen has ex-

Book Bargains!

for a limited time only

An overstock of a few hundred copies of the following books has led Harcourt, Brace and Company to offer them at greatly reduced prices for a limited period of time. All of the books are of permanent value. Regular trade editions. Stock perfect in every way. When ordering, please present the coupon to your bookseller to be assured of the reduced price.

12 Distinctive Volumes

1. THE WORKS OF FRANCIS RABELAIS. Edited by Albert Jay Nock and Catherine Rose Wilson. The Urquhart - Le Motteux translation. "In all probability it will remain for many years the definitive edition of Rabelais."—Sat. Review. 2 volumes, total of 952 pages, 84 illustrations.
   Formerly, $15.00. Now* $5.00
2. Lytton Strachey's BOOKS AND CHARACTERS. Fourteen essays on French and English subjects — one of Strachey's most famous books. 324 pages.
   Formerly, $3.50. Now* $1.00
3. Lytton Strachey's PORTRAITS IN MINIATURE. A later volume, in the same vein as "Books and Characters." "A delight to devotees of belle lettres!"—Forum. 214 pages.
   Formerly, $2.50. Now* $1.00
4. Catherine Carswell's THE LIFE OF ROBERT BURNS. "A definitive biography of and a monument to Scotland's greatest poet." — Horace Gregory. 411 pages, 4 photographs.
   Formerly, $3.75. Now* $1.00
5. Catherine Carswell's THE SAVAGE PILGRIMAGE: A NARRATIVE OF D. H. LAWRENCE. "Will doubtless have to be consulted by all future students of the man."—American Mercury. 296 pages.
   Formerly, $2.75. Now* $1.00
6. THE ELEGANT WOMAN, by Gertrude Aretz. A sumptuous volume—the history of feminine elegance from the rococo period to modern times. Frontispiece in color, 62 full page plates, 315 pages.
   Formerly, $5.00. Now* $2.00
7. Clive Bell's LANDMARKS IN 19TH CENTURY PAINTING. The great figures and influences in French and English painting of the period. "Far broader in outlook than Art or Since Cezanne."—London Times. 214 pages, 20 photopraphs of paintings.
   Formerly, $3.50. Now* $1.00
8. Clive Bell's AN ACCOUNT OF FRENCH PAINTING. A survey from the primitive through the modern period.
   Formerly, $2.75. Now* $1.00
9. Ozenfant's FOUNDATIONS OF MODERN ART. The aesthetics of the most advanced schools of art. 325 pages, 175 illustrations. 7½ x 10.
   Formerly, $5.00. Now* $2.50
10. NEW DIMENSIONS: THE DECORATIVE ARTS OF TODAY IN WORDS AND PICTURES. By Paul T. Frankl. Chapters on fabrics, modern furniture, lighting, city architecture, etc. 88 pages text. 122 pages of photographs. 9⅛ x 12¼.
    Formerly, $10.00. Now* $2.00
11. MODERN ARCHITECTURE. By Henry - Russell Hitchcock. The growth of modernism traced from 1800 to the present. 252 pages, 59 illustrations. 8⅜ x 11¼.
    Formerly, $5.00. Now* $1.00
12. MODERN EUROPEAN BUILDINGS. By F. R. Yerbury. 150 full-page plates from specially taken photographs, a collection of the finest examples of the new art of Europe. 8⅞ x 11½.
    Formerly, $5.00. Now* $2.00

Present coupon to your bookseller, or send to the publisher

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

(For convenience, order by number.)

Please send me the books indicated by the following numbers.

....

☐ I enclose check or money order. ☐ Send C. O. D.

Name..

Address..

ceeded the limits she set herself, that the clothes on her skeleton were made for a bigger frame.

After noting this fundamental flaw, we have nothing but praise for the story of Don José Diáz Marquez and his three sons. There is much more in the book than a brief review can suggest. One has a sense of Spain beyond Granada, of the temper of the people, of the luxuriant beauty about them and the purlieus in which they live. One is aware of the political arena in which the republicans are performing dangerous and not too graceful veronicas, of the church as a powerful influence on the people and as a tumor on the national brain. Also, one understands Miguel, a true aficionado, who is resentful that his twisted body can never face a bull and sits at the bull fight thinking: "There's enough valor down there to set Spain alight and save her from her ignominy. Watching one man doing a difficult thing bravely makes one feel one must go and do one's own thing bravely, whatever that may be."

LEONARD AMSTER

Shorter Notices

Hoxsie Sells His Acres. An American Novel in Verse. By Christopher La Farge. Coward-McCann. $2.

Here is a capably told story in verse (not at any time really fine poetry) of the disruption of a Rhode Island village when one of the old settlers sells his lands. It is a good psychological study of village characters and their tangled lives.

Duranty Reports Russia. By Walter Duranty. Selected and Arranged by Gustavus Tuckerman, Jr. The Viking Press. $2.75.

It is well-nigh impossible, within the limit of a brief review, to do justice to the twelve-year record of Walter Duranty as New York Times correspondent in Moscow. These collected dispatches constitute a record that has already become a standard by which journalistic achievement is measured. Particularly striking, viewed in retrospect, is Mr. Duranty's almost uncanny capacity for gauging correctly the relative importance and the essential qualities of personalities as well as their relationship to events. And this collection demonstrates how correct and farsighted he has been in his interpretation of the happenings in Soviet Russia during the past twelve years. It is obvious that Mr. Duranty, particularly during his first three or four years in Russia, by keeping in check his own prejudices, antipathies, and sympathies, evolved a rationalistic dispassionate method of reporting that is probably without a parallel today. There exists no account which makes more intelligible to the outside observer the epic of the construction of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, with all its incongruity, tragedy, and heroism. Mr. Duranty's dispatches, read together, are a vivid kaleidoscope which not only shows contours and forms sharply but also reveals their essence.

Samuel Pepys. The Man in the Making. By Arthur Bryant. The Macmillan Company. $3.

Many excellent scholars have attempted the biography of Pepys, and several, notably Tanner, Ponsonby, and Drinkwater, have produced valuable studies; but if the present volume indicates the quality of Mr. Bryant's complete work, he has written the definitive life. Obviously the result of scholarship at once thorough and affectionate, the book presents the full character of Pepys against the varied background of Restoration England, Although the author has freely used the rich source material available for his scene, he has resisted the temptation to digress in order merely to show his erudition. When he speaks of the condition of the navy he remembers that his primary concern is the part played in naval affairs by Pepys; and when he deals with the Dutch War he keeps in mind the fact that his major interest is its effect on the life of the Secretary of the Naval Board. His restraint is remarkable, perhaps excessive, in the passages telling of the plague, of the fire and its aftermath, and of Pepys at the play. As the book draws gracefully to its close Pepys stands forth a man and a hero. He has fought valiantly for his little fortune, for his joys both furtive and social, and for England. The sordidness of his craving for money is diminished by his taste in spending it, the occasional vulgarity of his joys by his humanity in alternately seeking and hating them, the venality of his public life by his essential desire, never truly departed from, to serve himself only after king and country have had their utmost. He dared to live abundantly, and if he did not always cherish the highest virtue, he held to a liberal standard in an age when most ways of life were either too narrow or too broad. The volume is eminently readable. One lays it down with regret tempered only by the anticipation of its sequel.

Duck's Back. By Kate Mary Bruce. The John Day Company. $2.50.

This novel is a study in contrasts between British character and American. The story, cleverly told and ironic, describes the destruction brought into the Kent household by Sara and Jerry Hurst, expatriate Americans. The narrator is the novelist and the whole is seen through her half-humorous, half-despairing eyes. The characters in this book are exceedingly well drawn, very much alive, and subtly individualized. The author's style is clever, well adapted to her purpose of smart satire.

The American Farmer and the Export Market. By Austin A. Dowell and Oscar B. Jesness. University of Minnesota Press. $2.

In this little volume the authors have succeeded in giving to the public a clear and acceptable analysis of a complex and vital subject. The various proposals for solving the question of how and where farm products may be marketed more advantageously than opportunity now affords are considered under two main headings: The Home Market and The Export Market. It is shown that we are facing the prospect of little increase in population. Likewise, increased consumption of farm products is shown to be unlikely. In the face of greater efficiency of the farmer, the difficulties of reducing output to domestic requirements are, as the authors view it, well-nigh insuperable. Our farmers must meet the competition of other farmers directly or indirectly. Under the heading The Export Market a short chapter on the tariff is offered, and another shows the relation of the farmer to the tariff. In the closing chapters is found a good statement of the problems confronting the government in its task of restoring foreign trade, in connection with which it is noted that the AAA is framed on the obvious basis of national self-sufficiency. The views of the authors, while not over-optimistic respecting the outcome, are unmistakably in favor of developing and promoting foreign trade, which policy they admit will require a downward revision of our tariffs and increased importations of finished goods.

German Family. By L. C. N. Stone. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

The jacket of "German Family" praises it as a superb novel, an important revelation. This is a pity, because it is neither. It is a competent, lively narrative of the effect of the coming of the Hitler régime upon a family which by inter-marriage is part English, part German, part German-Jewish. It has no revelations to offer, at least none that the newspapers of the world have not offered to their readers over and over again. On the underlying factors, economic, social, psychologi-

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

Intimate, colorful, alive! The most complete adult camp in the Adirondacks. Chamber music by the Compinsky Trio and the Perole String Quartet.
Dance Recitals by Pauline Koner and a complete summer stock and try-out theatre in the best Westport tradition.
Private golf course, lake and tennis courts.
Booklet on request.
GREEN MANSIONS
157 WEST 57th STREET
CO. 5-6346
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

MOON HILL
ON SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS

For a Perfect July Vacation
HOTEL COMFORTS
Country Club Atmosphere

Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary laws.) Families accommodated.

Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42. PEnn. 6-1720

JEANETTE PRISAMENT, M'g. Dir.
Presents
MAMAKATING PARK INN - - -
In the Heart of Shawangunk Mts. on Beautiful Masten Lake
WURTSBORO, Sull. Co., N. Y.
Tel. Monticello 603
● All Sports & Entertainment

Moderate Rates.
Special consideration for seasonal stay.

15th Season
WESTERN VIEW FARM
An Inn unique in its hospitality
On a mountain top only 2½ hours from New York
Rates: $8.00 a day by the day, $7.00 a day by the week; $6.00 a day by the month; $5.50 a day by the season.
Service à la mode Continentale
Address: Edward G. Ohmer, New Milford, Conn.—Telephone, New Milford 440.
From all over the world comes this Farm's clientele

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Jewish. Rate $16 wkly.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake. Splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Guests met at Lake George. $18.00 and $20.00. R. J. Venton.

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
Booklet on Request
■
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7663

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group
July Rate $29.50
Superior Cuisine
Round Trip Fare $8.50 by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
8th SUCCESSFUL SEASON

Uncas Lodge
"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.
- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

JULY RATE $21 for 1 week
$40 for 2 weeks
Rate per day, $3.50
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey
Golf, riding, tennis, all outdoor activities, 150 acre estate, private lake, beautiful country. Excellent food, spacious house, log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Central Railroad of N. J. or Pennsylvania to Red Bank.
Management Mascha and Hyman Strunsky
Telephone Atlantic Highlands, 264

CAMP ANNISQUAM
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

Charming
UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

THE MARY GUERIN INN
On the Shore of Martha's Vineyard Sound
VINEYARD HAVEN, MASS.
Excellent Food, Wonderful Sailing, Bathing, Fishing, Tennis, Golf, Hunting, Riding, Motoring. Rates Reasonable.

THE ATLANTIC HOTEL, BELMAR, N.J.
"For An Ideal Vacation"
For many years the perfect hostelry serving people of culture and refinement. Excellent food plus every conceivable diversion. $25 in July. Ask for Booklet "W". N. Y. Tel. ORchard 4-2673.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.
Garden Spot of Ulster County
Modern hotel amidst beautiful 200 acre fruit and grape farm, solariums, saddle horses, tennis courts, social activities, refinement, congeniality, American Jewish cuisine. Rates reduced to $16 and $18.
Joseph Rosenthal Kingston 3430

ECHO LAKE! TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.
Booklet "N" on Request
City Phone
VAnderbilt 3-9874

AN ADIRONDACK CAMP
of the
BETTER TYPE
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports.
ECHO LAKE TAVERN
Warrensburg, N. Y.

SCAROON MANOR
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
Hotel Comforts. Complete Social Staff
COUNTRY CLUB INFORMALITY
Most Beautiful Summer Resort in America
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
NINE CLAY TENNIS COURTS
SIX HANDBALL COURTS
ON SCHROON LAKE, N. Y.
JOS. FRIEBER MGR.-DIR.

BREEZEMONT
A resort of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.
Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."
Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

ZINDOREST PARK
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 300
Formerly a millionaire's estate of 150 acres, beautifully landscaped. Tennis. Handball courts. Swimming, boating, fishing. Many more attractions. Saddle horses on premises. Nearby golf. 1½ hours Erie R.R. or auto. Open all year.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship. Wholesome food. Tennis.
THE HIL-BERT HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
H. Friedberg Mahopac 953

A RESTFUL and delightful vacation place only 31 minutes by express from Penn. Station. One of the finest beaches on the Atlantic. Delicious, simple, wholesome food. Rieber's Cottage, Belle Harbor, L. I. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

BARLOW FARM
On Candlewood Lake, Sherman, Conn.
Charming colonial house. Modernized, sixty acres woodland. Berkshire foothills. Russian cuisine personally supervised by Nina. Weekly rates $16. Weekend rates $3 daily. Information, City Phone MAine 4-8276.

□ RESORTS □

CAMP MILFORD
KENT • CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests. Delicious meals.

Weekly Rates—July & August
$27.50 PER WEEK

Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N. H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates Today

1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PEnnsylvania 6-7842

A Vacation Message to READERS of THE NATION

■ Many readers of The Nation go to Unity House when they are bound for vacation land because of the superb facilities for play and relaxation and the gala programs starring such famous artists as Toscha Seidel, Alla Nazimova, Molly Picon, Sigmund Spaeth, Isa Kremer and the Hall Johnson Choir. This year the dining room, lobbies, all rooms and buildings have been repainted and new facilities added. . . . Three additional tennis courts (9 all told), two more handball courts, a fleet of new boats and canoes are on hand for the 1934 season.
Sunday, July 8, Stevedore Company, and July 14, Russian Opera Co.
RATES: $25.50 a week, July and August—$22, September, after Labor Day. Proportionate reduction for union members. Owned and operated by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

UNITY HOUSE Forest Park, Pa.
N. Y. Office:
3 W. 16th Street

J. HALPERN, Manager—M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.

Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service

55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

RESORT ADVERTISING RATES:—

One inch, narrow column	$6.16
Ten insertions	5.55 each
One inch, wide column	9.52
Ten insertions	8.57

CLASSIFIED advertisements can be taken up to 4 P.M. on Mondays, to appear in the issue on the stands Thursday—cost, 62 cents a line of 6 words. Minimum, 3 lines.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, N. Y. COrtlandt 7-3330

cal, it is silent. But it describes with sympathy and sensitiveness, for all its light touch, the miseries that descend on one after the other of the Hirsch family and their connections as the Nazis gain ground. There is the German Jew whose people have lived in Germany for generations and who loves his fatherland: suddenly made to feel a pariah, whose resignation from the Steel Helmets is demanded, whose clubs will have none of him, whose business is ruined, whose mistress is afraid to remain with him, who has to march to police headquarters with his arms above his head, he kills himself. There is the delicate and highly strung youth who dies as a result of Nazi maltreatment, the scientist whose laboratory is wrecked, the playwright whose manuscript is destroyed, the student whose studies are cut short and her future darkened, all for no reason except their Jewish blood. There is even one rather absurd and unconvincing girl Communist, who is rescued and smuggled out of Germany in the nick of time. For those individuals who cannot be bothered to read facts or to ponder them, however terrible, except in the guise of fiction, Miss Stone has provided a useful statement as well as a varied entertainment. But her presentation of her theme is as superficial as it is vivid.

The Later Wordsworth. By Edith C. Batho. The Macmillan Company. $6.

Miss Batho's book will have to be taken into account henceforth by any person who wants to talk sense about Wordsworth. Such a person will have learned from Miss Batho how not to talk like a parrot about "the lost leader" of legend. The older Wordsworth, contrary to the prejudiced testimony of Leigh Hunt, Keats, Haydon, Hazlitt, Byron, and Shelley—the only testimony which is ever repeated—remained to his death tolerant, humane, vigorous of mind, and within appropriate limits modest concerning himself and his work. The fact that he did not ossify into a liberal at thirty-five has been taken to mean that he descended into reaction in the fields of politics and religion; to Miss Batho it means that he kept on thinking and that in many respects he was right—or, if not right, worthy of intellectual respect and understandable on intellectual grounds. Those who do not share her enthusiasm for the old poet's ideas will at least be under the obligation to listen to her statement of them. With respect to his later personality it should be impossible after this book for anyone to repeat the standard charges of coldness, arrogance, and absurdity. And with respect to the later poetry it will be incumbent upon any commentator to acknowledge Miss Batho's evidence for her conviction that the difference in its quality is conceivably accounted for as much by Wordsworth's continued illness and prospect of blindness as by a hypothetical loss of spiritual and psychological powers.

Silius Italicus. Punica. Translated by J. D. Duff. Two volumes. Philo. Volume V. Translated by F. H. Colson and G. H. Whitaker. Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50 per volume.

Of these three volumes in the Loeb Classical Library the third continues with Philo, who will not be complete until the ninth volume, and the first two contain text and translation of a Roman epic which has not seen the light of English since 1672. Mr. Duff tries gracefully in his introduction to defend Silius Italicus against the immemorial charge of dulness, even going so far as to point out the best passages so that any reader may test him. There is no doubt that the Punic wars are an interesting story. The only trouble with Silius, even in his best passages, is that he is appallingly prosaic.

Louis Hacker will review George Soule's "The Coming American Revolution" and Walter Lippmann's "The Method of Freedom" next week in The Nation.

NRA U.S. CODE

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 18, 1934 No. 3602

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 57
EDITORIALS:
Can Labor Enforce Section 7-a? 60
Boards, Boards, Boards 61
Hitler Moves Right 61
Consumer Goods 62
ISSUES AND MEN. THE STRANGE GERMAN CHARACTER. By Oswald Garrison Villard 63
CARTOON: LOW VISIBILITY. By LOW 64
LABOR BIDS FOR POWER. I. RIOT GUNS IN SAN FRANCISCO. By Miriam Allen De Ford. II. TRIAL BY FIRE IN MILWAUKEE. By Florence Higgins 65
COMPANY UNIONS AND THE A. F. OF L. By Louis Adamic . 67
A LENINGRAD LETTER. By Harold J. Laski 69
WHAT IS BELIEF? By I. A. Richards 71
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 74
CORRESPONDENCE 75
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 75
BOOKS:
Sonnets. By Mark Van Doren 76
Revolution and Reaction. By Louis M. Hacker 76
The Ukiyo-ye Primitives. By Benjamin Rowland, Jr. 77
Which Is Which? By Lincoln Reis 78
Epic of a Class. By Edna Kenton 79
Eleven Million Strong. By Sylvia Kopald Selekman 80
Not Even Heroic. By Thacher Winslow. 80
The Economic South. By Broadus Mitchell 81
Jewish Social Planning. By Beryl Harold Levy 82
Shorter Notices 84

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE UNIVERSITY OF PITTSBURGH has discharged Dr. Ralph E. Turner, for nine years professor of history, and the ensuing reverberations are likely to shake the very foundations of the "Cathedral of Learning." Dr. Turner was formerly chairman of the Pennsylvania Security League, which militantly seeks social and economic reform through legislation, and makes no bones about its hatred of the Mellon-Grundy-Vare combine which once held Pennsylvania in its back pocket. After Dr. Colston E. Warne, professor of economics (now at Amherst), had been driven out of the university for his attacks on coal-field conditions, and five other liberals had been dropped, Dr. Turner quit his post as chairman of the Security League. But he continued his assaults upon the sweatshop and upon the social backwardness of the industrial commonwealth. Dr. Turner was voted the most popular man on the campus by the seniors of two years ago, and Chancellor John G. Bowman once called him "one of the ten best teachers in the college." Nevertheless he dismissed Dr. Turner, by a coincidence in the midst of a fund-raising campaign among the steel, iron, and aluminum magnates who make up the university's board of trustees. But the Mellon-Grundy wire-pullers apparently forgot that their 1,000,000-vote majorities are no more and that they are faced with a Democratic opposition that threatens to sweep the State. The Turner case is being made a campaign issue, and the Democratic members of the Legislature will probe the matter very thoroughly when the university requests its usual annual financial aid from the commonwealth (for the 1933-35 biennium $1,188,000 was thus granted). "There's a lot of good in Turner," Chancellor Bowman said, commenting on the dismissal. "He's not all bad by any means. But I believe the university could carry out its policy better without him around." What is the policy in question? It might make an interesting research assignment.

THE FACULTY of Harvard University has decided that the patenting of discoveries or inventions bearing on matters of health and therapeutics is undesirable, and hereafter the scientists in Harvard laboratories will not be permitted to take out such patents. It would seem to be so obvious as not to be worth voting on that the results of medical research in such a quasi-public institution of learning as Harvard should be given freely to the public, yet this quiet announcement is probably the epilogue to a particularly petty attempt to protect the profits from an important therapeutic device developed in a Harvard laboratory, even to the point of trying to keep off the market a superior and less costly machine. The story was told in The Nation of March 1, 1933. In May, 1929, Professor Philip Drinker of Harvard devised a respirator for use in cases of infantile paralysis and applied for a patent. In the two and a half years which elapsed before the patent was granted, John Haven Emerson, proprietor of a machine shop in Cambridge and by all accounts a sort of mechanical genius who knew not the ways of commerce, saw the Drinker machine and talked with its inventor about possible improvements. Drinker was not interested, but Emerson in his own shop made a superior machine which could be made for $1,000 instead of $2,300. In spite of the fact that the supply of such machines throughout the country is pitifully inadequate to cope with any serious epidemic of infantile paralysis, Dr. Drinker, who had sold the right of manufacture to a commercial firm and was receiving royalties, did not welcome Mr. Emerson's improvements. His manufacturer was even less pleased; and when the Drinker patent finally was issued, the manufacturer entered suit against Emerson for infringement. The short dispatch about the new ruling at Harvard fails to state whether it has any practical bearing on the Drinker-Emerson case but at least it makes impossible another such incident in at least one great university.

PERHAPS THE PLEASANTEST THING that has been said about Joseph P. Kennedy, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, was said by Mr. Kennedy himself. Replying to an inquiring reporter, he remarked that he was "inclined to list himself as a liberal." No one else who has commented upon Mr. Kennedy's career has been similarly inclined. He has instead been generally listed as a stock gambler on a grand scale. He was involved in one of the pool operations brought to light by Ferdinand Pecora in the hearings before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. But on the other hand Mr. Kennedy has certain qualifications not overlooked by the watchful Mr. Farley, who conferred with the President on the day before the appointments to the commission were announced. Mr. Kennedy is an old friend and admirer of Mr. Roosevelt; he traveled with the Democratic candidate during the 1932 campaign; he contributed many thousands of dollars to the party war chest, and helped to raise many thousands more. As if to balance the old-fashioned Tammany tactics implied in this appointment, the President put four good men on the new commission, including Ferdinand Pecora and James M. Landis, both of whom are known to favor rigorous regulation to end stock manipulation and the type of speculation practiced by traders like Kennedy. It will be interesting to see how successful they will be in counteracting the influence of the chairman, who has already declared that legitimate speculation has nothing to fear from the new law and the new commission.

SOME OBSCURE ENEMY has wronged Mr. Irenee Du Pont. The recent attacks upon the munitions makers, he thinks, issue from "a subservient force, instigated by the Third International and allied interests to weaken the defensive powers of the capitalist countries." Which capitalistic countries? Before the World War, Mr. Du Pont's firm was cheerfully weakening the defensive powers of the United States by handing over to a German concern discoveries made by chemists in the employ of our government. And at the moment Mr. Du Pont's crowd are doing what they can to weaken the Administration's attempt to stop that little capitalist war in the Chaco. One looks forward with pleasure to the testimony of Mr. Du Pont next fall at the hearings of the Nye Committee on munitions manufacture. He will have ample opportunity to air his wrongs, and Senators Nye and Bone can probably be trusted to do right by him.

THE DETERMINATION of subordinate officials in the Public Works Administration virtually to ignore the existence of local public-housing authorities and to embark on a program of direct federal slum clearance and low-cost housing should be promptly and vigorously repudiated by Secretary Ickes. New York's experience is a case very much in point. Last January Mr. Ickes sent the following telegram to Mayor LaGuardia:

> The Public Works Emergency Housing Corporation has earmarked an amount not to exceed twenty-five million dollars available for loan to duly constituted New York City Housing Authority subject to submission satisfactory low-cost housing project which meets our approval.

The New York City Housing Authority, which was created as a direct result of these assurances, soon thereafter developed a program for a thirteen-block low-cost housing project in Williamsburg. The program was approved through constant consultation by officials of the Housing Division of the PWA. Under an agreement between the two bodies the Housing Authority obtained options for the PWA on a third of the necessary land. The PWA was to acquire the land and then turn it over to the Housing Authority as part of its loan, advancing the remainder of the $25,000,000 in cash with which the Housing Authority was to construct the buildings. A week or so ago Colonel Hackett, who has recently assumed direction of the Housing Division of the PWA and who had been a party to this agreement, announced that the PWA was going to come into New York and erect the buildings itself, reserving decision as to whether it would then turn them over to the Housing Authority to operate or make it merely a renting agency. In the first place this is an inexcusable breach of faith. It also violates every sensible principle both of government and economics. As an excuse for his change of policy Colonel Hackett has charged the New York Authority with indecision and delay. A careful check-up of the facts shows the delays and indecisions to have been all on the side of the PWA. Mr. Ickes should make an immediate personal review of this particular case as it affects the whole low-cost housing policy of his Administration.

RUDOLF HESS, Hitler's most trusted lieutenant, spoke almost tenderly to the French war veterans across the border. "As proud soldier speaking to proud soldier," he asked, "must this be [the horrors of war]? Can't we get together? Can't we, together, preserve mankind from such things by the use of good-will?" He praised the courage of the French soldier. He even praised Barthou, mentioning with particular approval the Foreign Minister's culture and capacity for appreciating Richard Wagner. His demand for peace was impassioned. But tenderness and praise and passion all rang a little hollow, and the words "good-will" fell with a ghoulish sound, from lips that had just extolled Hitler's heroic "severity" in murdering the Storm Troop leaders, innocent and guilty alike, "without any consideration and with lightning speed according to old military principles." And they contrast oddly with some of Herr Hess's former acts and sentiments. For Hess is an old Nazi, a class-room brawler and beer-hall fighter, who in 1924 wrote a ferocious poetic attack on France containing the lines:

> Hey, Frenchie, that's a bad morning greeting!
> You over there will have to die, that we may live. . . .

He was also praised by Hitler in "Mein Kampf" in these words:

> Like wolves, in packs of eight and ten, they fell upon their foes and began to thrash them out of the hall. . . . Then I really began to know many men, and chief among them my brave Maurice, my present private secretary Hess.

Of such stuff are Nazi statesmen and peace-lovers made.

THE NEW CABINET in Japan, headed by Admiral Okada, represents another of those inimitable compromises at which the Japanese are so adept. Following the assassination of Premier Inukai in May, 1932, neither of the extreme jingoist elements nor the discredited political parties, backed by the business interests, were in a strong enough position to assume the responsibilities of office. Accordingly a balance was struck in setting up the Saito government whereby the military-naval clique was allowed to control foreign policy and the civilian elements were given authority to regulate domestic affairs. As is so often the case in Japanese politics, Saito's downfall this past week was brought about by a relatively extraneous issue—a financial scandal in which his government was not directly involved. The real cause of the change, however, appears to have been the desire of the younger naval officers for a leader who would be vigorous in pushing the demand for Japanese parity at the 1935 conference. Unable to dominate the situation sufficiently to secure a man of their own choice as Premier, the ultra-nationalists accepted the next best bet—an admiral belonging to the more moderate wing of the navy group. The remaining offices were then apportioned among the various factions with scrupulous regard for the niceties of the existing equilibrium. As indicated by the retention of Hirota as Foreign Minister and Hayashi as Minister of War, little or no change may be expected in Japan's attitude toward China or the Soviet Union.

IT MIGHT BE HOPED that working under the same sun, tilling the same soil, and suffering from the same general break-down of agriculture would, if anything could, shatter the ephemeral distinctions among separate farmers. But the bloody strike at the Seabrook Farms at Bridgeton, New Jersey, is disillusioning. Seabrook is a 5,000-acre truck farm. Before the strike 500 field hands were employed, picking crops and preparing them for canning. They were not itinerant workers. They lived in the neighborhood or in nearby Bridgeton. Many of them have had farms of their own, and eked out their scant livelihood with the 25 or 30 cents an hour Charles E. Seabrook, the owner, paid by agreement with the Agricultural and Cannery Workers Industrial Union. This NRA contract was signed in April. In June Seabrook received a $200,000 loan from the Farm Credit Administration. Immediately he discharged 100 workers, speeded up the remainder, and cut wages to from 15 to 20 cents. The terms of the loan limited him as to payroll expenditures, he said in explanation of his action. The militant workers called a strike, their second (the first resulted in the April wage agreement). They picketed the farm, and carried on the usual peaceful strike activities. Vegetables worth $25,000 rotted away. Unable to bear this waste, though their own crops also suffer from "surplus-itis," the farmers of the country (friends and neighbors of the striking workers, it will be recalled) formed a vigilantes' group, and took it upon themselves to break the strike. Thugs were imported from Philadelphia and Atlantic City. Scabs piled in by the truck-load. City and county police came out in full force. State police came, with billies and tear gas. They routed the pickets, injuring several. As the last straw, 100 farmers, armed with shot-guns, volunteered for deputy sheriff service, to protect strike-breakers. In a second battle on July 9 dozens of workers were beaten and gassed, a barracks was burned, a score of arrests were made, and the Sheriff called upon the Governor of New Jersey to declare martial law.

PICKET LINES have formed before the Commerce Building in Washington. A small number of hardy souls, defying the Washington heat, have been carrying placards intended to shame General Johnson into reinstating John Donovan, discharged head of the NRA Employees' Union. Among other things, these placards call attention to the existence of Section 7-a and protest against the formation of company unions. It is hardly likely that General Johnson will be budged by the pickets or by their placards. Nevertheless, the picketing has already had at least one important effect, it has stirred into noble language that distinguished organ of liberal opinion, Mr. Eugene Meyer's Washington Post. In an editorial entitled Bargaining with the State the Post has resurrected theories of political sovereignty which, one would have imagined, died with Hobbes. "Employees of the government belong in a class apart," the editorial states. "Trade-union organization as such has no place in the government service," it continues. And then the editorial reaches its climax: "The state does not bargain with its employees. It commands. The sooner that elemental lesson is learned by those who think that trade unionism can exist under bureaucracy, the nearer we shall be to constructive solution of real industrial problems." On one essential point, however, the Washington Post is unclear: Is General Johnson the state? Are his prejudices and whimsies to be regarded as an expression of sovereign power? And how about this idea that "the state does not bargain with its employees"? Has the learned editor never heard of a lobby conducted by government employees? Or does he merely believe that the NRA union, instead of addressing itself directly to its boss, should try to get Congress and the President to go after him?

THE CITY OF NEW YORK is about to award a bus franchise containing provisions effectively outlawing the company union or any of its disguised relatives. Although the franchise in question is a relatively unimportant one, the collective-bargaining clause containing the company-union ban is to be incorporated into every other franchise awarded by the LaGuardia administration. Clause 28 of the franchise to the Avenue B and East Broadway Transit Company seems far removed from the vague generalities of Section 7-a of NIRA or the ambiguous Wagner bill. It reads:

> The company agrees not to permit the existence of, or to deal with, any company-controlled union or association, and to that end it agrees that it will not participate in, encourage, or give financial support to the formation of any union or association of its employees, or participate in the management or control of any such union or association after its formation.

Equally unprecedented are the provisions prohibiting the bus company from discriminating against any employee because of race, color, or creed and requiring it to recognize and deal with the representatives of its employees. In the event of a dispute concerning who are such representatives, the Mayor or the Board of Estimate is empowered to determine them. If the company defaults in any of its obligations under the collective-bargaining clause, the city is empowered to terminate the franchise on three days' notice. Not only is Jim Crowism barred to the company, but any union of bus employees is also forbidden to deny membership to anyone because of race, color, or creed.

A NOTE OF WISTFUL sensitiveness has crept into the administration of emergency relief. In the L. W. D. offices in Pennsylvania (and by now presumably elsewhere) relief workers have been instructed how to meet certain embarrassing little difficulties that often crop up. "When a person comes in and says he will commit suicide unless you give him a job," the instructions are, "be sure and report it to your superior immediately. Then if he does commit suicide, you won't have it on your conscience."

Can Labor Enforce Section 7-a?

AFTER enough shooting, gassing, and casualties to equip a small Latin American palace revolution, the California National Guard unlocked the Golden Gate, and the shipping traffic, paralyzed for two months, is moving again under police and military protection. But the battle is not over. The marine workers are still out and fourteen unions, including the teamsters, have threatened to declare a general strike. The two months' tie-up brought about a depression within a depression. Now, if the general strike is called, the situation is likely to move again into the phase of open warfare which has characterized every major strike movement during the past six months.

All of these conflicts, of course, are rooted in the broken promises of the NRA. While the President talks peace and amity to the Haitians, the Colombians, and the world at large, the radio of the S.S. Houston is sputtering news of war all over the industrial map of America. Section 7-a was in effect a promissory note given to labor to insure its support of the NRA and of the Administration. Industry also got its promissory note, in the form of a suspension of the anti-trust laws and the incorporation of price-fixing provisions in the codes. Since big business, organized in trade associations, controlled the code authorities, industry was able to collect on this promissory note of the Administration, and continues to collect, despite the protests of the Darrow Board in behalf of small business and the consumer. Labor, lacking equally powerful organization, has been far less successful in collecting its promissory note. The government has repeatedly defaulted on the clear obligation written into Section 7-a in the Weirton case; in the automobile settlement; last and most miserably in the case of the Harriman Mills, which cheerfully defied the screams of General Johnson's moulting Blue Eagle.

But the promissory note of Section 7-a is still a matter of record. It is good strictly in proportion to the debtor's ability to enforce collection. In Toledo, labor collected a partial payment in the teeth of the powerful Automobile Chamber of Commerce. It did this by calling in militant political leadership, by reinforcing the striking Auto-Lite workers with masses of unemployed workers, by openly challenging the courts and the police, and by staging a pitched battle with the National Guard which the authorities did not dare press to its final issue. Something very similar happened in Minneapolis, where the Communist League of America took the leadership (in Toledo it was the American Workers Party, and in San Francisco the Communist Party has played an important role.) In Minneapolis, too, the strike of the truck drivers was well organized and militant; the fragile settlement was soon broken by the employers, and there too a general strike is threatened. The story of the Milwaukee strike, told elsewhere in this issue, describes what was in effect the uprising of a whole community against an arrogant public-utility capitalist. In this case it was apparently militant Socialist leadership that brought the unemployed into action, and played an important part in winning the strike. Also in this issue, Miriam A. De Ford tells the story of the battle of the Embarcadero. Better than the muted press accounts it makes clear that the marine-workers strike is giving San Francisco a taste of something very like civil war. In Mobile, where the longshoremen have gone back to work on the ship operators' terms, and elsewhere all up and down the Pacific, Atlantic, and Gulf seaboard the conflicts differed not in essential nature, but merely in degrees of violence. In Portland, Oregon, the marine workers are still out and a general strike is threatened.

In Akron 30,000 rubber workers, influenced by the precarious success of that Toledo outbreak, are trying to shake off the crippling bonds of the A. F. of L. craft unions in preparation for effective strike action. Meanwhile the manufacturers have piled up a five-months' supply of finished tires. In the Scioto marshlands of Hardin County, Ohio, a 100 per cent strike of the onion field workers has brought General Connolly, of the Ohio National Guard, to the scene; this, after the tenant farmers, laborers, and sharecroppers, reinforced by the Unemployed League, had rejected the "settlement" of the federal conciliator, who proposd fifteen cents an hour as the basic wage instead of the current eight to thirteen cents an hour! In Butte, Montana, the power of the Anaconda Copper Company is being challenged by the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smeltermen. Violence, strictly in the tradition of "bloody Butte," broke out last week when a chain was thrown over the power line into the Belmont mine, stopping the pumps for ten minutes, and a scab truck driver was taken to the hospital with a broken head. Ward Kinney tells the story of the Butte strike in next week's issue of The Nation.

Surely all these developments prove that General Johnson, whatever his deficiencies of mind and temperament, has been a good school master. Labor has learned from him that the NRA's promises to labor have not been and will not be fulfilled; further, that when labor plays its high card, the threat of the general strike to force fulfilment of these promises, then the power of the state is joined with the power of the employers to see that they are not fulfilled. In other words, the President's New Deal for labor has resulted merely in a series of defaulted promises, followed by imposed, unstable truces designed to disguise this default, while in effect ratifying it. But no peace is in sight; the government's attempts at mediation are repeatedly stalemated.

Labor's revolt is not revolution, and cannot be, in the absence of an effectively organized revolutionary movement, which has not yet appeared in this country. But clearly, the rapid spread of the strike wave, characterized by increasing violence and increasing willingness on the part of hitherto conservative labor elements to invoke the dangerous weapon of the general strike, means that the conflict of forces is developing. Labor is not going to take the defaults of the New Deal lying down; it is not going to be put off with new promises that merely take the place of other promises already broken. If the President will not or cannot enforce Section 7-a, perhaps labor can and will. Three weeks from now Mr. Roosevelt will be back in the White House. It will be interesting to watch the reaction of the President's celebrated political sensitivity to the new turn of events. Will he "crack down?" And on whom?

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Boards, Boards, Boards

IT began last summer with the establishment of the National Cotton Textiles Industrial Relations Board. Shortly thereafter, the Wagner board was created. Since then, labor boards have proliferated until today they fill the landscape of industrial relations. First, the National Labor Relations Board and its immediate affiliates, steel and longshoremen. Second, boards set up by the NRA in connection with codes: cotton, silk, and wool textiles, bituminous-coal, newspaper-publishing, lumber, trucking, and so forth. Third, code boards independent of the NRA: petroleum (under the Petroleum Administration) and automobile (thanks to the March 25 settlement).

We see here emerging an elaborate system for governing industrial relations under Section 7-a. This system may be taken to express the Administration's labor policy. The government will not lend a direct hand to the job of bringing the employers and the trade unions to terms. Instead the government will assist in the creation of appropriate instrumentalities to perform this function.

It is doubtful, however, whether most of the boards now flowering in Washington pastures are fit instruments for their chief task: forcing our anti-union industrialists to bow to the clear provisions of the law requiring them to deal with trade unions. This might not be true if the Administration were inspired with a forthright will to put Section 7-a into effect. Unfortunately, the Administration manifests no such will. It projects its labor boards in vacuo. It projects them, not for the purpose of imposing New Deal labor policies upon Old Deal employers, but simply because it is expedient to maintain the industrial peace. The history of Senator Wagner's board is instructive. So long as the board contented itself with forestalling and checking strikes, things ran smoothly for it. In the course of time, the board advanced to a theory of industrial relations leading straight toward union recognition and collective agreements. This brought into play opposing forces which finally wrecked the board and ended its existence.

Virtually all of the new labor boards have been conceived in error. No doubt they have been modeled after devices for administering industrial relations which have proved more or less successful in a number of industries, for example, clothing and anthracite-coal. But clothing and anthracite-coal are organized industries wherein trade unionism has taken deep root. The employers recognize the trade union. What is more, the emloyers and the trade union are bound one to the other by a collective agreement. The board's job, accordingly, is the relatively simple one of interpreting and applying the specific provisions of an existing agreement. There are no psychological barriers to break down; no fixed habits to transform. The board is not called upon to waste its energies in battering away at a stubborn anti-union psychology. A totally different state of affairs confronts the boards created under Section 7-a. True, they have a document to administer, a code of fair competition, which on the surface resembles a collective agreement. In fact, however, only a handful of the NRA codes are the fruit of prior collective bargaining: the clothing codes, the soft-coal code, the legitimate-theater code, hardly any others. It is the least of the functions of these boards to interpret and apply the labor provisions of the code bearing on hours, wages, and other working conditions. Their chief problem arises when a trade union, fresh from an organizational campaign, seeks to press home recognition demands against employers determined not to grant them.

In their natural growth, labor boards have evolved as a device for regulating collective agreements—where there is already a mutual will to agree. In their hot-house forcing by the Roosevelt Administration, labor boards are applied to the composition of industrial disputes arising out of the unwillingness of employers to bargain collectively. Can the same mechanism be expected to perform successfully two utterly distinct if not positively opposed functions? This seems to us doubtful despite the care and conscience with which the President selected the personnel of the new National Labor Relations Board. Lloyd Garrison, Harry A. Millis, and Edwin S. Smith are not only experienced and intelligent; they will almost certainly attempt to induce employers to observe the intent and letter of Section 7-a. But they are confronted with an opposition that has wrecked the board that preceded them and has driven other men of similar liberal sympathies to the support of hopeless compromises such as the automobile settlement. And they take office at a moment of labor unrest unprecedented in the post-war years.

Hitler Moves Right

AS the smoke from Nazi rifles begins to lift from the scene of tragedy, it becomes possible to obtain a clearer view of the background and significance of the recent sanguinary events in the Reich. While it is still difficult either to verify or disprove the existence of an organized anti-Hitler conspiracy within the ranks of the Storm Troopers, there is abundant evidence of disaffection and a fundamental clash of interests which made a showdown inescapable. It is illuminating to note, for example, that Ernst Roehm, founder of the Storm Troops, had always possessed a totally different conception of the use of that body from that held by his close personal friend and chief, Adolf Hitler. As a military man, Captain Roehm was primarily interested in building up a large well-disciplined army which could form the backbone of German defense in the case of war. Hitler, on the other hand, looked upon the S.A. as a political weapon to be used for the seizure and consolidation of power. Differences over this issue are said to have been largely responsible for Roehm's resignation in 1925, which Hitler did not even deign to acknowledge; and it was not until 1930 that matters were patched up sufficiently for him to resume his post.

Recent political and economic developments had served to reopen this long-standing conflict. Roehm's proposal that all German youth be compelled to undergo a period of military training in the S.A. had been rejected, chiefly because of the opposition of France. Meanwhile the Storm Troopers, composed almost entirely of young men without other means of support, had become openly discontented over the delay in putting the socialist half of the Nazi program into effect. And while it is doubtful whether this dissatisfaction would have led to a "second revolution," as alleged by Goering, it had already been capitalized by Roehm in his demand for a showdown. To the conservative element in the government, reorganization and reduction in the size of the S.A. seemed to be the only answer, both as a protection against the threat of an uprising and as a means of lessening France's objection to German rearmament. Judging by all indications, the Storm Troop leaders would not have strenuously opposed such a move if they had been permitted to take a number of their best men into an enlarged Reichswehr. This possibility was blocked, however, by the officers of the latter body who had always been luke-warm toward the Nazis and who preferred to draw their recruits from the more conservative Stahlhelm. The attempt of the S.A. leaders to ban the Steel Helmets forced the issue. A choice had to be made, and when it was announced that the Storm Troopers would be given a leave during the month of July it was evident that the so-called radical wing of the party had lost its battle.

That Hitler's coup marks a definite swing to the right has been borne out by subsequent events. Despite his recent attack on the theoretical bases of National Socialism, Von Papen has been retained as Vice-Chancellor—an obvious concession to Hindenburg. The Storm Troops will be purged of non-party elements and greatly reduced in numbers. Most noteworthy, however, has been the granting of virtually dictatorial power over all German commercial and financial activities to Kurt Schmitt, Minister of Economics. In an attempt to curb the growing adverse balance of trade which has reduced the gold ratio of the Reichsbank to a nominal 2 per cent, Herr Schmitt, who is known as a conservative, may be expected to insist on wage-reductions and a curtailment of Hitler's extravagant job-making program, so that German exports may once more compete on favorable terms in the world's markets. Evidence of a rightward trend may also be seen in the compromise reached at London on July 4 in which Germany agreed to pay full interest to British holders of the Dawes and Young plan bonds. Although England exacted this concession on the threat of impounding German balances, it will be difficult for the Reich to refuse to grant similar terms to American and other holders of the bonds. Even the assumption of this partial obligation, so bitterly opposed by Schacht, makes action for bringing German economy in line with that of the outside world more imperative.

There remains the question of the effect of these events on the trend of German politics. Do they represent a consolidation of National Socialist power, or the beginning of its downfall? Backed by the combined forces of the Reichswehr and the S.S. (Schutz-Staffel), Hitler's position seems relatively secure at the moment. With the S.A. reduced to a shadow of its former self, no group save the military leaders themselves will be in a position to challenge the authority of the government. But by casting his lot with the right, Hitler has irrevocably narrowed the basis of his support. This action may enable him to escape some of the inner contradictions of his regime, but it cannot allay the growing discontent of which the alleged conspiracy was a symptom. The reorganization of the Storm Troops can serve only to drive thousands of disillusioned Nazis into the ranks of the despised Marxists. Although the ranks of the Communists and Socialists have been enormously reduced by Nazi terror, recent reports from Germany indicate a marked growth in their underground activities, a development which is likely to be accentuated if the Nazis adopt a reactionary policy.

Consumer Goods

THE current issue of "The Golden Book" publishes in translation an amusing skit by Ilf and Petrov, the Russian authors of that remarkable satiric novel "The Little Golden Calf." This time they are concerned with the editor of a boy's magazine who summoned a successful author, told him that youthful readers were beginning to rebel against a continuous diet of instructive literature, and ordered a novel of pure adventure—something like "Robinson Crusoe" but with, of course, a Soviet slant. After an appropriate interval the author returned with a completed manuscript which seemed to fill the bill. A Russian sailor, lone survivor of a shipwreck, was washed ashore on a desert island; he engaged in a single-handed struggle with nature, and was rescued after a period of years.

Unfortunately, however, the editor was not satisfied. He failed to perceive the Soviet slant and he was not convinced when it was explained to him that the sailor was a Soviet citizen who demonstrated how successfully such citizens were equipped for the struggle against nature. Where, he demanded, was the chairman of the committee and how did the author suppose that Soviet life could be represented without a Chairman of a Committee? It was finally agreed that a gentleman to fill this office should be washed ashore along with Robinson, but the editor was still not satisfied: "Who," he demanded, "is going to collect the dues?" Positively there must be a girl to collect Robinson's dues and there must also be a safe to keep them in. The rum which came ashore on the raft must be thrown overboard to be replaced by a safe and, of course, a table at which the chairman of the committee could meet with himself. Editors being the authoritative creatures that they are, the manuscript was completely rewritten. Not only the chairman and the girl but a whole skeletonized bureaucracy came ashore with Robinson and the theme became something much more than merely the struggle of man against nature. It became the struggle of a properly collectivized man against nature.

Maxim Gorky was recently asked what kind of books were best liked in Russia. "Any kind," he is reported to have replied, "which doesn't have any tractors in it." Nor do we see any reason why either Gorky's remark or the story of the Soviet Crusoe should be taken to indicate any decline of revolutionary fervor. Both may indicate only that the Soviet citizen is beginning to demand "consumer goods" in literature as well as in other commodities. The authorities may well consent to having them supplied and they need not thereby recognize the validity of any aesthetic chatter about the superior importance of "pure art." They need only say to themselves that the worker who has spent the day increasing the production of steel, assembling tractors, and listening to statistics on power output may reasonably feel that he has, at the end of the day, a right to expect something tangible in the way of better food and sportier clothes. Stories which are interesting in themselves instead of being merely incentives to further effort may then be put in the same class with a pork chop or a new pair of comfortable boots. They contribute nothing to the building of socialism but they are legitimate consumer goods, and if the demand for such goods is increasing surely this is nothing to worry about.

Issues and Men

The Strange German Character

THE blood-bath in Germany by means of which Hitler has "purged his party" of its alleged mutineers—as to whose guilt no evidence has as yet been allowed to reach the outer world—cannot fail to do the German people harm wherever the news of it is read. For, as The Nation has said, those horrible reports cannot be laid at the doors of Jewish libelers or foreign enemies; fifty deaths are now officially admitted, which means that the actual number must be very much larger. This standing up and shooting after three-minute trials of leaders who the day before were among the elect of the Hitlerites, or the outright murder of others like General von Schleicher and his wife, we might expect in a Balkan state or in a South American revolution, but never in a country which boasts of its high Kultur and its civilization. These horrors will only start up afresh, and seem to justify the wartime-atrocity propaganda stories of the Allies. They will stamp Hitler for all time as a bloody tyrant who lost his head and slaughtered left and right without any thought of what this would do to Germany's standing before the world. They will raise up dozens of enemies for him in the Storm Troop ranks for every leader that he kills. Murder on this scale inevitably begets more murder.

Yet so odd is the German character that I have no doubt that we shall have thousands of prominent Germans applauding Hindenburg's telegrams of approval to Goering and Hitler and having no difficulty whatever in rationalizing acts which they would be the first to denounce as evidence of purest barbarism had they occurred in any other country than their own. I expect also that in Germany and among myriads of German-Americans there will be plenty who will swallow the statement of that silly ass, Dr. Hanfstängl, that Hitler by his murders saved not only Germany but all the world. His reasoning is, I suppose, that if Hitler had fallen Germany would have been lost and without Germany the world could not survive. This again reflects the amazing processes of the German mind. Hanfstängl probably thinks that the fiction that Hitler by his accession to power saved Europe as well as Germany from communism was widely believed here and there and that this theme of Germany's noble saving of the world by killing mutineers without counting the cost will also render service in whitewashing men who are, if the truth be told, among the worst and bloodiest criminals in the world.

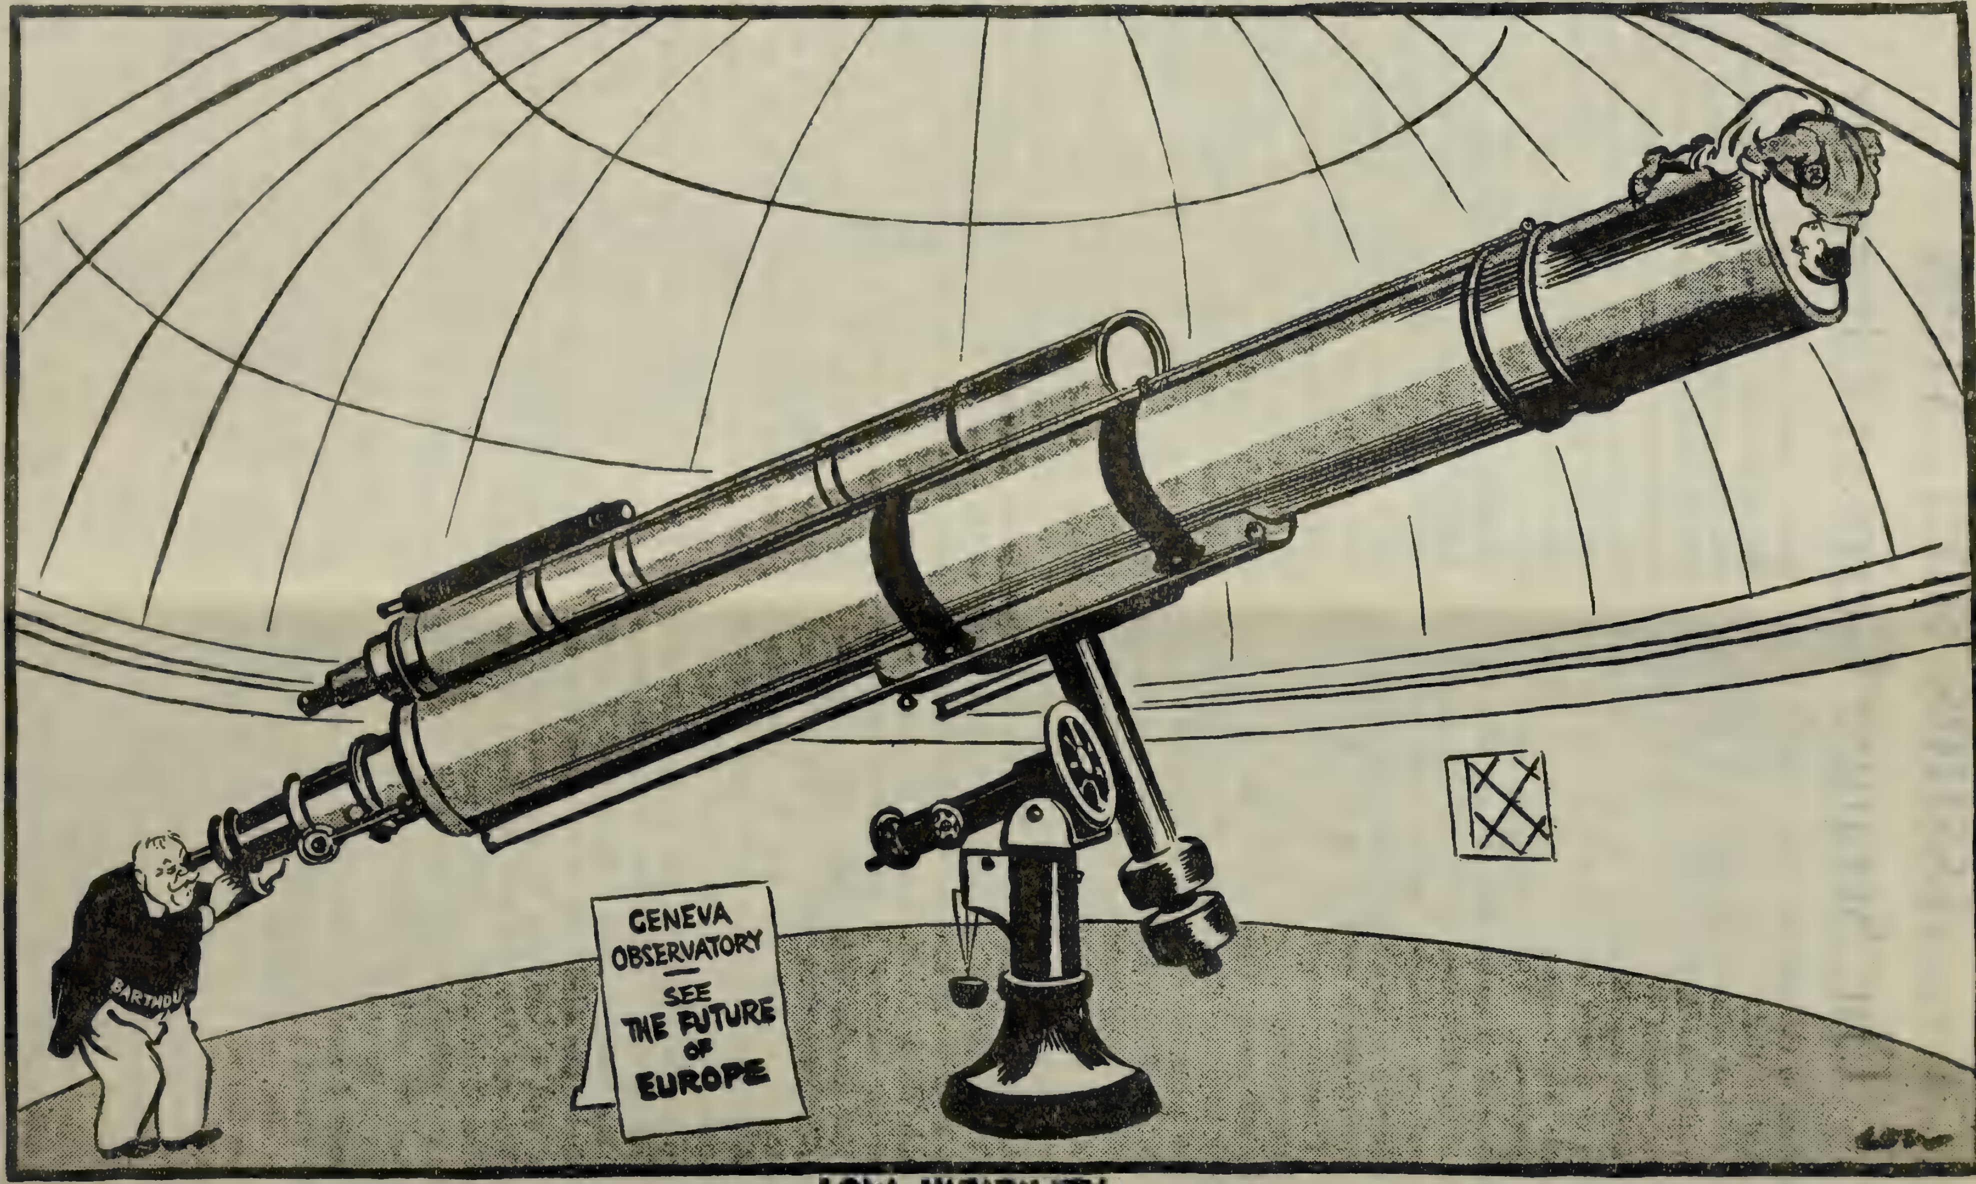
Only last week I received a letter from an old friend in Germany, the wife of a distinguished university professor in a Hanoverian city, repeating the old story that "if the National Socialists had not won, bolshevism would not only have conquered Germany but all of Europe perhaps with the exception of Italy." "So," she added, "the National Socialist success was our sole salvation from complete bolshevist barbarism." Undoubtedly the writer believes this absurdity; there is a certain childishness and gullibility in the German character which makes their minds more susceptible to mass psychology than even the American mentality—as Hitler has demonstrated so clearly. I have no doubt my correspondent will similarly agree with Hanfstängl that Hitler has again saved the world by slaughtering those fifty good and true, pure-blooded, and blond Aryans, without a drop of Jewish blood in their veins, of whom she and all National Socialists were so proud until recently. Until, in fact, Hitler a fortnight ago decided to butcher them—as the noble fifty had previously imprisoned, tortured, and butchered in those happy days of March and April, 1933, when they were free to wreak their vengeance upon any and all pacifists, Socialists, Communists, and all other individuals whom they disliked. Salvation from bolshevist barbarism? Good heavens, how can one differentiate morally between the slaughtering of the bolshevists, between Mussolini's atrocious blood-letting in the early days of his regime, and these foul crimes of Hitler? There may have been more in Russia than anywhere else but that does not mitigate the guilt of Hitler and Goering a single iota. I shall write my correspondent that barbarism already rules in the Third Reich and that it will be amazing, indeed, should the threatened economic disaster come on top of the Hitler murders, if we do not yet see the establishment of a communist government in Germany, and not in the far distant future either.

Yet I have no doubt that in the face of all this barbarity, the odd German character will manifest itself anew by more of the unending bitter complaints that we have had ever since 1914, that the world does not understand Germany, that it is unjust to it, that it is so credulous as always to believe the worst of Germany. There will continue to be the same bewildered protests that the Germans are not accepted by the rest of the world at their own rating as the greatest and most cultured race in all the world, who, as Hitler has said, are a people divinely appointed to lead the human race to greater heights than have ever been achieved before. They will resent bitterly the world's irresistible outcry because the assassins of General von Schleicher "accidentally killed" his wife when they killed him. Ludwig Lewisohn put it rightly some months ago when he wrote in a magazine article that the Germans were suffering from a hopeless inferiority complex; that their greatest cross is that they cannot win the good-will of the rest of the world and the recognition of their complete superiority to everybody else.

Oh, the pity of it! The pity that a people of such great qualities, such lovable traits when taken individually, that such kindly and well-meaning millions so gifted in all fields of science, industry, and invention, are impelled by some terrible daemon to put themselves always in the wrong, to ruffle the feelings and outrage the sensibilities of the rest of the world they seek so eagerly to win to a recognition of their own innate kindliness and desire for righteousness!

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



GENEVA
OBSERVATORY
SEE THE FUTURE
OF EUROPE
BARTHOU
LOW

LOW VISIBILITY.

(Copyright in all countries.)

Copyright by The Nation and Inter-Europa Press. Reproduction in the United States forbidden.

Labor Bids for Power

Riot Guns in San Francisco

By MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD

San Francisco, July 7

AT the southeast corner of Steuart and Mission streets, in San Francisco, near the headquarters of the International Longshoremen's Association, men chalked a rough square. In it they lettered the words: "Two men killed here, murdered by police." Others came and heaped the square high with flowers; men knelt and prayed, or stood watching with hats in their hands. Then the police came, rubbed off the chalked words, and dumped the flowers into a patrol wagon. They ordered the hatless men away.

Bloody Thursday was over.

In a series of skirmishes that were more battles than riots, two strikers, Howard Sperry and George Coundourakis, were dead; several others lay near death; thirty or more were shot; nearly a hundred, including a score of policemen, were badly enough injured by clubs, tear gas, or bricks to require hospital treatment. Two of the wounded were a man and a woman shot, one in the head and one in the arm, when bullets struck a Municipal Railway street car approaching the Ferry Building. Strictly speaking, Coundourakis was not a striker; he belonged to the Cooks' and Waiters' Union and was reporting the strike for the International Labor Defense. But he and Sperry are to be buried at a joint funeral attended by all union locals in San Francisco. There is no doubt that many thousands will turn out.

The battles raged all day, July 5, from Rincon Hill throughout the section of San Francisco bounded by the Embarcadero, Townsend Street, Third Street, and Market Street—all the warehouse district "south of the Slot" and near the waterfront. The worst engagement of the day took place on lower Market Street just as offices were letting out their employees and continued to the Ferry Building itself, where 25,000 commuters, with no other way of getting home, were endangered by bullets and tear gas, and herded like frightened steers into the various waiting-rooms. Meanwhile thousands of heedless curiosity-seekers crowded the edges of the fighting, standing on every available spot raised above the sidewalk, so as to make easy targets. Some of them were injured, and they deserved to be.

The objective in the morning was to stop the trucks, each with its police convoy, which were rolling out of Pier 38, the Matson Line, to a warehouse near the Southern Pacific Railroad Station. The Industrial Association had announced the port open to commerce at 1:25 Tuesday afternoon. For the sake of holiday travelers, no attempt was made to haul freight on July 4. Early Thursday morning it started again. Trucks were overturned, drivers beaten, goods dumped. The strikers set fire to dry grass in a vacant lot and the firemen turned the hose full on them.

In the afternoon it was the State-owned Belt Line Railway, carrying freight cars up and down the Embarcadero, that was the object of attack. Two crews, fearing for their lives, had already refused to take out a train, even on penalty of dismissal. Two box cars were burned. Men lay in the tracks where the engine would have to run them down. The crews were showered with bricks and stones.

That night, at ten o'clock, the National Guard took charge, called out finally by Governor Frank F. Merriam, who had hesitated unnaturally long to help his friends the shippers because he is a candidate for reelection (or rather for election; he merely succeeded, as Lieutenant-Governor, when Governor Rolph died), and strikers and strike-sympathizers have votes. Detachments were called from San Francisco itself, and from surrounding towns from San Jose and Gilroy to Berkeley and San Rafael. It is said that among these guardsmen there are about fifty who are actually themselves striking stevedores. If they refuse to fire when ordered, they can be court martialed. The waterfront of San Francisco has been declared in "a state of riot," which is the next step before martial law. The armory at Fourteenth and Mission streets is heavily guarded, following persistent rumors that it was to be dynamited.

The attitude of the police is a curious one. Many of the regular waterfront police were once longshoremen themselves. Then men were moved to the waterfront from all over the city, 750 of them, led in person by Police Chief William J. Quinn. At one hour some of these policemen would fraternize with the strikers, buy tickets to their benefit dances, share with them sandwiches from the ships. An hour later these same policemen would ride strikers down, club them viciously, shoot straight into milling crowds, hold tear gas bombs against a striker's flesh so that it was torn and burnt.

General strike talk grows. The conservative leaders of the Central Labor Council have tried to head it off by appointing an "investigating committee." But meetings are called of teamsters, ferryboatmen, street-car employees, and one huge mass meeting to which all crafts are asked to send delegates. A general strike would call out 45,000 workers, and probably put the whole city under martial law. Charges of communist control fly back and forth—the port opening coincided with a drive against communism by the American Legion. Teamsters even now will not haul scab-loaded goods anywhere,* machinists and welders will not work on ships with scab crews. All the nine maritime unions stand close together with ranks unbroken. There is much covert sabottage by sympathetic workers; try, for example, to get a taxi driver to take you to the Ferry Building.

The National Longshoremen's Board, appointed by President Roosevelt, and consisting of Archbishop Hanna, Assistant Secretary of Labor McGrady, and a lawyer named Cushing, begged both sides to let it arbitrate. Both sides agreed, but under "conditions so impossible of fulfilment" that the board would not even reveal them. On both sides the fundamental question is that of control of hiring halls; neither will give way an inch on that vital issue. The board announces it will now, by the powers vested in it by the federal government, hold open meetings, subpoena witnesses, and force the election of representatives who must submit to arbitration. Nothing can be done through the I.L.A.

---

* The teamster's union, by a count of 1,220 to 217, voted [illegible] July [illegible] to strike in sympathy with the longshoremen.

except by a coast-wide ballot of members. In the midst of this solidarity, the lonely figure of Lee J. Holman, deposed local president of the I.L.A., pipes of the desire of his new little organization, the San Francisco and Bay District Longshoremen's Association, to go back to work if the wicked communists will let them; Holman has even applied to President Ryan of the I.L.A. for a charter in the A. F. of L.

All is quiet, as I write, along the Embarcadero, where boys who still shave twice a week man machine guns, and a police airplane circles overhead. Today and tomorrow there will be meetings to consider a general strike, Monday will be the funeral of Sperry and Coundourakis. The scab-manned trucks are moving unmolested from dock to warehouse and back. It is the lull before the thunder sounds.

Trial By Fire

By FLORENCE HIGGINS

Milwaukee, July 7

WHAT is it?" "What happened?" "Oh, Christ, they killed a man. Oh, Father in Heaven, they burned him."

The crowd had surged forward like one body carried by its thousands of feet. Then in a second it had broken up. It was like a solid sheet of ice cracking with a great roar. The mass had become individuals, each seeking his own escape. From what? We didn't know. Nobody knew. We ran, the blonde, slim, silk-stockinged legs of girls flashing, workmen's shoes thumping heavy and solid, rushing, stumbling, slipping, dodging.

And after that vindictive dart of blue-rose fire from the window of the beleaguered Lakeside Power Plant, last stand of the Milwaukee Electric Railway and Light Company in the strike which had already stopped all street-car traffic, it was dark.

The great arc lights outside the plant had gone long ago, dying in puffs of smoke as rocks struck them. "The boys make pretty good pot shots, don't they?" a deputy had said comfortably, watching them. But M. N. Osborne, one of the striking employees, had begged us, "Stay away from that fence. You don't know what you're monkeying with. This is the company's last stand, and they'll stop at nothing to defend it. They don't fear God, man, the devil, or government. There's women in this crowd. My wife's here. We don't want blood, but you're going to get it if you monkey around with that fence."

The great building itself was dark, but there was stealthy movement in it. Heads showed from the roof, watching, intent. And then the fence had gone down, then the flash of fire, then the blind rush into the blind darkness, then the slow return, and the question tossed like a ball from one to another of us, "What happened? What happened?"

Well, nobody knows what happened, though there have been answers given. Right after the riot some of us compared what we had seen and it looked like this to all of us:

The five kids were quite a bit ahead of the rest of us. The company men were behind an embankment in the yard where the rocks couldn't get at them (but some of them did anyhow, because four men were taken out in an ambulance later with everybody standing around and yelling "Scab!" at them). They were playing streams of water from fire hoses on the crowd, and somebody got the idea that if they could break through the fence and get behind the wall of the plant itself they could nail the hose men in a hurry.

Eugene Domagalski, though nobody knew who he was then, was ahead. He and these four others rushed in through the gap when the section of fence went down. Domagalski got up to the bushes that line the edge of the plant. That was where it happened. Arville Schaleben, the reporter for the Journal, was close, and he said the flash of blue flame looked five or six feet long "as if it jumped from the building and raced through his body."

For a second, the boy's whole body seemed to glow, as though it were illuminated (this is what Schaleben says, and the others; this I didn't see myself) and the glowing body bounced right back "as though he'd bumped up against a rubber barrier." His head lay towards the crowd when he fell. He looked limp as a rag doll out in the rain, "as though every bone in his body were dissolved."

It must have been five or ten minutes before an officer came. Everybody was afraid to touch the kid. If it had been a shot, if it had been a knife, they would have known what to do. But this death in a blue flame had an element of unreality that seemed to paralyze us all. When they carried the kid away, with his legs just dangling loose like cooked spaghetti, one big-shouldered fellow kept saying, "Oh, God, I'm sick to my stomach. Honest to God, my stomach's just turning over. I seen guys get killed before, but I never seen a murder in cold blood."

At the inquest, the coroner's verdict was that Domagalski died "of his own neglect." Frank Brindza, who was burned when Domagalski was killed, testified that Domagalski was carrying an iron pipe. He said it was too dark for him to notice whether Domagalski had pushed the iron rod through the power plant window. Deputy sheriffs and Electric Company officials had said he struck high voltage apparatus within the plant with an iron rod. Everybody talked about the rod later, but nobody talked about it that night in the crowd.

Schaleben was one of the first into the enclosure; he went in with the deputy to get the kid, and he didn't see it. He didn't see any hole in the window, either, though a newspaper picture taken next day showed one. The coroner's verdict read merely that "he held part of the fence and came in contact with high voltage wires or machines."

The awed whisper that went through the crowd that night was: "It was a cold-blooded trap. The company had high voltage wires strung up in those bushes." One of the deputies and a company guard both testified at the inquest that there weren't any live wires "planted" around as a trap, and no evidence was brought in to show that there were. But that was what the crowd said.

This was the third, and as it turned out to be, the last night, of rioting in the electric-company strike. It was not, from the first, a strike like any other the city had ever had. At the least, 157 (the company's claim) at the most, 400 (claimed by the unions) strikers were actually involved. Yet crowds of 10,000 here, 5,000 there, several thousand at another spot, turned out on each night not only to encourage the small bands of pickets vocally, but actually to battle with the police and the defenders of the company's property.

A fat man was standing on the curb with his wife on Wednesday night during the riot at the Kinnickinnic Avenue car barns. Tears trickled from his eyes ludicrously, while his lips grinned widely. Tear gas had just been hurled, and the fat man said it was just like horseradish. People near him laughed, and encouraged, he elaborated, "They should serve wienies with their sharp horseradish. Hey, cop, give us some wienies next time with that horseradish." We were jammed up against his sweating stomach by the crowd. Talk began about the small number of strikers, and the great size of the crowd, and the fat man said, "Don't be dumb. Don't kid yourself like the electric company is doing. This is no strike of a hundred and a couple men against the company. It's the people of Milwaukee against the chiselers and the big guys. If they lose this strike, unionism is dead in this town. If they lose this strike, every guy of us that works for a living loses."

Other people said the same thing in different ways. Daniel W. Hoan, Socialist mayor of the city, received a letter from S. B. Way, president of the company, serving notice that Way intended to hold the city of Milwaukee liable for any damages done to company property and injuries to company men. Mayor Hoan wrote in reply:

> I now notify you and through you the most powerful trust the world has ever known . . . that you alone are solely responsible for the riots that have so far blotched the good name of the city. . . . Your attitude toward your employees, our people, our city, our federal government, is more arrogant than that of any ruler in the world. Uncle Sam himself has been compelled to rebuke the insolence by removing your Blue Eagle. You are now witnessing the harvest of pent-up public indignation you yourself have aroused.

Mayor M. V. Baxter, of West Allis, a suburb, wrote Mr. Way that "your appeal for protection comes with poor grace in view of your attitude towards attempts to settle the controversy peaceably," and that "I cannot promise you more assistance than we are legally compelled to provide." He concluded:

> From personal observations among the alleged mob I am forced to the conclusion that this is not a strike of 80 or 157 employees, but rather a strike of some one-half million citizens of Milwaukee County against a continued ruthless and soulless exploitation at a time when most people are hard pressed for the bare necessities of life. . . .

City Attorney Laurence Gram, of West Allis, not a Socialist, informed Way that "Your personal attitude of 'public be damned,' private business first and public interest last has finally become intolerable to the great mass of people. It is out of this feeling that public sympathy with the strike has arisen."

After the strike was called off Friday night and the terms were signed, John D. Moore, federal mediator, was asked by reporters what factors caused the accord which had appeared impossible 18 hours before. He told them, "The death of Domagalski and the shutting off of power." But white-collar workers and laborers, going to work on the street-cars from which the hated and ridiculed wire netting had been removed Saturday morning, said to each other: "Well, we won the strike. We showed 'em."

On the day that the strike ended it was reported that some Milwaukee business men, who had been meeting secretly, were preparing to lay before the district attorney that section of the Wisconsin statute which empowers him to issue warrants, if necessary, for mayors of any municipalities who fail to take action to quell riots. They called the letters "highly inflammatory and tending to arouse mob feeling and incite riots." It was also reported that the business leaders would urge police raids of communist headquarters on the charge that communist leaders were directing the strike. Neither of those things was done. Police did take into custody on suspicion of vagrancy forty-four private detectives imported by the electric company for service during the strike. When they were put through the bureau of identification one man was found to have served a six-year term in New York for murder. The police said seven busloads of imported guards had already left town.

Also, the first two of the unlawful assemblage and riot cases growing out of the strike were dismissed by Judge A. J. Hedding in district court, the court holding that to prove unlawful assemblage and rioting, the state must show that the suspect went to the scene with an unlawful purpose in mind.

Company Unions and the A. F. of L.

By LOUIS ADAMIC

ON Saturday, June 16—the day after the tragic fizzling-out of the militant rank-and-file strike movement in the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, described in The Nation of two weeks ago—I went to a great steel workers' picnic, held in a vast park beside a lake on the outskirts of Canton, Ohio. The picnic was organized by the Sixth District of the A. A., which includes the lodges in Canton, Youngstown, and the lesser steel towns thereabouts. Several thousand workers were there, mostly steel men with their families and girl friends. It was an all-day affair. Most of the folks had baskets of eats with them, and beer, soda pop, hot dogs, sandwiches, and ice cream were to be had at the big pavilion near the shooting-galleries.

There were all sorts of "doings." Some of the younger people had a good time in and on the lake, diving, swimming, rowing. The children had their games, the merry-go-round, and other amusement devices. Some of the youngsters shouted hilariously and dashed about. Most of them, perhaps, looked healthy enough; not a few, however, were all too obviously working-class children growing up during a great economic crisis in dismal, musty dwellings along cinder-strewn streets and alley-ways. They were thin and old-looking, many of them wearing cheap eye-glasses; and malnutrition was the reason.

Women of all ages, wearing cheap clothes, sat on the grass in small groups, chatting, or just sitting in silence, keeping an eye on the kids. Some of them no doubt were younger than they looked. Lots of them had bad teeth; for years they had had no money for dental work. A few of them, here and there, talked among themselves of what had happened in Pittsburgh the day before. No strike, thank God! They were relieved by the sudden turn of events. They approved the decision of the delegates to the "strike" convention not to strike. They didn't know (as I indicated in my last article) that that decision had been made for the delegates by President Roosevelt, Secretary of Labor Perkins, General Johnson, William Green, and the old leaders of the A. A. Anyhow, they were glad, these steel workers' wives, that the men were not going to strike right away. Times were so hard, and some of the men were just beginning to work again a little after years of almost steady idleness. And had a strike been started, some of the men would surely have been killed or wounded, for a number of the mills had armed for battle. What good would that have done?

"Of course," I overheard a woman say, "it would be different if we, I mean the men, could pull a real strike, a real one—all the steel and iron and tin workers organized in one union—all quitting at the same time, then just staying home till they got what they wanted, and none of 'em going near the mills to be shot at. But as things are now, the workers are all split up. Here are these A. A. lodges of Young Boys and Old Boys that don't get along: like cats and dogs. There's the communist union. All kinds of unions, none of 'em pullin' together. And then those company unions—"

"Those company unions," put in a second woman, quickly, "they are bad; if it wasn't for them—"

"They're bad, all right," said a third woman, listlessly, "but what can you do?"

The men, especially some of the younger men, the rank-and-filers, stood or sat about in small groups or around the tables in the pavilion, talking in snatches, smoking, munching sandwiches, drinking a bit, all palpably uncomfortable, bewildered, trying to appear indifferent. The shooting-galleries were not attracting many of them. I talked with a few. None really knew what had happened in Pittsburgh the previous day; what the labor movement or the NRA really was all about. I asked, "And what do you think of company unions?" "I'm against 'em," was the typical and prompt reply. "How about the other steel workers you know; do they feel the same as you?" I asked. The usual answer was, "Everybody I know is against company unions." The company unions were the only subject to which they reacted with spirit. In some instances the answer was a brusque, fierce laugh and a look which seemed to say, "You don't think we're saps enough to go for company unions, do you?"

In the afternoon, the speeches. None of the rank-and-file leaders spoke. None had any experience in talking to large crowds, and over the radio besides, for the speeches were broadcast. Moreover, as I have said before, all the rank-and-filers were confused; what could they say? . . . I did not hear all the speeches. The first one I listened to was by a former A. F. of L. union official whose name I forget, now running for office in Canton; a thick, short man with a bull voice. He spoke of the grand and glorious American labor movement, its traditions, achievements: blah, blah . . . for ten minutes. The leaders of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, he said, were about to go to Washington, the capital of this great country, to be received there by the President of the United States, the great Mr. Roosevelt, in the White House: blah, blah . . . for another ten minutes. Our great President was to talk with these leaders of the A. A., "your leaders"; he was to consult with them, deal with them—"and, my friends, if the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, under the leadership of its tried and true, duly elected officers, is good enough for our great President, it's good enough for you."

Faint, scattered applause. No life in the audience.

Then the speaker embarked upon a long-winded attack on the company unions. Furiously and voluminously, he denounced the "steel barons," the "autocratic Steel and Iron Institute," for not recognizing the virtuous A. A. and for coercing the workers to join company unions. He described all the evils, from the workers' point of view, of company unionism. And at nearly every other sentence the huge audience, now suddenly alive, vehemently applauded. Many of those who clapped probably realized that the speaker was a wind-bag, but passionately agreed with what he said about company unions.

The next speaker was Louis (Shorty) Leonard, secretary-treasurer of the A. A.; a former Socialist Party spellbinder gone "pure-and-simple" conservative; a wind-bag that at once nauseates and amuses one. He "explained" what had hapened at the "strike" convention, eulogized William Green, that great, that sterling leader of American labor: blah, blah . . . praised Franklin Roosevelt, the greatest President since Lincoln: blah, blah . . . To all this there was little or no applause. The workers and their women just stood and listened apathetically.

"Shorty" then tore into the subject of company unions and, using very much the same words as the previous speaker, denounced the "autocratic, un-American steel barons," the "ruthless, undemocratic, steel interests," who refused to grant the request of organized labor in their industry for recognition of the union and collective bargaining; who defied the President and Congress of the United States, and, by various methods, forced—"forced, my friends"—their employees to join company unions, thus viciously, purposefully, retarding the normal growth of "legitimate" labor organizations. He kept this up for fifteen minutes or longer: blah, blah . . . repeating himself three or four times; and on the average of once a minute, if not oftener, he was interrupted by loud, spontaneous applause. It was evident that the workers really felt strongly about company unions, and that this feeling, which in the ensuing few days, while going around in the steel regions, I encountered elsewhere, was the result of bitter personal experiences or long, consistent anti-company union propaganda, or both; probably both.

Two days later, "Shorty" Leonard made essentially the same speech at the Hungry Club luncheon in Pittsburgh, attended largely by liberals and radicals of that city; and I was told that he and other A. F. of L. labor skates in the Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio steel regions had been talking to that effect every chance they had had for months—blaming company unions for the A. F. of L. organization's failure to organize labor in a big way, while simultaneously, as I have shown last week, subtly retarding, frustrating unorganized labor in its NRA-inspired urge toward organization.

In brief, the A. F. of L. union skates are utilizing, exploiting the workers' hate for company unions, stirring and intensifying it, focusing their thoughts and feelings on the company-union evil, exaggerating the power of company unionism, in order to keep them blind to the faults and shortcomings of the A. F. of L. organizations. This hate focused on the company unions makes the A. F. of L. group safe and free from criticism on the part of the workers, except the more intelligent ones, of course, who cannot be blinded so easily. Are the A. F. of L. unions weak and ineffective? Yes. But why? Because they have to contend with that awful enemy of organized labor, that great evil, the company unions. Hence, if the A. F. of L. unions are not what they should be, it is not their fault, but the company unions', the bosses', the Steel and Iron. Institute's. Also, by talking so furiously against company unions the A. F. of L. leaders make themselves appear friends of labor. Labor, ill-informed and bewildered, fearing and hating company unions, does not repudiate them. It allows itself to be "led" by them. This talking so furiously against company unions keeps labor from looking around for other leaders, from becoming a raw mass for a new movement, probably a radical, revolutionary movement, which, by and by, would displace "pure and simple" A. F. of L.

The Steel and Iron Institute lately released some figures pertaining to company unions. It claimed that over 90 per cent of steel, iron, and tin workers were in company unions or in favor of such organizations. As a matter of fact, the overwhelming majority, probably over 90 per cent, of workers in the steel regions that I visited in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia, are fiercely anti-company union. There are company unions in nearly every town, but few workers who have succeeded in overcoming their fear of not belonging to them have joined them.

Until very recently the company unions were comparatively unimportant in the workers' consideration. Then the A. F. of L. spellbinders, fellows like "Shorty" Leonard, commenced to harp on them and thus built them up in the workers' minds to an extent that thousands of men joined them because they were afraid that if they did not they would—according to the A. F. of L. union leaders, whom they heard talk—lose their jobs or suffer some other calamity. Thus A. F. of L. fakers acted as organizers of company unions!

Consciously? Deliberately? Intentionally? Yes, in all probability, consciously, deliberately, intentionally. As I suggested in my first article, it certainly is not to the advantage of the old A. F. of L. oligarchy to have their unions become big organizations. How can they keep out the thousands of workers who want to come in? By impressing them with the importance and formidableness of company unionism, by scaring them, and driving them, fear-stricken, into the company unions.

Am I giving the A. F. of L. fakers credit for more brains than they are likely to have? I think not. They are desperate. They are fighting for their existence. And in such a situation even a normally dull or stupid person or group is apt to develop great cunning and a high capacity for evil-doing.

Is it possible that there is, in this matter, conscious, direct cooperation between the Steel and Iron Institute's agents charged with the promotion of the company-union idea and the leaders of the A. F. of L. unions in the steel industry? I, for one, certainly think it conceivable that there is. If there is not, it all works perfectly, anyhow.

Are President Roosevelt, Miss Perkins, General Johnson, Donald Richberg, and the other geniuses in the New Deal aware of this conscious or unconscious, direct or indirect cooperation between the company-union forces and the A. F. of L. fakers? If they are not, their spies in the labor field are not as good as I think they are.

A Leningrad Letter

By HAROLD J. LASKI

Leningrad, June 20

GENERALIZATIONS about Soviet Russia are even more dangerous than those one tends to make about other countries. Its size is so vast, its complexities so intricate, that one can find in any region the material for a mass of contradictory affirmations. In a month's stay I have met Russians who have insisted to me that (a) there is no democracy here and (b) that there is no finer democracy in the world; (c) that there is no such thing as justice in Soviet Russia and (d) that the legal system in Soviet Russia is its supreme achievement. I give only indications of the labyrinth through which one has to thread one's way.

I visited Russia as a professional student of politics, concerned to observe its institutions in operation. Here I propose to set down some of the conclusions at which I have arrived. They are based on innumerable conversations with men and women varying from the unskilled factory worker to the People's Commissar. They suffer, of course, from the fact that many of them have come to me (though by no means all) through the distorted medium of translation, though I add that the linguistic ability of the translator with whom I was provided was, to judge by her capacity to make eager argument intelligible to both sides, quite admirable. I found no disposition to conceal the meaning or extent of ugliness which no visitor could fail to notice; and I rarely discovered anything which could be called deliberate evasion.

Judged by the ordinary standards of Great Britain or the United States the standard of living is low. The people on the streets are shabby, and the furniture in most of the houses I saw was poor. Overcrowding in Moscow and Leningrad is great, and a large part of the people there still live in slum conditions. Outside the Torgsin shops, the supply of consumers' goods is still pitifully small; and the proportion of the population which has access to Torgsin is, of course, fractional. I doubt whether an unemployed English worker on the dole has a standard of life as low as the lower-paid categories of Russian workmen in full employment.

On the other hand, I was assured not only by Russians themselves, but by newspapermen who had lived in Russia for many years, that conditions are definitely better than at any time since 1917. No one can doubt the intensity of the effort towards improvement. The new housing; the social-insurance system; the educational opportunities for the masses; the very real power of the trade unions to protect the interests of the workers; all of these are admirably conceived, pretty efficiently administered, and satisfactory evidence of the vital fact that the material and spiritual welfare of the masses is the primary and permeating objective of Soviet planning.

The result is one fact which it is not, I think, open to any serious observer to deny. Russia is a land of hope. The masses have no doubt that the sacrifices of today will be justified by the achievements of tomorrow. The mental climate is one of intense exhilaration, of a buoyant and optimistic faith I have never before encountered. The belief in the "manifest destiny" of Russia, the conviction that it is succeeding in its experiment, is obviously both widespread and profound. That this makes the adventure worthwhile at least for all who have come to maturity since the revolution is, so far as my necessarily limited observation goes, quite unquestionable.

The revolution has brought to the common man opportunities he has never before possessed in history. This is particularly true, of course, in the industrial field; but it is not confined to that area. Ability is certain to find its opportunity of expression, granted only, of course, that it is not hostile therein to the purposes of the dictatorship. Factory managers, engineers, administrators, judges, soldiers, are only instances of men with whom I talked (by no means all of them members of the Communist Party) who were, before the revolution, simple working men with no prospect save that of remaining so until the end of their lives. The revolution has discovered a reservoir of unknown talent (as does every revolution) in the working-class which is immensely impressive; and it differs from all previous revolutions in that, even after seventeen years, it is still able to harness the ability it discovers to the service of its objective. In some ways, I regard this as the most impressive aspect of Soviet Russia.

The fact of dictatorship is real and omnipresent. It is ruthless and relentless in suppressing all opinion the purpose of which it conceives to be hostile to its fundamental objectives. On the other hand, it must be admitted that there is a reality, though of a special kind, in Soviet democracy, which is undeniable. Factory democracy is real; the worker is consulted, both individually and through his trade union, at every phase of his work. He is not only consulted; he can be certain that his criticism, especially in matters of technique, will reach and influence the effective sources of power. In the political field, the number of workers who, in the local soviets, play an effective part in administration, is greater than in any other country. They do not control fundamental policy; that is the exclusive appanage of the Communist Party. But their views count with the party and influence it greatly in shaping its policy. The soviets are really less governing organs than organs of consultation and administration; but in those realms they unquestionably are a real factor in the making of the party line. The men who control the party realize that they cannot govern successfully save as they keep non-Communist opinion largely in step with their direction. Outside the political field, there is a real and impressive democracy in the administration of justice. The People's Courts are a discovery of quite seminal importance in the history of legal procedure. In small cases they realize in a striking degree the ideal of justice without law. They prove, to me at least, that legal administration in capitalist countries suffers greatly from the excessive domination of professional technique. And in this realm the work of the courts has the exceptional value of training some half-million men and women in the business of government. On this side, also, the Russian experiment represents something new.

Of justice in the political field I cannot speak with any confidence. Discussion with some of the highest officials concerned convinced me that its underlying principle is that of raison d'état, and it is obvious that the dangers of prejudice and error arising from the application of this principle are immense. Certain laws in this realm also seem to me as incapable of objective justification as statutes like the Incitement of Disaffection Act in England, or the various criminal-syndicalist laws in the United States. I am confident that if I lived in Russia I should court difficulty from my sense of the need to found a Council of Civil Liberties.

Of the administration of justice certain other things are striking. It is generally simple, efficient, and straightforward. Real pains are taken not merely to educate the judges after appointment, but to organize effective criticism of their work. In Moscow, for instance, judges of the higher tribunals make a monthly report on their work. They seek, in conjunction with their colleagues, with the Ministry of Justice, and with the various academic institutes of law, to make the effective incidence of their work at least as much preventive as purely judicial. Once the thesis is accepted (and it is widely accepted) that the economic environment is the main factor in crime, the degree to which the judge who is, in Coke's phrase, "given over to criticism," may feel the kind of sense of social responsibility implicit, to take the best example, in the work of Mr. Justice Brandeis, is remarkable. This is an aspect of judicial work in Russia which clamors for careful inquiry by a competent investigator from Harvard or Yale. We have much to learn from its operation.

The Comrades' Courts, which exist in the big houses, factories, workshops, farms, are also valuable and educative institutions. They have no penal authority. But they do excellent work in ameliorating those normal relations of social intercourse which too often, elsewhere, bring in the law where it has no real place. Essentially they are an institution for improving human relationships by reasoned, popular discussion. The population concerned elects its tribunal of three, but anyone may attend and participate in the examination of the difficulty. It may be a worker who is slacking, a house-tenant who continually quarrels, or what not; whatever the incident involved, the admirable common sense with which these courts conduct their work shows how much more we could do than we have done to organize the ordinary social impulses for creative purposes.

So much has been written on prison administration in Russia that I need not comment upon it more than to say that it amply deserves all the eulogies that have been heaped upon it. Experiments like that of Bolshevo are literally triumphs of the power to reclaim human nature from the results of evil surroundings; and the ordinary prisons prove that a socialist environment has a capacity for regeneration of which it is impossible to overestimate the significance.

I add, of course, that I have seen nothing of the treatment of political prisoners or of a liquidated class like the kulaks. Definite instances given to me, and certain general accounts, suggested that this is a very ugly aspect of the picture in which Soviet Russia has little to learn from either Hitlerite Germany or the Balkan dictatorships.

The most fascinating institution in Soviet Russia is the Communist Party. Seven years ago, when I wrote a book on communism, I compared its position in Russia to that of the Society of Jesus in the Roman Catholic Church. After innumerable discussions with its Russian members, I think the analogy is justified. As a party, it has many and outstanding virtues. Courage, loyalty, the will to self-sacrifice, endless devotion, immense energy, these it has in abundance. It is relentless, dogmatic, intolerant, too incapable of skepticism, permeated with an emotional attachment to its principles which makes it dangerously over-confident in its prognostications, especially in the international field. Its discipline is so rigid that, despite its technique of self-criticism, I suspect it of failing to utilize the full ability at its disposal by its emphasis on intellectual obedience as a primary virtue. It is too full of suspicion of its opponents' motives; and it counts its end so vital that it becomes a little easily convinced that it can afford to be indifferent to the means (and the cost) by which that end is attained. It is much more dominated by its leaders than is good for any party; I was often presented with a text from Stalin, not as a thesis to be discussed, but as an argument that ended the matter. It is too much devoted to the search for deviations from the party "line"; and since the party "line" is amazingly in the hands of the central party executive this tends to give its decisions a mechanical character which is good neither for the leaders nor for the rank and file. Nevertheless, the party is extraordinarily impressive. I wish my own party could command the same fervent and selfless devotion from its members.

The Russian intellectuals apart, it is curious to note how little interest in foreign countries exists, and how profound is the ignorance of their habits and traditions. Again and again, after questioning some high official for several hours, I would suggest that he would perhaps like to ask me some questions in his turn. Only once did he do so. And when an economist of some distinction could take the view that the purpose of the 1934 Unemployment Act in Great Britain was to put the unemployed into concentration camps—she even suggested that the true analogy of the clauses of the statute was with the Hitlerite camps in Germany—I felt that it was difficult to bridge the gap between us. A high legal official sought to persuade me that the independence of the English judiciary was simply a trick intended to deceive the workers into a failure to realize the class character of the courts; when I sought to explain its historical causes, he obviously regarded my view as baseless. A distinguished academician urged on me the necessity of arming the British working-class for the coming struggle. I tried to make him see the difficulties in the way of buying and storing machine guns and other munitions of war in an efficiently administered state. His answer was that a party which really willed socialism would find a way. Shrewd as were many of the observations on points of detail, I was unable to avoid the impression that the communist approach makes even men of first-rate ability lose most of their perspective in judging the situation abroad.

It was the background of this atmosphere which makes me convinced that Russian communism is as genuine a religion as any in the experience of man. Lenin and Stalin are the objects of a worship the emotional intensity of which can only be understood by a student of religious history. The democratic centralism of the Communist Party is like nothing so much as the ability of the Roman Catholic to think freely up to the point where the church pronounces its considered judgment; and a failure to accept that judgment is followed by as real an excommunication as ever Rome imposed. Not only that; the contrition humbly expressed by men like Zinoviev, Radek, Kamenev for their "deviations" is curiously akin to the penance which Rome exacts from the sinner who returns to the fold. I have used the analogy of the Society of Jesus. Perhaps even more just, from another angle, is that of Cromwell's Ironsides, with the emphasis that it was the depth of their religious conviction which made of them such splendid soldiers. So also with the Communist Party. It is the absence of any desire to reexamine first principles that gives it the immense driving power it possesses. Men who can await the future with complete certainty as to its character can go forward with a confidence denied to men who see only as through a glass darkly.

[This is the first of two articles by Harold Laski, who has just returned to England from Soviet Russia. The second will appear in an early issue.]

What Is Belief?

By I. A. RICHARDS

My difficulty with beliefs is the simple-seeming one that I do not know what they are. But it is possible to play so many conjuring tricks with the word "know" that I had better explain, if I can, just in what sense I do not know what a belief is before discussing the consequences of this particular kind of ignorance or skepticism. Incidentally, the sorting and caging operations needed to keep the word "know" from betraying us in this discussion are so much the same as those needed for "believe" that they will help us later. Moreover, these possibilities of analyzing and separating different senses of such key-words as "know," "believe," "truth," "love," and "self" supply, for me, both the grounds of a very wide skepticism and the hope of turning the skepticism into a constructive movement. Skepticism is so often associated with despair that it is worth while to insist at the beginning of a skeptical article upon its hopeful possibilities.

I invite the reader to consider the remark, "I do not know what a belief is," in a spirit of neutral curiosity. I invite him to set aside the combative tradition in which such remarks are usually discussed, and to look before he leaps to any conclusion as to what it must mean—to look rather lingeringly for what it may mean, and to consider the very important differences between these possible meanings. I want to suggest at the same time that there is hardly any remark of general interest which we can make that does not need to be examined in this way before we can use it—except for crude polemical purposes.

First, there is the sense in which to know what a belief is would be to know its ultimate nature. In this sense, evidently, we do not, any of us, know what anything is. So this is not the kind of ignorance which is troublesome with beliefs. In fact, this seems a singularly supportable kind of ignorance that troubles none but metaphysicians.

Next is the sense in which not to know what a belief is, is simply to lack some piece of available information. This kind of ignorance, again, is not, I think, the kind which is troublesome here. For this kind of ignorance is easily removed. If a Tibetan, for example, does not know what an oyster is, we can send for one and explain it to him and for all necessary purposes he will then know what an oyster is.

Close to this, is a sense which may concern us here. A man may not know what a belief is through the lack of a necessary kind of experience. The blind man who does not know what a color is has often been cited in this connection. But with the blind man we can easily decide that he is blind without using his ignorance of colors as evidence of his blindness, and moreover we know so much about vision and about colors that we can understand his ignorance and explain it once we know he is blind. (And the same applies to color-blindness.) So the parallel is weak. No one can suggest why it is that certain people, belonging to a cultural tradition which has had much to do with beliefs, people in all other respects normal, as far as we can tell, and enjoying the full range of normal experience, should show this ignorance. No one can explain why they should lack the necessary experience, or, here is the main point, just what experience it is which is necessary and lacking. It remains, however, possible that, if we knew much more psychology than we do, we might be able to give some explanation of this kind and so straighten out the parallel with blindness. Later on I shall sketch some conjectures of this sort. So for the moment we may leave this case of the man who does not know what a belief is because he has never had any.

More to our purpose is the man who does not know what a belief is because he does not know which, among the mental states which he does enjoy, are beliefs and which are not. This may be thought to be the same case as number two above. The man needs a little teaching, we may say. He should consult a dictionary or get a better-informed friend to instruct him. But if he replies that he has done this conscientiously and that the information which has been given him is insufficient to enable him to decide what a belief is, we shall, with our next step in trying to understand his trouble, come nearer to our main problem.

There seem two plausible interpretations (not incompatible) of this skeptical state. He may be in the same case as a man who does not know what an afanc is. Consulting the dictionary he discovers that an afanc is a fabulous Welsh beast—and, of course, he does thereby get to know, in a sense, what it is. But he is entitled to say that, for his purposes, he still does not know what it is. The description "a fabulous Welsh beast" is too indefinite for him to be able to decide whether, for example, he has ever seen an afanc, or whether there are or have ever been any afancs. The authorities, he notes, are divided as to whether an afanc was a beaver, a crocodile, or a dragon. In brief, the dictionary definition is adequate for the purposes of Welsh folklore, but not for zoology. Similarly, the man who does not know what a belief is may say that such definitions as he can obtain may be adequate for logic or theology but not adequate for psychology or for his personal problem of deciding whether he himself has ever had any beliefs or not.

This brings us to the second interpretation of his difficulty. The definitions available may work fairly well as parts of the systems of abstract psychology to which they belong. But they may still be held to be inapplicable to our actual mental states—insufficient to allow us to identify one of our own or our neighbor's mental states as a belief, and reject another. Add to this the large number of psychological theories that are current—all using the word belief but in quite different ways—the queer mixtures of these theories that most people have compounded, and the extreme vagueness that is prevalent in these matters. We shall then have the outline of the excuse a man may offer who says that he does not know what a belief is, and that, when other people say they believe something, he does not know sufficiently what they are doing to be able to agree with them or dissent.

But, someone will say, it is easy to point to beliefs that all men share, and whatever the exact account of them may be, all men can easily identify these beliefs in themselves and so unambiguously settle what a belief is. I agree that there are an infinitude of certainties that all men share—all the certainties that belong to that routine of expectation on which our life depends. But I should argue that these certainties differ in a number of all-important respects from any beliefs that are ever subjects of interesting discussion. These certainties of expectation, for one thing, are being ceaselessly verified in our lives, verified in an exact sense which leaves no room for discussion about it. By an artificial extension of the technique of prediction and verification we get science, which, so long as it remains science, also gives no scope for dispute. Where it turns into speculation—not yet ripe for verification—there is, of course, plenty of room for discussion, just the same kinds of discussion with the same kind of ambiguities that play about the other beliefs that I am contrasting here with certainties. But these certainties, which we can identify in ourselves, are not discussable (as opposed to conjectures about them) just because they are so certain, so universal, and so unambiguous. For example, my certainty that if I dive off the summit of the Matterhorn I shall soon be in pieces. If this is called a "belief" it is, along with all similar "beliefs," quite uninteresting. I could make a list of such "beliefs" that would run to a million words and nobody would find a word to say against one of them. The only "beliefs" that would provoke discussion (let us give them a capital B to mark them off) are Beliefs that a majority of the world's inhabitants would, if they could understand them, dissent from. The only exceptions to this last might be, perhaps, a number of Beliefs of a character too vague to be susceptible of examination.

This odd state of affairs (odd when we consider the confidence with which Beliefs are discussed) is partly due to the provincialism of human traditions hitherto. As comparative studies extend (they are only embryonic at present) we shall recognize that Beliefs are products of tradition and circumstances to a degree which we cannot as yet reconcile ourselves to admitting. We may also become more ready to inquire persistently into the question, "What is Belief?" As we know, the best minds (in these matters) have given the best part of their best energies to the questions, "What should we Believe?" and "Why (on what grounds) should we Believe?" I cannot find that any comparable attention has been given to the question, "What is Belief?" ("What are we doing when we Believe?") It is at least arguable that this is logically the prior question; that it must be answered to some degree before the other questions can be profitably taken up.

Any definite answer to it will seem a long way off to a critical psychologist, but a surmise as to the general form of the answer may be worth venturing. The basis for such a surmise lies in analogies with questions about other items in popular or traditional psychology; Love, for example, or Knowledge. Each of these much-argued items can be admitted (more easily than Belief) to be an omnium gatherum including many very different kinds of things. If we consider the way in which we learn to use these words and to think with their aid about what we mean by them we shall see no reason why this should not be so, and fairly good reasons for thinking that it is so. And the same reasons hold for Belief. The psychologist, in fact, when he is sticking to his business, has no use for the term Belief except as marking a collection of materials for analysis. The analysis cannot yet be carried very far, only far enough to suggest that under this heading, Belief, both in popular and in sophisticated use, are to be found an extremely heterogeneous set of mental states, processes, and conditions. So diverse indeed that it may well be doubted if there is one among them which deserves the name—one, that is, which its possessor may name Belief with a decent likelihood that other people will really more than vaguely understand him.

Such an extreme surmisal may be unduly skeptical; but the arguments for the view that Believing covers a variety of very unlike mental events can be made, I think, as sound as any argument in psychology. Sound enough to put the burden of proof—that there is some one definite, recognizable mental act, specific in its nature and frequent in occurrence, which is to be called Believing—on to anyone who maintains it. A general consensus of opinion that there is such an act will clearly not do as a proof, for, as we have seen, the question is, "What are we being unanimous about?"

So much for my initial simple-seeming difficulty that prevents me from having any confidence that I know what a Belief is. It also prevents me from any steps which might encourage any Beliefs I might happen to have—that is to say, any attitudes and so forth that I treat (or that treat me) otherwise than as the hopes, fears, desires, devotions, renunciations, aspirations—that I do not call Beliefs. In what follows I shall mean by Beliefs just such feelings, attitudes, settings of the will, concentrations of attention, and so on, but given a kind of secondary sanction by being called Beliefs, being confused through the prime ambiguity of this word with truth-assertions, and being thus afforded marked privileges in the parliament of their fellow-sentiments. And, when I say that I am, so far as I know, without Beliefs, I do not mean that I am devoid of these sentiments, but that in me they are without this special secondary sanction. I fancy that this situation I find myself in is shared by a good number of my generation—those, at least, upon whom a speculative interest in psychology has taken effect. Even some who are nominally Believers in creeds are not, I imagine, in a very dissimilar position. The difference would be that whereas they are wishing to Believe, I am not. This difference may be worth exploring.

It has often been alleged that without some Beliefs life would be intolerable or worthless—that Beliefs of one kind or another are an unescapable need of human nature.

> If the Sun and Moon should Doubt
> They'd immediately go out!

I would reply that certainties (of the kind instanced above) are, of course, necessary. But these certainties are of the same kind in mice and men, only more numerous and elaborate for man as his life becomes more artificial in its conditions. But the necessity of Beliefs either for mouse or man is another matter. I should be inclined to admit that for some types of mind (which are the result of a special training and tradition) life may be more difficult, and especially more difficult to live finely, without Beliefs. But against the view that this need goes deeper than can be explained by an acquired mental habit I would point to the Chinese, among whom what are recognized as their finest types of humanity have for centuries avoided Beliefs more studiously than their fellows. "Ah! But they were avoiding bad Beliefs!" someone will say. I agree, but I want for the moment only to damage the opinion that Beliefs of some kind no matter what are a necessity for the mind.

"What an inexplicable frame of mind is belief!" said Darwin. It is perhaps rather less inexplicable now than in his day: sixty years of psychology have done a little toward clearing up the tangle. For it is in the image of a tangle—the threads of our different interests, needs, sentiments, rubbing against, hitching upon, twining round one another—that we can most easily picture the problem. We will assume, here, that metaphors are not psychology. But in terms of this metaphor, a Belief may be imagined as a point where a thread of interest (an imagining, a feeling, a desiring) has caught improperly upon other threads, so that in the incessant running of the threads it is given checks and pulls which do not properly belong to it, and would not occur to it if the mind's economy were in perfect order. For example: a feeling, let us say, that a story creates in us would be altered in various ways if the story were actually true. But our proper interest in whether the story is true or not may and usually does belong to quite another system from the interests that give the story its feeling. If these interests catch in one another, we can be easily convinced that the story gets its value from its truth, or conversely that it must be true because we feel as we do about it. Add to this our amazing virtuosity in conjuring with the various senses of truth, and we have the typical conditions for a set of Beliefs about the story.

This is an over-simplified example, of course. The "catching" of independent interests in one another evidently cannot be demonstrated. It is merely a plausible sort of hypothesis to account for observations we all constantly make about each other's Beliefs. But the main point I want to make with its aid is that the value of the story may be and often is quite free from any implications with its truth standing. It may get a little adventitious force from being taken as true, but this extra force may very well not be an improvement in its value; in any case taking it for true exposes it to risks. As Matthew Arnold said, "we have attached our emotion to the fact and now the fact is failing it." If the fact fails it the emotion is, quite unfairly of course, apt to be damaged.

To take a different kind of example. A man setting forth a plan—say the Five-Year Plan—is very likely to get his admiration for the plan implicated in his opinion as to whether it will be realized in fact. He comes to Believe in the Plan. I should argue, and those who do not Believe in the Plan will probably agree with me, that success is more likely if his inspiration from the plan and his judgment of practical possibilities do not get intertwined, and he does not Believe that it must come true.

These instances are too easily seen through by the non-Believer. They have to be to serve my purposes here. In cases of more interesting beliefs the intricacies of the tangle are likely to be beyond all tracing. I want only to suggest that the same kind of "catching" or snarling of lines of interest which would work just as well or better in freedom from one another may be suspected in all Beliefs. And the more adequately we can imagine the natural complexities of the mind and therefore the opportunities for snarling, the stronger our suspicion will grow. Psychoanalysis has helped us immensely here.

I suggest, then, that there may be reasonable ground for not wishing to Believe anything. Those who say, "I am convinced," and think this should recommend their views may be a little naïve. And in making this suggestion I am not overlooking the immense value of Beliefs to certain types of minds. The ages of faith may have supplied invaluable ingredients to human nature. I think it very likely that we should be today infinitely the poorer without them. I wish only to discourage the assumption that the type of mind which needs Belief is necessarily the finer. Often it seems to be, and if this were usually so, at present, there would be nothing to surprise us. For our tradition encourages such minds and serves them with all its treasures.

But I began by remarking upon the hopeful possibilities of skepticism. The kind of questioning which, for me, dissolves the traditional landmark, Belief, into a cluster of undeveloped problems can be applied to almost all our mental landmarks. Truth, Knowledge, Beauty, the Will, the Good, the Self—with all their satellite terms—fade out. Under a persistent analysis they appear as merely fictions—devised to suit changing needs and owing their seeming solidity to their systematic interlocking ambiguity. A moment comes when any persistent inquirer will be forced to echo Trumbull Stickney:

> Sir, say no more;
> Within me 'tis as if
> The green and climbing eyesight of a cat
> Crawls near my mind's poor birds.

But, looking back, the picture that human history presents is not one which needs no mending. Our mind's poor birds have not served us so well that we must fear to disturb them. And in any case they are being disturbed whether we like it or not. The hope of skepticism is that it may uncover behind these fictions more of the actual forces by which we live. Then, with a more conscious control, we may better order our lives.

In the Driftway

ETIQUETTE is a strong seed, sown in the minds of young children of all classes, nourished by both habit and expedience, and flowering in conduct which to the neutral observer frequently seems irrational. It is possible, of course, that this codified irrationality of etiquette is a necessary defense, a blindness erected against the otherwise intolerable irrationality of our modern way of living which we call civilized. There is an etiquette of war, an etiquette of peace, an etiquette of the bread-line, an etiquette of commerce. For example, the Drifter is periodically afflicted by the etiquette-bound irrationality of his haberdasher. The affliction is mutual. Confident in his superior knowledge of what is the right thing, the haberdasher prescribes with haughty authority the hat, or shirt, or tie the Drifter is supposed to wear that season. The Drifter demurs mildly, because he has the heretical notion that last season's hat was more becoming, and feels, moreover, that since he is paying for the hat, he should be permitted to indulge his silly preferences. The haberdasher is shocked, no less. He freezes. He intimates that the Drifter's money is counterfeit; that he is outside the pale not merely of commerce, but of our common humanity, and that the sooner this unfortunate episode is ended the better. On at least one occasion of this sort, the Drifter became violent. He exploded, liked the Terrible Mr. Bang, and marched out of the shop in search of another haberdasher; only to return an hour later and accept meekly what the haberdasher ordered. The haberdasher was right, of course. What would happen to business, to society, to the very foundations of our civilization if anarchic creatures like the Drifter were permitted to have what they wanted?

* * * * *

DOUBTLESS by way of compensation for such humiliations, the Drifter cherishes those rare eccentricities of behavior that he has encountered and occasionally tried to emulate. There was the West Indian elevator boy in a down-town skyscraper who by some miracle of art imposed a kind of African rhythm upon the vertical traffic which he supervised. The hum of the motor, the bang of the door, the start, the stop were all woven into this rhythm. "Going up, going up, going up," he chanted. "Come on, folks, anybody got a song?" Then there was the friend who interrupted a stroll along the old Barbary Coast of San Francisco by droppining on hands and knees, crawling beneath the swinging door of a honky-tonk, and barking. This done, he calmly resumed his stroll, remarking merely, "They seemed very much surprised." With modest pride, the Drifter concludes by recording a minor exploit of his own. When Roxy's Theater in New York opened some years ago the Drifter, with many thousands of his fellows, hastened to marvel at this magnificence, surpassing the grandeur that was Rome. Attended by a super-selected usher he moved from wonder to wonder, with appropriate exclamations of awe. Then, pausing beside a huge Corinthian column, he remarked, "Usher, this pillar is hollow." "Yes, sir, very good, sir," replied that brilliant apprentice showman. "We'll have it filled for you tomorrow."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Reopening the Controversy

To the Editors of The Nation:

Messrs. Houston and Ransom seem to me in error at certain points in their reply to our article in the July 4 Nation. The facts as stated were agreed to by Mr. Houston in our conference. As we did not have the same opportunity to reach an agreement on the facts in Mr. Houston's reply, I am asking that you change your ruling about closing the controversy and allow me to state them as they seem to us.

It is true that Helen Boardman did not make a complete investigation in Virginia, but this does not tell the whole story. She was recalled before she had finished by a telegram from Walter White and never given a chance to return. She did not talk with any of the Virginia Negroes who are alleged to have seen Crawford there. She did arrange to have these people seen, however, by a colored woman from Washington; the latter for some reason never did this and the N. A. A. C. P. allowed the matter to rest there, until October.

The statement that the Boston alibi placed Crawford in Boston continuously from September to January 13 is too sweeping. Crawford himself in the alleged confession to Gallaher claimed to have gone to Philadelphia twice on a truck. There was also a break in time which was not completely covered by the testimony of alibi witnesses. Deacon Bailey, for instance, who positively placed Crawford in Boston early in January said there had been a period in the last part of December when he had not seen him at all. This might mean that Crawford did go to Virginia and return before the murder and that both the alibi witnesses and those who claimed to see him in Virginia in December were telling the truth even if Crawford was not.

Messrs. Houston and Ransom say, "It has been suggested that these witnesses were under duress" and also "that they certainly did not appear to be under duress." What about Bertie de Neal? She had to our knowledge been arrested and held as a material witness for varying periods not less than three times. Does anyone suppose that she would have given information likely to send her lover to the chair of her own free will? Mr. Houston, moreover, admitted at one of our conferences that she was in fact in custody when he interviewed her, but he assured us that this did not really constitute duress. He had not seen her in jail but in the sheriff's kitchen where she was acting as the sheriff's cook.

On this point of duress they speak also of a colored boy who talked with counsel and who had previously "refused to divulge information to the prosecution." But I cannot understand why, if the idea was, as they state, to find out what the prosecution's case was, they spent time on a witness who had "refused to divulge this information to the prosecution." This witness, Lester Hill, did later give testimony against Crawford at the trial. Also, apart from actual duress in individual cases, the general atmosphere and the terrorization of the colored people must be considered. As Messrs. Houston and Ransom state, they were still "so apprehensive" even at the time of the trial that counsel could not find lodging in Leesburg and had to commute from Washington throughout the trial. Is it likely that people in such a jittery state would go out of their way to withhold evidence against Crawford or to give evidence they might have that was favorable to him?

Messrs. Houston and Ransom labor under a misunderstanding about the real basis of our criticism. It was not that counsel left the investigation of the alibi to the last, but that they never made any real investigation—at least not with any thoroughness—and then stated in print that the alibi witnesses had been seen and could not substantiate the stories they had told at the extradition hearing. Our criticism on this point is not merely a formal one. We felt that the defense actually did not know anything about the alibi and were in no position to speak about it. They speak of nineteen witnesses who placed Crawford in Virginia, but five of these witnesses had criminal records. The quality of the witnesses in Boston was decidedly higher than this. Perhaps if a thorough investigation had been made the alibi testimony would also have stood up quantitatively, as well, against the Virginia testimony.

Messrs. Ransom and Houston say that Crawford did not want to appeal. On all the evidence I have seen this seems to me doubtful. At least it seems to me doubtful without duress or inducement or some misunderstanding of the consequences. It is a matter of record that Mr. Houston wrote to the prosecutor on December 17, immediately after the first verdict, stating that he and the N. A. A. C. P. were anxious to wind up the matter and offering to plead Crawford guilty to the Buckner indictment in return for a second life sentence. On the following January 5, Crawford wrote from jail to one of the Boston witnesses that he was "an innocent man and Mr. Houston, one of my lawyers, say he is going to get me out in two years." He also early in February gave the interview which he later repudiated saying he was not satisfied with his trial. Messrs. Ransom and Houston say that "as Crawford's counsel they took their orders from Crawford." It does not seem to me that the language used by Mr. Houston at the time of the Buckner indictment was that of a man "taking orders from Crawford."

Helen Boardman is in the West and unable at the moment to voice her criticisms, but I believe that this statement also substantially represents what she would feel about the reply to our article.

Northampton, Mass., July 1 Martha Gruening

Contributors to This Issue

Miriam Allen De Ford is a California newspaperwoman.

Florence Higgins is on the editorial staff of the Milwaukee Journal.

Louis Adamic is the author of "The Native's Return."

Harold Laski, professor of political science at London University, has recently delivered a series of lectures on problems of representative government at the Institute of Politics at Leningrad.

I. A. Richards, Fellow of Magdalene College, Cambridge, is the author of many important works on philosophy and literary criticism.

Mark Van Doren is well known as critic, editor, and poet.

Louis M. Hacker, whose "Short History of the New Deal" will soon be published, is at present teaching in the summer session of Columbia University.

Benjamin Rowland, Jr., is a member of the Oriental department of the Fogg Museum in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Edna Kenton is the author of "The Book of Earths."

Lincoln Reis is engaged in research in medieval logic.

Sylvia Kopald Selekman is the author of "Rebellion in Labor Unions," and coauthor of "British Industry Today: A Study of English Trends in Industrial Relations."

Broadus Mitchell is associate professor of political economy at Johns Hopkins University.

Beryl Harold Levy is the author of "Reform Judaism in America."

Books

Sonnets

By MARK VAN DOREN

I

Should this end now it were the end of light,
That would no longer reach an earth receded;
And the grey death of odor; and a blight
On taste and touch, with every sound unheeded.
I could no longer count the falling days,
Nor weigh an ounce of sorrow out to pain;
It were the end of knowledge when the ways
Of feeling are as reason to the brain.
Should it end suddenly—but I am wrong.
Nothing so invisible can shatter.
Our love is not an object, like the long
Cold hand of time, that is the purest matter.
But that is something different, and slow,
And closes gradually, as the senses go.

II

Let it be always secret what we say;
And where we meet, be that our world alone.
Nor think us ever guilty, since our day
Is one on which no shadow-bands have shown.
Shame is a shadow that will never fall
On us who have cut down the trees of pride.
Let the world darken past the garden wall;
The space within is conscienceless and wide.
Nor think us ever weary, or in need
Of company to bring the night at last.
Love is a lonely and contented deed,
Done in a desert that is sweet and vast;
Where neither of us turns a happy head
To see the world behind us that is dead.

III

As the blue fringes of this flower desire
Comparison; yet even this old glass,
Wherein some workman hid the sky afire,
Is not the same; and so the mind must pass,
And look along the world, and never come
To the pure hue repeated—thus I range
Through the live chronicles that tell the sum
Of love's known history; and each is strange.
No love is like our love beyond the start;
Two look upon each other, then we lose them.
They whisper to each other, but apart,
In a wild shade, and we can never use them—
Likening ourselves to nothing more
Than two late comers as the long day wore.

IV

When I came back to your unlifted eyes,
And spoke to you, inquiring how we did,
And you looked up without the least surmise—
Then the old music, that so long was hid,
Sounded; and I knew it was to pour
Forever while we lived, with no abating.
The unskilled players were unskilled no more,
And every string had sweetened by its waiting.
There will be nothing now but one clear tone,
Of which we shall not tire; and when it pauses
We shall exist upon love's faith alone,
That knows all silence to its deepest causes;
And comprehends the ever devious ways
I still must follow as I sing your praise.

Revolution and Reaction

The Method of Freedom. By Walter Lippmann. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

The Coming American Revolution. By George Soule. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

UNQUESTIONABLY, more books like these two will be written, for, as Mr. Soule himself has observed, in a revolutionary climate the voice of the intellectual is increasingly heard; but it is to be doubted whether we shall see for some time a more courageous and forthright presentation of the role of revolution in modern society than Mr. Soule's book or a more subtle and disingenuous defense of reaction than Mr. Lippmann's. These two books are vastly different in another way. One has the conviction that Mr. Soule, having set his feet firmly on the true road of progress, will travel it to whatever ultimate goal it may lead; Mr. Lippmann, on the other hand, has already arrived—safely in the camp of toryism. In this present case, Mr. Lippmann, quoting from Montesquieu, Hume, Sainte-Beuve, Burke, Spengler, Machiavelli, Salter, Mill, Bayle, F. S. Oliver, Macaulay, and Aristotle, finds new reasons for convincing himself that capitalism will endure forever. It is all urbanely argued and only occasionally does the author of "The Method of Freedom" descend to low tactics, as when he refers to both fascism and communism as "absolute collectivism" and when he calls a planned economy "an economy of scarcity." Mr. Lippmann is never hysterical but who knows? Like the Edmund Burke he is so fond of citing he may yet write a twentieth-century "Reflections on the French Revolution."

Mr. Soule's book is in an entirely different category; and there can be no question of the significance of "The Coming American Revolution." It is important not only because it indicates Mr. Soule's loss of faith in planning under capitalism—it will be recalled that a brief two years ago he was the author of a book called "A Planned Society"—but because he has arrived at his present place almost completely without the assistance of dogma. The result is a book that can be read and understood by every American. If, in the course of this review, certain questions are raised, this is not done in any spirit of captiousness: the problems touched upon in "The Coming American Revolution" are so many and so perplexing that only in the freest atmosphere of debate will it be possible for all persons who agree with Mr. Soule's premises to work out an American philosophy of history as well as an American program of action. I agree with Mr. Soule fully in this: that in America the time has not yet arrived for the iron-bound discipline which a revolutionary movement, to be successful, requires. Until that time comes it is imperative that all thoughtful persons pool their wisdom and experiences so that by the correction of each other's errors and the filling in of each other's lacunae they may arrive at theoretical and practical positions which are fully applicable to the American scene.

Mr. Soule has entitled his book as he does because he is convinced that the American revolution—the elimination of capitalism and its succession by socialism—is now in process. His study of previous revolutions in modern times (this constitutes the first part of his book) has indicated to him that social upheavals have followed fairly fixed patterns: first, in a society, there take place basic changes in the methods of production—"changes often brought by new mechanical or economic techniques"; there follows a new alignment of classes and 'sharper class divisions arise"; the society is then compelled to resort to oppression to keep all classes other than the ruling one in subjection; conflict (not necessarily open) inevitably springs up, the downtrodden grow in numbers and strength, and when deterioration sets in and all normal functioning is about to cease the new class takes over power. The main purposes of the revolution, indeed, have already been gained during the long period which precedes actual class hostilities; and these break out only as counter-revolutionary forms when the once powerful former rulers resist complete submergence. This was the course of events in the English, American, French, and Russian revolutions. In the fourth and last part of his book Mr. Soule sees us now in the midst of a new revolutionary upsurge, for not only has the governing class, the capitalists, lost faith in itself and declined in prestige but the class destined to overthrow it, the proletariat, is steadily gaining in power.

This is neatly put and in the main Mr. Soule's argument is a sound one; but there are a number of weak links in the chain. Are "basic changes in the ways of conducting affairs" absolutely essential as the initial step in revolution? Undoubtedly, changes in mechanical methods of production ushered in the commercial revolution (merchant capitalism) and began the downfall of feudalism, but what would be those basic changes that would bridge the gap from capitalism to socialism? Is it not more correct to place the whole emphasis on class oppression? A society, in its progressive stages, is one of very great vigor, and opportunities for advance are many and bewildering; with age, however, institutionalization sets in, the horizons for individual aggrandizement contract, and the ruling class can maintain itself in power only on the backs of the other groups in society. The first sign of deterioration, and therefore of coming revolution, is the general awareness of class oppression. Capitalism in America will begin to totter on its throne not as a result of new basic changes in the methods of production but when the masses grow conscious of the existence of underlying class cleavages and antagonisms.

This contention of Mr. Soule's is not so important as his belief that the rising class slowly gains in strength and attains almost all its objectives before the coup d'etat. Again, in a very real sense, this was true of the bourgeoisie before it seized power in England, America, and France: for the bourgeoisie succeeded in mastering its social environment through control over the means of production (class oppression set in when the feudal state sought to hamper the bourgeoisie's activities by monopoly, restrictions in trading, excessive taxation, and the like); also, by marriage and in other ways (in England particularly) the thin line between feudal lords and merchants began to crumble away. But can it justly be said that any gains the proletariat may make—through organization for collective bargaining, social insurance, and advances in the social services—in the light of the experiences of the workers in fascist Italy, Germany, and Austria, are likely to be aught but temporary? Only a strange confidence in the reasonableness of the capitalist state could prompt Mr. Soule to declare, as he heralds the coming American revolution, that: "The upward climb of the workers has begun, though it is far from completion." Organization and struggle must precede the proletarian revolution in a diversity and intensity of ways unknown to the revolutionists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

The second part of his book Mr. Soule devotes to an exposition of the social and economic evidences of capitalism's decline; and here he hastily summarizes the operations of some seven major factors as well as a large number of minor ones. Among the more important of these are advances in technology, shifts in occupational groupings, changes in business ownership, the rigidity of debt, the decline in foreign trade, etc., etc. All this, of course, is true but the reader fails to gain an overpowering sense of the contradictions that are at the heart of the capitalist system. Mr. Soule could have proved his case without the slightest difficulty if he had grouped his arguments about the three most significant reasons for impending collapse, that is to say: The shift of control from industrial capitalism to finance capitalism (with the emphasis therefore no longer on legitimate economic expansion but on the exploitation of investors and the wrecking of properties); the growing spread between capacity to produce and capacity to consume; and the inability of imperialism any more—without deadly international warfare—to provide all the needed outlets for surplus capital.

Mr. Soule's third section is devoted to a brilliant and incisive analysis of the failure of the Hoover and Roosevelt programs to cope with the fundamental reasons of capitalist crisis. In many ways, some of the most successful writing in the book is to be found here. All in all, "The Coming American Revolution" is an excellent example of typical American polemical literature, as characteristically American as, let us say, were "Wealth Against Commonwealth" and "The Promise of American Life." But Mr. Soule has traveled far from Henry D. Lloyd and Herbert Croly; and so has the America of the nineteen-thirties from that of the eighteen-nineties and the nineteen-tens.

LOUIS M. HACKER

The Ukiyo-ye Primitives

The Ukiyo-ye Primitives. By Yone Noguchi. Privately published. American Distributors, E. Weyhe, New York. $15.

BY way of introduction, it might be well to give an explanation of the words "Ukiyo-ye" that figure in the title of Mr. Noguchi's book. The term "Ukiyo-ye," pictures of the transient world, is descriptive of the content and purpose of Japanese prints—to be a mirror of the fashions, the theater, the favorites of the stage and Yoshiwara in Yedo of the Tokugawa period. The term coined to describe this popular art was really one of contempt, implying that here was a mere reflection of a world of unrealities in contrast to the permanence of things in the world of Buddhism. It was a bit of intellectual snobbery on the part of the aristocratic classes who considered beneath their notice this expression of the cockney populace of the capital.

It would be well to look briefly at the conditions in Yedo, the Tokio of the seventeenth century, that forms the background and material of the Early Ukiyo-ye. Seldom in the world's history had there been such a sharp line of demarcation as existed between the ruling military classes and the great mass of shopkeepers, artisans, actors, and courtesans that were the population of Yedo. The Daimyos and knights treated the peasants like animals and despised the artisan class of the capital. These latter were at the bottom of the great inverted pyramid of military feudalism. The military aristocracy in this age of great extravagance when a Daimyo could line a road with gold screens, that could devote itself to the esoteric refinements of the tea ceremony, considered as vulgar the popular art of the townspeople. When the Daimyos came with their trains for the enforced six months' sojourn in the Shogun's capital, the city of Yedo flourished as never before; the artisans battened on the hundreds of retainers that made up the households of the lords. There flourished the other arts that have been immortal in every capital since Babylon, and in the gaudy life of the licensed quarter, the artists found a never-failing source of inspiration. At one time no less than fifty theaters were operating in Yedo. The populace followed the foibles and fashions of their idols of the stage with all the avidity of the modern cinema addict. This interest called into being the first of Kiyonofu's actor prints. It was in the green rooms of modern Tokio that many of the most valuable collections of prints have been found, the heirlooms of one of the great hereditary professions in Japan.

The makers of prints were not necessarily painters. Theirs was a craft as special as the sword-maker's and with a similar pride in work, a similar aristocracy of taste in workmanship. Mr. Noguchi's book, the first of a series of seven on Japanese art, treats of the period from 1650 to 1765, the age of the great craftsmen who made possible the achievements of Utamaro and Hiroshige. The term "Primitive" as used in connection with the prints applies not to any lack of sophistication in the design, but to the undeveloped technique of printing in the years before the invention of the color block. The distinction between artist and craftsman is intentionally made, for the pioneers of the print industry never dreamed that they were anything but workmen supplying an article for which there was a demand. The prints were used as bill posters, as New Year's cards, as advertisements for the new class of town traders at Yedo, as souvenirs of the capital, and, later, as illustrations to popular guide books. The prints of this period have a vitality, a sort of rustic strength that is the special factor in every archaic art—a lovely economy of fastidious taste, to a certain extent conditioned by the primitive technical resources of the craft. Although technically imperfect, the tradition of great design that had been kept alive in the Tosa and Kano schools was perpetuated by the early masters of Ukiyo-ye. The painter Iwasa Matabei and the lyric decorator of screens Sotatsu may be credited with the beginnings of the Ukiyo-ye subject matter. This is a lusty art, far removed from the esoteric refinement of the tea ceremony, and, like the art of the seventeenth-century Dutch painters of Kermesse, an exuberant reflection of contemporary life in the Bohemia of the capital. The Ukiyo-ye represent in many ways the most expressive art of all the East, not bound by any convention not self-made, and without obligations towards religious dogma.

To a certain extent it is true, as Lafcadio Hearn once observed, that for an occidental to perceive the truth or the beauty or the humor of Japanese drawing, he must know the life which these prints reflect. Even today at the Kabuki theater we are reminded of Kiyonaga's actor prints, and in the slender beauties in the little houses by the river in Kyoto, may recognize the darlings of Toyonobu's prints. The long pennants of dyed cloth trailing in the Kamo River, the gaudy, fascinating horror of the Yoshiwara, the cleanness and saneness and simplicity of the Japanese interior—these are all features of Japanese life that we may recognize in the earliest Ukiyo-ye. Their unpretentious and sincere charm together with the distinguished mastery of design is enough to raise the best of the Japanese prints beyond such delights of association and recognition to a place in art beyond race and geography. Especially in the so-called "Primitives" the eye is delighted by the draughtsmanship in thin, sweeping, wire-taut contours—with no concern for effects of light that troubled later print-makers under the influence of Western art. Neither do the prints of this early period rely on the effects of setting or on the devices that came with the perfection of the color block—their effectiveness depends on the magnificent flat patterning and on the extraordinary rhythmically posed figures, conceived—especially in the work of the Kwaigetsudo School—as moving tactile silhouettes. With all the limitations of the craft in its beginnings, the early Ukiyo-ye men were extraordinarily successful in giving a feeling for space by the skilful placing of the figures against meager settings, in giving a definite life quality to the pose, and suggesting marvelously the relations between people, both tender and sinister, in the world of the prints by the turn of the head, by an exquisite and significant gesture of the hand.

The story is an old one of how the prints were used for tea wrappers and for such utilitarian purposes as to patch torn screens and fusume, until the discernment of such connoisseurs as the de Goncourts brought them to the attention of the Western world. It was the directness and simplicity of the Ukiyo-ye design that must have appealed most strongly to such nineteenth-century French painters as Degas who saw in them new inspiration in composition and design.

Although it seems unfair to criticize a man writing in a foreign language too severely, there appears to be little excuse for so many "Japanicisms" in Mr. Noguchi's text, especially when competent revision could so easily be undertaken by one more familiar with English. Mr. Noguchi's manipulation of the language is such that it frequently obscures the meaning of whole passages. In fact the complete absence of the revision alleged in the preface almost leads one to suspect the author's use of Japanese-English as a purposely affected quaintness. His aesthetic judgments tend toward the sentimental and are for the most part so superficial as to be of practically no value. Another glaring fault is that the chapter on the beginning of prints in Asia and on the founder of Ukiyo-ye, Matabei, is presented as a "postscript" and not, as would seem logical, as an introduction.

To make the book of real value to the connoisseur we could also wish for a list of seals and actors' mon such as are furnished in Binyon and Sexton's compendium on Ukiyo-ye. Although the format of the book leads one to suspect a scholarly treatise, such is not the case; the author never more than flirts with old problems, such as that of Kiyanaga II, without offering any new solution. In spite of this defect and its shortcomings as a popular work, Mr. Noguchi's book gives us what are undoubtedly the finest reproductions in any work on Ukiyo-ye that has yet appeared in English.

BENJAMIN ROWLAND, JR.

Which Is Which?

Reality and Illusion. By Richard Rothschild. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE contempt for philosophy discovers its seat in the presumption of the sophist, not in the severity of the philosopher. It is the sophist who would persuade us to wisdom or to his doctrine by means of rhetoric rather than of reason, and who, to flatter our vanity and perhaps his own, would name his enthymemes demonstration and his prejudices insight. Among the untutored, however, the sophist gains and will always gain an audience, since sophistry, like art in the conception of Mr. Richards, consists in the satisfaction of impulse, and the forms in which this satisfaction would express itself change with the moment and the place.

Richard Rothschild in the brief inclosure of a single book, would present us with a transcendental Aesthetics or the Grasp of Reality, an Ethics, a Theory of Religion, Organics, Politics, the Problem of Society and the Meaning of History, a treatise on Mathematics or the Problems of Science, and finally, for his and our last end, the Quest of Happiness.

It would be vulgar, with reality eloquently defined as the unity of the larger self, the background and synthesis of the individual and the group, to dally with the peculiar elements of any particular discipline. To ask whether the words "background" or "science" answer to one thing or many, and if many, what the distinctions between the many are, to inquire into the various significance of unity, or to ask why vastness of quantity should be the measure of perfection and time the synthesis of synthesis—these verbal labors are suitable to the philologist; they do not merit the attention of the philosopher. From him or from Mr. Rothschild we shall learn, if we pursue the book to its close, that in every joy there is an element of pain; that the morphology of pleasure is cyclical; that to desire a thing leads merely to frustration, if only the frustration one feels when the thing is finally possessed; that in respect to happiness . . . we may conclude that the only difference between the mature individual and the immature is that the pendulum in the case of the former swings to greater extremes of exaltation and depression; and that Mr. Rothschild finds it convenient to deliver these necessary truths in a loose and barbarous mode.

LINCOLN REIS

Epic of a Class

Escape from the Soviets. By Tatiana Tchernavin. Translated from the Russian by T. Alexander. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

IF you are looking for an example in support of the dictum that really "fine writing" is natural writing, you can do no better among current books than to offer Tatiana Tchernavin's "Escape from the Soviets." A more unpretentious, simple story has seldom come any reader's way. If a book is a bridge over the gulf that separates reader from author, this book is a bridge so delicate as to eliminate both bridge and gulf. Here the reader sits eye to eye with the speaker—the veritable teller of the tale. If he has an ounce of sensitiveness, he can hear the voice itself of the narrator; quiet, controlled, exquisitely just in its emphasis, disattached from the personal in a way that makes this story the epic of a class—unless we employ new Russia's term and say "category"—of people. Somehow, here, all the difficulties of translation seem overcome, and we listen to a story common to all mankind.

Common, that is, to all mankind when in the throes of revolution. And its tone should make for the reader's attempt to catch this author's point of view. She never seems to forget—nor ever have had to remember—that revolution is always revolution, and so never—whatever the aim of its leaders—free from cruelty, injustice, stupidity, with unimaginable horrors a part of each day's work.

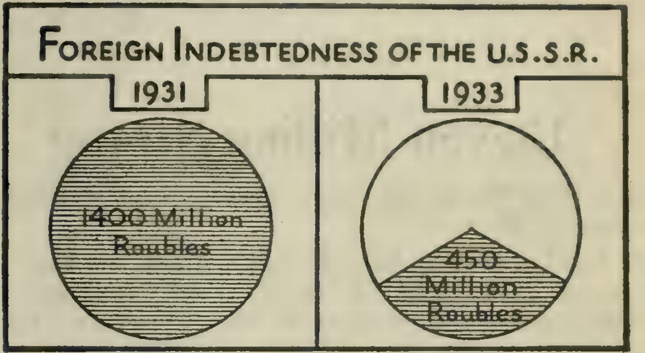
The story begins with the birth of her son, in 1918. "The revolution as such," she says on her first page, "did not frighten me. I was brought up in a very liberal professorial family and felt convinced that the overthrow of the autocracy would lead to real political freedom." Her husband was a scientist—both of the intelligentsia, the simple class source of all their later woes.

For twelve years—until 1930—the Tchernavins contrived to exist by way of their professions. Madame Tchernavin, forced out of teaching when her schools were disbanded, took charge, first of the Pavlovsk Palace Archives, and then, under the NEP regime, became assistant curator of the Hermitage Museum at Leningrad. By 1930, the intelligentsia were doomed as "counter-revolutionists" to "save the face" as the Chinese put it. Tchernavin was arrested first and later convicted and exiled. "And what shall I do all by myself, mother?" the twelve-year-old child asked, when Madame Tchernavin's arrest seemed imminent. "Go to school. Wait for me. Take food to daddy and me in prison—you know there's no one else to do it," was the mother's reply. In March, 1931, she was arrested and held till the following August.

On page 165 there is a map, "showing route of escape" from Kem, where Tchernavin was a prisoner, to Finland. The thirteen-year-old boy had bought one, on first word of their getting permission to visit his father. The rest of the story is the

The SOVIET UNION
has sharply reduced its foreign debt
and greatly increased its wealth

In the face of the world wide depression, while other nations have sought moratoriums and similar forms of delayed payment, the Soviet Union not only has met its current obligations as due, but actually has reduced its foreign indebtedness more than 67%.



(Present parity of rouble $.8713)

This exceptional record of payments was made possible by the steady economic progress of the Soviet Union. During the period when these payments were made, the Soviet Union gained second place among the nations of the world as an industrial producer, and it increased its national income by 75%. In the year 1933 the nation further benefited from a favorable balance of trade amounting to over $128 million. These facts emphasize the safety of

SOVIET UNION 7% GOLD BONDS

These are the bonds of a nation which has met promptly every obligation incurred by it during the entire 16 years of its existence. Salient features of the bonds are:

Principal and interest payments are based upon a fixed quantity of gold and are payable in American currency at the prevailing rate of exchange . . . Holders are thus protected against loss resulting from possible further reduction in the gold content of the dollar . . . These bonds are offered at par and accrued interest in denominations of 100 and 1000 gold roubles. (A gold rouble contains 0.774234 grams of pure gold.) . . . Interest is paid quarterly at the Chase National Bank of New York . . . The State Bank of the U. S. S. R., with a gold reserve of more than $706 million, agrees to repurchase these bonds on demand of the holder at par and accrued interest at any time after one year from date of purchase, thus assuring long term marketability.

Send for circular N-8 for full information about these bonds

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street Tel. HAnover 2-5332 New York

Food and Sexual Feeling
Between food and sexual feeling there is an intimate relation. Certain foods will stimulate sexual feelings; other foods will allay sex desire. What these foods are, and how they act on the organism, is explained by an eminent endocrinologist in the current issue of
The Modern Psychologist
Edited by Dagobert D. Runes, Ph.D.
OTHER ARTICLES
What Does Freud Want? — What Makes Us Cowards?
The Science of Hypnotism. — Tricks of the Subconscious.
Surgery and Neurotics. — The Psychology of Forgetting.
You can get a special five-month trial subscription to The Modern Psychologist for $1. Enclose bill, check, or money order, and address to The Modern Psychologist, 310 Riverside Drive, New York.

journey to Kem and "escape from the Soviets." The plan, the delay, and the action—which covered three weeks. Long flight of the hunted from the hunters, with compass lost at the start, the father fallen ill with a bad heart, the boy crippled with an abscessed foot, and, finally, mother and son left in the forest, while the father labored on toward Finland. Not a word of heroics, but a fresh, new saga of human courage!

The "enemies of Russia" will like this book, and the sentimentalists likewise. But it is not written by "an enemy of Russia"; nor, above all, by a sentimentalist. The exposure is stark, and carries truth in every line. It is straightly addressed to every true friend of Russia within and without the Soviets.

EDNA KENTON

Eleven Million Strong

Women Who Work. By Grace Hutchins. International Publishers. $2.

IN her latest book, Miss Hutchins draws the usual Communist morals from the lives to which American industry still condemns too many of its women workers. The facts she marshals to prove her frankly stated thesis portray a sadly familiar and shameful story. According to the last census, some 11,000,000 women were gainfully at work in the United States, almost two-fifths of them less than twenty-five years old, almost three-tenths of them married. Not theoretical notions on women's rights, not a desire for pocket money, but the hard necessities of their own support and that of their dependents drive these women into factories and mills and offices. Still concentrated in unskilled and semi-skilled trades, suffering from numerous discriminations on the job, they face, too, the double burden of work inside and outside the home. And for this they draw, on the whole, pitifully low wages, work frequently under harmful conditions, and face always the insecurities of slack times, old age, and ill health.

The general conclusions Miss Hutchins draws from these facts would be indorsed by most students of the subject. In addition to their basic human requirements, women workers need labor laws and working facilities to safeguard their specific physical constitution. But the mere formulation of such legal standards guarantees nothing. The laws must be vigilantly enforced; and enforcement demands constant policing. Experience has proved that the best police force lies in organization of the workers themselves. The American Federation of Labor, with few exceptions, has failed as yet to organize women, though the history of labor and the successes achieved by particular unions amply demonstrate that they can be organized. It is in organization, too, that individual women workers must seek their ultimate salvation. Professional and increasingly mechanized white-collar jobs no longer offer sure "rungs up the ladder of success" for the ambitious. In them, as in all others, women must fight for better wages and conditions, social insurance and increased security.

So far Miss Hutchins wins general agreement. But when she departs from the realm of science and enters that of politics, the affirmation which becomes her argument has no place for caution, qualification, or weighting. It merely extols in chapter after chapter, for instance, the labor organizations associated with the Trade Union Unity League as the shining exemplars of invariably correct tactics for improving women's conditions. Communist Russia, apparently, can afford to admit mistakes; American Communists never make them. The Communist argument lumps all employers without distinction as driving exploiters of labor. The more damning truth appears to be that even the best-intentioned among them cannot always maintain their progressive policies against the pressures of industrial fluctuation. It reduces all obstacles in the way of Communist triumph to conscious capitalist machinations or capitalist reformer poltroonery. Yet surely the desire of women to please men arises from something more than capitalist propaganda; and surely, too, such indiscriminate disparagement as Miss Hutchins heaps on all who fight in the same battle but with different weapons is itself conscious machination.

But even more important, this political affirmation leads Miss Hutchins at times into virtual misrepresentation. Two instances on which I have first-hand information are glaring enough to undermine confidence in a good part of her detailed evidence. When Miss Hutchins describes the suspension of the six o'clock night law for women in Massachusetts textile mills (p. 113), she fails to mention or misstates six qualifying facts that put quite a different color on the situation. The suspension of the law is only for the period of the Recovery Act—an experimental effort to substitute national code standards for State legal ones. Under its terms girls less than twenty-one years old still may not work after six o'clock. Not only Governor Ely and "textile mill owners, including the 'liberal' Henry R. Kendall" urged this course; the State Federation of Labor and our socially responsible Commissioner of Labor and Industries also urged it. The special regulations that followed the suspension do not seek to control the percentage that women may constitute of the total employees in any mill, but of the total permitted on night shifts. They have been made not alone for cotton but for each branch of the industry, and only after joint consultation with labor and employer representatives. Similarly when Miss Hutchins cites Bay State wages (p. 142), her quantitative adjectives are misleading. It was not in "many factories of the Bay State," but in one out of eighteen studied at New Bedford and Fall River during February and March, 1932, that "employers paid all of their employees less than $10 a week."

Yet because Miss Hutchins's purposes are mainly political, scientific criterion cannot yield final judgment on her accomplishment. Nor can anti-Communists refute her contentions by decrying her program. Nothing less than the elimination of the undisputed conditions she describes can effectively meet her challenge.

SYLVIA KOPALD SELEKMAN

Not Even Heroic

Tin Soldiers. By Robert Wohlforth. Alfred H. King, Inc. $2.

IT would be rather hard to say who is, or will be, the most unpopular graduate of West Point—Robert Wohlforth or Colonel T. Bentley Mott, U. S. A., retired, whose article in the March issue of Harper's gave such a courageous, frank, and illuminating picture of this famous institution. Both have painted, in no uncertain colors, its grueling and soul-destroying regimentation, its planned, leisureless days, its unvarying (from year to year) class-room assignments, lectures, recitations, and examinations which make the "poop-sheets" so useful and accurate to those who have had neither the time nor the intelligence to prepare their work. Colonel Mott's article is, of course, the more scholarly; Mr. Wohlforth's novel the more vivid and absorbing. But "Tin Soldiers," though it is a novel, does without doubt give a true but sordid account of the careers at West Point of eight or ten cadets. John Alwin, "an average man," whose inamorata (a wealthy Long Islander) falls in love with and eventually marries his handsome Italian roommate, "Dok" Cipriano, is the principal character of the book; but other classmates receive nearly as much attention. There is the Negro, LePere, for example, who sticks it for three years only to quit, not because he is openly persecuted but because he is absolutely ignored and left to himself. There is also the athlete, Emil Kranz, who is continually in danger of being lost to the football team because of his weaknesses—studies and women. Just one instructor is at all fully drawn—Major Bookel, an arrant coward, who, because of mistreatment while a Beast (that is, a freshman) years before, has been taking his revenge on the cadets ever since.

There is nothing that smacks of "The Rover Boys" or the tales of Richard Henry Barbour in this book; it is strongly reminiscent of Percy Marks's "The Plastic Age" and should be ranked almost on a par with it. Yet this story of West Point deserves special consideration, because it helps to shatter the illusion that young men in clean, trim, resplendent uniforms are perfect or, at least, heroic. They can be, and very often are, stupid, cruel, perverted, ill-mannered, and cowardly. Furthermore, cadets who are told that "you must first see that the little 'you' fits himself into the system of West Point and not try to change the system to fit you" and who are not even allowed to decide for themselves the most trivial things (for a flag is hung out "to tell you when to wear your rubbers and wear your heavy underwear") are, by the time they have graduated, deprived of all sense of initiative and originality. The point is this: that if America turns fascist—and that day may be nearer than we think—then our lives will be lived in much the same way as life is now lived at West Point, with the same type of man, if not the very same men, as our dictators.

THACHER WINSLOW

The Economic South

Economic History of the South. By Emory Q. Hawk. Prentice-Hall. $5.

WRITING about Southern institutions and development has gone through several phases. In the ante bellum period and extending past Reconstruction, there was adulation on the one hand and invective on the other. Though economic forces underlay it all, politics was the staple of debate. Later came monographic treatment, in which calmer appraisal showed itself. Even in these special studies, however, one was apt to find lingering certain motives of attack or defense. Straightaway exposition arrived only recently. But still we lacked broad inspection and inclusive statement. This was unfortunate, particularly because there was no convenient means of acquainting students in the South and out of it with the economic history and problems of the region. In Professor Hawk's book we have come a long way from the eclectic travelers' diaries, the apologies for slavery, the sentimental memoirs, and the bloody recollections of the Civil War.

What other large district is so inviting a field of exploration for the economic historian as the Southern States of America? Here, compressed into a short span of experience, are elemental social forces succeeding one another—colonial beginnings, agricultural reliance, a slave economy, war and its aftermath, industrial achievement, and national consciousness and tolerance emerging in the place of sectional pride.

Professor Hawk has read widely, condensed skilfully, and combined his materials ingeniously. He has shown a sense of proportion, and his volume is chock full of facts. His writing is clear and smooth, and does not neglect an occasional grateful pleasantry. Here is a picture of the economic South, in all its essentials, in all its stages.

For all the fact of the existence of monographic material and statistics (the latter by no means always in usable form), Professor Hawk has had to do a deal of spade work. This is partly responsible for the lack which the present reviewer discovers in the presentation. Objectivity need not preclude—indeed, it should induce—conclusions. Generalization and inter-

The MOSCOW THEATER FESTIVAL

FOR great dates in the theater, mark September 1 to 10 in Moscow. The brilliant program announced ranges from Borodin, Rossini and Shakespeare to "Intervention" and "The Negro Boy and the Ape". Every one of the productions . . . drama, opera or ballet . . . is of outstanding importance and compelling interest.

Oliver M. Sayler of New York and H. W. L. Dana of Boston, both outstanding authorities on the Soviet theater, will lead separate groups of American visitors to the Festival. Arrangements are being made for those who attend to substitute other current performances in Moscow theaters for those on the official program, if they wish. All-inclusive costs are very low, the entire Festival may be visited for as little as $77 for ten days in Moscow—including tickets.

For detailed information and complete official program write for Theater Festival Booklet NA-7 to

INTOURIST, INC.

U. S. Representative of the Travel Co. of the U.S.S.R., 545 Fifth Avenue, New York. Offices in Boston and Chicago. Or see your own travel agent.

THE SCANDINAVIAN UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF PROGRAM

By C. J. Ratzlaff

A thorough survey of the most complete, co-ordinated system of unemployment relief in the world. Established on a permanent basis in 1914, the Scandinavian experiment in cash benefits, unemployment insurance, and public works is invaluable to all concerned with social and economic planning.

Just out, $2.00

THE PLIGHT OF THE BITUMINOUS COAL MINER

By Homer L. Morris, Illus., $3.00

TARIFF RETALIATION

By Joseph M. Jones, Jr., $3.00

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA PRESS : PHILADELPHIA

pretation are as essential as exhibit. Though the subject matter steadily invites it, I do not find the author's own judgment as actively at play as I could wish. Professor Hawk is excellent at modifying dogma, but this need not imply unwillingness to point a moral. He has not done things that he ought not to have done, but he has left undone things that he ought to have done. The fundamental opposition in the South's story is, when all is said, that between staple agriculture and slavery on the one hand and industrial variety and free labor on the other. The penalty and recompense in each of these systems are not, it seems to me, sufficiently illumined and brought home to the reader and student. The weight of opinion must be, surely, on the side of diversification, enterprise, and industrial democracy. The South, moreover, has not only a past but a future, and it is eminently appropriate that a book of this sort should draw powerful lessons, for Southerners and others, which will give direction to the solution of pressing problems.

The South has made most of the mistakes which ignorance in the many and arrogance in the few, widespread poverty and concentrated power, could lead to. Despite this, Southerners like to believe that there is in the section a special capacity for confessing past error and mustering fresh resolve. It is to this talent, this gift of public candor, that Professor Hawk might have appealed more successfully than he has done.

BROADUS MITCHELL

Jewish Social Planning

Judaism as a Civilization: Toward a Reconstruction of American-Jewish Life. By Mordecai M. Kaplan. The Macmillan Company. $5.

MORDECAI KAPLAN sees that reform Judaism has failed as a medium of Jewish adjustment. "It is as though a family were to organize itself into a philosophical society." The synagogue has lost its character as a communal center and became a temple for occasional worship. The rabbi has metamorphosed into an oratorical proxy performing religion for a congregation, mostly women, which finds social ascent rather than social justice through its channels. From Ellis Island to Temple Emanu-El (or perhaps, even, Ethical Culture) has become the familiar heroic saga.

Nevertheless, though he sees the situation in all its desperation Mr. Kaplan believes that Judaism has a fifty-fifty chance of survival, and advocates pulmotor efforts at revival of an integrated Jewish life.

His essential outlook is not dissimilar to that of Stephen Wise, but he is less vociferous, with a mind more formally philosophic and a program more systematic. He sees that present Jewish adhesiveness is based largely on sheer momentum, the coercions of anti-Jewishness, and what may be called the "shikse taboo," the tenacity of the Jewish family's abhorrence of intermarriage. But that is not enough for survival through a crisis as serious as that created by contemporary anti-Semitism. There must be determined social planning. Kaplan proposes, therefore, what may, without disparagement, be termed a species of unisolated ghettoism. Jews in America are Americans first, but theirs is the privilege of a twin culture. Only in Palestine can the Jew live a completely Jewish life, but Jews everywhere may take heart to create a flourishing civilization, fecundly artistic, accelerating the renascence of Hebrew, pro-Zionistic, of course, and still basically, but not wholly, religious. This is the most dignified and well-thought-through program which has yet been offered to Jews who are not willing to assent bovinely or sullenly to the fact of their Jewishness or are relieved to forget it, but regard it as an opportunity for creative cultural activity like so many other less central phases of their life; the more so as it is an exercise of that piety which Santayana praises as a "reverent attachment to the sources of one's being and the steadying of one's life by that attachment." Nor will many wish to deny to an amorphous historic people the same "will to civilize" which is vouchsafed any living organism, especially since the richness of cultural diversity is so evident. Moses told God a long time ago that the Jews were a stiff-necked people. Neither the Jews nor the world have as yet succeeded in belying him. But with the old sanctions gone, they will not be able to muddle through.

Kaplan has worked from the inside out, and this book as it stands is not sufficiently comprehensive a synthesis to represent the needs of all American Jewry. His functional sociologic approach reveals his thorough modernity. But his discussion of rival interpretations is too labored in terms of library distinctions, while his linkage into the present suffers from the fact that his reconstruction has been in the making for a period of fifteen years, before the crystalization of politico-economic faiths had offered so ready an alternative and the Nazi onslaught had once again basically threatened Jewish security. How does he meet the challenge of the former Menorah group, now among the "unpossessed"? The times call poignantly for decisive penetration into controlling contemporary forces which Kaplan has only grazed. But perhaps that is material for a second opus.

It is surprising that more attention has not been paid to the structural parallelism of Judaism and Communism, both of them envisaging a guaranteed movement through history to a this-worldly era of justice, engineered by the downtrodden for the benefit of mankind. Thus Jewish radicals, following Marx, have only to substitute a wider content for a virtually identical pattern, and the influx is rapid. The fate of Jewish culture now rests mainly with the middle class, as Lewisohn doubtless sees in coming to their defense. The workers are too pressed under our order to find time for the amenities of even one civilization. They seek both a faith and recreation through other channels. But that is the reason why, going beyond a recognition of the Prophetic base of the Jewish tradition, Kaplan's program involves, by deeper implication, the widest and most concrete implementing of "social justice." For those who dissent both from Heine's dismissal of Judaism, as not a religion but a curse, and from Marx's conviction that what the world needs is not emancipation of, but from, the Jew, Kaplan's analysis is uniquely clarifying and positive.

BERYL HAROLD LEVY

Shorter Notices

The Social Cost of Industrial Insurance. By Maurice Taylor. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.25.

This is the first comprehensive survey of industrial insurance from the social point of view. Particularly interesting is the history of burial insurance, which developed from friendly and burial societies. The volume has an amazingly comprehensive bibliography, and indices of subjects and authorities, with much original material, including an authoritative mortality table which indicates an actual mortality so low as to cast doubt on all present day life-insurance cost and practice. The author shows how the companies have departed from their proper functioning as insurance companies, their growth as savings institutions with insurance as an incident: he shows how less is being paid each year in death claims, and more as savings payments: that despite the 700 millions paid each year in premiums, the companies fail to give adequate burial protection, and are unsatisfactory as a means of saving or of practical thrift, because of the inability of the policy holder to get his savings when he needs them, and the tremendous expense, as well as the

□ RESORTS □ RESORTS □ RESORTS □

Intimate, colorful, alive! The most complete adult camp in the Adirondacks. Chamber music by the Compinsky Trio and the Perole String Quartet.
Dance Recitals by Pauline Koner and a complete summer stock and try-out theatre in the best Westport tradition.
Private golf course, lake and tennis courts.

Booklet on request.

GREEN MANSIONS
157 WEST 57th STREET
CO. 5-6346

Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.

St. Regis HOTEL FLEISCHMANNS N.Y.
"Catskill Mts.' Greatest Hotel Value"

- ANNOUNCES Special Rates for July & August $22.50 UP
- Fleischmann's Finest and Largest Hotel
- Large Professional Social and Athletic Staff.
- Every Recreational Feature.
- Dietary Laws.

N. Y. C. Phone Kilpatrick 5-10309

"ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE SWITZERLAND"

MOON HILL ON SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS

For A Perfect
Adirondack Vacation
HOTEL COMFORTS
Country Club Atmosphere
Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary laws.) Families accommodated.

Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42. PEnn. 6-1720

NAPANOCH
COUNTRY CLUB
NAPANOCH, N.Y.
Every Outdoor and Social Activity.
Write for Booklet.
Thrilling Entertainment by C.B.S.
New York City Phone: MUrray Hill 4-3802

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Jewish. Rate $16 wkly.

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
Booklet on Request
■
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn., 6-7663

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group
July Rate $29.50
Superior Cuisine
Round Trip Fare $8.50 by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
[illegible] SUCCESSFUL SEASON

"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

JULY RATE $21 for 1 week
$40 for 2 weeks
Rate per day, $3.50
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

15th Season
WESTERN VIEW FARM
An Inn unique in its hospitality
On a mountain top only 2½ hours from New York. Rates: $8.00 a day by the day, $7.00 a day by the week; $6.00 a day by the month; $5.50 a day by the season.
Service a la mode Continentale
Address: EDWARD G. OHMER, New Milford, Conn.—Telephone, New Milford 440.
From all over the world comes this Farm's clientele

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey
Golf, riding, tennis, all outdoor activities, 150 acre estate, private lake, beautiful country. Excellent food, spacious house, log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Central Railroad of N. J. or Pennsylvania to Red Bank.
Management Mascha and Hyman Strunsky
Telephone Atlantic Highlands, 264

CAMP ANNISQUAM
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

Charming
UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

THE ATLANTIC HOTEL, BELMAR, N.J.
"For An Ideal Vacation"
For many years the perfect hostelry serving people of culture and refinement. Excellent food plus every conceivable diversion. $25 in July. Ask for Booklet "W". N. Y. Tel. ORchard 4-2673.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.
Garden Spot of Ulster County
Modern hotel amidst beautiful 200 acre fruit and grape farm, solariums, saddle horses, tennis courts, social activities, refinement, congeniality, American Jewish cuisine. Rates reduced to $16 and $18.
JOSEPH ROSENTHAL KINGSTON 3430

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.

Booklet "N" on Request
City Address
545 Fifth Ave.,
Room 1109
VAnderbilt 3-9874

AN ADIRONDACK CAMP of the BETTER TYPE
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports.
ECHO LAKE TAVERN
Warrensburg, N. Y.

SCAROON MANOR
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
Hotel Comforts. Complete Social Staff
COUNTRY CLUB INFORMALITY
Most Beautiful Summer Resort in America
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
NINE CLAY TENNIS COURTS
SIX HANDBALL COURTS
ON SCHROON LAKE, N. Y.
JOS. FRIEBER MGR.-DIR.

BREEZEMONT
A resort of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.

Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

ZINDOREST PARK
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 300
Formerly a millionaire's estate of 150 acres, beautifully landscaped. Tennis. Handball courts. Swimming, boating, fishing. Many more attractions. Saddle horses on premises. Nearby golf. 1½ hours Erie R.R. or auto. Open all year.

For complete relaxation, beautiful country, pleasant companionship. Wholesome food. Tennis.
THE HIL-BERT HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, N. Y.
H. FRIEDBERG MAHOPAC 953

BARLOW FARM
On Candlewood Lake, Sherman, Conn.
Charming colonial house. Modernized, sixty acres woodland. Berkshire foothills. Russian cuisine personally supervised by Nina. Weekly rates $16. Weekend [illegible] $3 daily. Information, City Phone MAine 4-8276.

A RESTFUL and delightful vacation place only 31 minutes by express from Penn. Station. One of the finest beaches on the Atlantic. Delicious, simple, wholesome food. Rieber's Cottage, Belle Harbor, L. I. Belle Harbor 5-0089.

RIVERSIDE INN, Seymour, Conn.
On Lake Housatonic, 70 miles from New York
Beautiful surroundings. Tennis, boating, bathing, fishing. Excellent meals. Rates $3 per day, $18 per week. Derby 639-2. Also bungalows for rent.

☐ RESORTS ☐

CAMP MILFORD
KENT • CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests. Delicious meals.

Weekly Rates—July & August
$27.50 PER WEEK

Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N. H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates Today

1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PEnnsylvania 6-7842

WHAT'S NEW AT
UNITY HOUSE
FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA
J. HALPERN, Manager M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager
N. Y. Office: 3 West 16th Street

A Vacation Message to THE NATION Readers—

UNITY HOUSE offers superb facilities for play and relaxation, and the gala programs featuring many famous artists have become increasingly popular. Many new facilities this year for sport and play. $25.50 per week—July and August. Reduction to Union members. Owned by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

Always the Finest of Entertainment

A galaxy of great talent, with nature vieing with artistic achievement.
Starring such famous artists as TOSCHA SEIDEL, ALLA NAZIMOVA, MOLLY PICON, SIGMUND SPAETH, ISA KREMER, and the HALL JOHNSON CHOIR.
And many other artists for your entertainment. Always something new and interesting.

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS, WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

RESORT ADVERTISING RATES:—

One inch, narrow column....$6.16
Ten insertions .... 5.55 each
One inch, wide column.... 9.52
Ten insertions 8.57

CLASSIFIED advertisements can be taken up to 4 P.M. on Mondays, to appear in the issue on the stands Thursday—cost, 62 cents a line of 6 words. Minimum, 3 lines.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, N. Y. COrtlandt 7-3330

many millions entirely lost when premiums are not paid for three years, or partly forfeited as an unwarranted surrender charge. Although stressed as a thrift encouraging agency, industrial insurance has failed to prevent destitution or dependency, even tending to create dependency, if not destitution. Dr. Taylor questions the ability of the working classes to carry their present savings-insurance load, even in normal times, and shows that the compulsory savings feature is incapable of being temporarily suspended in periods of reduced income. He mentions but fails to detail the notorious selling methods of the agency force, insists that there is too wide a gap between the expressed ideals of the home office and the practices of the agent, officially prohibited but practically countenanced. He suggests simple but far-reaching reforms, and hints at government insurance, despite his belief that insurance requires selling. There is a certain timidity in the presentation of the facts, and a deference in the conclusions arrived at. On the whole, however, Dr. Taylor's volume is a well planned and executed work.

Discrete Series. By George Oppen. The Objectivist Press. $1.

Mr. Oppen is an Objectivist, a descendent of the Imagists. Like William Carlos Williams he pictures boldly and allows the reader to relate the pictures given as separate images within a single poem. He differs from Mr. Williams, however, in that almost every poem describes an actual movement of objects. Either the images are those seen from a train or from some vehicle in which the poet is placed, or are actually in motion themselves. Sometimes Mr. Oppen presents, as it were, a level or plane of movement, images seen from a certain angle. He draws his images from modern industrial life. He presents them in much the same manner as the impressionist painter might. His work, however, has the fault which is characteristic of this whole school of poets. The images are not fused with the emotion. They merely objectify it.

Functional Affinities of Man, Monkeys, and Apes. By S. Zuckerman. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

Most contemporary students of anthropoid apes concern themselves only with functional studies and evade the problems of classification and evolution. Dr. Zuckerman, the English author of "The Social Life of Monkeys and Apes," who is now at Yale, has here undertaken the difficult task of appraising the extent of th econtribution to private phylogeny of recent experimental researches on the physiology and psychology of apes and monkeys. He has written an extremely competent work which may be regarded as an indispensable supplement to "The Great Apes," by Yerkes and Yerkes, which summarized the historical literature. The diverse studies of specialists, who are often ignorant of the work done in parallel fields, are critically evaluated and brought into focus in a composite picture which will serve as a point of departure for all future research in this subject. It is clear that inquiries which have gone beyond anatomical structure to an analysis of such problems as the mechanisms of reproduction, of blood reactions, and of anthropoid intelligence have worked havoc with the early schemes and generalizations of the age of Darwin. In fact while the intimacy of the kinship of man and the apes has been increasingly substantiated to the chagrin of the bigots of the Bible Belt, there is not a single important conclusion as to the sequences of evolutionary development that can be declared to be proved to the unanimous satisfaction of authorities. Zuckerman's book, alert with discerning and provocative judgments, indicates the vast field for research that lies ahead. It is designed for scientists, but intelligent laymen will be cheated of a rare treat if they let its technical vocabulary prevent them from learning of the many ways in which they differ from—and resemble—their nearest relatives among the lower animals.

The Nation
FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 25, 1934 No. 3603

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS . . . 85

EDITORIALS:

- The Republican Opposition . . . 88
- "Worse than the Earthquake" . . . 89
- Hitlerism in a New Phase . . . 89

ISSUES AND MEN. BORAH GOES ON THE WAR PATH. By Oswald Garrison Villard . . . 91

CARTOON: THEY SALUTE WITH BOTH HANDS NOW. By LOW . . . 92

THE AGE OF DISTRIBUTION. By Stuart Chase . . . 93

DOG DAYS IN WASHINGTON. By Mildred Adams . . . 96

MONTANA CHALLENGES THE TYRANNY OF COPPER. By Ward Kinney . . . 98

A LENINGRAD LETTER: II. By Harold J. Laski . . . 100

ZERO HOUR ON THE COAST. By Grace Mettee . . . 102

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter . . . 102

CORRESPONDENCE . . . 103

FINANCE: BIG BUSINESS IN SEARCH OF NEW FRIENDS. By Peter Helmoop Noyes . . . 104

BOOKS:

- What Is a Poem? By Lincoln Reis . . . 106
- The Story of a Jingo. By Ludwig Lore . . . 107
- The New Utopia. By Walter N. Polakov . . . 108
- Preachers and War. By Oswald Garrison Villard . . . 108
- Japan Over Asia. By Mauritz A. Hallgren . . . 109
- Southern Culture. By Virginius Dabney . . . 110
- Shorter Notices . . . 110

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE . . . 110

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

IN The Nation for November 29, 1933, Ludwig Lore charged that George Sylvester Viereck had lately gone to Germany under contract with Carl Byoir and Associates to collect information favorable to Nazi Germany, with the purpose of disseminating this information in articles written for American consumption. Mr. Viereck thereupon wrote an indignant letter to the editors of The Nation categorically denying such a contract or that he was being paid by anyone to create a favorable impression of the Nazi government in this country. On July 10, 1934, Mr. Viereck, testifying before the Congressional committee investigating Nazi propaganda in the United States, admitted that he was, by contract, receiving $1,750 a month from the Byoir firm to produce publicity in this country "detailing the attractiveness of travel in Germany." He also acknowledged the receipt of $500 a month for four months beginning in March, 1933, from Dr. Otto Kiep, then German Consul General in New York City, for services "strictly advisory, concerning the general aspects of public relations," and he further testified that this $2,000 was given in cash "to avoid spies among the professional Jews and bolsheviks." Mr. Viereck declared he could see nothing improper in these transactions, and doubtless he sees nothing improper in his denial to The Nation of something which he was subsequently compelled to admit while inconveniently under oath. The English language contains terms which briefly and explicitly define conduct of this sort, but Mr. Viereck's reputation is well known by now and the matter is of small importance as far as The Nation is concerned.

OF MORE MOMENT, of course, is the disclosure of the payment, by the German dye trust, the IG-Farben-Industrie, of $25,000 a year to Ivy Lee, public relations counsel who numbers John D. Rockefeller among his clients, for general advice about the American reaction to what is happening in Germany. It is to be assumed that Mr. Lee earned this not inconsiderable stipend, not to mention the $33,000 paid his son for acting as his Berlin representative in the transaction, although one would suspect that an annual subscription to half a dozen leading American dailies and a faithful reading of their contents might reveal almost as much and it would certainly cost a lot less. These services, however, come high. Byoir and Associates, for example, are revealed to have a $6,000-a-month contract with the German Tourist Information Bureau to dispense information designed to bolster up the declining German tourist trade. Burton Holmes, well known as a lecturer, with what used to be colored slides but now are bona fide moving pictures, on foreign parts, merely accepted free passage to Germany, as did Colonel Alexander Powell, author of "The Long Roll on the Rhine." In other words, Congressman Dickstein's suspicions, along with those of many other persons, that the German government, through various German industries, has been busy and willing to pay through the nose for services which would attempt to sell Hitler's government to this country turn out to be only too justified. It may be that these activities are perfectly lawful and they may even be matched by what could be disclosed about propaganda from other countries, but it is just as well to have these matters brought out occasionally into the light of day. And it is too bad that when his government has dispensed its funds so freely, Herr Hitler, by his "purging" of the Storm Troops, should completely wipe out whatever gains had been made. Unfortunately The Nation is not permitted to be sold in Germany; otherwise this observation could be offered as an authentic example of American opinion of Nazi Germany, and no charge would be made for it whatsoever.

AMONG THE COUNTLESS victims whose lives are sacrificed each week by Nazi terror, there have been many whose death has left the whole world immeasurably poorer for their passing. One of these was the poet and writer Erich Mühsam who was "found dead in his cell" last week, one of the most human, most sensitive, most appealing personalities in modern German literature. Mühsam, together with hundreds of prominent literati and labor leaders, was arrested on the night of the Reichstag fire. He was handed over by the police to the S. A. vandals who dragged him to their notorious headquarters in the Friedrichstrasse, where he was terribly beaten. From there he was sent to the Dachau concentration camp and later to Oranienburg where he was subjected to the never-ending martyrdom which the Nazi regime accords its unbending political foes. Prisoners released from this hell who sought refuge across the border described him as a broken man, his hearing gone, his teeth knocked out on the day of his arrest, his body emaciated with suffering, his mind dimmed by the tortures of a thousand indignities. Author of some of the most beautiful lyrics which Germany has known in the last decades, Mühsam was a courageous fighter, an anarchist who wielded a deadly pen in defense of the wronged and the downtrodden. He published two periodicals before and after the German Revolution of 1918. Kain (Munich 1911-1914, 1918-1919), which he wrote from cover to cover, and Fanal (Berlin 1924-1926) were both masterpieces of journalism. Many of Mühsam's day-by-day comments on political events will have a permanent place in the world's revolutionary literature.

TWO OF THE NINE DEFENDANTS accused of stabbing Leon Tourian, Archbishop of the Armenian Apostolic Church, in the procession of high mass last December 24 in New York City have been convicted of murder in the first degree, the remaining seven of manslaughter in the first degree. All were members of the Armenian Revolutionary Federation, the so-called Tashnag, which played a role in Armenia opposing the Turk from 1890 on and dominated the short-lived Republic of Armenia in 1918-20. After Armenia became a member of the Soviet Union and the Tashnags were forced out, their activity declined. But the depression aroused new enthusiasm for this, as for other nationalist movements, even among Armenians in this country. A cult of the flag was instituted, not the present Armenian flag, but the flag of the brief Tashnag epoch of Armenia; youth movements, imbued with race worship, were started, glorifying, this time, not a blond Nordic race but the dark Armenian people; publications appeared full of high-flown, red-blooded positiveness. The political devil to be opposed was, of course, the Soviet rule in Armenia. Yet the Soviets had rescued what Tashnag had been incapable of holding, had furthered Armenia in economic and cultural reconstruction. Even the Armenian national church continued to exist and when Archbishop Tourian, sent to this country three years ago as prelate, approved the existing Soviet order and resisted efforts to involve the church in support of Tashnag, he became the target of Tashnag attack. Here, as in Germany, ardent nationalism led to terror. Here, too, Tashnag, like Hitlerism, has tried to win support among outsiders by calling its cause a crusade against communism. The nationalistic perpetrators of the crime have been called murderers by an American court and will be punished as such. The real criminal is nationalism.

WILLIAM GREEN has promised that he will "personally see to it" that the Donovan discharge case is brought before the National Labor Relations Board. If he is as good as his word, the new board will shortly enjoy the opportunity to prove that it takes Section 7-a in dead earnest. Mr. Green is now on record as holding that the dismissal was a clear case of discrimination. After a meeting of the Labor Advisory Board last week, he stated: "The circumstances under which Mr. Donovan was discharged, the facts connected with the case, the services he was rendering are such . . . as to leave room for only one opinion. . . . Mr. Donovan was discharged unjustly and for union activity." Does Mr. Green express the point of view of the Labor Advisory Board? This is hard to say, for at the meeting which brought forth his statement, the board for the second time refused to review the case. A majority of the board, it is said, insists on construing the term "advisory" in a literal sense, and refuses to take an active part in the dispute. If this report is true, then the Labor Advisory Board justifies the strictures of its worst critics. How can the board dare to pose as the protector of the rights of labor throughout industry if it will not help preserve the decencies of collective bargaining in its own household?

THE REFUSAL of the Republic Steel Corporation to renew its contract with the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers indicates a new phase in industry's fight against the attempt of labor to gain real power under the protection of Section 7-a. The corporation frankly admits that its decision is aimed at the two factors which alone could make organized labor strong enough to cope with organized industry, namely rank-and-file control and the sympathetic strike.

> The Republic Steel Corporation [reads the announcement] has decided not to renew the signed contract due to the fact that there is great danger that the management of the Amalgamated Association may pass into the hands of the radical element known as the "rank-and-file leaders."
>
> These are the men who voted for and almost succeeded in bringing about a nation-wide steel strike on June 16. We cannot afford to have a contract with any organization which may at any time throw the men in our plants out of work due to conditions . . . existing in a plant possibly hundreds of miles away.

The announcement ends with the pious declaration of belief in collective bargaining with which the heads of industry now invariably end their most vicious attacks on that principle. The implications of this action are far-reaching and ironic. For twenty-one years the corporation has dealt with the A. A. simply because it was a weak organization whose leaders could be depended upon to be "reasonable." Now that the membership has increased so greatly that the control is passing into the hands of the workers themselves, the union stands to lose what little foothold it had in the steel industry. The Republic Steel Corporation has found a clever device, by which Section 7-a can be turned against the workers for whose benefit it was designed.

THE STRIKE in the Montana copper mines, discussed elsewhere in the present issue of The Nation, is a direct outcome of the copper code approved early this past spring. Few of the NRA codes have let down the workers' expectations as thoroughly as did the labor provisions of the copper code. Where the prevailing rate of pay for miners in the Northwest was something like 53 cents an hour, the code specifies 47½ cents for inside and 45 cents for outside labor. Furthermore, the maximum length of the work-week is set at 40 hours averaged over a period of three months. Eight hours a day is prescribed, but no limit on the number of days per week. This makes it possible to work one group of miners 56 hours a week for a number of weeks; then to lay them off while another group is being worked 56 hours; and yet to keep within the 40-hour limit as averaged over a three-months' interval. It was clear at the time the copper code was being formulated that if wages and hours were not improved a strike would ensue. Representatives of the International Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers were outspoken in their demand for terms improving the status quo. The Labor Advisory Board opposed the proposed labor provisions as finally drafted. But the copper producers were too much concerned with the fair-trade provisions—with formulating a plan for regulating production and sales, maintaining prices, and working off accumulated surpluses of stock —to pay attention to the demand that the code raise pay rates and shorten the work week. The NRA, for its part, fell in with this point of view. Significantly, Mr. King, the administrator in charge of the code, has now become managing director of the Copper Code Authority. Here is one strike, at least, that could have been averted if the NRA had remained true to its original objective.

IN DENVER, COLORADO, the other day, according to an Associated Press news story, an old man was accosted by a beggar who asked for "four bits for a bottle of moon"; the man refused on the ground that he was himself on relief, the beggar became threatening, whereupon the old man hit the beggar a blow that resulted in his death. When the defendant appeared in court, he was congratulated by Judge Charles C. Sackmann, told he had done "a good job," and given a thirty-day sentence, most of which was deemed to have been already served while he was awaiting trial. This extraordinary story, of course, cannot stand on its own merits without the background of Colorado's general economic status. Out of a population of a little more than a million, 56,000 families—probably more than 200,000 persons—were on public relief last month. Colorado is next to lowest of all the States in the Union in the amount of relief it gives to needy persons. When more than one person in five in the State is on relief, and when that relief, according to official figures, amounts to between $5 and $10 a month per family, it is easy to see that social values—even by a judge on the bench—can become a little twisted. When life, in the eyes of the State, is held so cheap, death is no more costly; and a dead beggar, after all, is one person that the State will not have to worry about feeding.

AFTER MORE THAN A YEAR of inactivity, the Department of Labor and the Department of Agriculture have finally decided to cooperate in a study of ways and means for improving the working conditions of agricultural labor. It is possible that this study may result in proposals to incorporate provisions bearing on wages and hours into the various AAA production-curtailment agreements. If there is any one group of workers in need of this kind of protection, it is the agricultural workers. Cash wages in most types of farm labor are hardly worth talking about. Hours of toil are limited only by the rising and the setting of the sun. The seasonal character of the work leads to a kind of high-pressure driving equalled only in the worst type of canneries and clothing-trade sweatshops. Furthermore, agriculture is the industry in which child labor has sharply flourished, as a cursory glance at the Census of Occupations will reveal. Truly the "forgotten men" (and women and children) of the New Deal, the farm workers, are increasingly taking matters into their own hands. The outbursts last year in the California citrus-fruit regions, and the more recent strikes of the Ohio onion workers and the Seabrook farm employees, show which way the wind is blowing. Unless the government does something to protect the agricultural workers, this wind may change into a hurricane of the same type that has been raging in San Francisco, Minneapolis, Milwaukee, and Toledo.

COMPANY UNIONISM on the railroads is now in its last throes. Joseph P. Eastman's interpretations of the Emergency Transportation Act of 1933 started the good work. The recent amendments to the Railway Labor Act of 1926 have finished it; for these amendments strike the company union at its most vital spot. They forbid the carriers from devoting any of their funds to initiating or maintaining any labor organization. Nevertheless, if company unionism is dying, it is dying hard. At Chicago last week, for example, there occurred a convention, called by the Allied Independent Railway Organizations, preliminary to the formation of a nation-wide organization of railway shopworkers unions independent of the A. F. of L. The Allied Independent Railway Organization came into being two years ago. It consists of some 75 former company unions of shop-crafts workers employed by some 25 different lines. Apparently it is the intent of the leaders of this movement to divide the sympathies of the shop workers by introducing dual unionism. The carriers, it is likely, are thoroughly in sympathy with this aim. Unable any longer to use their financial resources against the A. F. of L., they no doubt welcome the new organization for what it is: an attempt to shut out genuine collective bargaining. How successful the new union will be, is another question.

THE FRENZY of the film censors has grown to cyclonic proportions. A great white cloud of purity hangs over Hollywood. Cardinal Hayes and Dr. Tippy (for the Protestants) have spoken, Will Hays has answered meekly, and Mae West is revising her latest picture, while 12,000,000 over-impressionable Americans are expected to sign the pledge not to look at moving pictures that may lead them into lives of sex, crime, and nudism in luxurious penthouses far above their means. "The church," says Cardinal Hayes, "is a mother of joy," and would not curtail the pleasures of her children, but they must be wholesome pleasures and "evil motion pictures in their baneful influence undermine the moral foundations of the state." "The motion picture," says Father McCaffery, "has done the most in the last twelve years to make America immoral." These are strong words for weak pictures, judging from most of those it has been our (more or less) pleasure to see, and we cannot help being reminded of a famous remark of the now disgraced Jimmy Walker when as a State Senator he opposed a bill for the censorship of books. "No girl," said he, "was ever ruined by a book." The churches have so far failed to produce a gangster who attributed his success to the movies, and a careful inquiry among our divorced friends reveals that not one of them got the idea from a motion picture. But we should not urge these considerations upon the worthy gentlemen who are evidently panting for some vice to track down. They might be diverted to some even dearer vice which could not protect itself so well. For we have faith in the movies. We are convinced that Mae West, like love, will find a way.

The Republican Opposition

THE Republicans have finally discovered an issue. At their July sixth celebration at the birthplace of their party, they decided to concentrate upon the Constitution, our endangered liberties, and "to battle for the first principles of Republican government." "Do we desire to retain our democratic form of government? Do we desire freedom from official tyranny, or to submit to the control of an all-powerful democracy? Do we desire state capitalism or our existing system of individual savings?"—these were some of the questions hurled at the Jackson, Michigan, audience by that stalwart liberal reformer, Henry P. Fletcher, the new national chairman of the Republican Party. He listed effectively some of the extraordinary powers bestowed upon the President, roundly denounced Congress for abdicating its functions and merely registering the decrees of the President, falsified lavishly the cost of the New Deal, found the Democrats guilty of abandoning the principles of Andrew Jackson, and declared that "we want more courage and less corruption in our financial, industrial, and political life." He added that "we think we can have all these things without a cowardly surrender of democratic principles." Then he made this startlingly naive announcement: "I propose in due course to set up committees of the most competent men we can find to make a study of current economic questions, so that their reports may furnish the basis of a constructive and forward-looking Republican legislative program."

The spectacle of the Republican Party, which held control of the government from 1921 to 1933, sitting down solemnly in 1934 to appoint committees to find out about our economic situation is too much for our risibles, but here, too, honest confession—of ignorance—may be good for the soul. What kind of a legislative program was that which Mr. Hoover offered to Congress during four years, since it was not "constructive and forward looking"? Similarly, we are impressed by the sudden Republican desire for "more courage and less corruption in our financial, industrial, and political life," for surely that corruption never reached such heights as during the administrations of Coolidge and Harding, while there was probably less courage in the Hoover Administration than in any other since the Civil War. As for the abdication of its functions by Congress, Mr. Fletcher was careful not to point out that the Republican members of that body were just as guilty as the Democratic. Indeed, that is the great weakness of Mr. Fletcher's and his party's sudden assumption to this new virtue. The Republicans helped to vote in the New Deal; their Congressmen and Senators have been as ready to recommend deserving Republicans by the thousands to fill those horrifying bureaucratic jobs, as they were to vote for all the grants of power which Mr. Fletcher bemoans. They no more had an alternative policy to recommend then than they have today. But Mr. Fletcher does not wish to be reckoned a hide-bound conservative; he declares that the Republicans are not "preaching the doctrine of stand-patism"; they, too, will "prevent"—now!—"private enterprise from running amuck," although he is certain that industry can police itself "without regimentation and state direction." Beyond all this is the fact that before the Republican challenge can become a serious one the party must have a clear-cut constructive program, and one better than Mr. Roosevelt's. No mere defense of the Constitution and of our liberties will suffice. And they must produce a candidate who can make headway against Mr. Roosevelt's charm and nation-wide popularity. There is no such candidate in sight.

Waiving this, however, we welcome the signs of an awakening opposition. Without it democratic institutions are not safe in the United States; it is a commonplace that our whole governmental system is predicated upon the clash of rival political philosophies and creeds. But it is long since we have had a genuine opposition—one that had a vitally different creed from that of those in power. We should rejoice, indeed, if we could feel sure that this Republican reunion would mean the gathering of all conservatives in one camp, and all those who favor the New Deal, or at least the bulk of the Roosevelt program, in another. Let us have a distinct cleavage, so that men may know under just whose banner they will fight if they join one or the other of the armies. We do not see why big-business Democrats, and those who see in the Roosevelt policies a modified sovietism, should not take service with Mr. Fletcher. But let them not be mealy-mouthed about it; let these conservatives say straight out, as has Colonel Roosevelt, that they want to go right back to the rugged individualism of Hoover, if that is what they really wish and desire. The parties should tell us exactly what they stand for. If the Republicans do not do it, the President will see to it that they are put in the position where they will have to take an unequivocal stand, or invite disaster.

On the other hand, if the Republicans persist in their demand for personal liberty they may compel the Democrats to do as well in their platform. It is, of course, laughable to see the Republican Party posing as a champion of human rights in view of the wholesale denial of those rights, and of justice in the courts, during their recent twelve years in power. But, on the other hand, Mr. Roosevelt himself has not spoken out against the constant infringement of individual rights, and his question to the American people in his good-bye address, as to whether they had been conscious that they had been robbed of their liberties, showed that he had no conception of what is taking place in almost every State of the Union, whenever and wherever unbridled economic forces and individual rights come to blows. Mr. Roosevelt could have countered effectively if he had only come out, as we hoped he might when Norman Thomas was arrested, with a ringing utterance denouncing this lawless treatment of one of the outstanding figures of our American life. But liberty is not what Mr. Fletcher and Senator Vandenberg had in mind. Their Goddess of Liberty is one which permits the privileged big-business men to wreak their will upon the rest of their fellow-citizens; at bottom their sudden zeal is due simply and solely to fear that the economic system which has permitted a few to batten upon the entire American people is in jeopardy. By all means let us divide on that issue; only good can come of it.

"Worse Than the Earthquake"

THERE has always been something dream-like and fragile about San Francisco. It is young—the very hills on which it stands are young in geologic time—and it has all the characteristics of youth. It is beautiful, romantic, generous, sentimental, and intermittently brutal.

Even more than other American Megalopoli, San Francisco has long known that its existence hung by frail threads of rail, highway, and water transport. Courageously, magnificently, it has been building bridges—across the Golden Gate to the Marin County mainland, across the bay to Oakland. Today, with the bridges half built, those frail threads have been cut.

San Francisco has known terror before, when her sunny complacence turned to nightmare in the sudden cataclysm of the earthquake and fire. But this new terror which has gripped the city by the Golden Gate is different. It is so quiet—San Francisco, they say, is like one of the "ghost towns" of the Mother Lode. After a sharp, brief spasm of rioting, the general strike is on and nothing moves. The frivolous little cable cars, small as roller coasters, no longer clang up and down Russian hill. Across the deserted Bayshore Highway a lonely cowboy ambles on his horse. And eighty-nine deep-water ships rock at anchor in the stricken harbor where only the ferryboats still shuttle from shore to shore.

In this zero hour before what may well become a bloody conflict, there rises a babel of voices: Mayor Rossi denouncing the fomenters of the strike and proclaiming a "state of emergency" (the full force of the California National Guard is already on duty in the city); Archbishop Hanna pleading, "Let reason rule"; President Roosevelt's National Mediation Board protesting that the grievances of the seamen should not be injected into the settlement of the longshoremen's strike; shrill voices of San Francisco housewives clamoring in the markets for what is left of the diminishing stock of foodstuffs; voices out of radio loud-speakers announcing that the Seafarers' Council of the Port of New York is threatening to strike and that Portland, Oregon, expecting the general strike to spread to that city, is rationing the available supply of gasoline; voices of editors saying, "Keep your head, San Francisco," and pointing out that in the past big general strikes have been broken by the "public." Indeed, before this is printed, the public—that is to say, the National Guard—may have broken the strike, though scarcely without violence.

One doubts that either violence, or mediation, or both, will settle the issues. The longshoremen insist, and rightly, that they must control the hiring halls; in the lack of such control the employers' "Blue Book," a register of the timid and the cowed, has imposed company unionism in its most virulent form upon the San Francisco waterfront, demoralized as it is by the depression-spawned surplus of casual labor. As the strikers put it, "You can't arbitrate a shoe or a hairpin or any other article, so how can you arbitrate a hiring hall?" The longshoremen and the seamen are right, again, in rejecting the employers' demand that the seamen's strike be settled separately, since this would split labor's two most militant forces and facilitate the defeat of both. The seamen are demanding that the employer-controlled Marine Service Bureaus be abolished and that all hiring be done through the offices of the United States Shipping Commissions. Unless this demand is won, the newly formed union faces the same sort of discrimination that the "Blue Book" made possible with respect to the longshoremen. With the depression, seamen's wages dropped from $50 and $75 to $33 and $50, and the twelve-hour day was established by about half the lines. Since the strike, Dollar and Matson line passenger ships have been filling vacancies with college boys at $23 a month.

With the general strike, of course, the issue has become both wider and simpler. It is, will San Francisco be a closed-shop city or not? San Francisco industrialists have for years envied the success of their Los Angeles colleagues in making the city of the angels a notorious open-shop, labor-sweating town. Unquestionably many of the West Coast industrialists have wanted this show-down. But when it came it proved too big for them to handle. Already the financial loss is almost beyond computation. Citizens forced to stand in line at the score of restaurants "accredited" by the General Strike Committee are muttering that this is "worse than the earthquake."

The whole question, of course, is more than merely that of the open versus the closed shop. It involves the larger issue of the general strike as a weapon, and already even liberal newspapers are beginning to say that labor has "no right" to inflict the hardships entailed upon any community. But if labor has no such right, then the employers are in exactly the same position and are neither more nor less responsible for whatever hardships may ensue. The real question is one of expediency and tactics. The general strike is an act of desperation and last resort, and it has not in the past proved markedly successful. It is obviously the duty of any government to preserve order and to suppress rioting. But we, at least, do not doubt labor's "right" to employ the general strike as a weapon.

Hitlerism in a New Phase

WITH an orgy of blood Hitler and his associates put an end to national socialism in the Reich. The coup of June 30 was the outcome of contradictions inherent in its regime. Hitler, Goering, and Göbbels were pressed by powerful capitalist interests while the old reactionaries—the Junkers, militarists, and influential bureaucracy of the Hohenzollern era—on the one hand and Hitler's own S.A. followers on the other attacked his policies and sought to undermine his personal supremacy. Hitler's coup de force occurred at the zenith of this crisis. The incredible tempo with which Germany had been driven in the direction of the totalitarian state, accomplishing in a year what Mussolini achieved in four, and the rashness with which it imposed its will on every phase of social and industrial life were not without reason. Despite its spiritless capitulation, the German working class represented a much greater potential force than that of Italy. This Hitler knew and he planned to demolish this incipient foe before it could strike.

Mussolini's conquest of the Italian people coincided with the beginning of a period of economic ascension. Germany, on the contrary, is suffering from the disintegrating effects of an ever-widening crisis which derides every attempt to restore normal conditions with artificial means. It gave Hitler no time to experiment, to feel his way. Under more favorable circumstances he might have concealed behind occasional concessions to the masses his subservience to the heavy industrialists who have financed and built up his movement. But the necessity of sustaining a tremendous army of unemployed out of the nation's coffers and Germany's losing fight against a world-wide boycott created a situation that had to be met at once with accepted capitalist methods: longer hours, lower wages, and greater oppression of the working class. This line of attack, manifestly at variance with his pseudo-socialist program of the past, at first brought no open resistance on the part of the masses, who accepted it as a necessary intermediate step in the direction of fascist socialization. But as time went by and Hitler's bondage to the financial and industrial overlords of the nation became increasingly apparent, dissatisfaction grew among the workers, the tradesmen, and the farming population. This popular dissatisfaction became menacing when it invaded the Storm divisions, heretofore the support of the fascist regime.

For some time Hitler had planned to abolish this army of more than a million men and to create a smaller but absolutely reliable party army. A month's vacation for the Storm Troopers—a vacation strictly without uniforms and arms, to begin on July 1—was to have been the first step in that direction. But again events forced the Chancellor to accelerate what he had probably planned to do with greater circumspection. Von Papen's provocative speech, the consequent hostilities between the Storm Troops and the Steel Helmets, the refusal of the S.A. leaders to accept dictation, and Krupp von Bohlen's threatened resignation as head of the heavy industries, forced him to take this drastic step sooner than he had probably intended.

In the realm of foreign affairs matters were no less precarious. Germany was isolated, politically and commercially. It had suffered a number of significant defeats: in the matter of the Polish corridor and, more recently, in the official withdrawal, under pressure from Italy, of its claim to Austria. Nor is the outlook more favorable for the future. The possible loss of the Saar region through the opposition of the Centrist Party, the impossibility of continuing its armament program in its entirety and the consequent hopelessness of its plan to solve Germany's problems at the point of the sword, the collapse of the mark at home and the consequent rise in prices of staples and important food products, the prostration of its job-producing scheme, and, last but most important, its failure to obtain credits abroad—all these brought Germany to the brink of catastrophe and created a situation which made it easy for the forces of reaction to take the reins once more and make Hitler subservient to their bidding.

The Chancellor was willing to fulfill the demands the heavy industries made upon him. He was not willing to relinquish political power. In this dilemma there was only one course which he could take: to strike out against both fronts at once in the hope that his influence in the Reichswehr was already sufficiently strong to insure its support. Here, by the way, we may find the answer to the mystery surrounding Schleicher's death. The former Chancellor had not resigned himself to private life. He looked forward to a future in which he with the help of his Reichswehr colleagues would again stand at the head of the German government. This Hitler knew. War Minister von Blomberg, who had always sympathized strongly with the National Socialist movement, stood behind the present Chancellor. If his influence was to predominate over that of Schleicher and his supporters, the latter must be removed.

As matters stand at present Germany's industrialists and financiers will be glad to avail themselves of the "Leader's" personal popularity. Hitler's position with the masses is still strong. In the Reichstag he declared: "The policies of the Reich will remain as they were. There will be no changes." But no mention was made of the fact that Minister of Economics Schmitt, representative par excellence of the great industrialists, has been made industrial dictator with unrestricted power over commercial and industrial affairs.

The immediate war danger, of which the Reich has been the focal point for more than a year, seems to have been banned for some time to come. The Powers, probably in conjunction with Germany and Soviet Russia, will come to some workable arrangement regarding Balkan spheres of interest and will establish temporary "order" on the Continent. As the understanding just arrived at between Great Britain's leading statesmen and Louis Barthou has already proved, a German government dominated wholly by capitalist interests may count on concessions in the shape of credits and rearmament. Anti-Semitism will not be liquidated, but a more conciliatory attitude will be shown toward influential sections of the Jewish population. There will be a check on the flagrant "outrages" which constituted an important part of the Storm Trooper's recreational activity and which were so largely responsible for the resentment of the outside world.

For Germany's recovery program under this new direction the working masses and the small bourgeoisie will have to pay. Prices are rising, must rise if the government would retain the support of the farming population, already much incensed over the recent application of a coercive grain-collection system. Wages, on the other hand, already much reduced, will fall to still lower levels. The program of lower wages and longer hours which the government has not dared to inaugurate, will now be put into effect. Social insurance will all but disappear. Hitler's fantastic job-producing program, which forced harassed factory and farm owners to over-staff their plants and acres with inefficient and unskilled S.A. men at dole wages, will be the first to go by the board. The S.A. man who was a person to be feared and conciliated in the past, once more becomes a jobless proletarian. Despite the suffering and terror that Hitler's metamorphosis will bring to the German people, it will mean a large step forward for the working class. The feeling that it is grappling with an invincible foe is gone; it knows from experience that it can stand firm against the industrialists.

That German labor does not rise in revolt today is not due to its failure to realize the altered situation. At present it is without revolutionary leadership. But illegal activity will increase and will find the masses more receptive and other elements more tolerant of its propaganda. The reorganization of Germany's working class is about to begin. May it find leaders big enough to bear the responsibility for its future.

Issues and Men

Borah Goes on the War Path

WILLIAM E. BORAH is a law, if not a party, unto himself. The mystery of him never fails to stir the wonder of all who observe him at close range. Here is a man of extraordinary ability who in some respects towers above everyone else in the Senate. When he rises to speak, Senators rush to their seats precisely as they hurry to leave them when Senator Copeland gets on his feet. His speeches are excellent reading, solid, with form and vigor, and as a lawyer he has few equals in Washington. Yet the fact is that he does not begin to exercise the influence that he should. Conservatives dislike and distrust him. Liberals and reformers admire him and mourn that he will not take the role of a national leader which he could have essayed at any time during the last twenty years. Had he done so the whole history of the United States would have been different. He could have galvanized into life all the Progressive forces of 1912, so shamefully betrayed by Theodore Roosevelt after he had called them into being. He could have led the liberal forces throughout the country to confront the black reaction of Harding and Coolidge, and he could have made the nomination of Herbert Hoover impossible.

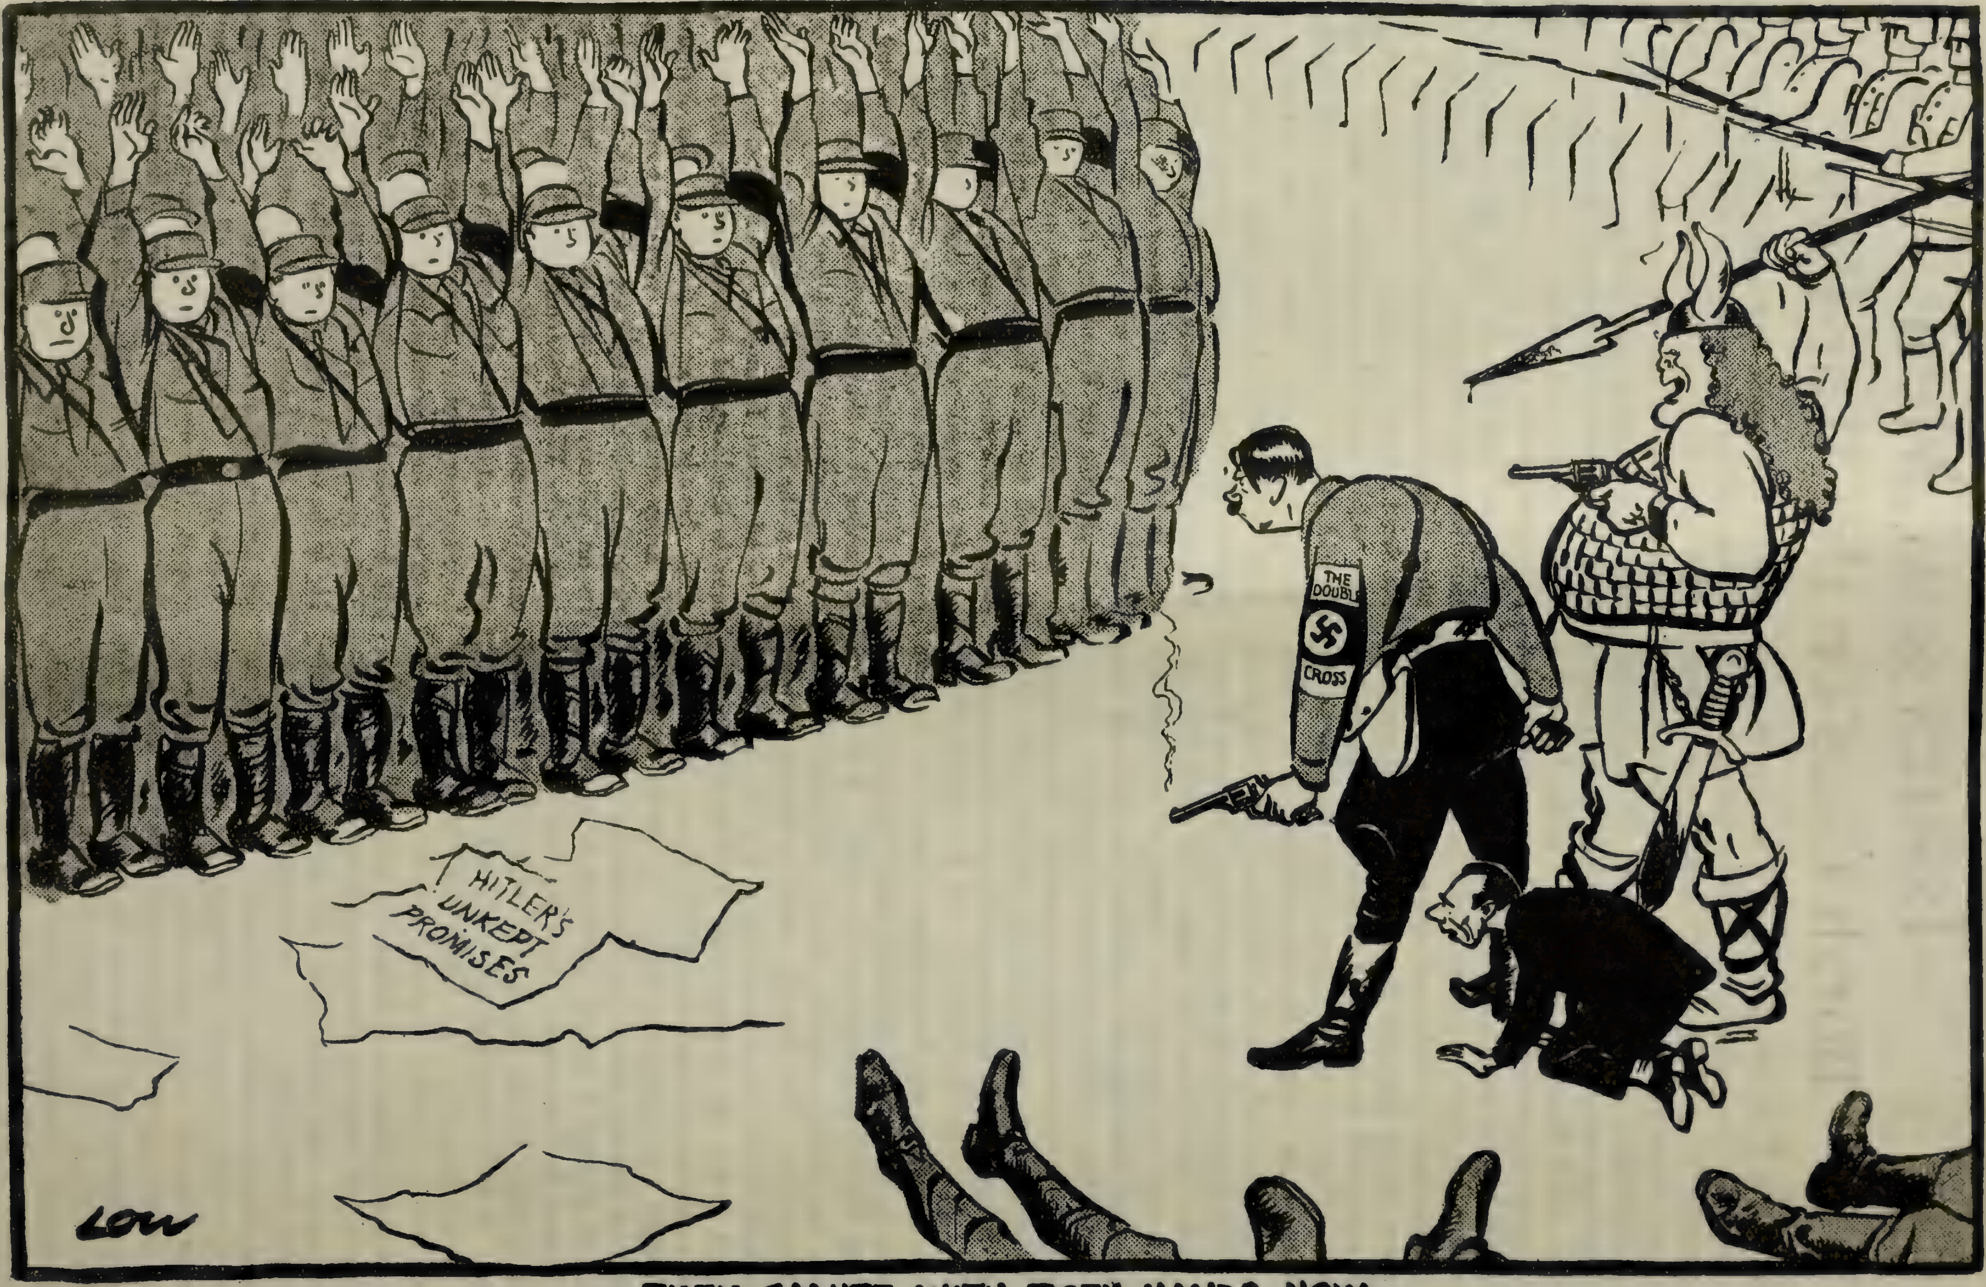
Indeed, I believe he could have compelled his own nomination. Sometimes I wonder if he could not still do it. The opportunity is not only in his own ability, but in the amazing dearth of first-rate candidates in the Republican Party. I have already pointed out how extraordinary it is that we are half way to the next Presidential nominations and that there are no Republican candidates in sight. I know, of course, that big business has its eye on ex-Senator Jimmy Wadsworth of New York and is carefully saying nothing about him publicly so that no movement will be started to head him off. But the Jimmys and Teddys are not big enough for a substantial opposition to Mr. Roosevelt. Borah has the strength and power, the logical and analytical mind, and despite his having passed his sixty-ninth birthday and having had to undergo a serious operation, he is still in fine health. Indeed, he has always taken the best care of that large body of his. He has led a most regular life. I once wrote that "his daily horseback ride in Rock Creek Park is as much an institution in the Capital as the Washington Monument itself." He has declined to yield to social lures and he has accomplished the prodigious amount of work that he has achieved by devoting every possible moment to study. He now threatens once more to cut loose and has left Washington for his home State with the announcement that he will speak during the summer on various occasions to combat the bureaucratic regime of Roosevelt, the suspension of the anti-trust laws, the rise of monopoly, and our "departure from the principles of the Constitution," which he says will be as "disappointing and disastrous to the interests of the American people" as was our going into the war to make the world safe for democracy in which, as he now admits, "We did not succeed." He will also attack the Republicans for some of their sins.

It will be a grand thing to have a man like this in opposition all summer, and he will find plenty to talk about in the dangers of the emergency powers granted to the President. But the old sickening doubt as to whether he will go through with his program returns to plague us. There is some constitutional inhibition in the man that seems to prevent his persisting in the campaigns that he undertakes. I do not believe, as do many, that it is a question of the front page, and that he loses interest when the subject which he is discussing finds its way into the back pages of the dailies. But there lies the mystery of it. Certainly it will be possible, if he does not grasp this opportunity to put himself at the head of the opposition, to write on his tombstone that here was a man who could have been the President of the United States, but who would not—and there are few who deserve this epitaph. After the next campaign he will be too old to be considered for the office. Of course, I do not know whether the arch reactionary, Henry Fletcher, would care to have him head the party; probably not. But if he should for once in his life cast all reserve to the winds and go into the Republican primaries with a clear-cut, constructive program, he could give the Republican high command some extremely interesting hours, and perhaps make people feel that William E. Borah for once had lived up to his ability and made the most of the talents that nature has bestowed upon him.

It is considerable of a jump from Idaho to Mississippi, but I must not forbear to call attention to the three-cornered fight for the Senatorship in that Southern State. What distinguishes it is that Congressman Ross A. Collins has abandoned a sure seat in the House after years of service to contest for the Senatorship. His letter telling me of his decision aroused mixed feelings, for there has been no more useful man in the House of Representatives than Mr. Collins. Indeed, there is no man in that body who so thoroughly knows the army situation. His years of service on the Appropriations Committee he utilized to make himself a greater authority on military expenditures, I have heard it said, than any man in the War Department. He has often tripped up not only the heads of the War Department themselves, and the chiefs of staff, but division heads of the department who have appeared before the sub-committee of which he is chairman with such incessant demands for more money as to make the horse-leech's daughters appear models of self-abnegation. There is no one in the House to take his place in this respect. He is the only Congressman who has persistently fought the army and navy lobby, who has seemed to realize to the fullest degree the alarming growth of the military power in Washington. I hope with all my heart that he will be elected. We need a man like him in the Senate, but we need a dozen like him in the House. According to the reports the choice lies between Mr. Collins and ex-Governor Bilbo.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



THE DOUBLE CROSS
HITLER'S UNKEPT PROMISES
LOW

THEY SALUTE WITH BOTH HANDS NOW.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press. Reproduction in the United States forbidden.

The Age of Distribution

By STUART CHASE

MY "Economy of Abundance," to which Mr. John Strachey took such gentlemanly but profound exception in The Nation for May 9, discussed new social conceptions made necessary by new physical and technological conditions. In the argument, orthodox socialism and communism, as well as capitalism, individualism, and various other isms, were brought under critical review. Where the facts seemed to lead, I tried to follow, irrespective of what hallowed cathedrals of doctrine were damaged.

The new physical conditions and facts are reasonably apparent and have repeatedly been called to our attention. There is no need to go into them at length here. They include: A compounding curve of invention; a vast per-capita increase in the consumption of inanimate energy; an industrial and agricultural plant far in excess of pecuniary market demand; a steady increase in output per man hour, resulting in a surplus of labor and technological unemployment; specialization of economic activity to the point where it now constitutes one interdependent net work; population growing at a decrement; autarchy and the resulting decline of foreign trade.

With these facts firmly in mind, let us approach the concept "capitalism." What is it? I should define it as the private ownership of the means of production, and, by virtue of such ownership, a flow of free income in the form of profits, interest, rents, and royalties. After deducting living expenses, including certain outlays for conspicuous consumption, the pleasure and the duty of the capitalists has been to invest the balance in more means of production, the income from which, after deductions, is further reinvested, ad infinitum.

This stupendous rhythm of compounding indebtedness has not only been pleasurable to capitalists, but it has come to provide the balance wheel of the whole system. The prompt investment of the free income has provided wages and salaries for workers in durable-goods industries, with which income these workers have cleared the shelves of the consumers' goods produced in the same period. Equilibrium came to depend on compounding reinvestment in a compounding durable-goods sector, which distributed compounding purchasing power, with which a compounding volume of consumers' goods was cleared at a profit—which was once more reinvested. Accounting, insurance, actuarial, and banking practice are all predicated on this rhythm. Capitalism by its name connotes the investment and safe-guarding of capital, or the profitable accumulation of the means of production. It is a method harsh but pragmatic for building up a productive plant; for "developing" a given economic area. It belongs to an age where the problems of production are paramount.

But what of the time when the area should be at last "developed"; when the means of production should no longer be at a premium as a vehicle for profitable investment; when the exquisite mathematics of the compounding process should run clear off the map of physical realities? Capitalists have been too busy ever to answer these questions. Even today, with the compounding process seriously crippled, most capitalists prefer a mystic nostalgia for 1928 to any frank facing of their own formula.

Yet for all practical purposes, the problem of production is solved. The plant has lost its scarcity status, as witnessed by surpluses and excess capacity, a condition which was becoming ominous long before the depression. Further increases in the means of production are discouraged, owing to the poor prospects of realizable profits. Regard the sorry state of the durable-goods industries today, and the huge surplus of idle capital in the banks. But without an increase—duly compounded—in the means of production, durable-goods workers remain on the streets, their purchasing power all but gone. This so depresses the total volume of purchasing power that profits and free income are, for the system as a whole, inadequate to validate the values set on the present means of production. According to R. R. Doane, capital assets valued at $441,000,000,000 for the whole nation in 1929 dropped to $256,000,000,000 in 1932. The decline of nearly two hundred billion registers an appalling shrinkage in the ability to validate.

With no sufficient means under the canons of "sound money" to extend markets and purchasing power, the system comes to a halt, the majestic rhythm stops. Presently it goes below the line into disintegration—as we have observed it for the past five years, both here and abroad. Capitalism cannot stand still without disaster. It must move forward to keep in equilibrium—like the Red Queen.

The simple conclusion seems to be that capitalism has fulfilled its function, the plant has been built to the limit of the sound-money framework, and the flow of free income is seriously jeopardized. Whether that body of enterprising individuals constituting the "control" (see Berle and Means) of this disintegrating system are also departing, is another question. Some, like Kreuger, Insull, Wiggin, and Mitchell, have gone; others may or may not follow. We shall return to them presently.

Consciously or unconsciously, economic thinking and economic action are now oriented towards distribution. The consumer is creeping to the center of the stage. Ways and means to furnish him with purchasing power form the outstanding problem of current statesmanship. Doles, subsidies, civil works, public works, controlled prices, pegged minimum wages are all aimed pragmatically, if without much theoretical blessing, at mass distribution, a distribution which by-passes the rigid formula of capitalism. The fact of the by-passing is amply evidenced by the piteous wails issuing from the sound-money camp.

Aids to distribution have taken two general forms—the artificial stimulation of purchasing power through government spending; the rationing of surplus products—like wheat, meat, potatoes—direct to the needy consumer. All Western nations are threatening their budget balances with one or the other of these devices. We use both in the United States, and the general opinion seems to be that we must use them far more freely. John Maynard Keynes recently advised the President that four hundred million, rather than the present one hundred million a month, was essential if the economic machine was to continue to operate.

These doles, driblets of relief, and feeble "make-work" projects can hardly be dignified with the title of "a distributive age." But they clearly mark the beginning of such an age, as Watt's wheezy old steam engine marked the beginning of the age of quantity production. If private business cannot distribute the surplus, the community must. The community is proceeding to do so, with comparatively little regard for budget balancing. Consumers must eat. There can be, I believe, no permanent retreat from this beginning. The tide of distribution must mount, at the cost of any and every "sound-money" barrier.

At some dated point, which I believe has been reached, capitalism as the dominant institution gives way to consumerism, or distributism, or whatever you please to call it. Capitalists will continue for a time legally to own many of the means of production, but not to reap unearned income therefrom in anything like the amounts hitherto obtaining for the system as a whole. The United States Steel Corporation, the central pillar of American capitalism and of the age of production, has been in the red for several years to the extent of scores of millions of dollars. Without sufficient customers, the magnificent plants are a liability, and an expensive one. Technological abundance is breaking the stranglehold of private ownership on the means of production; not in every industry to be sure, but in enough industries to warrant the generalization. The proof is found in the figures of excess capacity. So the product must be shared with the masses, who alone are numerous enough to consume it, whatever the status of legal ownership. A vested right in the means of production is profitable only when pecuniary demand outruns supply. When the technical arts create a supply in excess of pecuniary demand, the financial value of vested rights approaches zero.

In short, in a distributive age, it is not of cardinal importance who owns what, except as a matter of administrative efficiency. The important thing is that mass consumption balance mass production. Costs in terms of man hours are now very low, and going lower with every technical improvement.

Capitalism as we have known it is being liquidated under technological pressure. To deny this is to deny the facts of the modern world. It by no means follows that capitalists of the "control" group are due for similar liquidation. It is probable that they will move heaven and earth to control the new economy as they once controlled capitalism. They are forceful fellows with sublime egos. It will be a very different plate of beans, however, and may confuse them considerably. Their cherished stock market will no longer be central in the picture, and it was about the stock market that their control technique largely revolved.

As a matter of fact, the "control" in recent years has not owned the properties which it has manipulated. The wayfaring investor has held the bag. This cleavage between finance capital and the general investor is indicative of the declining importance of ownership. Even if workers owned their factories, they would be as helpless without a market as their sometime bosses. You cannot eat crankshafts, or clothe yourself in spark plugs. Ownership is a static, legal concept. The power age is a dynamic physical reality; its goods must be moved regardless of ownership, or it ceases to function. Mr. Strachey does not deny the decline of capitalism, rather he first admits and then denies it, for a reason which I think I can explain. He pictures it deciding to accept a lower and lower rate of profit, down to one-fourth of 1 per cent, which he thinks will mean an equal or greater aggregate return. But this depends on increasing markets, and how markets are to increase when mass purchasing power is declining—when in fact markets themselves are statistically declining—he does not say. Nor does he allow for any divergence of opinion, or of will, or even of funds, among capitalists. As an orthodox communist he sees all capitalists representing one mind, one heart, one pool for investment, on which one governing intelligence sets the rate. This is carrying class-consciousness to lengths which the facts deny.

I do not pretend in this brief exposition to enter the vast and vaulted grottoes of Marxian criticism. Marx was a great man. His economic vision was profound, perhaps to the point of foreseeing the collapse of capitalism at the hands of a surplus economy. His sociology was less profound, and his tactics, I believe, stand in need of extensive revision. The analysis of socialism in this article does not pretend to account for all that Marx did or did not say. It follows a simpler pattern—the popular conception of socialism as evidenced by the linguistic behavior of most of its adherents.

Let us look more closely at the popular concept of "socialism." Its cardinal plank is also ownership—the social ownership of the means of production. It is thus a kind of anti-capitalism, developed in opposition to capitalism, in the age of scarcity when the problem of production was dominant. It proposed to wrench the monopoly of ownership in the scarce means of production away from private parties and vest it in the state. Most socialists appear to assume that the volume of goods is limited, and that the division should be more just. But under 1934 technological conditions, the potential volume of goods is all but unlimited.

What happens to anti-capitalism when capitalism degenerates; when a distributive economy undermines the strategic importance of the private ownership of the means of production? Socialism loses some of its own importance. That is why John Strachey denied the evidence in my book. He leapt to defend the continued existence of a bold, bad capitalism; for if it weakens, his doctrine weakens. The two are inextricably interlocked. Mr. Strachey drew a somber picture of the capitalist class all but welcoming the depression as an opportunity to weed out the small fry and consolidate its position. Assuming that this has happened (in some cases monopolies have been strengthened, in others, like Mid West Utilities, broken), what good is consolidation without an adequate volume of sales? The national income has been cut in half. Mr. Strachey, and communists generally, have a producer tropism; they look at plant and its ownership. I have been driven to look first at the distribution mechanism as something which has come to overshadow and control the other. They would have workers seize the factories. I would have workers, and consumers generally, control the distributive machinery and organize that flow of purchasing power and goods which governments, under the pressure of circumstances, are already feebly steering in their direction.

The moral sanction of factory seizure was given by the doctrine that labor creates all wealth. This was roughly true in 1850. Today the mental labor of technicians harnesses inanimate energy to create far more wealth in total tonnage than is created by manual labor. The traditional toiler is passing from the productive picture at an alarming rate. Already in this country an adequate flow of physical goods could be produced by not more than one-fifth of the working population. Yet everybody must eat. A surplus economy is undermining rigid conceptions of the class struggle. The conflict is no longer primarily between producers and owners of the means of production; the ground has shifted to a point where mass consumption is sovereign to both, technologically as well as ethically. Class struggles we may have, but the lines must be reformed.

Socialism, narrowly interpreted, loses much of its drive and significance in a distributive age. In its broader aspects, namely distributive justice and community well being, it is of course greatly advanced, for mass distribution is a long step towards social justice. But the ancient strategies, the ancient objectives, the ancient hates, become less valid. This is depressing, if not infuriating, to those who have devoted their lives to capturing scarcity-age citadels. Capitalism has become a dear and necessary enemy. I call on any competent psychologist to check me on these observations.

Meanwhile nobody had a rounded philosophy which did fit the modern facts, and about which a realistic movement for the regeneration of society could rally. No prophet arose to develop a doctrine for the distribution age. The gross, mountainous facts moved, but interpretation was lacking. The vast public interest in technocracy was in response, I believe, to a flash interpretation which seemed to fit the facts. It captured more imaginations in a few months than socialists had done in a generation of hard, devoted work.

Technocracy indicated that there was plenty of goods and promised mass distribution. The effect was electric. Here was something which lived and moved. Plain citizens find it difficult to become excited about taking legal title to steel mills, coal mines, and railroads, and civil servants find it even more difficult. Why burden one's self with colossal administrative burdens, if ownership is not a cardinal consideration? Why regulate everything, if goods must flow in any event? The important matter is the goods.

If private parties refuse to move the goods, of course the community, through the state, or through consumers' associations, or through guilds of technicians, must see that they are moved. (I understand that it was suggested in Washington that, in the event of a complete breakdown of industry, army officers should be thrown in to administer the plants.) That this will sooner or later entail nationalization of many of the means of production, I do not doubt. Technological considerations already point to public ownership of banks, railroads, and the energy industries—coal, oil, and electric power—in the near future. The basic question to answer is what method promises to move the goods and disseminate the physical surplus with the least social disruption. A dogmatic insistence that nothing can be accomplished until the profit system is officially abolished and the state is captured by the proletariat loses point in a surplus economy. If the claims of capitalists were being handsomely validated, the dogma would have point; the capitalists must be cleared away. As we have seen, the claims are not being validated for the system as a whole, and the capitalists are clearing themselves away—to the extent of a two hundred-billion-dollar shrinkage in the past four years. And the end is not yet. Mr. Strachey says the capitalists will not permit themselves to be expropriated. It is not a question, as I see it, of permission; it is a question of maintaining expanding markets. If capitalists can expand markets, their holdings will be validated; if they cannot, expropriation takes place by default. Mr. Morgan is as helpless as King Canute.

For a long time I have been searching for a social philosophy which would fit the modern facts. Thorstein Veblen started me on this quest. I have tried to hold to the facts no matter whose toes were stepped on. I have not been able to find any hope in an enlightened or reformed capitalism. This is not because all capitalists are low fellows, but because of the inflexibility of their compounding formula. A production system cannot fit a distribution age. I have been unable to find a realistic solution in the class-struggle tactics of socialism or communism, as popularly interpreted, because they too are production-age systems. Technocracy was an analysis with which in large part I agreed, but which carried no practical program of action. I have been unable to find any satisfying general solution in simple shotgun remedies like the Douglas plan, although it faces squarely the problem of distribution.

This has thrown me back on the experimental method. Experimentation is a somewhat lonely business, lacking, as it does, the warm arms of faith and doctrine. Given the modern trend, however, what else can a fact follower do? There is no body of doctrine competent to deal with this trend.

"The Economy of Abundance" was an attempt objectively to describe the forces at work. To act intelligently, one must first understand. Few people seem to sense the extent of the pressures which applied science has let loose; even fewer the concept of the technological imperative. The latter pointed a path; if my description was adequate, a line of action was indicated. Certain planks in a program could even be laid down. But I built no complete program because I did not know enough. When a sufficiently large group succeeds in digesting the characteristics, trends, and imperatives of a surplus economy, a real program will be forthcoming, and not before. It was to the understanding of that group that my book was addressed. Spade work if you please, but without spade work you have no house, or at best a rickety one.

The formulation of a clean-cut philosophy and a social program for the age of distribution is coming. It will contain many elements broadly called socialistic. It may win the allegiance of many socialists, now vaguely disturbed with their own lack of progress. It will be strongly collectivist; it will nationalize certain key industries; it will work out a method of non-interest-bearing public credit, it will largely displace the profit motive—not for ethical reasons but to move the goods. A vast extension in the public-works sector appears to be inevitable. The general objective will be the distribution of the surplus, rather than a wrangling over the ownership of a productive plant which has lost its scarcity position.

What devils the new philosophy may have to face I do not know—fascism is obviously one—but the head devil will not be traditional capitalism. I am sorry that I had to speak disrespectfully of Mr. Strachey's devil—he was a grand devil until very recently—but the facts seem to show that he has now compounded himself into a quite dreadful impasse.

Dog Days in Washington

By MILDRED ADAMS

Washington, July 10

WHATEVER may be the condition of the rest of the country, there can be little doubt that Washington is almost its old self again. The President is on vacation. Congress has gone home. General Johnson has gone to the country. The beat of life sounds less like a riveter and more like a bumble bee. The pace of the streets is that of the South in the hot sun. Nothing disturbs the summer somnolence but the struggle of a late-born board to get itself desks and telephones.

This drowsy torpor is not solely the effect of the summer sun. Collars wilted and foreheads dripped last year as now, but men were galvanized by an idea, or a whole set of ideas, into an activity that made them oblivious of temperature. Now the force of novelty, the drive of emergency, are dying away. Idealism is out of breath.

It has taken fifteen months for the tremendous stimulant that was the New Deal to wear off, and the ancient forces of red tape, politics, climate, fatigue, and plain human inertia to reassert themselves. Fifteen months of energy and improvization, of work so hard and so continuous that flesh and blood performed miracles in its accomplishment. Fifteen months of erecting a new super-government above the paralyzed form of the old. Fifteen months of establishing federal control over the banker, the farmer, the home owner, the stock broker, the miner, the industrialist, the retailer, the manufacturer, the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the social worker and the unemployed. Fifteen months of swift, hard effort of the kind that delights the American to the bottom of his bones. Work so steady that there is no time for doubt, hours so long that all stimulants lose their power to keep a man awake. One may fall asleep in a board meeting from sheer exhaustion, but there is no room for worrying about ultimate ends.

And now that the framework of the new governmental edifice is up? Now that the New Deal has entered on its "administrative phase"? It is summer, hot, muggy, hard on all kinds of starch. The NRA holds a picnic down the river to celebrate its first birthday, and so few of the faithful attend that the special boat is only half filled. The PWA has a day off as its birthday present, but not before Secretary Ickes has lectured it for eating breakfast on office time (they get to work at eight) and rushing off to play the moment the clock strikes half-past three. The miracles are a little limp, and many of the young have temporarily given up remaking the world in favor of picnicking along the Potomac.

Three of the agencies that were most active last year look distinctly dog-eared. The National Labor Board that was to revolutionize relations between workers and employers has broken under the strain and been junked. The Consumers' Advisory Board, that was going to unearth, organize, and protect the consumer from the predatory self-interest of the industrialist and the worker, sits in its offices and counts its meager winnings over and over again, while its executive secretary packs his trunk to go and be a college president in Oregon. Even the NRA, which won most of its battles with the other two, looks groggy. The old rushes are staged at intervals, the old bellows emerge, but the general effect is of being what prizefight reporters call "punch drunk."

Meanwhile what interest there is has shifted to the newer agencies of control created by the last Congress. Housing, the securities and stock-exchange board, farm mortgages, the new labor board. There the lights burn into the night, there lunches are snatched from trays on desks, there board members fight over ways and means, and discover that they are also setting up first principles.

Even now the stimulus is not all gone. The level of intelligence and interest has not yet sunk to where it was in, say, the Coolidge era. Conversation still sparkles if you know where to look for it, and cooperation is not all construed as always meaning "yes." The night has not yet come when the only government building showing lights is the one that prints the stamps and the paper bills. But the signs all point to a reestablishment of that discouraging spectacle called normal political life.

It may be, as some people say, that this is merely a breathing spell, that the country needs a vacation from the constant Roosevelt drive, that when cool weather comes and the President returns the town will take up its Utopia building with the old enthusiasm. But if that happens, it will be because that versatile magician has managed to produce an entirely new bunch of rabbits from his hard-working silk hat. These people are tired. Some of them are leaving, some are turning cynics, almost all of them are slowing down. Perhaps the surest index of their mood lies in the quality of the conversation one hears and the contrast between the parties of winter and summer. Not official conversation, not state parties, just the ordinary talk of ordinary young New Dealers.

They poured into Washington last summer, sick of depression inertia, full of energy and enthusiasm, delighted at the chance of doing something which seemed constructive. Young lawyers, economists, financiers, executives, industrialists come to look after codes, idealists burning to have at least one finger in molding the life of their country a little nearer to their heart's desire. The pace of work speeded up. In place of a leisurely seven or eight hours, these men worked ten, twelve, fourteen. People began to talk of wartime psychology, of emergency psychosis. Any man who was not obviously overworked felt apologetic. In spite of the Administration's outspoken desire to shorten hours, increase wages, and spread employment throughout the nation, the rule in Washington was that anyone who did a job well had twice as much to do the next day.

By October the new machine was running at top speed. Code makers filled all the hotels. Government buildings were jammed with new bureaus and new people, some of whom were unknown even to their own telephone operators. So much was being done that even the big dailies gave up trying to cover all the news. The town discovered an entirely new kind of social life. Casual people, these newcomers, with little sense of the hard and fast precedents and conventions that rule Washington. Young men who kept no account of hours, who rented houses, installed cooks, lived as though they were in college fraternity houses, who seemed to have no responsibilities outside of their jobs, and were quite capable of wearing shorts to the office if it was hot. Young women of a type Washington hardly recognized, neither debutante nor civil-service clerk, capable of hard and intelligent work, wearing clothes well, not easy to step on.

Never since the war, they say, has there been as much good conversation in Washington as during the first nine months of the Roosevelt regime. It went from the top to the bottom, and it was not all emergency stuff. Men and women of many different minds worked together under a pressure that generated an enormous energy and an amazing curiosity. Any lunch, any dinner, any cocktail party burgeoned with new programs. The air was electric. Hard and fast ideas were stood on their heads. The marvel was that the Dr. Wirts heard so little.

It was not only immediate plans that interested these people, but the philosophies that lay back of them. Each of them needed to find out what the others thought were the basic things of life, theories of government, economic concepts—and why. What is money? What is labor's share, and what the best way to obtain it? Wherein does American capitalism differ from that described by Marx? What might communism do to America, and how would we like it? Is democracy actually finished?

Lawyers from Harvard who had sickened of Wall Street, social workers who had learned their liberalism under Johnson in California, agricultural and monetary experts from Texas and New York State, financiers from the Chicago Board of Trade, editors from Georgia, all trying to meet each other's minds, produced a particularly engaging set of mental gymnastics. How much permanent importance it had is another matter. Certainly it blew off steam, sometimes it resulted in a bit of mutual education, sometimes it merely set people more firmly in their own ruts.

To an onlooker it was immensely stimulating. Anybody was willing to talk about the whole experiment, or his own part of it, to anyone who would listen. Instead of having to dig for information, the conscientious observer found himself protecting officials from their own indiscretions. Newspaper people knew more, and told less, than for years.

Then Congress came back with fire in its eye, angry at neglect, outraged at what was happening, jealous for its prerogatives, its privileges, its influence. Georgetown resumed its ancient sway, though with a new set of hostesses. Alice Longworth was eclipsed by another and very different feminine Roosevelt in the White House. Ruth McCormick Sims was gone. But Arabella Greenaway, with a seat in Congress, a private fortune, a long friendship with the President's wife, and the reputation of possessing more charm than any other woman in Washington, took her place. Mary Harriman Rumsey rented a house from which she directed the destinies of the Consumers' Advisory Board when she was not commuting from New York. Frances Perkins lived with her, and had her housekeeping done and her parties given for her in the expansive Harriman way.

With Congress there came back a very different type of social life. The social structure of Washington is an involved and traditional thing, based on precedent and jealously guarded by its devotees. There is an elaborate system of inviting and accepting, of seating and being seated, of calling and receiving. The story of the Senator's wife who refused to enter a ladies' dressing room until the wife of a younger Senator who had preceded her went out, is told in all seriousness.

With one eye the traditionalists looked askance at the unconventional young, and with the other recognized them as potential cocktail partners and decorative dinner guests. After all, a lion was a lion, and the Brain Trust were the heroes of the hour. So fashionable ladies discovered economics, and the young, eating richer dinners, began to put on weight.

It was too early for real disillusionment to set in, but some of the more ardent idealists began to wear a slightly baffled air. The barriers of politics, inertia, established interest were telling. There is little of the good talk left now. The only people one finds discussing the larger aims of the New Deal are strangers just come to town or officials giving interviews in which they will be quoted. For most of those who work in it, the forest has vanished in the trees. Any mention of abolishing unemployment, establishing sound cooperation between worker and industrialist, gets a very weary eye. Conversation has dwindled into discussion of detail at the best, and virulent gossip at the worst. There is little of that exhilarating necessity for protecting key people against their own confidences. They are more apt to look about on all four sides of them, and then impart as a matter of the greatest secrecy something that was in all the papers at least two weeks ago—also characteristic of the old Washington.

There is nothing extraordinary or necessarily discouraging about such a let-down. The American people are good sprinters. They work in spurts, and then rest. The whoopee era was a spurt of one kind, the depression a rest period, however much it may have resembled national nervous prostration. The Roosevelt honeymoon was another and different spurt. What it did to Washington must be assessed now, for the honeymoon is definitely over. Its most obvious achievement is the super-government it has set up, that network of boards, authorities, corporations, administrations which has almost obscured the old departments. They have the President's interest and confidence, and the interest of the public. They also have the spending of gigantic sums of money in the administering of emergency legislation. Their office needs have outrun even the gigantic building program, and they are scattered about the city in almost any ancient mansion or old warehouse. Their clerical force is an army which has come from the ends of America, and, as New Dealers, has developed a queer cohesion which seems to have little to do with past lives or future hopes.

This New Deal army has almost eclipsed the older civil service. It is by and large of better mental caliber, more initiative, greater receptivity to new ideas. Perhaps it is thereby less dependable, less sure to stick no matter how stupid the job. Certainly it is resented by the older group, which regards it as a bunch of spoiled kids. Even the women in it who have, by sheer ability and the point of view that takes equality for granted, done more to secure a place in the governmental sun than Washington has ever seen, get no whole-hearted admiration from their elder sisters in service. But there is no reason why they should. The Brain Trusters are not admired by Congress.

Montana Challenges the Tyranny of Copper

By WARD KINNEY

Butte, Montana, July 12

TWO speeding cars careen through traffic, bounce over street-car tracks, roar up and down the precipitous streets of "the richest hill on earth." In the lead car, hard-pressed by pursuers, is an Anaconda Copper company gunman, alone. Five strikers are trailing him. Butte's somnolent police are unstirred. A few minutes later five sheepish men file into a crowded room and walk uneasily to chairs around a council table. Heads droop under the glare of an Irish veteran of many Butte wars.

"A fine bunch ye are! Ye let him get away!" says the old timer.

"He got to his girl's house and beat it from there; his car's faster than ours."

"His girl? Aye, she works at ——'s. Tomorrow every workin' man is to go to her counter, ask to see her goods, then say good and loud: 'So you're the little tramp who runs with that scab gunman on the hill!' Keep it up until she gets fired!"

And so Butte labor brings one more "peaceful and legal" weapon into play in the bitterest struggle in the history of battle-scarred Copper Hill, a history marred by treachery and humiliation for labor, jurisdictional fights when rifles spat across Butte streets, and the infamous lynching of the Wobbly, Frank Little, in 1917. And the Anaconda Copper Mining Company, for more than a quarter of a century czar of Montana, is fighting for its life.

"Bitterness? There ain't no bitterness in this strike. Just determination. And there hasn't been a soul hurt." So says a union leader. But there is bitterness—a pall of hate hangs over the city. Families and friends have split; daily community incidents, some funny, some tragic, testify to it. But there has been little violence. Since the union man made his boast, two men, a gunman and a scab driver, have been beaten. The gunman was arrested for drunkenness; unionists claim that his car, set afire during the melee, contained gas bombs and other weapons.

On May 8 approximately 3,600 miners and stationary engineers, members of the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smeltermen, walked off Butte's hill. The same day 700 smeltermen at Anaconda quit. Two weeks later printers on the company's two newspapers in Helena, the State capital, walked out demanding a wage scale equal to that just granted by the two dailies in Great Falls (not company owned). And on June 7, 1,000 workers in the Great Falls reduction works of the Anaconda joined the march.

There was talk, and still is, that the company wanted a Butte strike, welcomed a shutdown for two months, and had "packed" the miners' union. Older heads in unionism held the strike ill-advised because, despite its grievances, Butte is reputedly the highest-paid mining town in the world. Nevertheless the miners struck, and so did the engineers, who had never walked out before; and along with them marched every pumper and every helmet man (water and fire-fighters), leaving one of the world's richest properties at the mercy of flame and flood.

Pumps were manned with officials, office workers, recruits from Great Falls and Anaconda clerical staffs, and whatever scabs the company could find. Pay is $6 a day and board and room, but scabs are scarce. Gunmen escort those who do not sleep on the properties to and from their homes. Some of them work sixteen hours a day.

The labor press reports water rising in the mines, but even the strikers doubt any serious danger. However, fires in three properties (the copper is in a sulphur formation which burns furiously) are gaining, and despite its offer of as high as $20 daily for helmet men, the company finds few recruits for this hazardous job.

Butte miners say they are fighting for an American living standard. They want an embargo or a prohibitively high tariff on copper. The company can mine its ore in its Mexican, Chilean, or Polish properties, ship it to the United States, pay the present four-cent duty and still sell at a profit at nine cents, they claim.

Demands in the present strike are five:

1. No man required to work alone underground.
2. Reestablishment of weekly wage scale and elimination of the "contract system of drilling."
3. Six-hour day and five-day week.
4. Check-off system.
5. Increased wages, amounting roughly to $1.20 an hour for miners against the 53 cents paid when the strike began: a weekly scale of $33.50 for surface labor, $35 for smeltermen, $36 for miners, $38.50 to $50 for engineers, and $72 for helmet men when using helmet.

Strikers insist that these are minimum demands, but most observers believe some of them would be compromised, including the wage section. Most important are the first two. Butte old timers say an average of one man daily is killed or injured in the mines, and many accidents could be averted or their effect minimized if two men worked together. The contract system is one by which, paying so much per yard drilled and slashing the rate at will, the company has been able to cut wages steadily throughout the depression. Miners complain that despite a State law limiting mine shifts to eight hours, they have had to work ten or twelve to obtain $5, the minimum for survival on half-time or less.

The struggle has become more than a strike. The company is aware that, all over Montana, enemies it has crushed underfoot for twenty-five years are watching this battle; and the company has been confronted by the most amazing solidarity ever seen in the State. The most effective boycott Montana has ever known began in Butte on the day of the strike. Merchants were asked, then told, by unionists, not to advertise in the two company papers. They complied with a willingness startling to the Anaconda, which began to realize with considerable shock that the city of Butte, long its feudal domain, was heart and soul against its noble lord.

After the strike had been on a month, the two papers (the Montana Standard and the Butte Post) carried only two local advertisements of appreciable size, those of Symons' and Hennessy's, large department stores. A big grocery which had planned to break the boycott changed its mind when on June 12 the Silver Bow (County) Trades Assembly ordered complete boycott of the two stores. The papers shrank, picked up each other's type, frantically cut expenses.

The Butte Retail Clerks Union ordered merchants to cease deliveries to scabs. The company press protested, but many merchants obeyed. Unconsciously funny, the Montana Standard said: "There were no developments yesterday in the effort to prevent merchants from deliveries to families of men working in the mines . . . other than that certain stores already had put into effect the ban. . . ."

Throughout the United States, Canada, and much of Europe, mine strikers leave men to protect the properties unless operators employ scab miners. The company has made no attempt to mine ore. Why then were pumpers and helmet men called out?

The reason lies deep rooted in the soil of Butte, planted alongside seeds of hate which at last have sprouted. First, consider Butte: It is one of the dirtiest, and yet, as Joseph Pennell called it, one of the most pictorial cities in the United States. The Department of Commerce survey this spring showed that 64 per cent of Butte homes needed repairs; 32 per cent have less than adequate space for the families housed; more than 2,000 of the 10,727 dwelling units surveyed, practically 20 per cent, have no indoor toilets; more than 3,000 have no bathtub or shower, more than 6,000 still use wood or coal ranges.

A Consumers' Council survey this month revealed that for every normally-fed child in Butte, five are undernourished; Mrs. Francis Robbins, who compiled the study, is quoted in dispatches as saying, "Butte apparently has one of the highest undernourishment records in the country in proportion to its population."

Now, consider Butte labor: In 1930 Butte teamsters and machinists struck against a threatened $1-a-day cut and reversion to the nine-hour day. Butte's Associated Industries scabbed on wholesalers' trucks and forced merchants to accept goods so transported. Clerks walked out and a general strike was planned, so with James D. Graham, who heads the State Federation of Labor, a union delegation called upon Governor (now Senator) J. E. Erickson to beg him not to call out troops, at least without personal investigation. The results of this conference were not made public, but unionists were only convinced of their lack of influence in high political quarters. The militia was not called out. They returned to Butte and the strike was settled after a company threat to smash unionism in Montana, the men taking a cut in wages but retaining the eight-hour day.

In December, 1932, Butte's retail clerks were refused renewal of their contract. Labor saw this as the opening shot in another open-shop drive and the clerks struck, followed by teamsters and building trades. Bill Daly, company mine manager, was accused by unionists of dragging miners' and engineers' leaders out of bed in the night to demand that they end the downtown strike, with another union-smashing threat as alternative. The strike was won, but that threat rankled.

Now, consider the company: One day Butte miners, grumbling under wage cuts, layoffs, and meager relief, found on their doorsteps copies of a tabloid-size free newspaper, the Eye-Opener. Published by Charles Hauswirth, a successful coal merchant and long-time foe of Anaconda, and edited by Walter Shay, a rebellious descendant of the Shays of Shay's Rebellion, it presented the following statistics from the Federal Trade Commission's report:

"John D. Ryan, chairman of Anaconda, 1932 salary $214,383, bonus $2,597; Con Kelley, president, 1932 salary $249,232, bonus $3,438." Both had received more in previous years, but the company-owned press had been telling Butte that 1932 was the company's most desperate year.

Hauswirth's little weekly, formerly mimeographed, now prints some 28,000 copies a week. Still free, it finds buyers at twenty-five cents a copy a few hours after completion of the press run. Shay shares the field with the Montana Labor News, the organ of the State Federation, edited by a Congregational minister, the Reverend Charles Sebold, much given to piercing company press hypocrisies, and the Butte Citizen, the leaflet from the strike committee, listing scabs. This is typical of Citizen items:

"W. X. ——, member of engineers' union for thirty years, says he patched his overalls to educate his son; now the son is inside the Leonard fence making dirty money while his dad is on FERA making clean money and doing his hitch on the picket line. He is heartily ashamed of his son."

Lastly, consider relief: Throughout the Hoover Administration relief was controlled by the company. In March, 1934, after a legislative investigation, the Butte board, headed by Colonel D. Gay Stivers, a company attorney, quit. Among CWA abuses charged to this board by a minority report of the legislative committee (the State assembly turned it down and adopted the majority report) was the use of the "rustling card" and extensive employment of political or business "friends" of the A. C. M. on relief payrolls. The "rustling card" had been a symbol of bitter labor hatred in Butte for many years. Issued by the Mutual Labor Board, it permits the holder to seek work in the company's city. Those who were known as radicals never got cards; those who became radical were likely to lose theirs. Without one relief was unavailable.

Relief now (the miners are on it during the strike) is hailed as eminently satisfactory. Meanwhile R. C. Jacobson, federal mediator, liked by the men, continues his efforts to obtain some concessions from either side, not very hopefully. Conferences now have been moved to Washington, where last week Senator Wagner reported "progress." The strikers, whose general committee in charge of negotiations has included about fifty men, have so far refused to send a contingent to Washington.

As long as relief continues there probably will be no serious violence in Butte. Discipline is extraordinary, for all of Butte's previous wars have been bloody and vicious. But if relief should stop—the Anaconda has a fortune in hoist equipment, not too hard to sabotage; and all of Butte's power enters the city on two 100-mile lines over mountain wilderness. On July 6 somebody tossed a chain across the power line into Belmont mine, stopping the pumps for ten minutes. It would be easy to throw another chain, more effective next time, and the mile-high city in the Rockies and its "richest hill on earth" would be left to darkness and to terror.

A Leningrad Letter: II

By HAROLD J. LASKI

Leningrad, June 25

I HAD too little time to examine in any detail the Russian educational system. But such examination as I was able to make left me with certain impressions it is perhaps worth while to record. The scale of the effort is unique in the history of the world. The passion for knowledge, especially among the young, is well-nigh universal; and the communists have done a remarkable work in making intellectual improvement seem a moral obligation to the citizen. Books are devoured as soon as they appear; the public libraries cannot even begin to cope with the numbers who desire to use them. The defects appeared to me to lie (1) in the absence of a sufficient supply of trained teachers; (2) in rather poor text books (through Stalin's personal intervention a big effort is being made to remedy this weakness); (3) in rather low (though, in the circumstances of the time and scale of the effort, understandably low) and superficial standards of attainment; and (4) in a certain tendency, after all not unknown in capitalist countries, to regard soundness of political views rather than really effective knowledge as a passport to appointment. All these defects are born, clearly, of youth and the exhilaration of a revolutionary atmosphere. It is interesting that a serious attempt will be made, beginning next year, in Moscow University to develop a historical faculty on the normal academic model; and a proof of the Russian eagerness for the best methods available may be found in the fact that the man who is to teach English and American history is to be sent abroad for six months to study the methods in vogue there.

I inquired with some care into the religious position. There is, I think, no doubt that the churches are fighting a losing battle. They have little interest or prestige for the younger generation. Education and propaganda have decisively undermined the authority of superstition, and the inability of the churches to organize any social work among their members has been a fatal barrier to their progress. Among the older people, especially the peasants, religion still counts for something; but the inability to acquire property, on the one hand, and the absence of any political recognition on the other, are a fatal barrier in the way of their future. There appears to be nothing that in a strict sense can be called persecution; there is merely a refusal to allow to the churches the opportunity to develop those social institutions which, together with their property, have been the basis of their power in the Western world. I believe it to be true that emotions previously satisfied by religious beliefs are now satisfied far more fully by the exhilaration offered to millions in the opportunity directly to participate in the great economic adventure upon which Russia is engaged. It is clear, further, that to those who are at all profoundly conscious of the import of the revolution the churches are indissolubly linked with the worst social features of the Czarist regime; to accept the value of the one is, almost automatically, to reject the value of the other. I doubt whether there is much serious need for the militant atheist propaganda.

No one who discusses Russian problems with the political leaders of the country can doubt the reality of their desire for peace. They need it, as perhaps no other people, for the fulfilment of their great economic task; and the drastic proposals for disarmament and security they have made at Geneva are not merely window-dressing, intended to exhibit the impotence of capitalist states before the problems of peace, but also, in very considerable part, a genuine effort to obtain a breathing-space to consolidate the internal position of the Soviet Union. At the same time, the leaders are fully convinced that war is ultimately certain. To that end, they have not only built up a great army fully equipped with every device modern technique has developed. They have also created a passionate national spirit in the general population the mobilization of which, in the event of attack, would make Russia far more formidable as an enemy than at any period in her history, and far less likely to suffer from internal divisions of opinion than any other power in the world. In the Anglo-American sense of the word, there is literally no pacifist movement in Russia. The conviction (in my judgment, a correct conviction) that war is rooted, not in human nature, but in the inherent principles of the capitalist system, is so universal that to prepare oneself for the inevitable attack seems elementary common sense to three out of every four people one meets of military age, men and women alike. Conscription apart, it is a common experience to find that in any big factory a rifle range is part of the ordinary equipment, and that about one-third of the workers there have qualified as skilled marksmen. Nor can one doubt the popularity of the Red army. It occupies a place of honorable consideration in the Union such as the army of no capitalist state even begins to possess. The intensity, moreover, of its political convictions, and both the width and depth of its educational training are unique in the history of the world.

It is worth while, I think, to emphasize also the passion of the Russian government for research. The savant, especially where his work has visible practical significance, has a consideration and a status in the union which are remarkable. I do not know enough in detail to give any special emphasis to this generalization. But from such inquiries as I was able to make I should judge that not merely in the natural sciences, but in more humanistic fields like ethnography, history, law, linguistics (through the exploration of the hardly known peoples of the extreme north, the southeast, and the far east), work is being done of high significance. If a body like the Rockefeller Foundation were to devote some of its resources to making known to the Western world some of the results of recent Russian work in these fields, I believe it would render an immense service to scholarship. For it is not merely the enormous additions to knowledge that are taking place; perhaps even more it is the revision of accepted values that it would be significant for us to understand in all its fullness. A series of reports by experts on recent Russian work in the fields I have noted would be invaluable; even in English history, for instance, certain problems are being investigated with a fullness never before attempted. And a full study of Russian legal experience in recent years, on the lines of Mr. Hoover's Commission on Law Enforcement, would, in my judgment, yield results as stimulating for law reform as the work of Jeremy Bentham over a century ago.

In so brief a discussion as this, it would obviously be futile for me even to attempt any general estimate of the Russian experiment. But I may perhaps make certain inferences from the impact of experiencing it at first hand which will at least serve to illustrate the kind of conclusions which, in a fuller survey, I should be tempted to draw. I start with the premise that the revolution is the seminal fact of modern history: it has brought the discussion of socialism from the realm of abstract doctrine to the plane of concrete practice. From this angle, it is a challenge to capitalist civilization of which it is impossible to overestimate the significance. The challenge consists in the growing ability of the Soviet Union to prove that it can do for the masses all that capitalism has been able to effect in its history; that it can do it, in ever-increasing measure, without giving birth to the privileges and injustices which are inherent in the capitalist regime. The cost of the experiment is enormous; but the Soviet government has been able to convince its people that the cost is worth while. To produce that conviction, it has had to be, as in large measure it remains, relentless, harsh, intolerant. Dictatorship is not a picnic; it is a regime of deliberate and organized repression which sweeps ruthlessly out of its path all who are unable to conform to its purposes. To those who do so conform, indeed, it offers opportunities of creative adventure as rich and as full as any system with which I am acquainted. It means hardship, self-denial, the continuous and profound subordination of self. If its objectives can be accepted, it obviously makes possible, even for the humblest, an exhilarating fulfilment of personality such as Wordsworth caught in his first enthusiasm for the French Revolution. For the spirit which doubts, it means profound discomfort; for the spirit which denies, it means imprisonment and possibly death. It is the expression of a movement to the intensity of which no one can remain indifferent.

It is an error of judgment to conceive of proletarian dictatorship as simply and directly the enemy of freedom. It is, unquestionably, the enemy of the freedom which capitalist democracy has secured. The restraints are different in character, and directed to different ends. But I doubt whether any reasonable observer could argue that these restraints are incompatible with that affirmation of the essence of personality which is the criterion by which the quality of states is to be judged. There has been more realization of personality under the Soviet regime than in any comparable epoch in history. The method of expression has been different; it has not been less real. The real difference has lain in the width of assumptions possible under the capitalist regime, on the one hand, and the communist regime on the other. I believe myself that the tolerance and freedom open under capitalism were simply a function of its expanding prosperity; as this has declined, so they also have contracted until, in extreme cases, they reach the repressions characteristic of Hitler and Mussolini. That tolerance and freedom, in a word, are characteristic of capitalist security; they disappear with its disappearance. So, similarly, the intolerance and repression characteristic of proletarian dictatorship are the symptoms of communist insecurity; they will disappear as conviction of security emerges in Russia. But for those who, in Russia, are able to adapt themselves to the foundations of the new system there are opportunities, and therefore freedoms, comparable in volume to those of the early days of the industrial revolution. The class affected is, of course, both different and wider, and it does not depend upon its ability to procure the use of capital for its private well-being. For this reason, I believe the claim of the bolsheviks that their form of state is a higher form than that of capitalist democracy to be well-founded; the relation it establishes between individual self-expression and the public welfare is more direct and real than is the case under capitalism in general, and capitalism in decline in particular.

On the other hand, I believe that the conditions under which the bolsheviks were able to secure power were special conditions unlikely to be easily available in the Western industrial democracies. It is far more difficult there to break the large and well-knit middle classes (which hardly existed in Russia). It needs, for the success of communism, a disrupted machinery of government, a disloyal and discontented army and police, revolutionary feeling in the working-class, a trained and disciplined revolutionary party to lead that class, and a revolutionary leader of something like Lenin's caliber to lead the party. These conditions are only likely to emerge after a long epoch of capitalist repression, for example, after an experience of a Hitlerite regime or in the aftermath of unsuccessful war. Without these conditions, no successful attempt at revolution is possible; and the effort to promote communism will only hasten the transformation of capitalist democracy into fascism. That the latter, in the long run, means communism, I should add that I do not doubt.

The real lesson, I think, of Russia is this. The general principles of its ideal are the inescapable outlines of any future civilization which hopes to retain civilized standards, material and spiritual, of life. The question the dominating class of capitalist society has to answer is whether it is capable of so reforming itself, and so rapidly transforming itself, as to make the transition to a socialist society relatively so painless as to be capable of being peacefully effected. Communists affirm that this is impossible of achievement; while I lack the certainty of their conviction, the experience of Italy, Germany, Austria, and Spain, to take only the more prominent examples, makes it probable that they may prove to be right. And it is a reasonable inference from the present international position that we are moving, as in 1914, to an epoch of great wars, of which the consequence will be revolution. Capitalist democracy will not survive those wars, for the capitalist class will not pay their cost since its need for profit will cause it to throw the burden on the masses who will seek to revolt against it. In these terms, we shall enter upon an epoch in which fascist and communist states will confront one another with the knowledge that their principles are finally incompatible. In those epochs, also, I think, it will be shown that the Soviet Union has a power of internal stability which is unattainable by any competing form of social organization. The lesson, therefore, of the position we inherit is the urgent need for the peaceful and drastic transformation of the foundations of capitalist society while there is time to effect it. But I doubt whether the capitalist regime permits that kind of abdication to those who profit by its operations.

[The first of Mr. Laski's two Russian letters appeared in last week's Nation.]

Zero Hour on the Coast

By GRACE METTEE

San Francisco, July 13

[The following description is excerpted from a letter written by a travelling labor organizer to her national headquarters.]

WE hitch-hiked from here to Bellingham, Washington, and back, 2,400 miles along the coast. We met and talked to a great many of the men who are on strike and had a chance to keep up with it as we went along because all of the Pacific coast is tied up.

This is too big to realize unless you see it. All along the coast, even in the smallest towns, ships are lying at anchor in the harbors and at the piers and men are on picket duty. At Portland there is no gasoline and it was difficult for us to get out of town as very few cars are running. Pickets on the outskirts of the town on all highways are stopping trucks, and just as we came along two four-thousand-gallon tanks of gas had been run over a cliff into a ravine. The drivers were beaten and forced to walk back in the direction they had come. But the gas made a big fire and the whole side of the hill covered with pines was burning.

We had a hard time getting back to San Francisco as there was no traffic going in that direction. The whole coast has a gas shortage. We were finally picked up by a State highway policeman who brought us the last 150 miles. He had a small truck loaded with gasoline barrels he was bringing through for the use of ambulances and he had a permit from the ILA to cross picket lines.

In Frisco, the Embarcadero looks like a section of wartime France with barbed-wire enclosures and soldiers standing about five feet apart all along the shore for miles. They have been ordered to shoot to kill. Since the Guard has been here the picketers have simply changed their tactics and have started to overturn trucks all over the city and destroy their contents so that no goods can be moved to the waterfront.

Outside of town we saw twenty-three gasoline tank cars lined up by the side of the road. Some of them had been there for four days and their drivers were camped under a guard of several hundred pickets and a couple of State police. They were peaceful and quiet, some of them cooking over a fire and some of them washing clothes.

Contrary to stories in some papers, the Communists are taking almost no part in the strike outside of holding street meetings attended by a dozen people or so. This strike was not whipped up by radicals of any kind. It is a spontaneous strike that grew out of the action of an A. F. of L. union. Ryan was here and tried to settle the strike and even signed peace terms and until his terms were rejected he denied the very existence of reds. Now he is saying that the strike was taken out of his control by the Communists. The strike got out of his control when he signed an agreement while in conference with the Mayor and his board of mediators at which there were none of the rank and file present. After he did this he was voted out of the strike committee and a new one was formed that has had control of the situation ever since. Ryan is about as popular here as Roosevelt and whenever Roosevelt's name is mentioned at meetings he gets the bird. The strikers here are redder than any Communist I ever saw. I watched them turn over a truck load of rice. They cut the sacks open and poured the rice in the radiator. Then they started the engine and let it run until it stopped of itself. After that they threw the truck over and left it upside down across the streetcar tracks. The strikers filled a sewer full of rice and gave bags of it to kids and people who asked for it.

Everyone is fishing, rich and poor alike. Meat is almost non-existent, except in hospitals. Pickets help bring in supplies for hospitals and accompany the trucks to their destination. Doctors are broadcasting diet instructions to ward off attacks of scurvy and dysentery due to the limited food supply. Several minor strikes in the canneries which attracted little notice previously have now caused the complete loss of the tomato and apricot crop.

Everyone I have spoken to here is hungry to know what is going on in the East and has been wondering if we are actually as prosperous and satisfied as the press here would have them believe. I was amazed when I came here to learn that the depression was over back East and that there was no unemployment there any more. When I described Eastern conditions to these people they couldn't get enough of it and many of them told me that it gave them greater courage to know that there were real radicals in the East and that they were doing things. They thought they were isolated out here and were the only unpatriotic people in the country.

In the Driftway

THE elaborate ugliness of the houses human beings build at the seashore has always fascinated the Drifter. As a people, Americans seem to prefer bad architecture, but seaside houses have a special kind of ugliness which must spring from something deeper than bad taste. It is international and its transcends even the laws of economics. Most summer houses are occupied only a few months a year which would seem to be an excellent reason for keeping them simple. Moreover, eaves dripping with gingerbread are not designed to withstand the blasts of a good southeaster. Yet the shores of the world are lined with cupolas and turrets, curlicues and doodads, which can serve no conceivable purpose except to clutter up the view.

* * * * *

IT is the Drifter's private theory that the purpose is just that. The sea continues to be a pretty overwhelming phenomenon before which the human animal must in some way assert his superiority. In the course of the centuries he has managed to build up a comforting defiance of most natural forces. He has filled the darkness with a billion lights. He has filled the open spaces with cities. He has filled up time with busyness. He has filled up all available silences with noise. He has never been able to do much about the sea, though he does what he can. When he crosses it he gets as far away from it as he can afford to—preferably on the A deck of a floating hotel. And when he goes to its shore for a rest from his lights, his cities, his busyness, and his noise—for he is after all an animal whose strength can be renewed only from natural forces—he bolsters up his ego with the visual racket of cupolas and turrets.

THE only seaside resort the Drifter knows which does not fit his theory nevertheless confirms it. He is thinking of Nantucket in general and of 'Sconset in particular. The native boast that 95 per cent of Nantucket architecture is good is only a slight overstatement. Yet the whole island is for the most part a summer resort. The miracle is easy to explain. Nantucket's towns were fishing villages before they became summer resorts. Of necessity the people who make their living from the sea have long ago come to terms with it. And they would be as likely to build a tower dripping with gingerbread as to go to sea in a papier maché boat. The typical 'Sconset house is trim and low, like a sailing ship's cabin, clinging to the ground as a sailboat clings to the sea. One almost expects to see hatches instead of doors, and she lies so close to the earth that it seems as if most of her living space must be below decks. Her horizontal lines offer no resistance to the wind. And even the ancient rambler roses that cover her seem less like a decoration than a network of thongs to batten her down against the wildest storms. The other half of the miracle is that the inhabitants of Nantucket are proud of its whaling past and have managed to preserve its sea-going architecture. The Drifter hopes their vigilance will not relax. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Good English

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The editors of The Nation presumably have never taught English. Leastwise the editorial on Good English in the issue of June 27 betrays a complete failure to perceive the motives behind the establishment of a "corrective English clinic" at Princeton.

Similar remedial measures for undergraduate illiterates are common among State institutions—and are of doubtful effectiveness. There is, however, no question of establishing standards, and the point that professors differ in their opinions as to what constitutes good English only befogs the issue. It clearly does not rise to that high ground.

As Dean Root is reported to have said, "Split infinitives and dangling participles are not the greatest sins. Some of them [i. e., the students] don't know how to write a sentence even good enough to have a split infinitive." That is demonstrably true. Yet the difficulty of the student backward in English is not simply a lack of knowledge of grammar and syntax. Grammatical and rhetorical principles (with a few important exceptions, such as the use of "shall" and "will") are wholly and completely logical. Accordingly, the defect of the so-called illiterate student is not so much ignorance of language as incapacity to think. That explains why "corrective" English instruction, practically speaking, is a total loss.

Prospect, Ohio, July 2 WILLIAM BURL THOMAS

Abolish the R.O.T.C.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

An editorial in your issue of July 4 is devoted to praising the Board of Regents of the University of Minnesota for having "done the really fine thing of placing military training on an optional basis."

"From reading it, one has a sense of knowing the status quo abroad."
—N. Y. TIMES

EUROPE BETWEEN WARS?

by

Hamilton Fish Armstrong

An absorbing, accurately pictured panorama of recent European developments, by an expert.

"Sober, intelligent . . . the best of the book is his interpretation of the tangled skein of Balkan politics."
—N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

at all bookstores $1.25

MACMILLAN

RACIAL ARTS OF LOVE

PRIVATELY PRINTED

MATURE READERS
AND COLLECTORS OF
AMATORY CURIOSA
OF ALL RACES
SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ON SCIENTIFIC SEXUALIA
ANTHROPOLOGICAL
ESOTERICA
UNEXPURGATED CLASSICS
EXOTICALLY ILLUSTRATED
MAGICA SEXUALIS

LIMITED EDITIONS

All FALSTAFF scientific and anthropological Books on the Love Relations of Mankind are enthralling and highly informative documents by authorities of international repute. That is why the FALSTAFF list of permanent subscribers reads like a "Who's Who" of America's Sophisticated Intellectual Aristocracy.

FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. 11-NA, 230 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Please send me free illustrated catalogs of Amatory Curiosa.

City.......................... State...........
Address ....
Name.. Age

It is unfortunate that the editorial in no way indicates that recent student protest has been directed not only at the compulsory features of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, but at the institution and everything it stands for. One might as well protest against compulsory Latin or Physics as against compulsory R. O. T. C. The menace of the R. O. T. C. is its function as a propaganda machine for the War Department. It exercises this function whether or not it is compulsory through war parades, distribution of literature, statements in the school press, and the general recognition it receives from the administration.

It is our impression that The Nation has in all recent comment on the subject attacked compulsory R. O. T. C. rather than the institution itself. The National Student League has taken an unequivocal stand against the R. O. T. C. in both its compulsory and optional forms. We should like to know where The Nation stands on this matter.

New York, July 5 JOSEPH COHEN

Colorado Relief

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In an attempt to confirm or refute the assertion of James Rorty in your issue of June 27 that Colorado stood next to the lowest State in the distribution of relief, giving only a little more than $5 per month per family, I was practically refused all figures by C. D. Shawver, State administrator.

Of $2,051,437 expended in the first four months of 1934, shown on a blueprint said to have been sent to Washington, all went to approximately 50,000 families, then the amount per month was $500,000 and the amount per family (if averaged) was $10. Estimating another way, 20 per cent of a million people are on relief, and there are 4.2 persons per family, again giving 50,000 families. In June, 1933, they were 47,051; in June, 1934, 56,470. An average of $10 a month for a family of four is scandalous enough; yet there are rumblings that allowances are being cut. The alleged report to Washington did not contain $615,865 which has been paid from the gasoline tax to the relief administration by the State treasurer. It was omitted because the government asked for "local" funds, and "local" was deemed to mean county. Practically no "local" funds were shown outside Denver, Pueblo, and Colorado Springs. The administrator did not tell what has been done with the $615,865.

In my opinion, one-fifth of Colorado is starving, while Governor Johnson makes speeches about lowering taxes. Another candidate for governor, former Governor Adams, will be voted for in the democratic primary by the republican banking fraternity, who whisper that he is "safe." Josephine Roche, liberal candidate for Governor, has not proposed any plan, but is being offered that of Upton Sinclair. Contrary to the situation in California, where for three months the heat of a national election has warmed the atmosphere, Colorado is quiet; newspapers are meek; and one wonders whether Miss Roche will make enough noise to attract liberal republicans and democrats as Sinclair is doing.

Denver, Colo., July 3 ALFRED F. ISHAM

CURZON and POINCAIRÉ CLASH

On the right is a typical scene from

CURZON

The Last Phase
1919 - 1925
by Harold Nicolson

which Frank H. Simonds calls: "Not only the best book Nicolson has yet written but also the single book in English that gives an authentic and objective interpretation of British policy in the decisive post-war years from 1919-1924."

In the first session, Lord Curzon, in precise but cutting phrases, summarized the disloyalty of the French during the last two years. . . . In the afternoon M. Poincaré responded to this attack. His voice was dry, his words were clipped, his insults were lancets of steel. Curzon's wide, white hand on the green baize cloth trembled violently. He could stand it no further. Rising from his seat, he muttered something about an adjournment and limped hurriedly into an adjoining room. He was accompanied by his secretary and by Lord Hardinge, then our Ambassador in Paris. He collapsed upon a scarlet settee. He grasped Lord Hardinge by the arm. "Charley," he panted, "I can't bear that horrid little man. I can't bear him. I can't bear him." He wept.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

Finance

Big Business in Search of New Friends

SINCE the start of the Roosevelt Administration, most of the professional spokesmen of business have floundered uneasily before the unaccustomed spectacle of an openly hostile and disrespectful public opinion, dangerously near to control of the functions of government. The search by these interests for a fresh source of mass political influence has had varied manifestations. One of these was the scheme of exploiting the untested political power of small investors. Another was the decision of certain industrial groups, in the interests of expediency, to soft-pedal direct attacks on the Roosevelt Administration. But by far the most adept trail-blazer for a new technique has been Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president of General Motors and servant of one of the most powerful industrial groups in the country—the Du Pont family. For three months Mr. Sloan has been engaged, with cautious indirection, in setting himself up as a principal opponent of Rooseveltian policies. He has carried on his campaign both by means of public speeches and by appeals to the 352,000 stockholders of General Motors. The chief novelty of his approach lies in his scrupulous care to avoid direct mention of the Roosevelt Administration, which lends him an air of political impartiality, and in his fervent espousal of the cause of greater prosperity for all. The chief strength of his argument lies in its concentration on the outstanding contradiction of the Roosevelt program—the restriction of production in some lines at a time when the crying need of the nation is for a greater quantity of essential goods. Behind this valid criticism, Sloan has masked the essential point of his creed, which is that any form of restriction on profits is "bad and undesirable" because it reduces purchasing power, prevents progress, curtails production, and lowers employment.

The fallacies of this superstructure of propaganda are self-evident since it completely ignores the question of how to reconcile with the present facilities for production the restrictions imposed by the profit system on mass purchasing power. But this fallacy does not interfere with the value of his message for purposes of ballyhoo. This was shown by the immense volume of favorable publicity obtained by the forum on industrial progress which he arranged at this year's Chicago Fair. Industrialists, scientists, and educators described extravagantly on this occasion the wave of prosperity which would follow from full exploitation of existing and pending industrial technique—if only the blighting hand of government regulation were removed from business initiative. Although no attempt was made to explain the failure of this utopia to emerge prior to the imposition of the blighting hand, the vision of "a more abundant economy" was no longer an exclusive monopoly of the Roosevelt Administration. And so astutely did Sloan lay his political lines that he maneuvered the President into sending a congratulatory message of endorsement to a meeting designed primarily to attack his own policies.

Sloan has now joined forces with the rejuvenated and reorganized Crusaders. This group, having outlived its usefulness as an anti-prohibition organization and having run up a blind alley in its attempt to dramatize the fight against inflation last fall, has turned to large-scale political activities on a platform which would provide an acceptable framework for American fascism. The Crusaders' "statement of principles" is devised to appeal to a wide variety of political palates. To those frightened by the occasional departure from orthodoxy at Washington and anxious to enlist in the cause of canceling the few important concessions won since the advent of Roosevelt, the Crusaders offer themselves as a "great voluntary organization which is militantly opposing all efforts of radical minorities to enforce their views on the majority." To the patriots, the Crusaders insist upon Americanism and constitutionalism; to the financially conservative they offer an emphasis on sound money, a balanced budget, "bearable taxation," and support of individual business enterprise. For the benefit of those who have been divorced from their traditional political allegiances by the scandals of recent years, the Crusaders appeal for "intelligent reform," explaining that "we want it plainly understood that we do not stand for reactionary orthodoxy." Nor are the farmers overlooked, since the Crusaders call for the "correction of conditions which have for years placed the agricultural producer at an unfair disadvantage."

Sloan's self-confessed allegiance to a common prosperity is matched by the Crusaders' confession of "no interest but the welfare of the American people." His associates on the advisory council of the organization include such disinterested parties as John W. Davis, counsel for J. P. Morgan and Company; Sewell L. Avery, president of Montgomery Ward; Francis H. Brownell, chairman of the Board of American Smelting; Frank Purnell, president of Youngstown Sheet and Tube; Cleveland E. Dodge, vice-president of the Phelps, Dodge Copper Company; Percy H. Johnston, Fred I. Kent, and James P. Warburg—three prominent New York bankers who escaped unscarred from the late scalping of banking reputations—and Professor Kemmerer of Princeton who recently foretold disaster for the great institutions of the country because of the prevailing tax burden on wealthy men.

While the true economic interests of such a group are self-evident, their sponsorship of the Crusaders' aims is significant as an attempt by an influential segment within big business to adjust its surface attitude to changed political standards. Particularly if the Crusaders take over the form of economic propaganda invented by Mr. Sloan and if the Roosevelt Administration continues to fall short of its recovery hopes, these efforts might easily restore the discredited old regime.

Peter Helmoop Noyes

The •RECOMMENDED BY PHYSICIANS

SEX TECHNIQUE

IN MARRIAGE

CONDENSED RESUMÉ

PREPARATION FOR MARRIAGE
THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN; OF WOMEN
SEX INSTINCT IN MEN; IN WOMEN
ANALYSIS OF SEX INTERCOURSE
THE TECHNIQUE OF THE SEX-ACT
PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS
THE FIRST SEX-ACT
ADJUSTMENT TO SEX LIFE; DIFFICULTIES; MUTUAL CONSIDERATION
FREQUENCY OF INTERCOURSE
POSITIONS IN PERFORMING THE SEX-ACT
INFLUENCE OF AGE, SEX INSTINCT, HEALTH
SEX INTERCOURSE DURING PREGNANCY; AFTER CHILD BIRTH
INABILITY TO PERFORM SEXUALLY
MENSTRUATION AND THE "CHANGE OF LIFE"
CURABLE CHILDLESSNESS
THE VALUE OF BIRTH CONTROL

FIVE DIAGRAMS

THE MALE SEX ORGANS (TWO VIEWS)
THE FEMALE SEX ORGANS (TWO VIEWS)
MALE AND FEMALE REPRODUCTIVE CELLS

INTERNATIONAL ACCLAIM

Below are a few of scores of publications, lay and medical, that have praised SEX TECHNIQUE: Journal of the American Medical Association; Johns Hopkins Hospital Bulletin; The Lancet (London); American Journal of Psychiatry; Japan Medical World; American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology; Indian Medical Gazette; American Journal of Nursing; Irish Journal of Medical Science; Cleveland Press; Canadian Practitioner; San Francisco News; Medical Journal of Australia; Cincinnati Inquirer; Scottish Health; Providence Journal; Parents Magazine; Medical Times; British Medical Journal; Journal of Neurology and Psychopathology; King's College Magazine; Public Health (London); Eugenics Review (London); Middlesex Hospital Journal; London Hospital Gazette, etc., etc.

By ISABEL EMSLIE HUTTON, M.B., Ch.B., M.D.
Physician to the British Hospital for Functional Mental and Nervous Diseases, London

Foreword by IRA S. WILE, M.D.
Former Commissioner of Education, New York City

Authoritative Comment

"THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE is a clear, succinct, non-emotional, authoritative and conservative exposition of the practical factors involved in making marriage successful on the sexual level."
—Ira S. Wile, M.D.

"Dr. Ira Wile describes the book exactly. . . . It is primarily concerned with the conduct of the honeymoon and with the technic of the sexual performance."
—Morris Fishbein, M.D.

"A practical work . . . with a modern point of view, and the author has certainly been guided by good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."
—Journal of the American Medical Association.*

"It is a book that can be safely recommended by physicians and parents."
—Johns Hopkins Hospital Bulletin.

* The membership of the A.M.A. consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

"Sexual pleasure, wisely used, may prove the stimulus and liberator of our finest and most exalted activities."
—Havelock Ellis.

Price $2.00 (Postage 15c extra) EMERSON BOOKS, Inc. 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. C.

Books

What Is a Poem?

T. S. ELIOT is an individual who happens to combine the virtues of poet and rhetorician and critic in his own person, with the emphasis perhaps on the poet and the rhetorician rather than on the critic. The value of his criticism lies not in the formation and explication of any consistent body of doctrine but in the independent remarks and observations made by the way in his more pretentious writings, and gathered, it may be, from his own experience as poet. That they do relate to some aspect of poetry, and that aspect often accidental, may be granted; that there is any touching of the essence must be denied, for what the significance of the term is, this Mr. Eliot has never told us; and the ordering of its parts he has never given. I. A. Richards, like Mr. Eliot, brings to the study and to the analysis of one subject, and a subject in which he shows great powers of perception, the learning gathered in the study of another; but even more than Mr. Eliot, under the pretense of judging and analyzing a subject under the name of one science, in reality he analyzes it under the aspect of a science altogether different. Mr. Richards is something of a psychologist and theologian (art, we are told, consists in the satisfaction of impulse; and, again, through poetry we are saved), but the consideration of a poem as a part of the subject matter of psychology or theology or even of rhetoric, while it may please as well as instruct, not only fails to touch but brings us nowhere near a Poetic.

I have selected the names of Mr. Eliot and Mr. Richards because admittedly they represent the two most distinguished figures of today in the criticism of English poetry; and so take it for granted that if they are the source of some error and confusion, the lesser-known figures are in even worse case. There are the Marxians, to whom a poem and its social significance are one, and there are those who still hold poetry to be prophecy or a way of life, or what comes to the same thing, of escape and reverie. I consider all these to be in error, not because what they say is false or completely inapplicable to poetry, but because their statements, although they may hold true of a part of a poem or signify some accident of it, do not state what a poem is, nor do they express that which constitutes the essence.

With all these opinions the same error is involved, though it takes form in directly opposite ways. I refer to the failure to understand either what constitutes a complex essence, or what the nature, the scope, and the limit of definition is. In the one case there is the failure to perceive that while it is true enough that all the elements and parts of a poem must take their beginnings from the world, our experience, habits, perceptions, attitudes, and the like, yet it is just as true that the thing constituted does differ from them in kind. That to isolate them from the poem, and then to speak of them as independent existences apart from their mediation to the end which is the poem, is to say nothing at all about the poem. In the other case there is the perception that a poem is a real and independent entity; and from this perception is deduced the impossibility of really talking about a poem or of really relating it to other things while it still preserves its identity as poem. There are other errors, less important perhaps. We may mistake a special variety for the general; this is illustrated by the tendency to forget or to ignore the fact that the almost impersonal and quite general product of popular song or of Dryden may be quite as poetic as the special and intense products of Donne or Catullus. Or there is the tendency of the poet to confuse his private, immediate experience with that of all other poets or with the poem itself.

I wish now to offer a definition of lyric poetry that will be in some accord with the rules and principles of definition; that is, which will state in their proper order the elements which taken together may be said to constitute a poem, but which apart may be predicated of other subjects as well. I shall give brief definitions of the terms used, but I shall not, since space forbids, attempt to deduce the consequences which follow from the definition. Nor do I pretend that the definition is exhaustive or perfect; as Aristotle said, a definition is the hardest thing to frame, the easiest to destroy.

Let a lyric poem be defined, then, as the imitation of a complex idea involving either in whole or in part some human action or attitude through the imagination, by means of metaphor, ambiguity, and word, the whole possessing unity of tone.

Before I define my other terms, a word must be said on the necessity for the metaphor or the ambiguity. Because we aim at one whole perceived at once, the ambiguity or the metaphor becomes necessary to the poem. If the elements are perceived as independent the one of the other or as in succession, we shall get nothing or merely several things which apart from their juxtaposition have no connection. It is because the metaphor brings together and unites diversities, or enables the properties of one thing to be ascribed to another, or because the word has overtones or is equivocal or both, and all realized in one subject, that the poem is enabled to realize immediately what would otherwise be impossible.

Our terms may now be defined. Imitation may be defined as the presence of some aspect of a thing in a setting other than that given or natural, or also as the realization of a function through a means other than that given and natural. From this it is clear that imitation does not necessarily signify pictorial representation. It is because we must either create out of nothing, which is impossible, or recombine in some way elements previously given in nature, that art, which is the production of something by man, involves imitation. I have said complex idea because a poem is not static but requires some development; and again, because of a simple concept, such as humanity, there is no assertion, and so no possibility of attitude and the like. In sum, by complex idea is meant the proposition or a series of propositions. The proposition is defined as that through which truth or falsity is expressed. Imagination may be said to be that which mediates between thought and sense (and in this place it is sense informed by thought which is intended); or it might be defined as sense informed by meaning, but sense abstracted from the immediate existent. And because sense and imagination involve some reference to individuals, however qualified, and because our individuals are either human or are referred to us who are human, poetry does in some way involve emotion. For where we have a particular, there we have the possibility of motion, and where there is the possibility of motion, there we may have either pleasure or pain; or we may have the attitudes of wanting or not wanting the particular, or we may wish its destruction or seek its preservation. The nature of emotion implies all of these. As to the metaphor, and the ambiguity, there is no need for definition here; except that the ambiguity is itself a form of metaphor. Tone may be defined as the effect of the attitude toward the subject idea present in the whole poem. Or it may be defined as the attitude toward the treatment of the idea. Is this love a grave thing, is it of importance; if either, is it to be treated lightly or intensely, or boorishly or with elegance? It is because of the tone, and because the poem is expressed through words, which are sounds, that rhythm and meter and the rest become important. Where we have sounds and the succession of sounds, there we may have the high and the low, the long and the short. It is by the various combinations of these that the tone may be deepened, suggested, reinforced, and the like.

The essence of a thing is never present, but only suggested in the imitation of that thing, and from this fact it is clear that of itself no poem is either true or false. This I suggest as one consequent of the definition; for the present I leave it to the reader to discover others.

LINCOLN REIS

The Story of a Jingo

Hitler Over Europe. By Ernst Henri. Simon and Schuster. $1.90.

THIS extraordinary book reaches the American public a month too late. The author's theses and prognoses which might have seemed incredible and slightly fantastic before, are so astoundingly confirmed by the events of June 30 that his book becomes almost an anti-climax in the wake of actual happenings. Who is the ruler, who the profiteer of the Third Reich? The question has been answered a hundred times before, by writers of lesser stature. But without the powerful impact of words and the breadth of vision of this delineator. The men who pull the strings in new Germany, says Henri, are the heavy industrialists, the great financiers, the Junker class. At their dictation Hitler removed the pseudo-socialist register from the program of the "National Revolution." Capitalism commanded its retainer to put an end to interference with profits; Hitler obeyed; the revolution is over.

And what of the socialization of key industries? asked the disappointed proletariat of the swastika movement. Experiments are dangerous, answered Hitler, the "revolutionist" of yesterday, because they eliminate the creative element, the power of personality from the industrial process. What of the expropriation of the great land holders? clamored the dismayed peasants. Efficient production demands, replied Hitler, that the great estates remain intact. Artisans, tradesmen, workers, each demanded the fulfilment of that part of the National Socialist program which was to solve their particular problem: the destruction of the department store, the abolition of interest servitude, and the nationalization of banks. Hitler swept them aside. "Our program is epochal, not immediate. Our system will exist for a thousand years. We are working for the millennium. Have patience! Wait!" But the people were starving and the S. A. was tired of promises. They grew impatient. Hitler answered with a bath of blood. Germany's questions are answered. There is peace in the Reich once more.

Thus the events of Hitler's first year present themselves to the chorus of his critics. Ernst Henri's analysis of the Hitler enigma is simpler, but much more exciting. The all-powerful Fritz Thyssen, personifying the heavy industries, is the villain of this thrilling romance. It is Thyssen, says Hitler, who took Hitler in hand with a strong and aim-conscious brain constructed the policies, the effects of which our generation has had to witness. It was he who brought Germany's industrialists to the man who was to become chancellor, and offered him greatness as the reward for unconditional submission. Hitler vaingloriously accepts and writes the closing chapters of the story of a capitalist nepotism which uses the coffers of the state to the greater power and glory of the family Thyssen.

"Hitler Over Europe" presents the picture of the last three years in cinematic tempo. How Thyssen destroys all competition, how every element in the nation's business, the Liberals, the Catholics, the Jewish financiers, the devout Protestants, and the free-thinking modernists become pawns in his ruthless grasp, moving forward and backward in blind and often unconscious obedience to the will of this all-powerful titan, is perhaps the most exciting part of this impassioned book. With an unfailing instinct for the melodramatic the writer pictures the author of Germany's misfortune as a monster who lies patiently in wait as the victims plunge headlong into his deadly traps. With deftness which leaves one slightly bewildered he brings the recent occurrences in the Reich to a sudden denouement, reduces the thousand conflicting elements in the German scene to one irreducible absolute—and calls that absolute Thyssen. Anti-Semitism and racial politics in this presentation become the weapon of a master-mind against the Jewish competitor at home and the British, Japanese, and French abroad. Religion, Nazi-culture, and the fight against bolshevism are all mere dramatic appurtenances to enhance the stature of the Thyssen lineage.

This story of the German master-mind becomes slightly fantastic, to be sure, in those chapters in which it outlines Alfred Rosenberg's scheme for world domination. In the skilful hands of the author this Baltic-German becomes the creator of a vast empire stretching from the Arctic Ocean on the north to the Balkans in the south, embracing the Russian Ukraine and the Scandinavian nations, Alsace Lorraine and the Netherlands. To offset the too palpable romanticism of Dr. Rosenberg's plans for the creation of a Nordic Central-European Nazi Empire Henri outlines another—Thyssen's—plan for continental control and supplements them both with the story of Rosenberg's secret International in Wilhelmstrasse 70a in Berlin, the building of the Foreign Office of the National Socialist Party, where this Machiavellian politician receives his secret reports from every corner of the globe and determines the policies of Germany's foreign office. Here are received the reports of the Brown International which works for Hitler and through him for Thyssen for a world dominated by Nordic Europe. That all this is impossible without war the author proves with incontestable logic. But he goes farther. He investigates the possibilities of success for Germany's army and concludes that it all depends on Goering's ability to create an overpowering air-armada.

Since that night when I read Remarque's much more sensitively emotional story of the World War in a single sitting, I have come across no book which so takes possession of the reader. No novel could be more thrilling than this journalistic description of our times. I read it months ago in the British edition and was struck with its sweeping power. I have just read it again and, with a clearer realization, perhaps, of its undeniable shortcomings as an unbiased evaluation of the German drama, was impressed once more with the remarkable ability of its creator. For the moment it stills the skepticism of an old hand in the revolutionary movement like myself though one cannot wholly escape the feeling that there are parts which are, in the last analysis, exceptionally able Communist propaganda against a not too realistic background of imagination and prediction.

LUDWIG LORE

The New Utopia

America's Capacity to Produce. By Edwin G. Nourse and Associates. The Brookings Institution. $3.50.

THIS daring adventure of economists into the world of realities is so novel, almost sensational, that praises of courage may overbalance the suspicion of dilettantism. For a moment Mr. Nourse and his associates have abandoned the familiar haunts of economists and have left "money and prices out of the picture," thus stepping out upon the firm ground of the "technical process of production and the division and use of the product merely in physical terms."

This word "merely" is charming in its naive contempt for physical reality. These mere actual facts of our food, clothing, shelter, transportation, and so forth frequently "admit no answer" that is familiar and acceptable to economists and so they trim the subject to fit their own preconceptions and formulas. That a machine can produce three times as much goods when used say 120 hours a week than when it is used only 40 hours, is a "mere" physical fact, and so they considered only the "conventional" single shift operation and output. That seasonal work and protracted idleness in some industries can be eliminated (See "Waste in Industry") and the productive capacity greatly increased seems not to matter, and the authors "accept the seasonal aspect of other industries as fact" (page 326). Similarly the "load factor" of electric public utilities is accepted "as fact" notwithstanding the Canadian and Russian evidence to the contrary. Furthermore, in determining the capacity they considered only the "active" plants of 1929 disregarding to a large extent the productive capacity of idle plants.

Likewise, in considering the "technical process of production" and its effect on labor requirements, the authors left out of their count the increased productivity per miner (page 151) and the increased idleness in sporadically operated and mismanaged mines. "We can not, however, regard these partially employed men as available personnel with which to man continuously idle machines and working places . . . without compelling a shut-down of the machines or plants to which they had originally been attached" (pages 155 and 156) is a typical argument. It is well known that the excessive number of competitive mines might be shut down to advantage, hence the wishful conclusion that: "Taking the mining industry as a whole, we may set down the additional workers who would have had to be recruited in 1929" in order to operate at full capacity "at not over 70,000 men." The fact that mines have excessive capacity so that not only a double shift but even one shift partly working would mine more than can be absorbed by the country's manufacturing facilities, did not even come under discussion!

By such methods the conclusion has been reached that 1,005,000 laborers could be released from agriculture, forestry, and fisheries, construction, trade, and service and 1,020,000 added to mining and manufacturing industries (page 414). But "had the plant capacity of manufacturing been fully utilized in 1929, all of this surplus labor and also a large additional supply would have been called for" (page 517), in which case some 1,229,000 additional workers would have been needed. Indeed, compared with the estimated number of unemployed, both at present and during 1927-1929 this computation holds no promise to provide employment to those willing to work and needing it.

The conclusion was reached that "our productive system as a whole was operating at about 80 per cent of capacity in 1929" and if utilized fully "it would have added goods and services to an amount one-fourth as great as the total which we are already getting" (page 416); but, revising limiting factors of uneven development in different industries, etc., and "reducing our expectation of full capacity . . . to a more reasonable 95 per cent," the attainable output "would mean an increase amounting to 19 per cent above what we produced in the late twenties" (page 421).

And the lesson drawn is: "Equipment was being maintained at a rate entirely suitable to the indefinite continuance of operation at the 1929 rate of activity. Labor in general was not being so driven as to impair either health or morale" (page 425).

Thus having found out that everything is for the best in the best of worlds, the main thesis was considered as proved and the easy formula for securing the 19 per cent utopia was found: all we need to do is to "reject all such revolutionary suggestions and seek economic regeneration under an economic organization not basically different from that to which we have been accustomed."

"The mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse."

WALTER N. POLAKOV

Preachers and War

Preachers Present Arms. By Ray H. Abrams. Round Table Press. $2.50.

DR. ABRAMS has made an interesting and valuable study of the conduct of the preachers of America in the days leading up to the war and during the struggle. It is a record of which all churchmen ought to be thoroughly ashamed, for it reveals the complete moral bankruptcy of the Christian church, its utter treason to the Prince of Peace, and its intellectual stupidity as well. A mere handful—only seventy—of the ministers were true to their faith, and as the years go by, future generations will be more and more amazed that such things as Dr. Abrams records could have come to pass. But they will surely find in the recreancy of the ministry in the stress of war one of the potent reasons why attendance at the churches has steadily decreased and why it is influencing less and less the moral tone of our American life, and indeed the whole development of our national policies.

It would be hardly fair to cite Newell Dwight Hillis as a typical bloodthirsty servant of Christ, but there are gems from his lips in this book which well deserve perpetual preservation. Here is one of them:

> We know that Tacitus said nearly two thousand years ago that "the German treats women with cruelty, tortures his enemies, and associates kindness with weakness." But nineteen hundred years of education have not changed the German one whit. . . . In utter despair, therefore, statesmen, generals, diplomats, editors are now talking about the duty of simply exterminating the German people. There will shortly be held a meeting of surgeons in this country. . . . These surgeons are now preparing to advocate the calling of a world conference to consider the sterilization of ten million German soldiers and the segregation of the women, that when this generation of Germans goes, civilized cities, states, and races may be rid of this awful cancer.

Then there was the Very Reverend Lyman Abbott, pal of Theodore Roosevelt: "I do not hate the Predatory Potsdam Gang because it is my enemy. . . . I hate it because it is a robber, a murderer, a destroyer of homes, a pillager of churches, a violator of women. I do well to hate it."

And there was also the Reverend George A. Griffith of the Episcopal Church, who declared: "I should do my best to have put to death any Boche in America, or any so-called American who would apologize in any way for what the Boche has done." And of course the Reverend Charles A. Eaton must not be forgotten. He counseled submarine workers thus: "When he [the spy] comes sneaking around with a bomb, don't say 'let us pray,' but take him out there in the marsh and tie him down and place the bomb on his chest. Light it and stand off and watch him blow to his Kaiser—to hell. Be regular he-men."

He was then pastor of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church.

There are many other valuable studies in Dr. Abrams's book, though it does not strike me that he has wholly covered the field despite evidence of great labor. Very useful are his quotations of clergymen who, like the turncoat, Rabbi Wise, now say that they will never again yield to war propaganda and hatred. Altogether 10,427 clergymen have stated in reply to a questionnaire from the World Tomorrow that it is their "present purpose not to sanction any future war, or participate as an armed combatant." If we could believe that the 70 have grown to the 10,427 we might feel profoundly encouraged. On the other hand, Dr. Abrams quotes various clergymen who still believe that Christ's appearance on earth was merely to teach people to kill one another, and I notice that the War Department is not having the slightest trouble at all in getting all the active and reserve chaplains it desires. They doubtless are one with the Reverend T. Andrew Caraker, of the Universalist Church of Our Father in Baltimore, who says that Jesus "would have been the first to wear a gas mask, shoulder a rifle, and enter the trenches." It is to be hoped that the War Department rewarded him with a colonel's uniform for that utterance.

All in all, this book belongs on the shelf of indispensable volumes for the use of future historians who wish to paint an unbiased picture of what Christian America looked like when it was teaching the Hun the Christian virtues and making the world safe for democracy.

Oswald Garrison Villard

Japan Over Asia

Empire in the East. Edited by Joseph Barnes. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.25.

PERHAPS no other single volume dealing with the problems of the Far East contains so much meaty information, sound reasoning, and lucid writing as does this work. It is not that the ten authors have tried to tell everything. They leave a number of basic questions unanswered and have stripped to the bone their discussion of several fundamental aspects of the problems they examine. But this enhances rather than detracts from the larger value of the book. To have attempted to go into every possible question would have defeated the purpose of the editor and authors, which obviously was to inform the average reader briefly, yet clearly and intelligently, what has been happening in the Far East, why it has been happening, and what is likely to follow. To accomplish this required the most skilful editing. Mr. Barnes has done a good job.

Owen Lattimore, the explorer, starts off with a discussion of Chinese history, which he shows has been an unceasing struggle between the Chinese and the various "barbarian" hordes who swept in for many centuries from the north and the west and in more recent years have come from across the sea. The Chinese knew how to deal with the Asiatic "barbarians"; they played one group off against another, "using barbarians to control the barbarians," and so remained fairly secure in their own culture and civilization. But this method has not worked with the new "barbarians" from Japan, Europe, and America, and in consequence China as a civilization and as a nation is threatened with destruction.

John E. Orchard, of Columbia University, a student of industrial problems in the Orient, examines the "Japanese dilemma," which consists mainly in the pressure of a rapidly growing population upon Japan's meager natural resources, a pressure that may cause an explosion at home if not relieved by a successful imperialistic program abroad, that is, on the Asiatic mainland. Mr. Barnes, who has lately become the secretary of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations, reviews the position Soviet Siberia has taken in relation to the general Far Eastern problem. Grover Clark, formerly editor of the Peking Leader, takes up the question of markets for Western goods in China and Japan, reveals that these markets have not proved as broad or profitable as the political quarrels over them might suggest, and reports that the Eastern peoples are now determined to keep their markets as well as their territories for themselves. Frederick V. Field, who has written on the Chinese consortiums, looks at the problem from the standpoint of the bankers, coming to the conclusion that so long as "the creation of surpluses is directly geared to private profit in the industrial nations," the Chinese must either copy the belt-tightening methods of the Soviet Union in accumulating capital for themselves, or else "borrow in the money markets of the world" and so "run the dangers of modern empire."

H. Foster Bain, formerly director of the United States Bureau of Mines, reports that the mineral wealth of the Asiatic countries is not nearly so extensive as was once believed and that therefore they are not likely to develop industrially as have the Western countries. Carl L. Alsberg, formerly chief of the United States Bureau of Chemistry, discusses the "struggle for food," pointing out that either population must be controlled or new farming methods introduced, and that in any case the exploitation of Eastern farm lands and peasants by Western Powers is a likely source of conflict. Pearl S. Buck, missionary and author, reviews the work of the missionary movement and shows that while this movement has been productive of some good, the missionaries, though perhaps not consciously, have been as active as statesmen and others in promoting imperialist interests in the Far East. Tyler Dennett, formerly historical adviser to the State Department, reexamines the principle of the Open Door and finds that while in theory this principle "fits into the pattern of internationalism," in practice, because of the "nationalism, which the world and especially the American people have adopted, the Open Door principle is likely to turn out to be little more than the old imperialism with a new name."

Since all of these authors point unmistakably to the probability of armed international conflict in the Far East, it is appropriate that the concluding essay, the work of Nathaniel Peffer, author and newspaper correspondent, should take up the question of Peace or War. He feels that we of the Western world must, among other things, "so reshape our social system that we shall not be compelled to take advantage of the disparity [between East and West] by political aggressions for economic aggrandizement. Thus, and thus alone, can the Far East be eliminated as a theater of war."

One hesitates to find fault with this excellent study. Yet it must be stated that nowhere in the work is the problem of Japan's national defense discussed. This is altogether as important in any study of imperialism or peace prospects in the Far East as the struggle for food, the Open Door, or Western aggrandizement. For Japan it is almost exclusively a military problem and, except in a remote sense, has no economic basis. To survive as a nation Japan, an insular power with no natural defenses, must follow the English pattern and either establish bridgeheads on the Asiatic mainland, as it has already done in Korea and Manchuria and tried to do at Shanghai, or else so shape its policy as to keep the mainland divided against itself. It is true that China is now and long has been too weak to offer a real threat to Japanese security, but there is an implied threat in Chinese nationalism and a much more positive one in the growing strength of the Soviet Union in Siberia. This is a problem any Japanese government, whether ultra-militaristic or composed of internationally-minded liberals, would have to face. It is as likely to result in war as any of the other factors discussed by the authors of this book.

Mauritz A. Hallgren

Medicine Looks at Homosexuality

What is the opinion of medicine on homosexuality? Is it curable? Is it acquired or congenital? What are the distinguishing marks of the true homosexual? What are the latest scientific findings on the subject? You can learn in the current issue of

Scientific Progress

Edited by Dagobert D. Runes, Ph.D.

Scientific Progress reports the latest events in all fields of science, accurately and readably. Among other articles: Your Eyes Reveal When You Will Die; Invisible Eyeglasses; Dead Dog Made Alive; Why People Die at Middle Age; Drug "Burns Off" Fat. $1 brings you a five-month trial subscription. Address Scientific Progress, 310 Riverside Drive, New York.

☐ RESORTS ☐

CAMP MILFORD
KENT · CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests. Delicious meals.

Weekly Rates—July & August

$27.50 PER WEEK

Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N. H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates Today

1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PEnnsylvania 6-7842

WHAT'S NEW AT

UNITY HOUSE

FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA
J. HALPERN, Manager M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager
N. Y. Office: 3 West 16th Street

A Vacation Message to THE NATION Readers—

UNITY HOUSE offers superb facilities for play and relaxation, and the gala programs featuring many famous artists have become increasingly popular. Many new facilities this year for sport and play $25.50 per week—July and August. Reduction to Union members. Owned by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

Always the Finest of Entertainment

Starring such famous artists as TOSCHA SEIDEL, ALLA NAZIMOVA, MOLLY PICON, SIGMUND SPAETH, ISA KREMER, and the HALL JOHNSON CHOIR.
Weekend of July 21, Russian Opera Troupe.
Sound movies showing latest feature pictures.
Weekly dramatic presentation, Pengrove Players.

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

Southern Culture

Culture in the South. Edited by W. T. Couch. University of North Carolina Press. $4.

THIS large symposium contains a mass of valuable and well-integrated material concerning the contemporary South. Each of the thirty-one contributors has special qualifications for the task assigned him, and the result is something in which Mr. Couch, the editor, may well take pride. Virtually every significant phase of Southern culture is discussed. Industry, agriculture, education, folk songs, race relations, politics, literature, journalism, fine arts, handicrafts, religion, speech, humor, and other cognate topics come in for examination. A majority of the chapters are well written and all are authoritative.

Mr. Couch has not imposed any particular postulates upon his contributors, the consequence being that there is considerable diversity in the points of view represented. In fact, he has included writers whose approach is wholly at variance with his own. Among the latter are two of the Nashville agrarians, with whose fundamental theses Mr. Couch is in almost complete disagreement.

These agrarians are Donald Davidson, who contributes the chapter on Southern literature, and John D. Wade, who deals with Southern humor. Mr. Davidson has always been one of the most ardent of the neo-Confederates, and he offers up his orisons at the shrine of John C. Calhoun with all the fervor of John Crowe Ransom himself. Mr. Ransom is the Great White Father of the group and certainly the other members cannot be charged with underestimating his importance in the world of letters. For example, in the chapter by Mr. Davidson in the volume under review, Mr. Ransom is mentioned in a laudatory manner six separate times, and his "Poems About God" is cited along with Mr. Cabell's "Jurgen" in such a way as to leave the impression on the mind of the reader that Mr. Davidson regards the two works as of approximately equal literary significance.

But if one is forced to disagree with much that Mr. Davidson and his compatriots have to say, one must admire their forthrightness. They are quite frank in proclaiming that Northerners are damyankees who ought to stay in the North; that Negroes can best be handled below the Potomac without "outside interference"—the "interference" with the grossly unfair trials of the Scottsboro defendants having been particularly obnoxious to them; and that such a grotesque manifestation as the Dayton, Tennessee, monkey trial was a wholly misunderstood and misrepresented phenomenon of Southern culture. It is unfortunate that the neo-Confederates, with their indubitable talents, should waste their time and their energies in so quixotic a quest as that upon which they have embarked, but they seem determined to save Dixie from the Northern ogres at all costs, and there is nothing anybody can do about it.

It is true that their crusade is not entirely without merit. They are right, for one thing, in contending that the educational system which has been built up in this country has serious defects, since it presupposes that every boy or girl who is not definitely subnormal is capable of absorbing a high-school and college education. Professor H. Clarence Nixon, who writes on colleges and universities in Culture in the South, is fortunately aware of the fallacies inherent in this thesis, and in a discriminating chapter he calls for a greater degree of selectivity in the educational process. In another chapter Professor Edgar W. Knight examines the present state of the public schools with unexceptionable scholarship, but he gives us small ground for believing that he recognizes the need for a complete overhauling of the entire structure.

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

Intimate, colorful, alive! The most complete adult camp in the Adirondacks. Chamber music by the Compinsky Trio and the Perole String Quartet.
Dance Recitals by Pauline Koner and a complete summer stock and try-out theatre in the best Westport tradition.
Private golf course, lake and tennis courts.

Booklet on request.

GREEN MANSIONS
157 WEST 57th STREET
CO. 5-6346

Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.

St. Regis
HOTEL FLEISCHMANNS N.Y.
"Catskill Mts.' Greatest Hotel Value"

- ANNOUNCES
  Special Rates for July & August $22.50 UP
- Fleischmann's Finest and Largest Hotel
- Large Professional Social and Athletic Staff.
- Every Recreational Feature.
- Dietary Laws.

N. Y. C. Phone Kilpatrick 5-10309

"ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE SWITZERLAND"

MOON HILL ON SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS

For A Perfect
Adirondack Vacation
HOTEL COMFORTS

Country Club Atmosphere
Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary laws.)
Families accommodated.

Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42 PEnn. 6-1720

NAPANOCH
COUNTRY CLUB
NAPANOCH, N.Y.
Every Outdoor and Social Activity.
Write for Booklet.

Thrilling Entertainment by C.B.S.

New York City Phone: MUrray Hill 4-3802

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y. Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing. Jewish. Rate $16 wkly.

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
■
Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
PEnn.. 6-7663

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group

July Rate $29.50

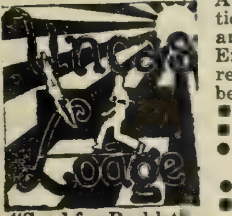
Superior Cuisine

Round Trip Fare $8.50
by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks

Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
8th SUCCESSFUL SEASON



"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes.
- 2 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

JULY RATE $21 for 1 week
$40 for 2 weeks

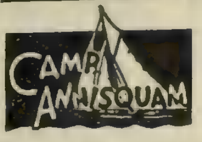
Rate per day, $3.50
Management—DIANA AND ABE BERMAN

Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

15th Season

WESTERN VIEW FARM
An Inn unique in its hospitality
On a mountain top only 1½ hours from New York.
Rates: $8.00 a day by the day. $7.00 a day by the week; $6.00 a day by the month; $5.50 a day by the season.
Service a la mode Continentale
Address: EDWARD G. OHMER, New Milford, Conn.—Telephone, New Milford 440.
From all over the world comes this Farm's clientele

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey
Golf, riding, tennis, all outdoor activities, 150 acre estate, private lake, beautiful country. Excellent food, spacious house, log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Central Railroad of N. J. or Pennsylvania to Red Bank.
Management Mascha and Hyman Strunsky
Telephone Atlantic Highlands, 264



ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

Charming
UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

ATLANTIC HOTEL BELMAR NEW JERSEY

"For An Ideal Vacation"

For many years the perfect hostelry serving people of culture and refinement. Excellent food plus every conceivable diversion. $25 In July. Ask for Booklet "W". N. Y. Tel. ORchard 4-2673.

VINEYARD LODGE, Ulster Park, N. Y.
Garden Spot of Ulster County
Modern hotel amidst beautiful 200 acre fruit and grape farm, solariums, saddle horses, tennis courts, social activities, refinement, congeniality, American Jewish cuisine. Rates reduced to $16 and $18.
JOSEPH ROSENTHAL KINGSTON 3430

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG
N.Y.

AN ADIRONDACK CAMP of the BETTER TYPE
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports.

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
Warrensburg, N. Y.
Booklet "N" on Request
City Address: 545 5th Ave. (Room 1109)
VAn. 3-0874

WUNNISHAUNTA
Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE
QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES
All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $22.50 - $25.00 - and $27.50
Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

BREEZEMONT

A resort of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.

Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, Warrensburg in the Adirondacks. One minute from Echo Lake. Splendid bathing. Canoes and boats for guests. Tennis court. Cabins if desired. Guests met at Lake George. $18.00 and $20.00. R. J. Venton.

RESORT ADVERTISING RATES:—

One inch, narrow column	$6.16
Ten insertions	5.55 each
One inch, wide column	9.52
Ten insertions	8.57

CLASSIFIED advertisements can be taken up to 4 P.M. on Mondays, to appear in the issue on the stands Thursday—cost, 62 cents a line of 6 words.

Minimum, 3 lines.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York
COrtlandt 7-3330

BURLINGAME PUBLIC

In a delightful discussion of Southern religion, the Reverend Edwin McNeill Poteat, Jr., takes what might have been a dull topic and transforms it with his practiced style into one of the few chapters which are written with genuine verve. Commenting upon the strictness of sectarian lines in Dixie and the insistence of the numerous denominations upon the maintenance of separate congregations in the smallest communities, Dr. Poteat says: "The fact that there is economic waste and weariness in such a system is perfectly plain. But this is perhaps regarded as an unexplained chastening of the Lord or a challenge to something or other." Dr. Poteat avers that the Episcopalians of the region "are relatively few, as is becoming to aristocracy, and they enjoy their exclusiveness to the point of advertising it in their collars."

Clarence E. Cason also writes with an easy freshness in his chapter, Middle Class and Bourbon. The vein of persiflage which runs through his discussion of class distinctions is one of the high lights of the volume.

Various other chapters merit special mention, but there is insufficient space to refer to any except that on the Negro by W. T. Couch. Mr. Couch presents a quantity of significant material and draws from it the sound conclusion that both abstract justice and the selfish interests of the whites demand more adequate opportunities and fairer treatment for the weaker race. VIRGINIUS DABNEY

Shorter Notices

The Woman She Was. By Lance Sieveking. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

"The Woman She Was" is a stunt novel, detailing the life of Dame Charlotte Castleton, Royal Academician, suffragette, V. A. D., wife and mother. Dame Charlotte was a woman of character and charm, "the finest type of Englishwoman." A first-class painter herself, she was a friend of the great, specifically of Rossetti, Swinburne, Wilde, and Renoir. Her life reflected the times. It was varied and occasionally tragic. Mr. Sieveking's account of her is chiefly remarkable for the fact that it tells her story backwards, beginning with her death at the age of seventy-eight, and working back to her birth. This is a method which might be interesting in the hands of a more subtle psychologist, but as it is used here it simply reduces a fairly lively tale to a series of anti-climaxes. Mr. Sieveking's novel also gives the impression that he has sat through a great many movies. He uses the fade-out and the flash-back extensively, and he appears to have borrowed certain little associational tricks from René Clair. All these devices give the book a superficial novelty, but it is a novelty that savors strongly of Woolworth's. All Mr. Sieveking's most frantic efforts could not turn a dull book into an original one. His apprehension of character is weak, his humor raucously juvenile. The best thing he has given us here is a strange portrait of Rossetti, and, in that case, Nature was kind enough to furnish Mr. Sieveking some excellent raw material.

A Cool Million: or the Dismantling of Lemuel Pitkin. By Nathanael West. Covici-Friede. $2.

There is a story that a Communist, walking in Central Park early one morning last winter, met a young man who had spent the rainy night sleeping on one of the rocks there. When asked what he thought of having to sleep out all night, while so many apartments within view on Fifth Avenue were empty, the vagrant answered: "I guess the landlords are having a hard time too." Lemuel Pitkin, hero of the present satire, is in a way such a man: content to follow the dictates of his heart and of outworn shibboleths rather than of reason. Lem (a rustic Candide) left Vermont to seek his fortune after he had been assured by "Shagpoke" Whipple, shyster banker in the town where he lived and ex-President of the United States, that America was the land of opportunity and that industry and fair play would be justly rewarded. His trials, such as twice being railroaded into jail, imprisoned in a brothel, persecuted, and exploited, were excessive; his rewards consisted in losing first his teeth, then an eye, afterwards a leg, a thumb, his scalp, and finally his life when he was killed by an agent of the Third International. Nevertheless, he became the martyr-hero of Shagpoke's Fascist party, the Leather Shirts of America, and like the less naive Horst Wessel, his name came to be sung throughout a nation, his birthday being celebrated by battalions of young men marching up Fifth Avenue in coonskin hats, leather shirts, and with squirrel guns in their hands, singing the Lemuel Pitkin song. Probably, since we have no Voltaire and would be unlikely to appreciate one, present day satire can only be written in a wisecracking style. Mr. West is heavy-handed but his book is stimulating and at times bitterly hilarious.

Years Are So Long. By Josephine Lawrence. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

The irritation that one feels with this book has nothing to do with the controversial matter—the problem as to whether children should be obliged to support their indigent parents. What the reader objects to is that the thesis tends to strangle the characters. And this is too bad, because the author could have made these people convincing if she had kept her eye more on them and been less obsessed with her thesis. There are two chapters that somewhat redeem the novel—the one in which the father and mother meet and have the day together, each trying to bear up for the other's sake; and the final chapter, in which the son George finds his mother at the grave of her husband and breaks to her the unhappy news that her children are putting her in a home. In this last chapter is insight and subtlety, and for the time one forgets the thesis, probably because the author herself forgot it and for once let her people behave like human beings. It is just this glimpse of a talent in the creation of character not completely respected that provides the irritation. But not even these two chapters redeem the novel's lack of distinction in writing.

Contributors to This Issue

STUART CHASE's latest book is "The Economy of Abundance."

MILDRED ADAMS is a frequent contributor to the New York Times Sunday magazine.

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at London University, has recently delivered a series of lectures on problems of representative government at the Institute of Politics at Leningrad.

LINCOLN REIS, a graduate student in philosophy at Columbia University, is engaged in research in medieval logic.

LUDWIG LORE, formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung, now conducts a daily column, "Behind the Cables," in the New York Post.

WALTER N. POLAKOV, author of "The Power Age," is the technical supervisor of research into energy sources of the National Survey of Potential Product Capacity.

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN, formerly an associate editor of The Nation, is now on the staff of the Baltimore Sun.

VIRGINIUS DABNEY is on the staff of the Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Ser
NOV 8
DEC 17

NRA U.S. CODE

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 1, 1934 No. 3604

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 113
EDITORIALS:
The West Coast Goes Red-Hunting 126
The Publishers Point with Pride 117
Little Magazines 117
Morals for Men 118
ISSUES AND MEN. HITLER'S "ME UND GOTT." By Oswald Garrison Villard 119
CARTOON: ON THE WAR-PATH. By LOW 120
SAN FRANCISCO: AN AUTOPSY ON THE GENERAL STRIKE. By Miriam Allen De Ford 121
WISCONSIN'S NEW PARTY. By Harold M. Groves 122
"IT AIN'T NO SIN!" By James Rorty 124
GEORGIA SUPPRESSES INSURRECTION. By Walter Wilson . 127
YOUNG RUSSIA AT PLAY. By Louis Fischer 128
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 130
CORRESPONDENCE 130
BOOKS AND MUSIC:
To a Snake in Eden. By Evelyn Scott 133
The Log-Book of a Soul. By Katharine Anthony 133
Facts—and Facts. By Ernest Gruening 134
The Bush Negro of Dutch Guiana. By Edward Sapir 135
German Socialism Still Lives. By Reinhold Niebuhr 135
Shorter Notices 136
Music: "The Most Faustian Art." By Kenneth Burke 138
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 140

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Contributing Editor

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

VIOLATIONS of the due processes of law and incitement to organized violence against the community reached a new high mark in the San Francisco general strike. But those responsible were neither aliens nor agitators. A list of the guilty elements would include the San Francisco Industrial Association, the Committee of Five Hundred, General Hugh S. Johnson, Frank F. Merriam, governor of the State of California, miscellaneous "vigilantes," and the constituted authorities of the City of San Francisco. The Nation strongly indorses the protest of the Committee for Workers' Rights, representing a united front of the American Civil Liberties Union, the International Labor Defense, the General Defense Committee of the I. W. W., the League for Industrial Democracy, the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, and the Non-Partisan Labor Defense, against the officially sanctioned lawlessness which is still going on in California where self-appointed "vigilantes" have gone so far as to invade private homes. The committee has also sent a letter to Secretary of Labor Perkins protesting against her telegram to Governor Merriam in which she assured him of the cooperation of the federal government in the deportation of aliens illegally in this country and outlined the legal basis for such deportations. Under Secretary Perkins's Administration, the abuses of the deportation law have greatly decreased. She has been so insistent on a strictly legal interpretation of the law, in fact, that she has brought down upon her head the violent protests of those who consider the statute an effective political weapon. In the light of this record, it is quite possible that her telegram, with its special emphasis on the legal procedure required in cases of deportation, was designed to have a sobering effect upon hysterical State officials. But there can be no doubt that in the setting in which it appeared it gave aid and comfort to the red-hunters of California.

IN ANY FRACAS the innocent bystander is often a better reporter than the professional correspondent or the active participant. Some of the most revealing details of the labor struggle on the Coast have come to us in informal letters from unofficial observers—like the following sentences taken by us from the letter of an occasional contributor:

> Hell has busted loose in California. . . . The newspapers, ranging from the out-and-out reactionary to even the liberal Scripps-Howard, are unanimous on one particular thing, "Get the Reds." . . . On July 18, 19, and 20, spectacular raids on all known places of Communist assembly were staged in San Francisco, Oakland, San José, Hayward, and other places. Similar raids are in preparation . . . in Los Angeles, Sacramento, and other towns where the Communists have organizations. Thousands have been arrested and thrown in the city bastille, many of whom were badly maltreated by the police and deputized Legionnaires—the Workers' Center in Oakland, which I visited immediately after the raid, was blood-spattered from wall to wall; the stairway that led to the street was actually slippery with coagulated blood.
>
> I am not a Communist—yet; but I was pinched and jugged while visiting the wrecked Communist center described, held in solitary confinement for forty-eight hours, fingerprinted, mugged, and third-degreed; all at the whim of a power-drunk chief of police.
>
> That these acts of suppression will result in driving the Communist Party underground . . . no one in his right mind can deny. California can no more meet the red menace by violence than could Hitler; meanwhile, let us recognize it for what it is—fascism, pure and simple. . . .

AN AGENT of the Winchester Arms Company came to Bridgeton, New Jersey, one day last week and demonstrated for more than a hundred farmers—self-styled vigilantes—the latest in tear-gas bombs, tear-gas pistols, rifles, and submachine guns. This interesting exhibition, attended also by police from several South Jersey towns, was held with the avowed intention of preparing the farmers for "labor trouble." It took place the day after twelve farmers had been named "minute men" to supervise the driving of all "reds" from the State, and a few days after the field and cannery workers at the Seabrook Farms, charging that the agreement which ended their recent strike was already being violated, had threatened to go out again. This new spirit of revolt among hitherto passive farm hands has in it the makings of a general farm strike in this important truck-farm area, upon which Philadelphia is largely dependent for food, and it is evident that the farm employers will stop at nothing, not even murder, to prevent this. It was these same farmers who, by creating a reign of terror in which strikers' homes were damaged and strikers themselves beaten or threatened, smashed the Seabrook strike. It was they who, as special deputy sheriffs, provoked the bloody fighting of the strike. And now they have announced their intention of supervising the registration of all farm and cannery workers by the United States Reemployment Service, and of weeding out all those with "communist leanings." This development is in line with the red scares in San Francisco, the Imperial Valley, and the onion fields of Ohio, and with the revival of the Ku Klux Klan with its goal of "eradication of alien and radical thought in industry." It is apparent that something has been started which points to trouble ahead.

BURLINGAME
PUBLI. . . BRARY

FOLLOWING THE FIRST PICKETING in this country of a newspaper plant by editorial workers of other papers, and the consequent recognition of the American Newspaper Guild by the Long Island Press, the Guild is on the threshold of another victory in Philadelphia, scene of its first, and thus far only, closed-shop contract. As this issue goes to press, reporters, rewritemen, and copy-readers of the Evening Public Ledger are voting for their representatives in collective bargaining, as ordered by the regional labor board, and there can be small doubt that the Guild will win, despite the recent dismissal of several of its most active and militant members. The Ledger, one of the two relics of the once-extensive Cyrus H. K. Curtis newspaper properties, has long been almost Chicago Tribune-ish in its anti-labor stand, and a victory for the Guild here is doubly impressive. But the interesting thing both in Jamaica and in Philadelphia are not the victories themselves but the manner in which they were won. These tactics of picketing and demanding rights are labor-union tactics, forced upon the Guild after its previous position of "professionalism" proved ineffectual. That they are efficient and wholly commendable tactics is apparent, despite the indignation of Editor and Publisher, the injured feelings of Arthur Brisbane, and the polite sneering of the Herald Tribune. The Guild has gone to the left and is the stronger for it.

DESPITE the best efforts of Governor Lehman, reapportionment—Congressional, State Senatorial, and State Assembly—is as far away as ever in New York. Apportionment has been the football of partisan politics since the first gerrymander. Residents of New York are still electing members of Congress and of the legislature on the basis of the population distribution of twenty years ago, nor is New York by any means the only sinner in this respect. Reapportionment of the national Congress had to wait twenty years, and when finally accomplished the changed sentiment of the country was revealed with a whoop when a predominantly dry House was changed into a wet one—wet by three to one. But this reapportionment was by State units only, and few of the populous States have redrawn their Congressional districts according to present population. The situation in New York is peculiar. While electing governors by pluralities running close to the million mark, the Democrats are prevented by the very Constitution from controlling the legislature. Small rural counties like that lately represented by Senator Warren T. Thayer of the power trust have equal representation with city districts of 100,000 population. Speaker McGinnies is another idol of the cross-roads. Every county under the Constitution is entitled to at least one Assemblyman, yet the whole number is limited to 150. The Senate of 51 members is supposedly elected by population, yet aliens are not counted as people and the Constitution expressly forbids New York and Kings, the two most populous counties, to have a majority of the Senate. During Democratic landslides it is possible for the Democrats to win the Senate by a margin of one, as at present, but virtually never the Assembly. Their best chance since 1912 was kicked away by National and State Chairman Farley when he intervened in the city mayoralty campaign.

BUT NEITHER TAMMANY nor the Republicans want an honest reapportionment, the G. O. P. because it would strike at its rotten-borough citadels up-State and Tammany because it would reduce its quota of legislators at Washington and Albany to the benefit of Kings, Queens, and Bronx counties. The present Republican bill would add two Congressional districts (two members now being elected at large) in the safe G. O. P. territory of Westchester, Nassau, and Monroe, and deprive Tammany Manhattan of four full districts and parts of two others. If passed by the Republican Assembly and the Republican Senate minority with the aid of Queens votes, it would certainly be vetoed by the Governor. On the other side, the Democrats at this writing have brought forth no reapportionment scheme at all. The Republicans now have only sixteen of New York's forty-five Congressmen, and hopes of gaining two by the changes outlined. No bills for legislative reapportionment had been introduced at this writing, despite the pleadings of Governor Lehman. The Senate districts are drawn by the legislature, while the Assembly district lines are drawn by the Board of Aldermen or other local legislative bodies. The extent to which gerrymanders enter into this business is obvious. The crying need is for all this to be taken out of politics, and all Congressional and legislative districts to be drawn according to population by boards of non-partisan experts, but so obvious a solution as that is doubtless reserved for the millennium. Meanwhile we shall continue to be plagued with petty politics of the type now being displayed at Albany, and hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers will continue to suffer taxation without representation.

SOON AFTER Hitler's carnival of murder on June 30, those familiar with the mental processes of the German Nazis voiced the suspicion that the murderers had used this opportunity to rid themselves of those who knew too much concerning the origin of the Reichstag fire. Others charged specifically that Chief of Staff Ernst of the Berlin SA and his wife, and Heines, the blackguard Chief of Police of Breslau, had been wiped off the face of the earth for the role they played on that night of February, 1933. These suspicions have just been confirmed by the Daily Herald (London), which publishes the story of an alleged fugitive SA man in Switzerland, one Kruse, servant of Ernst Roehm, who claims to be "the last surviving member of the Reichstag fire gang." SA troopers who escaped to the Saar three weeks ago vouch for the existence of an SA man of Kruse's name and detachment, but profess ignorance of his present whereabouts. It is too early to vouch for the truth of this SA man's disclosures. Until they have been adequately investigated one must receive them with the necessary reservations. This much is certain, however, that they offer the most convincing explanation for both the Reichstag episode and the events of June 30 that has yet come to our notice. The mass of apparently unassailable detail and the fact that his description of what happened on that occasion tallies so closely with the crime as reconstructed by noted criminologists in possession of the important facts in the case; his description of van der Lubbe as the dupe of the unscrupulous Goering, and the provocative behavior of Ernst and Roehm during the Leipzig trial—all taken together give a picture of that event which the supporters of the Hitler regime will find it difficult to refute. The jurists' International Committee for the Investigation of the Origin of the Reichstag Fire should be urged to resume its activity at once by summoning Kruse and others who can vouch for his identity to the witness stand.

FREDERICK T. BIRCHALL'S dispatch to the New York Times of July 22, telling of the efforts of several well-meaning American bankers to solve the immediate fiscal problem of the Reich is little short of fantastic. These bankers include James H. Perkins, of the National City Bank, Thomas W. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan and Company, and George H. Harrison, Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. They, like the British Montagu Norman, are not of the opinion that the catastrophe can be averted. They do hope, however, to stave off a too sudden collapse of Germany's economy lest a new financial tidal wave shake the precarious balance of the world markets, bringing French, British, and American investments crashing down about their luckless ears. The banks which these gentlemen represent are concerned to the extent of two and a half billion marks, in short-term credits alone and the interest on them. "So far," says Mr. Birchall, "this money has been earning a fair profit by being used for the financing of imports and exports." But a collapse of Germany's money market would not only devaluate German and municipal bonds, involving American investors to the tune of almost four billion dollars; it would knock the bottom out of industrial values as well, leaving the American financiers and investors holding the bag. Financial interests in London are inveighing against the proposed granting of further credits. It may be that the American bankers will decide otherwise. To our lay minds, to be sure, it seems unthinkable that these shrewd financial wizards should be considering throwing good money after bad.

AGAIN FRANCE is hovering on the verge of a crisis. Herriot and Tardieu—the liberal and conservative antipodes in the Doumergue Cabinet—are threatening each other with vengeance and destruction and the weak structure of the present government bids fair to crack under the impact of their blows. The veterans who, in their June convention, decided with a majority of two votes to "tolerate the present Cabinet until the middle of August," will grasp the opportunity with joy to throw the full weight of their influence into the scales for a "thorough-going revision of the Constitution" to replace the hodge-podge Cabinet with a unified and consciously reactionary regime. In this highly critical situation the report that Socialists and Communists in France have united on what might be called a non-aggression pact for mutual protection and defense is of the greatest significance. The two parties have agreed to refrain from mutual recriminations and attacks and to make the agreement the basis for a united anti-fascist campaign. It was high time that something of this sort should be done to prevent a repetition of the German debacle where Communists and Socialists clutched at each other's throats, leaving it to the fascist aggressor to carry off the spoils. Since last February the pros and cons of a united front have been discussed from every angle in the various groups of the French labor movement. For a time it seemed as if the Communist Party, which, as usual, tried to win the followers of the non-Communist organizations for a united front instead of directing its appeal to the organizations themselves, would defeat every serious effort toward united action by its intransigent attitude. But the Communist International seems to have realized the hopelessness of securing unity on these terms and quite suddenly decided to approach the Socialist Party and the trade unions of France with acceptable proposals. The response was immediate. The National Council of the S. P. expressed its approval of the plan outlined by the Comintern and a committee in which the two parties and the trade unions are equally represented is already at work. We are optimistic enough to believe that the reconciliation so auspiciously begun will be a lasting one. The organized masses on both sides want constructive and immediate action and will make short work of the irreconcilables in their respective camps. They have seen too much of the sufferings of the German workers to permit this new anti-fascist phalanx to be wilfully destroyed.

THE EMBARGO on the importation of arms to the Chaco does not seem to be entirely successful—to put it mildly. It is reported that $600,000 worth of American-made planes, part of a two-million dollar order, is about to be shipped to Bolivia. The Paraguyan Minster to the United States, Dr. Enrique Bordenave, has protested the proposed shipment, among other reasons because the American legation at Asuncion may be destroyed by bombs dropped from the planes. It is stated that the order was placed before the embargo was laid, which may very likely be true; but as far back as May 28 an article in the Santiago (Chile) Nacion declared that it was too late to impose an embargo on arms because both Paraguay and Bolivia were amply supplied with munitions for their Chaco war. That the arms manufacturers were sharp in detecting a possible suppression of business in this particular quarter and that they hastened to make sure of orders that would carry the war on for some time may be reflected in the announcement that the E. I. duPont de Nemours Company has increased the values of its shares, in the first six months of 1934, from $1.03 to $1.86, a gain of more than 80 per cent. Business is looking up, in short, not only in the Chaco, of course, but in several other parts of the world. And the customers continue to find themselves in a position to place still more orders; a Paraguyan war communiqué for the week of July 9 announced that the Bolivians had lost 3,000 killed and had suffered as many additional casualties in wounded, and that 50 machine guns, 1,000 rifles, 1 mortar, more than 1,000,000 cartridges, and 1,200 grenades had been captured. In the grim business of hastening death there is no depression.

The West Goes Red Hunting

THE San Francisco general strike has not only disintegrated; it has dissolved into an orgy of red-hunting. Vigilantes perpetrate raids on the headquarters of "leftist" labor organizations. Police follow, mopping up the victims instead of arresting the raiders. The business community indulges itself in the emotional orgy of an anti-communist crusade.

Only a few rays of light penetrate the gloom. Despite pressure by the Industrial Association, martial law will not be declared. Thus organized labor has been saved from a reign of military terror. Moreover, the shipowners have finally agreed to join the waterfront employers in submitting to the arbitration of the National Longshoremen's Board. By thus yielding to the marine-workers' united front, the shipowners have cleared the way for a settlement. But the settlement will be lasting only if it goes to the root of the trouble: control of the hiring system by employers who are determined to stifle the A. F. of L. unions—International Longshoremen's Association, International Seamen's Union, and so on—together with the T. U. U. L. Marine Workers' Industrial Union.

The temper of the authorities makes this a dubious hope. Both Mayor Rossi and Governor Merriam stood ready to crush the strike by calling in the police and the troops. General Johnson was on hand to incite to riots, lynchings, and mass deportations. According to the General, the strike was "civil war" and "bloody insurrection" engineered by the reds, and "responsible labor organizations" ought to "run these subversive elements out from its ranks like rats"; if the federal government did not act, the people of San Francisco ought to take the law in their own hands and put down the communists. Finally, the General thought it was a good idea to make jobs for American workingmen by sending these alien marine workers back where they came from. Most shameful of all, William Green made himself a party to the strike-breaking. He disclaimed all A. F. of L. responsibility for the walkout, which he said was "unauthorized." Washing his hands of the matter, he threw back the responsibility on the heads of the local union leaders. Technically, no doubt, Mr. Green was correct; the A. F. of L. did not call the strike; but it was not an "outlaw" walkout in the A. F. of L. legalistic sense; all steps taken were regular and constitutional. Mr. Green's statement, therefore, was superfluous if it was not actually treacherous. It had no other purpose than to stimulate sentiment against the rank and file who had forced the strike in opposition to their conservative leaders. At the same time that Mr. Green was helping to deliver the workers into the hands of their enemies, Mr. Ryan, president of the I. L. A., also played the strike-breaking game. This he did by conjuring up the red menace; by maintaining that the strike would have been settled long since had it not been for the machinations of communist elements. It can be said to Mr. Ryan's credit, however, that he at least suggested that the workers were striking for something, and that the die-hard attitude of the employers was a factor in the trouble.

Notwithstanding the collapse in San Francisco, labor is still on the warpath throughout the country. The whole Pacific Coast continues to perch on a volcano, which threatens to erupt unless the San Francisco dock strike is settled on terms satisfactory to the workers. In Portland, union workers are contemplating a general boycott and "passive resistance" in the Gandhi tradition. Senator Wagner's peace efforts in that city are in danger of being undone, because Governor Meier has seen fit to mobilize the Oregon National Guard for riot duty. In Seattle, the police, using tear-gas bombs, have broken the blockade long maintained by pickets at the municipal docks. Mayor Smith is here to blame, for he put himself at the head of the police, replacing Police Chief Howard who saw no need for opening the port by force. The greatest danger to the peace of the Pacific Coast is not that the striking workers will lose their heads; it is that the police and troops will get out of hand, engage in union-smashing, and drive the workers to despair.

In Minneapolis, a two-day truce was declared in the truck-drivers' walkout after the police opened rifle-fire on a crowd of pickets who attempted to stop trucks moving under armed escort. One picket was killed, and at least fifty persons were wounded by police bullets. As we write, the convoying of trucks by armed guards has been resumed. In Minneapolis, as elsewhere, the strikers have to contend not only against armed forces but against their national union officers as well. The Minneapolis walkout has been anathema to Mr. Tobin and his cohorts in the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. "The reds are to blame for this," they say, and thus they make it harder for the workers to achieve their end, in this case forcing the employers to live up to the settlement of late May.

Yet the labor unrest from below continues to grow in the face of police and troops, and notwithstanding betrayal by misleaders of labor. In Alabama, from 13,000 to 20,000 cotton-textile workers have walked out; twenty-seven mills have closed down. The United Textile Workers of America, the union behind the strike, asks for "recognition"; a thirty-hour week at a minimum rate of $12; and above all for abolition of the "stretch-out" and "speed-up." For once, the Cotton Textiles National Industrial Relations Board has failed to smother the revolt which has been brewing since the summer of 1933. In Montana, the strike of the copper miners affiliated with the International Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers remains in force. This strike aims at winning concessions in wages, hours, and working conditions that the copper code failed to convey to the miners. In metropolitan New York, a harbor tie-up threatens; and the knit-goods workers, led by the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, are ready to walk out to enforce their demands for a classified wage scale. Even in idyllic Kohler, Wisconsin, the workers are striking against the benevolent dictatorship of the former governor of the State. And there are new rumblings among the iron-and-steel workers.

In short, labor everywhere in the land is striving to collect the promissory note of Section 7-a. If this disrupts the roseate dreams of the New Dealers, they have nobody to blame but themselves.

The Publishers Point with Pride

RADICAL critics of our capitalist economy and culture have long contended that the apparatus of our daily and periodical press constitutes the most strategically placed as well as one of the most reactionary vested interests in America. This contention is impressively confirmed by a bulletin issued on July 16 by the National Publishers Association from which the following excerpts are taken:

> This has been a most unusual year in the publishing field and the National Publishers' Association has due cause to be proud of its operations during this year in the interests of the entire publishing industry.
>
> Wagner Labor Bill. This legislation would have been very costly to all publishers whether or not they operate their own printing plant. We took a very active part in killing this legislation.
>
> Tugwell Pure Food and Drug Bill. As originally proposed, this legislation would have been a serious blow to all advertising. Your committee and executives were finally successful in modifying this legislation.
>
> Unemployment Insurance. This bill provided for a tax of 5 per cent on all payrolls. Its seriousness speaks for itself, and your representatives aided in preventing its passage.

Among the directors of the N. P. A. responsible for this patriotic, forward-looking, inter-office communication is one Malcolm Muir of the McGraw Hill Publishing Company, and formerly one of the administrators in charge of heavy machinery codes. Others are Roy Larsen of Time, P. S. Collins of the Curtis Publishing Company, Merle Thorpe of the Nation's Business, S. R. Latshaw of the Butterick Publishing Company, William B. Warner of McCall's, and A. D. Mayo of the Crowell Publishing Company.

It was to gentlemen of this ilk, and to activities of this character that the President and the Secretary of Agriculture paid homage when, at the recent convention of the American Federation of Advertisers, they praised the patriotism and passion for truth of the ad-men. It was statesmen of this caliber that General Johnson was honoring when he said, in his address to the Pacific Coast Association of Advertising Clubs:

> He [the advertising man] must have an insight into the manufacture of the article he is to write the copy for. He must know the resistance to be met in prospective sales; he must know his market. In a word, in this great country he must know the temper and mind of the American people, and when a man knows that he is a statesman—no less. Do you know that in selling the draft we were told that it could not be done—that the Anglo-Saxon race would not stand for conscription. It had failed in England and three times here—but we did it. How? By pure publicity. . . . The sculptor works in plastic clay, the artist in paints, the author in words, but your material is human minds and emotions—a far more delicate and fleeting thing. You are artists or you are not good advertising men. Well, statesmen and artists—NRA needs your help.

Just how much help these "statesmen and artists" contributed toward furthering the objectives of the New Deal is indicated by the N. P. A. bulletin already quoted. Besides being a spouting vulgarian, General Johnson has the characteristic ad-man's gift of self-hypnosis, which, when consistently cultivated, produces highly dangerous charlatans and psychopaths. They are among the most effective disseminators of moral, ethical, and economic balderdash and confusion, the most diligent breeders of mass moronism in America. They are the loud-speakers of our emerging industrial feudalism; not our masters, but certainly our masters' bullying and cozening voices.

In a recent issue of the Ladies' Home Journal we see the statesmanship and artistry of the ad-man-editor applied to the exceedingly practical task of immunizing his readers against any future attempt to pass the consumer legislation which the N. P. A. boasts proudly of having defeated. The following is quoted from a chaste little editorial entitled Musings of Mrs. Consumer:

> The way some folks still go on talking about the "forgotten consumer" and the "forgotten buyer" is funny. If being steadily in the spotlight, with controversy raging over our poor neglected state, with government departments being rapidly set up for our protection—if that is being forgotten, then I've forgotten my own name. If the brain-trusters really succeeded in getting a people's forum, the people would probably have something to say about taxes—when they found out how much it cost them to be saved. . . . Possibly government needs cleaning up as much as advertising. . . . Perhaps there is as much misuse of power in one case as in the other—and with as much ultimate harm to us consumers.

When Congress adjourned without passing even Senator Copeland's emasculated version of the Tugwell bill, Secretary Tugwell wrote a consoling letter to the personnel of the Food and Drug Administration. "I wish to assure all of you," he said, "that the efforts of the Administration to secure a satisfactory law have not ended. They have only begun. . . . Sooner or later we shall have a satisfactory law under which to work in our efforts to protect the consumer."

Sooner or later, one might add, the Administration, if it really desires to protect the consumer, will have to do battle with the publishers, and with the thus far unrebuked effrontery of the advertising "statesmen" and "artists."

Little Magazines

THE correlation and interpretation of statistics is a fascinating sport. For example, we learn from the church statisticians that, as the curve of car-loadings goes down, the curve of religious conversions rises. Whereas a number of analyists have shown that strikes signalize the tail-end of a business depression: as business responds, feebly enough, to the pump-priming efforts of the NRA, labor retorts with a spreading wave of militant strikes.

Somewhere in this worm-tangle of statistical curves is a thin line indicating the rise and fall in the production of "little" magazines. The data is incomplete, but two things may be said with some confidence about this line. First, it is today a red line—most of the dozens of new little magazines that have sprung up during the depression are radical-to-revolutionary in their politico-social and esthetic philosophy; many of them are Communist in sponsorship and control. Second, the little-red-magazine curve correlates inversely with the drop in circulation and influence of the commercial periodical press. There is a third conclusion about which one can be somewhat less confident: the possibility that the apparatus of publication developed to serve the left political and literary formations may become a permanent, self-sufficient entity, rather than a training ground for young writers who expect to graduate eventually into the "quality-group" magazines, the women's magazines, or the Saturday Evening Post. This would amount to a kind of cultural secession, in which a new revolutionary class culture is precipitated out of the weakening social solvent of our "democracy"—a new culture with its own values, its own audiences, and its own means of production and communication.

This, of course, is a favorable statement of the tendency. But many of these publications are highly creditable and some of them look viable. For example, the well-edited Social Work Today, a bi-monthly now in its third issue, has effectively represented the radical wing of the social workers and, in view of the enlargement of the public-relief apparatus, seems likely to establish itself permanently. One would like to say as much for the Monthly Review, a magazine for professional workers which represents an attempt by Communist fellow-travelers to reach the increasing number of professional people whose financial and social status has been undermined by the depression—that pool of frustrated and desperate humanity in which the Italian and German fascists fished so successfully. Unfortunately, Mr. Koven, Mr. Johnson, and his associates got off to a highly defensive, introverted, and sectarian start, giving almost as much space to the recent troubles of the Communist Party as to the problems of the professionals. The Monthly Review may move up the "evangelical index" of the Communist Party a notch or two, but a radical change of policy will surely be necessary if it is to provide the required amount of education in this important field.

In the Partisan Review, Left Front, and Left Review—all John Reed Club publications—the Communist Party line is still pretty strict, but the product of the left literati has immensely improved. This is equally true of such independent ventures as Dynamo, Blast, and the Anvil. Most of the writers appearing in these magazines are new, many of them are promising, and the level of technical competence is surprisingly high. True, a kind of revolutionary sentimentality crops up here and there among these writers, but less and less do they attempt to substitute earnestness for art. Among the theoretical revolutionary magazines, the New International, published by the Communist League (Trotzkyists), is an impressive newcomer. When a small left group can get out a fifteen-cent monthly magazine containing in its first issue some 70,000 words of rather well-thought-out and well-written prose, then the dollar value of such enterprises as the opulent and glistening Fortune becomes somewhat questionable.

The limiting factor in the development of this "outlaw" press, is, of course, its factionalism. But as the depression continues to drive recruits into the radical fold, unifying tendencies are likely to develop. When the commercial magazines committed cultural suicide by becoming advertising businesses, they really accomplished a kind of service. They achieved the reductio ad absurdum of these middle-class "culture-bearers," and they cleared the ground for something new, strange, and increasingly vital.

Morals for Men

IN an article contributed to the Atlanta Journal by Bishop "Coco-Cola" Candler we read with considerable surprise that The Nation recently said: "[America] will never be restored in economics or in politics till it gets right in religion and morals." None of the editors remembers having committed this thought to paper and "get right in" is not a locution favored in this office. However, what we want chiefly to protest against is the assumption that morals have ever ceased to interest the American people or that it is not easier to get up a good hot discussion over a moral question than it is over any concerning such mundane subjects as unemployment, starvation, or mis-government.

Consider for example the case of the Aldermen of the City of New York. The metropolis is, we believe, faced with a good many serious problems. Money is scarce, thousands are clamoring for relief, and actual crimes of violence occasionally occur. But do the Aldermen, for all that, take the low view that such matters ought to have first consideration when a moral problem arises? They do not. What, to be specific, were they doing at their last meeting before adjournment for the summer—which meeting, incidentally, occurred almost exactly at the time when Mayor La Guardia was denouncing the bankers for their low appraisement of the municipal bonds about to be issued? We hasten to answer. They were engaging in long and heated debate on the subject of what ought to be done to men who insist upon appearing upon the public beaches with bare chests. They were also considering two ordinances relating to the question, which were introduced respectively by Alderman Louis E. Isnardi and Alderman Lew I. Haas. To the former the spectacle presented by gentlemen in trunks alone was appalling. "It's filthy and disgusting. It's immoral and it's nasty." The latter, on the other hand, could not see it that way. Accordingly Alderman Isnardi wished to reintroduce an ordinance, vetoed a few days before by the Mayor, which specifically forbids the public exhibition of the male chest. Alderman Haas, on the other hand, wished to pass one declaring that "exposure of the male anatomy above the waist shall not be deemed indecent."

To blunted sensibilities like ours the whole matter seems trivial. To us the male chest is a peculiarly uneventful expanse of no interest whatsoever. It presents nothing capable of catching the eye, arresting the attention, or arousing the passions. Its characteristics are negative and it is hard to see how it could possibly be indecent. We have no objection to its being covered because there does not really seem to be anything to cover; but we cannot imagine anyone, male or female, being led astray or started upon a life of sin through its exhibition. Nevertheless, it is reassuring to know that we have a Board of Aldermen sufficiently on the alert to sense moral danger where we would see none, and sufficiently conscientious to devote the little precious time remaining before adjournment to a solemn discussion of the proper way to meet it. It only remains to be added that the board finally disposed of the matter in a highly statesmanlike fashion. It decided to postpone further consideration of both proposed ordinances until the next meeting—by which time the bathing season will, of course, be practically over.

Issues and Men

Hitler's "Me und Gott"

IT is impossible to read Hitler's defense of his atrocious murders without taking heart. I am aware, of course, that he has strengthened himself at home for the moment by his horrible acts. When a dictator slaughters like that he stuns his country and, for the moment, paralyzes opposition. I have read of the cheers and approval with which his statement was greeted in the Reichstag and in the press, and how the latter is falsely misrepresenting to the German people the burning indignation of the public opinion of the world. Nonetheless, knowing the Germans as I do, I cannot but feel that this orgy of blood-letting marks the beginning of the end of Hitler. It may take a long time to rid the country of him; but, as Wendell Phillips once said apropos of slavery, "so, when the tempest uproots a pine on your hills, it looks green for months—a year or two. Still it is timber, not a tree." Hitler remains as dictator, but no longer the defiant head of a people which he insisted was united to the last man. A tyrant who begins to kill traitors must more than ever be on the look-out for their friends, their sympathizers, their relatives, their avengers.

Again, there must be some reason left in Germany, and just as Verdun opened the eyes of millions of the Kaiser's subjects, who had still been living in the intoxication of the "absolutely united Germany" of the first war years, to the hopelessness and folly of the German cause, so Hitler's speech—to say nothing of the cause of it—must give sight to many hitherto blind. For if there is any logic left among his adherents, if they are able at all to analyze in cold blood Hitler's speech, the following facts established by the tyrant himself—not by any critic or enemy—stand out clearly:

I. As the Kaiser identified himself with God, so Hitler declares: "In this hour I was responsible for the fate of the nation, thereby the supreme court of the German people during these twenty-four hours consisted of myself." Me und Gott!

II. Hitler admits that he knew in May of the traitorous plans of his chief of staff, Captain Roehm, and that he let him from then on continue to weave his plot instead of immediately dismissing—or killing—him and thus preventing his corruption of other Storm Troop leaders and persuading them to their deaths.

III. Hitler admits that he had known since May that Roehm "and the circle devoted to him broke all the laws of decency and simplicity, but it was even worse that his poison began to spread in ever enlarging circles." But Hitler allowed the poison to spread for two months longer, precisely as he had always known that in making Roehm, the open pervert, chief of staff he put into one of the highest offices a man whose homosexual love letters had been published and satirized freely in the German press as far back as 1932. He also admits that Heines, Hayn, Heydebreck, and Ernst were all of this type—yet he made them leaders and exemplars to the Storm Troops, upheld and glorified them until they turned against him.

IV. Hitler admits that in his Storm Troops there was (a) licentiousness, (b) corruption, (c) dissipated living—in his own words "bad conduct, drunken excesses, and interference with decent, peaceable folk—and (d) favoritism, which worked great injury, "the oldest and most faithful Storm Troopers were pushed more and more into the background." Yet the Storm Troopers were absolutely the creation and creatures of Adolf Hitler, who, by his own admission, took no steps to end the demoralization of his private army of which he says he was aware months and months ago—which speaks volumes for his worth as an executive and a leader.

V. Hitler admits the execution of "three special guard members who had made themselves guilty of disgraceful maltreatment of prisoners taken into protective custody"; similar entirely substantiated charges of torture and murder of prisoners have been known to Hitler but denied by him from the very beginning.

VI. Hitler admits that he caught no one red-handed; that not one single overt act had been committed before he struck, and he glories in the fact that his victims were shot on the shortest possible notice, or, as in the case of Von Schleicher and his wife, without notice at all.

VII. Hitler passes over the deaths of the Catholic leaders murdered by him without the slightest reference to them or attempt to connect them with the alleged plot.

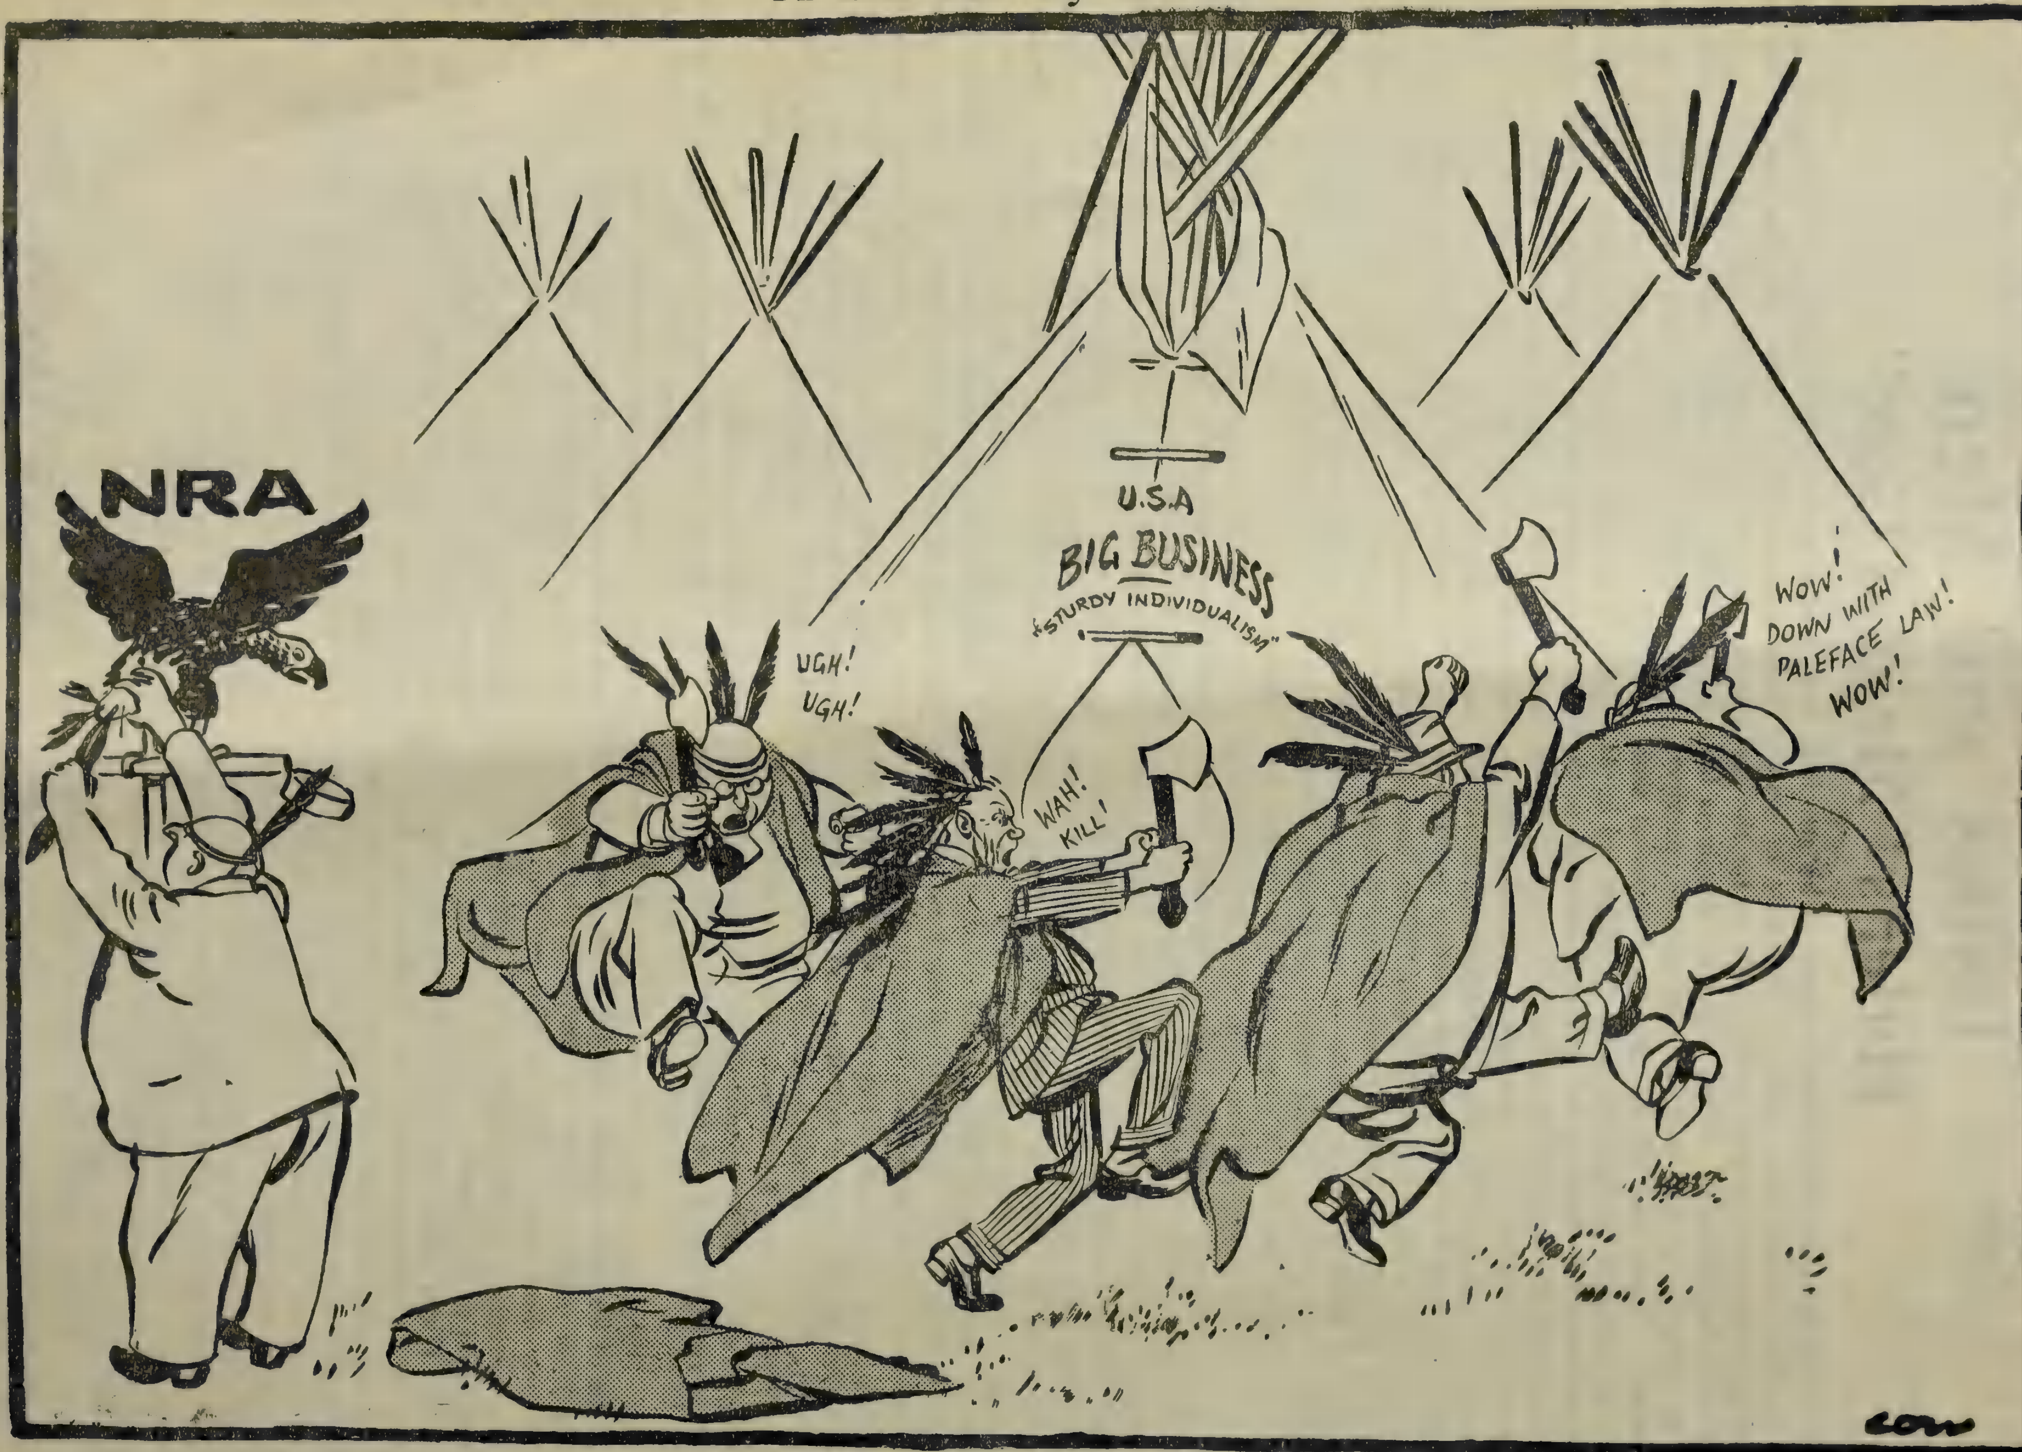
VIII. Hitler admits the gravity of the economic situation which in his earliest speeches he was going to cure at once and he has to fall back upon the absurd theory that Germany can be saved from disaster by the skill and inventiveness of her chemists and scientists who are to provide substitutes for cotton, wool, rubber, manganese, aluminum, the precious metals, and all the other raw materials upon which Germany depends.

But finally, and most important of all, is the fact that, like all dictators in history, Hitler after a year and a half of power has so completely identified himself with the state as to make any move against him personally a crime against the state. The Roehm revolt, if such there was, was not aimed at the German people or at the German state; Hitler declares that they wished to get rid of him and that they wished to make the Hitler revolution really the radical, National Socialist one Hitler fooled millions into believing that it was to be. All sane Germans cannot fail to see this, nor to realize that, having got rid of the Kaiser, they have placed over them a man who has now made himself the supreme authority beyond and above all law and courts and has arrogated to himself power of life and death over any one whom he may accuse of conspiracy against him. I cannot yet believe that in the long run the German people will stand for anything of the kind.

Oswald Garrison Villard

LIBRARY

A Cartoon by LOW



NRA
U.S.A
BIG BUSINESS
"STURDY INDIVIDUALISM"
UGH! UGH!
WAH! KILL!
WOW! DOWN WITH PALEFACE LAW! WOW!
LOW

ON THE WAR-PATH.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press.

San Francisco:
An Autopsy on the General Strike

By MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD

San Francisco, July 22

THE general strike in San Francisco and the Bay District collapsed in three days because it never was a general strike in any real meaning of that term. A true general strike is a revolutionary measure; it has political aims and its genesis is a profound economic revolt. What occurred in San Francisco was a gesture of sympathy extended to the stubbornly fighting longshoremen and maritime workers by good, conservative, patriotic A. F. of L. members who, stirred by the fiery appeals of Harry Bridges and other ardent strike-leaders of the I. L. A., bolted from the control of their usual masters, the reactionary labor leaders, and for a short while took the bit in their teeth. They were reluctant to go back; the vote was 191 to 174. But the vote to demand that both sides submit to arbitration was equally close—203 to 187—and yet the general strike committee did so vote. And even the rank-and-file workers were curiously cautious from the beginning; in the original general-strike vote there were three opposed unions; two of these were already out but registered an adverse vote simply to retain their charters, which forbade sympathy strikes. It is not of such material that genuine general strikes are made.

I walked through the downtown sections of the city on the third day of the strike, and I had to look about me sharply to see evidences of its existence. There were no Market Street Railway Company cars, but the municipal cars were running as usual, ordered back by the strike committee itself after one day off the streets. There were no taxis, more people than usual were on foot, and private cars were fewer because only physicians and public institutions could obtain gasoline; but entire calm and lack of alarm prevailed. Only the restaurants and barber-shops were closed; other stores, including department stores, were open as usual, and full of customers. Fresh meat could not be bought, food staples were rationed, and at first there were no fresh vegetables or fruit; but nineteen restaurants were allowed to open from the beginning, and in a day or two these had increased to sixty-nine. Newspapers were published as usual, light and power and communication systems were untouched, bread and milk deliveries were not interfered with. The strike was never complete, and it began relaxing its provisions almost at once. Food trucks manned by union drivers were given permits to enter the city, where National Guardsmen promptly ripped the permits off. About the only real deprivation endured by the general public was the inability to go to the theater, eat in a hotel dining room, ride in a taxi or on a Market Street Railway car, get clothes cleaned or washed, and get a hair-cut.

Naturally the citizens as a whole, until they were excited by certain newspapers and radio stations and by sundry spokesmen for the anti-labor cohorts—including Mayor Rossi—into viewing the whole affair as a communist plot, took these minor annoyances with more or less good humor. They stocked up in so far as they could on food and gasoline, postponed various gatherings, from the cosmetologists' convention to the Novena to St. Anne, and waited in a rather friendly spirit to see what would happen next. Some of the signs on closed business houses were mildly facetious—"Gone out to eat," read a card on one padlocked restaurant.

Meanwhile the National Longshoremen's Board, appointed by President Roosevelt, called in vain for a chance to arbitrate. The employers dallied; the workers, whatever the recommendations of the A. F. of L. strike committee, stood pat on their refusal to arbitrate the only real point at issue—the closed shop and control of the hiring halls. This board, later augmented and submerged by the aggressive General Hugh Johnson, had and has the confidence of none of the original strikers, and of none of the sympathetic strikers except the dukes of labor. Archbishop Edward Hanna, its chairman, is trusted by none except the conservative labor leaders. He broadcast an appeal just before the general strike, in which he pled for peace on the ground that we are all sons of one Father and brothers in Christ. That was as near as his speech came to economic reality. Edward McGrady, assistant secretary of labor though he be, has too long a record as a right-wing unionist to please the leftward-inclined rank and file. O. K. Cushing, the third member of the board, is a highly conservative attorney and affiliated with the Rolph group. And General Johnson, tactless, boisterous, and vacillating, certainly gives no assurance to the men that he will have their interests instead of their employers' at heart. The very fact that the shippers, with the approval of the Industrial Association, favored arbitration was sufficient evidence to the maritime and waterfront strikers that the committee could be depended on to decide against them.

Into this delicate situation walked the ideal scapegoat, the Communists. They walked in deliberately, helped by that incredible indiscretion which impels them to take credit for every uprising of labor. Nothing could have suited better the Industrial Association, which has dreamed for years of transforming San Francisco into the open-shop paradise which Los Angeles is. Nothing could have suited better the mayors of San Francisco and Oakland, with their political ambitions; the hardboiled sheriffs of the surrounding counties, fearful of renewed agricultural disturbances; the acting governor, eager to be the Coolidge of California and to harvest the votes at the primaries in August; the American Legion, already engaged in an intensive anti-communist drive; the ordinary conservative unionists, a little ashamed of having been caught in this emotional gesture and delighted to believe that the original strikes were only the result of control of the I. L. A. and the maritime unions by a radical minority.

In two days every headquarters and meeting place of every organization affiliated even remotely with communism was raided by bands of "unknown" civilian vigilantes and thoroughly wrecked. The Marine Workers' Industrial Union was a constituent part of the maritime strike and had a large contingent in that extraordinarily impressive silent funeral procession of the two men murdered by police on "bloody Thursday," July 5. But it was the first headquarters to be visited and smashed, this time with the assistance of the National Guard. The Western Worker, the Workers' School, the Trades Union Unity League, the I. L. D., the Italian and Chinese and Japanese sections—not one was missed. The fever spread to the east bay, which in every detail had copied the example of San Francisco about a day behind. The Oakland police and the "scientific police" of Berkeley, following, as in San Francisco, the civilian raids, mopped up after the wreckers and arrested everyone in sight. A meeting in a Congregational church was invaded; the West Berkeley hall of the Finnish cooperatives, not Communist-controlled although there are some Communists among the members, was reduced to kindling wood, while the helpless workers watched their thousand-dollar library, their theater with its two grand pianos, all their equipment that spelled years of sacrifice, committed to wanton destruction. In San Francisco the Triangle Press, an ordinary commercial firm which happened to print the Western Worker, was burned to the ground. The I. W. W. hall was included in the holocaust. In Oakland bricks were thrown through the windows of twenty private houses, bearing orders to get out of town. In Hayward a gallows was erected, marked "Reds, Beware!"

The San Francisco city jail, built to accomodate 150, now has 400 prisoners. Many of those arrested were seriously injured, but details were suppressed. All prisoners are being held under $1,000 cash bail; the leaders are to be tried on criminal-syndicalism charges, the aliens to be deported—in some cases to Germany, Italy, or Japan. One judge characterized their demand for a jury trial as "ridiculous," and when George R. Anderson, their attorney, applied to Police Captain O'Meara for a guard or for permission to carry a revolver, after he had received several threats of lynching, O'Meara replied that he was "too busy" to bother.

All over northern and central California now, from Sacramento to San Luis Obispo, Communist headquarters are being raided and radicals are being arrested or deported. For the first time the Communist Party had gained a place on the California primaries ballot ("unfortunately," as the chief of police of Oakland remarked), but every known candidate is either in prison or in hiding. They will not be allowed to hold any campaign meetings or demonstrations. Mayor Rossi of San Francisco says frankly that he intends to drive all Communists permanently out of San Francisco; and Mayor McCracken of Oakland echoes his sentiments.

Meanwhile, the general strike over, the I. L. A. and the maritime unions are being bullied into submitting to arbitration by the President's board—an arbitration that will almost certainly mean the crushing of the strike. The big shippers are calling their vessels home again to San Francisco, and announce that this time they plan "a real port opening, not just a gesture." The teamsters have capitulated utterly; they have voted to go back without reservations, which means that they will haul goods loaded and unloaded by strikebreakers. The strong pressure brought on the mayor from the beginning of the general strike to ask for a declaration of martial law has not let up even though the general strike is over. As an instance, employees of some firms have been ordered to sign petitions asking the mayor to call for martial law, and those who refused are being threatened with loss of their jobs.

Only a few small unions are still out on either side of the bay (except for the original waterfront and marine strikers), and these for their own grievances. The run-of-the-mill union men of the Bay District had their little sympathetic spree, and now they are back docilely in harness, under the resumed control of Casey and O'Connell and Kidwell and Vandeleur. President Joseph Ryan of the I. L. A. has even evolved the grotesque theory that the general strike was called to serve notice on the San Francisco longshoremen that they must get rid of Harry Bridges and his kind and return to conservative leadership! Since, months before the strike, the longshoremen ousted their renegade district president, Lee Holman, for just such advocacy, they are not likely to obey. But they and the maritime unions have now been abandoned to their fate. The general strike is over, but the general drive to crush militant unionism in San Francisco has only just fairly begun.

Wisconsin's New Party

By HAROLD M. GROVES

Madison, July 19

THE nation has always looked to Wisconsin for radical leadership. The progressive movement in that State has been one of unusual vigor and persistence. Frequently during the last thirty years it has had the responsibility of power. On such occasions it has shown an unusual capacity to convert its program into intelligent social legislation. Its statutes have been very widely copied by other States. It has met many defeats and disasters only to come back stronger than ever. In addition it has sent to Washington men of outstanding stature. Because of his courageous opposition to the war and his valiant battles for the under dog, Robert M. LaFollette, Sr., became the recognized national leader of the liberals and radicals. In 1924 when they decided upon an independent national ticket he was their choice as a candidate for President. His two sons who have stepped into his place as leaders of the Wisconsin movement have achieved national reputations in their own right.

For many years the Wisconsin Progressives have exerted their efforts within the Republican Party, seeking to capture its nominations and write its platform. Therefore, their recent decision to break away from the Republican Party and form a party of their own is of national interest and significance. The decision to strike out for themselves was not lightly and easily made. Since the last election there has been much new-party talk. But the leaders, with few exceptions, remained skeptical. They asked for a demonstration of popular demand; and they got it. During March a convention was held with delegates present from practically all counties in the State, most of them elected for the occasion by mass meetings of the rank and file. Each delegation was called upon to express the sentiment of its district and it was overwhelmingly for a new party.

At a later conference the new party was launched. Since then the people have had an opportunity to show their interest and enthusiasm in a more tangible way, and have responded beyond the expectations of the most optimistic leaders. It had been agreed that the new party would be established only if and when 50,000 signers could be secured on new-party petitions. This was a much larger number than that required by law. Working virtually without money and with less than a month of time, the workers for the new party proceeded to get three times the number of signatures which had been set as a goal.

Does this mean that the people of Wisconsin have turned against Roosevelt? Apparently not. The Literary Digest poll shows Roosevelt stronger than ever. But it is one thing to support Roosevelt and quite another thing to support the Democratic Party. After their own candidates had been defeated in the primary, the Wisconsin Progressives supported Governor Schmedeman and a Democratic slate two years ago. This one dose of the Democratic Party has been enough to cure the Progressives for all time. The State Democratic administration made an almost perfect Stalwart record and opposed in State affairs practically everything which Roosevelt supported at Washington.

Within the Wisconsin Progressive movement a very wide range of temperament and philosophy has developed. On the extreme right are the hereditary Progressives, really conservative by temperament; the opportunists, Progressive for the purpose of getting into office; and the mild liberals. This group is disposed to be very cautious. They were unanimously and vigorously opposed to leaving the Republican Party. Now that the new party has proved itself popular they feel more kindly toward it. With a few exceptions they are willing to go along with the movement. The new party, as the right wing sees it, should be exactly like the progressive wing of the Republican Party except for its new name and its separate column on the ballot. They favor calling the new party the "Progressive Party," and they feel that no new declaration of principles or technique of organization is necessary. They think that "the principles of Old Bob LaFollette" and "what we have done for this State during the last thirty years" are foundation enough for any new party to stand on.

On the extreme left will be found some Progressives of an entirely different color. Some of them are Socialists who work with the Progressives because they feel that the Marxist approach is ineffective. All of them believe that very fundamental changes in the economic system are necessary and some of them feel that there must be a change of a sudden and drastic sort. These members care little about "reforms" and efforts to "stabilize capitalism." They place the principal emphasis upon political education rather than immediate action. Much of the drive for a new party came from the left wing. They want the new party to be one in fact as well as in name. They are class conscious and wish to found the party on "a mass movement of the rank and file." They favor the name "Farmer-Labor," want a declaration of principles and a platform at once, and favor a dues-paying organization of the rank and file to govern more or less the party and to promote candidates with a left point of view. They would pattern the party after the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party. The League for Independent Political Action has had a strong influence upon this group.

In the center between the left and the right is a group of genuine liberals and mild radicals. They favor no break with the past so far as pressing an opportunistic program is concerned. They stress action ahead of education. Some of them feel that the tempo of progress must be increased in order to avoid fascism, war, and economic collapse, but they are interested in winning the next election and in what can be accomplished next year. This group divided on the issue of a new party. In the main it is not strongly class-conscious and it preferred "Progressive" as the new party label. It favors the primary election as a means of nominating candidates and framing a party platform.

The position of the middle group was recently presented in an address by Philip LaFollette. Some excerpts from this address follow:

> Modern intellectualism is inclined to believe that the mere statement of propositions in language means their carrying into action. . . . Experience has taught that those of common aims, confronted by factual situations, act without friction. . . . Let us all therefore endeavor to test theory with practice and resolve that the Progressive Party shall be dedicated to action.

Mr. LaFollette went on to explain his attitude toward public ownership. He favored public ownership of public utilities and central banks but opposed further "nationalization," advocating instead the "conscious distribution of national income" through taxation and other governmental policies.

The economic organizations cannot be left out of this picture. The leaders of the labor unions with some exceptions are left-wing Progressives and Socialists. The executive board of the State Federation of Labor is dominantly Socialist or socialistic. It will not be satisfied with a new party which is not thoroughly class conscious and which does not include the Socialists. These labor leaders have always complained considerably about the Progressives but they have obtained perhaps the best code of labor laws in the United States from legislatures dominantly Progressive. For this reason they cannot afford to oppose or ignore the movement entirely. The rank and file of the unions probably range from Socialists to middle Progressives. The organized farmers are much less disciplined and philosophically grounded than organized labor. Many of them are thoroughly radical and talk a great deal about cleaning out the profit system. Many will follow almost any magnetic leader who speaks their language. It is an accepted political maxim that neither the farm nor the labor leaders can deliver the vote of the rank and file in their organizations, not to mention the vote of the unorganized farmer and worker. The unorganized farmers have been strongly Progressive but unorganized labor voted in very large numbers for Stalwart Republicans and Democrats at the last election. Apparently they were frightened at the radicalism of Phil LaFollette.

Forging a new party out of groups with this wide range of viewpoint could hardly be accomplished without some friction. The right wing has occasionally referred to the left as "wind-bags" and "trouble-makers" and the left wing has sometimes called the right "office-seekers" and "the elder statesmen." Nevertheless there has been remarkably little dissension. Senator LaFollette has the respect and support of all factions and much Republican and Democratic support as well. Barring the unexpected he is sure to be re-elected by a wide margin.

On June 30 the left-wing group acting on its own initiative called a conference of representatives of farm and labor organizations and Progressive clubs. The meeting was well attended. It proceeded to organize a Farmer-Labor and Progressive League, adopted a declaration of principles, and appointed a platform committee. The declaration was not more radical than most Progressives would be willing to accept. Phil LaFollette and Tom Amlie both addressed the convention and both were given a warm reception. The League gives the new movement a dual organization, such as is characteristic of several political parties in Europe and, to some extent, of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party. What part it will play in the history of the party remains to be seen.

There are those who feel that the Socialist Party will make heavy inroads into Progressive support in the fall elections. The Socialists have chosen a farmer to head their State ticket and have been busily at work in rural territory. Outside the large cities they are undoubtedly receiving a warmer reception than ever before and they are making some converts. The consensus of opinion seems to be, however, that they present no very serious threat to the new party.

The decision of Wisconsin Progressives to form a new party is the most recent and perhaps the most significant break in the direction of a new political realignment. But it was Minnesota, of course, which was first in the field with an independent radical party. Moreover, the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party has enunciated the boldest and most radical platform which has yet appeared except under socialist and communist auspices. The showing of the party in the recent primary indicates that it stands a good chance of success in the general elections. On the other hand the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party is new in the field and has no record of achievement comparable to that of the Wisconsin Progressive movement. The last Minnesota legislature did pass a mild State income-tax law but it failed to enact even a conservative unemployment-insurance act.

The Non-Partisan League in North Dakota is now badly split and confused over the trial of Governor Langer for the misuse of federal funds. The League moreover has always done business within the Republican Party. But the North Dakota farmers, well organized and accustomed to united political action, should not prove difficult to convert.

The nuclei of new party movements have been organized in several other States. What kind of reception they will receive remains to be seen. Not everywhere are the Democrats in as ill repute with liberal people as they are in Wisconsin. Some of the States have election laws which make the inauguration of new parties difficult and it will require strong popular support to succeed in breaking down these obstacles.

It is true that the political cemetery is filled with new parties, but popular discontent has never been so strong or widespread as it is now. Unless the new leadership of the Democratic Party is able to liberalize that party nationally and locally to a much greater extent than has yet been done, and unless new party leaders run head-on into the rocks of dissension which have so often wrecked radical movements, the Progressive movement seems to have a good chance for success on a national scale.

"It Ain't No Sin!"

By JAMES RORTY

YOUR correspondent has discovered that all this uproar about the sinfulness of the movies is just a big, stupendous, colossal misunderstanding. He hopes that as a result of the explanations to follow, everything will soon be sweet and peaceful again; after which Mae West can go back to work, and maybe Elder Will Hays will buy your correspondent an ice-cream soda.

The movies are accused of corrupting the morals of American men, women, and children. But consider who makes the accusation—a "Legion of Decency" already numbering hundreds of thousands of people and rapidly growing; by autumn it is expected that there will be at least 12,000,000 Legionnaires of Decency—8,000,000 Catholics and 4,000,000 members of other denominations.

By their own admission these crusaders are themselves unstained; the movies have utterly failed to corrupt them. Presumably the criterion of membership in the Legion is the scriptural text, "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." Otherwise the crusade would be un-Christian and immoral. Surely one does not mobilize sinners to do God's work. Hence, considering the number and purity of the accusers, the movies must be acquitted out of hand. The conclusion is inescapable: America may be "smothered in goods," we may have excess productive capacity in industry and agriculture, but our moral economy is still one of scarcity. The labors of Cecil De Mille, Greta Garbo, Clara Bow, Jean Harlow, Lupe Velez, even that great good bad woman Mae West, have been utterly ineffective. Man does not live by bread alone. We are facing a sin shortage of alarming proportions. Relatively, America is still as innocent as a new-born babe.

It is possible, of course, that this shortage is more apparent than real—that it is largely based on the misunderstanding created by the efforts of the Hays office to have its sin and eat it too. For instance, the title of Miss West's forthcoming picture was announced as "It Ain't No Sin." If this title had been retained we would confidently expect that the Legion of Decency would set up headquarters opposite every theater exhibiting this picture, with a bigger, brighter Neon sign proclaiming "'Tis Too." Which indicates the tragic confusion of purposes underlying the whole controversy.

Stung by the ingratitude of her public, Miss West is rumored to have said: "If I was a home girl, I'd be broken-hearted." It is further rumored that Miss West, when sternly instructed to take the kick out of her current product, burst into tears. Like the Georgia mules that wouldn't plow under the cotton, the gallant trouper balked stock still in the furrow rather than abate her customary zeal in giving the boys what they wanted.

Sudden as it seemed, this new attack upon the movies did not spring full-born from the brow of Mrs. Grundy. It started over a year ago when some eighteen assorted sociologists, psychologists, and educators issued a nine-volume report of the findings of a four-year study of the effect of the movies upon children. The study was financed by the Payne Fund and instigated by another privately subsidized organization known as the Motion Picture Research Council. By a curious coincidence, the director of the Council is William H. Short, and certain unregenerate movie people have intimated that Mr. Short's object was to intensify the shortage indicated in the title of this article. In fact Mr. Short has at various times admitted as much. The nine-volume study was summarized and popularized in a book by Henry James Forman entitled "Our Movie-Made Children," parts of which were also published in McCall's magazine. The conclusions of the social scientists as summarized by Mr. Forman were, briefly, that sure enough the movies were not so good for the little tots; that the big tots as they reached puberty learned about women from Mae West and about men from Clark Gable; that the movie industry is, in effect, an educational apparatus rivaling in influence the school, the church, and the home; that at least three-quarters of the subject matter of current movies is sex, love, and crime—the apposition of "sex" and "love" is consistently adhered to; that many high school and college boys and girls confess they learned elements of practical love technique from the movies; that many juvenile delinquents and adult criminals have been movie fans and that some of them think the movies started them on the downward path; finally that the movies are a powerful instrument of propaganda—for and against war, for and against racial minorities. (The movie is also used consistently to carry propaganda against radical political and economic movements but this fact was not brought out.)

Some of the studies were about as silly-scientific as Walt Disney: for example the experiments in which a number of helpless boys and girls out of an orphanage, when exposed to the amours of screen lovers, promptly boosted the needle of the psycho-galvanometer. The "scientific norm" in these experiments was the reaction of the fiancee of one of the experimenters to a kiss administered in the laboratory. On the other hand some of the researchers were serious and sensible; they pretty much agreed that the trouble with the movies was their emptiness, their lack of genuine social and artistic content. They also indicated with some conclusiveness that "horror" pictures have bad effects on very young children and that non-movie-going children are on the whole brighter than children who see movies all the time.

As soon as this "fact-finding" study appeared, Mr. Short's Research Council went into action with a big campaign to do something about it, this requiring first a campaign for a $200,000 war chest. What Mr. Short's organization intended to do has never been very clear. The Motion Picture Research Council has always officially repudiated the suggestion that it intended to further the censorship movement. Last April, Mrs. August Belmont (the former Eleanor Robson) said flatly, "We don't want censorship, we are afraid of that." But Mr. Short, in his report delivered at the end of May, said, "I am not against censorship; so far as I know the views of the members of our group, most of them are not opposed to censorship. I think we are in agreement with the position of the splendid British Commission on Educational and Cultural Films that every culture has the right to defend itself by censorship against disintegrating forces. . . . But a negative method cannot perform a positive function; censorship cannot reconstruct and rebuild the movie output. . . ."

Yet the Patman bill providing for federal regulation of motion pictures was supported by at least two of the leading members of the Research Council. Unquestionably Mr. Short's organization sowed the wind although it seems unlikely that it will reap heavily in the path of the Catholic whirlwind which, by the way, it has never publicly repudiated or criticized. When Mrs. Belmont resigned as president at the end of June, on the ground of ill health, she said that "with the Pope expressing his condemnation in Rome and the Protestant churches, through their Federal Council, supporting the Catholic position in this country, the need is manifest for the kind of coordinating work the Motion Picture Council can supply."

What, by the way, is the Catholic position, and to what extent does the Federal Council of Churches (Protestant) support it? The Catholic Bishops' Committee obtained assurances from the industry that Mr. Joseph Breen had been given authority to clean up current productions. It expressed the hope "that the results of the organized industry's renewed efforts looking toward adequate self-regulation will be followed by adequate moral improvement in the pictures shown. And thus it is hoped that the Catholic bishops may be relieved of what otherwise will be the imperative necessity of continuing indefinitely and of extending the campaign of protest." But the Committee also approved the formation of a "Council of the Legion of Decency," and the individual bishops went on the warpath in earnest. Innumerable "black lists" and "white lists" have been issued. In Philadelphia Cardinal Dougherty, scorning the compromise of discriminating lists, has declared a boycott against all movie theaters which threatens to close some 500 houses. The bishops of forty-five dioceses have issued pastoral letters to their congregations urging them to join the Legion of Dencency and Bishop Cassidy of Fall River thinks Elder Will Hays ought to resign.

As for the lists, the current black list of the Chicago Archdiocese puts thirty-one pictures in the index expurgatorius, most of which by average standards are neither indecent nor immoral but simply childish, stupid, or incredibly banal. Conversely the white list approves among others a jingoistic pro-war film; films with a crook and a sot, respectively, as their heroes; an ultra-reactionary film showing the "World in Revolt"; a film glorifying the "poor rich."

The Catholic church has a vested doctrinal interest in suppressing movies which feature divorce or birth control. This is not the position by any means of all the Protestant denominations represented in the Federal Council of Churches. Yet the Reverend Worth M. Tippy, head of the Federal Council's department of church and social service has been cooperating with the Catholic drive against objectionable pictures. And in Chicago, Bishop Waldorf of the Methodist Church has undertaken to recruit 1,000,000 Methodists for the crusade, reinforcing Cardinal Mundelein's 1,250,000 parishioners.

In New York an Interfaith Committee of Catholics, Jews, and Protestants has undertaken to unify the church campaigns and is threatening to include books, plays, and dance halls. A speaker at the Interstate Conference of the Women's Christian Temperance Union urged the necessity of federal legislation as the only way to have "real censorship of dirty movies."

As might be expected, the ineffable William Randolph Hearst has joined the "Legion of Decency" with a whoop. On July 8 the Hearst press editorialized against the increase of dirty movies and revealed that the "American Husband" who wrote a letter to the editor of the Los Angeles Examiner last October was none other than that well known family man, Mr. Hearst himself. Said "An American Husband": "There will surely some day be established an effective federal censorship of atrocities which invade every household and exercise a determining influence on the character of the whole people, but particularly of the young. . . . Let the government do its duty. . . . . When an American husband takes his family to the theater he ought to be certain that he is not taking them to a house of ill-fame."

It would require only a slight shift in the wind to send the Legion of Decency careening after the sinful newspapers, especially the Hearst press. Maybe Mr. Hearst will pipe down before that happens. Or maybe, out of his seemingly inexhaustible resources of unctuous hypocrisy, he will find a way of getting out from under.

Against the frantic hypocrisy and irrationality of this country-wide uproar, there have been raised only a few, frail voices. Last week the National Council on Freedom from Censorship issued a statement suggesting that the recent attacks on the movies have confused the public mind and calling on the organizations responsible for the attacks "to clarify their attitude towards State and federal censorship of the movies and their plans regarding the stage, the book and magazine publications, the radio, and the newspapers."

Among those signing the statement were Elmer Rice, Mary Ware Dennett, Morris L. Ernst, B. W. Huebsch, Dr. Louis I. Harris, former Health Commissioner, and William A. Orr. The signers go on record as opposing either government or religious censorship and ask: "Can we take the judgment of some of these bodies expressing condemnation of the picture version of 'Men in White,' a Pulitzer-prize play of the year, as indicative of a condemnation of all pictures referring in any way to birth control or abortion? What other serious subjects would they prohibit from being presented in movies, on the stage, in books, and in the press? In making lists of motion pictures, condemned by the several organizations quoted in the press, would they object to naming the judges who have passed upon and approved these pictures, so that the public may be informed as to the ethical, moral, and artistic ability of these judges?"

Considering how long ago the fire alarm started ringing, the "morals machinery" of the Hays office was slow in getting under way. Characteristically, the industry was too cynical, too hypocritical, and too scared to fight. It scrapped the Hollywood Producers' Jury, the members of which could be counted on to let each other get away with anything and everything on the principle of reciprocity. It made Joseph Breen the moral dictator and told him to clean up, offenders being given only the right to appeal to the directors of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Inc. —the Hays office in New York. It also told J. J. McCarthy of the Hays office to clean up motion-picture advertising, which meant putting the fan dancers back into their clothes and seeing that the stills of screen lovers showed them in vertical, rather than in horizontal positions.

Under the Motion Picture Code, "block booking," which of course means also "blind booking," was validated, but the exhibitor was permitted to cancel 10 per cent of his booking. Block booking was attacked both by the Motion Picture Research Council and in the report of the Darrow NRA Review Board. And when the Legion of Decency got under way, many exhibitors pleaded helplessness on the ground that their contracts obliged them to show naughty pictures to which they themselves objected. An eminent motion picture magnifico—too eminent to be named—contributed to the writer the following jeer at this plea: "So these tank-town exhibitors say the hot numbers are pinned on 'em, eh? Say, did you ever hear of any exhibitor using his 10 per cent privilege to cancel 'I'm No Angel'? . . . Neither did I. But hundreds of 'em canceled 'Cradle Song' and it was a gorgeous, stupendous, wholesome picture."

But when the Legion of Decency was mobilized, some of these tank-town exhibitors—and big-town exhibitors too —called for help, so the industry cooperated. Henceforth any release prior to July 15 may be canceled if the exhibitor presents satisfactory evidence that the picture has been publicly objected to by the Legion of Decency or some other protesting body. This, of course, will cost the producers a great deal of grief and a lot of money. They have already had about a ten-million-dollar headache out of the current uproar and are due to suffer still more.

In the opinion of your correspondent it is a thoroughly deserved headache. There is more truth than jesting in the intimation expressed earlier in this article that the industry has afflicted us with a sin shortage. How otherwise can one interpret the preposterous spectacle of 12,000,000 "Legionnaires of Decency," themselves innocent of moral turpitude, careening over the cultural landscape and threatening to land us all behind the bars of a federal censorship? The movie magnates have treated the American people like cattle. They have measured the prurience of our Puritan mass culture, made films to exploit and incidentally confirm that prurience, and added for good measure a little of their own prurience. Of honest sin or honest sainthood they have given us practically nothing. Fake sin, fake sex, fake social and moral values: how can a culture achieve a healthy maturity on that sort of diet? It has not matured, but it has become bored. I suspect that the ease with which Catholic and Protestant reformers have launched this new crusade is owing to the widespread objection not to the salaciousness of the pictures but to their empty stupidity, only partially redeemed by an increasing technical excellence. Honest sex is not indecent and should not be dull; feeble salaciousness and hypocritical moralizing are both. The industry has never had courage enough to defend the first but has always taken refuge in the second. Witness what is happening to Mae West's new picture. The original title "It Ain't No Sin" was changed first to "The Belle of New Orleans" and then to "The Belle of the Gay Nineties" with corresponding bowdlerizing of lines and scenes. And Mae West's version of sex was far more decent than anything the screen had shown for years.

In short, the industry has bred this herd of pharisaical censors and now that it is being trampled by them, your correspondent finds himself dry-eyed and unmoved. It will pass of course. The middle-class mob will turn to something else, although we shall be lucky if this time we escape before a federal censorship is clamped down on both screen and stage—even, possibly, on books. If that happens, of course, we shall continue to have a shortage of sin—the culture will be frozen in the mud of our Puritan adolescent prurience—but we shall have an even greater surplus of bootlegged screen, stage, and printed salaciousness, offered, as usual, in the name of art.

Georgia Suppresses Insurrection

By WALTER WILSON

THE Georgia Supreme Court has sustained the conviction in a lower court—and the sentence to the chain gang for a term of from eighteen to twenty years—of Angelo Herndon, nineteen-year-old Negro youth, on a charge of inciting to insurrection. What desperate crime was committed by this young man that earned him such a savage sentence? The charges were two. He participated in a meeting of unemployed Negro and white workers. Worse, the police raided his home, without warrant, and found radical literature there such as "Communism and Christianism" by former Episcopal Bishop William Montgomery Brown of Arkansas, "The Life and Struggles of Negro Toilers" by George Padmore, and other items. In the trial that followed the prosecution appealed to racial, religious, and political prejudices. The assistant solicitor, John B. Hudson, said it was not a trial of Herndon, but of "Lenin, Stalin, Trotzky, and Kerensky." All of the State's witnesses were public employees, some of them detectives. The court blocked attempts of the defense to put on the stand white economists of standing from Georgia universities as expert witnesses on the literature and theories involved.

The old insurrection statute is being used in Georgia as a criminal-syndicalist law. But that crime had not been heard of when the law was originally passed in 1833 following the Nat Turner slave uprising in Virginia in that year. In 1866 the Georgia legislature, under control of the friends of the Confederacy (not carpet-baggers), enacted its Black Codes. As a part of them the old 1833 statute penalizing insurrection among slaves was made to apply to the newly freed Negroes and to agitators who flowed South to inform the Negro about his new prerogatives of freedom of movement, the right of franchise, and citizenship.

Only one case was tried under the law from 1866 to 1930. In 1869 a Negro preacher was charged with inciting his congregation to release a man from prison. The conviction that followed on a charge of inciting to insurrection was appealed to the Georgia Supreme Court and was reversed by that court on the grounds that though there was a law punishing insurrection there was not one for mere inciting to insurrection. General Joseph E. Brown, then Chief Justice of Georgia and, incidentally, one of the largest exploiters and traders in convict labor the South has known, went before the next session of the legislature and pointed out the lack of a specific penalty for inciting to insurrection. His suggestion was promptly executed. The law was enacted and has gathered dust in the archives for almost seventy years.

In 1930 six young Communists, two white girls, two Negro and two white men, doing trade-union and unemployed organizing in Georgia, were arrested and indicted under the same old insurrection statute. Bail was denied them for several months on the ground that the penalty on conviction was to be death. They were held in the cell at the Fulton County (Atlanta) Tower where prisoners already condemned to death are kept before being sent to Milledgeville for execution. They were also held incomunicado for a long time. Much of the same literature cited in the Herndon case was used by the prosecution in the indictment of the "Atlanta Six," as the cases came to be called. The Herndon case is really only a continuation of these cases.

However, the Atlanta Six cases have not yet come up for trial. There are several reasons. The Georgia labor movement, realizing that such a restrictive law would hit at all labor and progressive groups, took an interest in smashing the prosecution. The Atlanta Federation of Trades, made up of delegates from all labor bodies in the city, passed a strong resolution taking its stand for freedom of speech, press, and assemblage for communists along with everyone else. The editor of the local labor paper spoke out against infringement of the bill of rights. Fair-minded citizens of Atlanta also got busy. Committees were sent to see the authorities, demanding that the cases be dropped and all raids and persecutions of radicals be stopped. Finding the prosecution adamant, fifty-eight outstanding persons in Atlanta signed a statement and gave it to the press. In this they expressed their strong belief that the constitutional guaranties of free speech, press, and assemblage applied to communists just as well as to others. Editors in every Southern State praised the action and courage of the fifty-eight. The New York World said that this statement was worth more to the South than a "flock of skyscrapers." In addition to this activity in Georgia and in the South, labor and progressive groups in other sections of the country gave wide publicity to the cases and let their protests be known. As a result of this campaign the Atlanta authorities backed down and let the six out on bail.

But the subsequent conviction and savage sentence in Herndon's case proves that the prosecution was only waiting for a calm before striking again. The people who won the temporary freedom of the "Atlanta Six"—and this is especially true of the Southerners who aided so effectively—were lulled into a false sense of security because of the victory. They thought the prosecution of Herndon only a gesture and therefore no active campaign to stop it was carried on. This conviction and the fact that the authorities have issued subpoenas for the re-arrest of two of the Atlanta Six and for the arrest of two other communist organizers

BURLINGAME
LIBRARY

(both of them natives of Georgia) has partially shocked them out of their lethargy. An indication of this is an editorial which appeared, soon after Herndon's conviction, in the Macon Telegraph, established in 1826 and one of the South's most courageous and progressive newspapers. It said in part:

> It is no credit to the State of Georgia that a man should be given such a terrible sentence—indeed, even any sentence—upon the charge of "inciting to insurrection" when he possesses literature of the Communist Party, which was duly registered in this State in the election last year. . . . After all, those who stupidly use our courts for such purposes ought to keep in mind that the ultimate purpose of communism is to provide enough food and clothes and shelter for oppressed people and that the danger is not from outside propaganda, but from fathers who look into the faces of pinched and hungry children. . . . The Telegraph hopes . . . the United States court will speak out in vigorous terms on such a statute as that under which he was convicted.

Clearly it is about time that the Southern labor movement, Jeffersonian Democrats, and friends of civil liberties and decency everywhere should let their voices be heard. This is serious business. Roger N. Baldwin has called the Herndon case "The most preposterous conviction for free speech in the United States since the war." If the conviction sticks and if the Atlanta Six are sent to prison, the forces of reaction and fascism in Georgia will have temporarily triumphed. The entire labor movement, communist and otherwise, in so far as it really attempts to function, will be driven underground just as surely as in Nazi Germany. Not only that but it will give, in other Southern States, powerful impetus to fascist tendencies, such as the Silver Shirts, the Alabama White Legion, and the Klan. Alabama reactionaries are trying to force the passage of an anti-syndicalist law and a law banning lawyers from Alabama practice who come from outside the State. News has just come that the authorities in Atlanta have derived great encouragement out of the decision of the State Supreme Court in the Herndon case. This means to them that the legal machinery of the State approves of their actions. As a result the police have been raiding the homes of workers without warrant; they have intimidated them into stopping their subscriptions to radical and liberal publications; they have visited newsstands and told the owners that they would have to cease selling labor literature.

But it is not only labor that has cause to be alert in combating this incipient fascism. For instance, most of the "insurrectionary literature" cited in the indictments of Herndon and the Atlanta Six was found in the circulating room of the Carnegie library in Atlanta. Dates when it was taken from the library are stamped on each volume. If the staff of the library is fortunate enough to escape arrest, isn't it likely that at least the authorities will insist on censoring the material in the library? Prosecutor John B. Hudson is known to be annoyed because authorities in De Kalb County, near Atlanta, where Emory University is located, have not arrested Dean Edgar Johnson, of the School of Economics, who has stubbornly and criminally refused to cease using the Communist Manifesto of Karl Marx as required reading in his classes.

The International Labor Defense, assisted by the American Civil Liberties Union, is appealing the Herndon case to the United States Supreme Court on the grounds of the unconstitutionality of the old statute; the exclusion of Negroes from the jury; the exhibitions of prejudice during the trial; and the lack of evidence to sustain the verdict. It will likely be several months before the case can be argued.

In the meantime, a nineteen-year-old boy, in the first stages of tuberculosis, is confined in a small cell, given no exercise, fed rough food, in the same prison that once held Robert E. Burns, who wrote his prison experiences in "I Am a Fugitive from a Georgia Chain Gang." Herndon faces eighteen to twenty years on such a chain gang. He would not have one chance in a thousand to survive such a term. The Atlanta Six and hundreds of other labor organizers will face it in the future.

Young Russia at Play

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, June 26

THE streets of Moscow resound these days to the light tramp of children marching in twos to the tune of small drums and bugles. They are the "Pioneers" or Soviet boy and girl scouts going off to summer camp where they will remain for from four to eight weeks. More than 100,000 children left Moscow during the first fortnight of this month. Additional groups are now en route. Other cities too are disgorging their young generation into the fields, meadows, mountains, and seashore.

The Pioneers' vacation will be much pleasanter this summer than in years gone by. It is not so much that material conditions in the camps have improved. This change pales in importance with the fact that the children will be bothered less with politics. Their leaders and teachers will remember that boys and girls want to be boys and girls and dislike having their fun sandwiched in between two fat layers of training in the building of socialism.

A permanent feature of the summer day in camp used to be the political meeting where current Soviet problems would be "discussed." The children were likewise required to spend part of their time in neighboring villages propagandizing the adults, helping in the fields, and making nuisances of themselves in still other ways. Games often took the form of political jousts between, say, kulaks and collectivized peasants on the virtues of communism. Resolutions of party congresses were studied and sometimes memorized. And incidentally the Pioneers also went swimming when the business of life permitted such frivolities. In this respect, camp was little different from the school season. Pupils whose classes finished at one in the afternoon came home at 7 P.M. "There was a Pioneer meeting," ran the honest explanation. Three or four Pioneer meetings a week was not unusual. The children got tired and bored, and were unable to devote much attention to studies.

These perversions have now been "liquidated." Several weeks ago an official decree declared that the Pioneers were being overworked, and that political activities for children should be reduced to the lowest possible minimum. This decree was at least a decade overdue, and it is strange that the bolshevik leaders did not know about, or did not correct, a condition which Soviet parents have complained against for many a school term. But now that the reform is introduced it will be applied with characteristic Soviet thoroughness. Before the summer set in, a referendum was taken among the Pioneers as to what they wished to do in their camps, and the results of this investigation naturally conformed with the new policy. Camp directors have accordingly been instructed to give the children "Rest, rest, and rest," as well as a respite from politics. Camps situated near collectives must neither assist in harvesting nor undertake to enlighten perspiring mujhiks on Marxist philosophy.

The startling discovery that children could manage to live through a whole summer with nothing more than a few news bulletins of current events reflects a new and important trend in Soviet affairs. There is a realization here that man does not live by politics alone. Factory clubs are shortening their meetings to afford ample time for jazz dances. The theater is having more comedy, the cinema more love. Ideology is being diluted with sentiment. The newspapers, especially the official Izvestia under Bukharin's editorship, print more articles on scientific and "human-interest" subjects and are increasingly objective about conditions abroad. The schools, finally, have been ordered to teach geography and history.

This constitutes a revolution in Soviet education. Formerly the politics of geography was taught to the children but not geography so that, as has been pointed out in the Russian press, a boy might know that "New York is the center of monopolistic capitalism and the bulwark of financial imperialism," but he would not know exactly where New York is. The politics of history was taught but not history, so that a pupil in a Soviet school could declare that Catherine the Great was the "product" of a feudalistic agricultural civilization and furthered Russia's desire to establish contacts with the West, but could not say when she reigned or what she actually did. A Moscow boy of ten recently told me all the details of a strike in Rostov-on-Don in 1894, and yet he had not the faintest notion of Russian history during that period. The socio-political history courses, moreover, were so filled with clichés and dogmatic interpretations that primary school children, unequipped as they were with facts, became ignorant mental automatons. No premium was put on thinking or independent judgments.

When the products of this system began to grow up and enter higher institutions of learning or take government jobs there was a sudden realization—which might have come much earlier—that the young generation was loaded down with preconceived ideas but unembarrassed by excessive knowledge. Needless to say, these evils cannot be eradicated in one year or even two. The beginning, however, has been made. The old methods are being publicly ridiculed although yesterday they had official sanction. At the end of this school year special instructions were issued eliminating examinations in the social sciences despite the fact that they had been one of the chief subjects of the curriculum.

Instead of abstract, formalistic social sciences the schools will now give compulsory courses in history and geography. The decrees inaugurating this innovation were considered so important that they were signed not by the Commissar of Education but by Stalin and Prime Minister Molotov in order to make it clear to every last teacher that this new regulation has become the highest law of the land and must in no circumstances be departed from. The decree on history condemns the "abstract sociological schematicism" of the past which was devoid of chronology, facts, and the characters of individual leaders, recommends the memorizing of dates and names, orders the publication of new text books on ancient, medieval, modern, and Soviet history, and the history of dependent and colonial countries, and concludes with instructions for the establishment of five-year courses in the Moscow and Leningrad universities for the training of teachers of history. The decree on geography is equally concrete and emphatic.

The excuse that until now the bolsheviks were too busy making history to study it is unconvincing, for they are just as busy making history today. The new trend is rather a phase of that yearning for relaxation and surcease from politics which the people and the bolsheviks feel and which the bolsheviks are ready to satisfy. Hitherto, Soviet political life has been an incessant struggle against the internal enemy and against economic conditions which were, in their essence, anti-socialistic. The weapons employed in the war with these obstructions were hate, temperament, unquestioning faith, blind enthusiasm, and one-track dogmas, but not scientific attitudes, for the man with an academic mind who meticulously weighs the pros and cons of an issue is not usually a fighter.

But time has brought a change. The domestic struggle in the Soviet Union is not finished. All Soviet citizens are not pro-bolshevik. The opposition, however, is weak and puny. It has no heart; it dare not lift its head. It is leaderless and programless. It embraces a very small fraction of the population. At most it is an attitude of skepticism or mental reservation rather than a wish to overthrow the regime. The material moulds of the nation's economy, furthermore, are so uncapitalistic now, and so successfully uncapitalistic that the possibility of restoration is negligible. Under these circumstances, it becomes difficult for the bolsheviks to whip up a fiery crusading spirit against the enemy within the gates. And the danger of attacks from without is also diminishing. Today, accordingly, the Soviets' big problem is to discover and implement new means for the stimulation of public action and popular feeling.

With the floodgates of hate closing, the bolsheviks are tapping two fresh sources of social inspiration: pride and loyalty. The Cheliuskin episode, therefore, was very opportune and has been exploited to the full. The details of the two-months' stay of the Cheliuskin crew on a saucer of ice rocking in the Arctic and of their rescue by the seven hero-fliers are exciting and thrilling. This was the greatest Polar adventure of all times. The life in Schmidt Camp which was built on the floe and the safe delivery of its five score members to land were a high tribute to bolshevik organization and a triumph of the collectivist method over the individualistic which, appropriately, was recommended to Professor Schmidt by a German fascist daily. Schmidt rejected the trek over the ice by which the strong only might have reached the shore, and saved all by a masterful collective effort. The nation is proud. The Moscow street demonstration which welcomed the homecoming heroes was the brightest, best-staged, and jolliest I have ever seen here. The whole country insisted on acclaiming the expedition and its rescuers. I can think of nothing in Soviet history except the death of Lenin which has so united all Soviet citizens in one deep emotional experience. Russia was never a nation. Even during the World War, her rulers failed to arouse patriotism among the millions. The ethnic crazy-quilt and the dire poverty and oppression militated against unity and loyalty. The Soviet policy of economic and cultural autonomy for national minorities, on the other hand, proved to be an influence for cohesion, but class hostility produced the opposite effect. Today, the bolsheviks are searching for a common denominator which will close the ranks. There are still classes in the U. S. S. R. but no class exploits the other. The class war is accordingly tapering off to a skirmish. The gradual disappearance of such a disrupting element makes room for a unifying substitute. This is a development of vast sociological and political significance. It will be called nationalism. And indeed the latest Soviet slogan is: "For the Fatherland." The cry sounds queer, and when old bolsheviks like Radek and Bukharin write it —especially without the accompanying adjective "socialist" —they seem to swallow hard. The phenomenon is still young. It has been superimposed and there is no evidence that the nation needs or will accept this common denominator instead of another. Only the future will tell whether Soviet nationalism, if it strikes root, can be of a different quality than bourgeois nationalism; whether a nationalism whose chief purpose is not to divert attention from the class struggle can make a new contribution to society.

In the Driftway

SVEN HEDIN has not been captured by "bandits" in Chinese Turkestan. Instead he continues his peaceful geographical studies in presumably the most bandit-ridden spot on the earth's surface and the "brigand" who was supposed to have captured him, General Ma Chung-Ying, appears to be the same person as General Ma Chun-in who suffered defeat last week at the hands of General Shen Tsi-tsai and was driven across the Soviet border, where he and his horsemen have been interned by the Red authorities. For Hedin's sake the Drifter is rather sorry the kidnaping story turned out to be false. He is sure that the captors and the captive would have had a pleasant visit together in their tents on the lonely plains of Chinese Turkestan. For Hedin already was acquainted with the "brigand" general, having been held captive by him for three weeks in 1933. And the Drifter suspects that most "Chinese bandits" are simple people, as childlike as the Tibetan horsemen who forty years ago conducted Hedin out of the province of Jalok after his unsucessful attempt to reach Lhasa in disguise. These Tibetan cavalrymen were gorgeously dressed and heavily armed; Hedin was an unprotected enemy who had tried to reach their holy of holies; but their greatest joy on the long trek came when the "Schwed-Peling" (the Swedish European) allowed them to hold his watch to their ears and listen to its mysterious ticking. And their captive grew so fond of them that the parting at the border caused deep mutual regret.

* * * * *

THAT was forty years ago, and General Ma is said to be a hireling of Japan, but the Drifter cannot believe that any man-made harm can come to Sven Hedin. For forty-nine years he has been wandering through one of the few unmapped regions of the world. His yak-dung fires have burned in innumerable Himalayan passes; he has run the risk of death from cold, hunger, wolves, and thieves; over and over again, from one remote and desolate spot he has gone through storm and flood, through Himalayan cold and the unspeakable dirt of Tibetan villages, to reach another equally remote and desolate spot merely for the satisfaction of drawing a new line on the map of the world. His courage has stood him in good stead among the simple and impressionable nomads of Central Asia, but he has been protected most perhaps by a simplicity of his own which could be traced to his single-minded, completely disinterested passion for geography.

* * * * *

SINCE he threatens no man's vested interest, Sven Hedin will probably go unharmed to the end even in Chinese Turkestan where four Powers are now fighting for domination through their respective Chinese generals. And the Drifter is willing to believe that he has already won more victories than any of them. As to the quality of those victories and the satisfaction they have brought, the Drifter need only quote from "The Conquest of Tibet." Here is General Sven Hedin's idea of a "march of triumph":

> The cold alone pursued us and sank to —34.4°C. . . . One entire day snow swept around the marching caravan, and I could scarcely see the guide, who walked just ahead of my horse. . . . The caravan climbed up towards great heights on January 28. At the Pass Sela-la, the altitude was 18,060 feet. It was necessary to stand with legs apart to keep on our feet. It was safer to sit cross-legged while the blasts swept over the pass. . . . No human beings but Tibetans had even been here before; it was my land, I had conquered it.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Truth About the Jews

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Ernest Boyd's article The Dilemma of the Jews is both amusing and pathetic. Mr. Boyd is evidently the type of nineteenth-century liberal who has learned nothing and forgotten nothing since his adolescence. He must read the daily papers, yet he doesn't know that the Jews were kicked out of the structure of German civilization the other day because they were the most highly and effectively assimilated Jewish group in all history. He lives, I believe, in New York and he writes: "Attachment to his religion is the one thing that sets the Jew apart from his fellow-citizens." Such innocence is staggering. Do his Jewish friends sport phylacteries and a kosher kitchen and close their offices on the Sabbath? And does he pretend even to himself that they aren't Jews? I'm writing, so to speak, in words of one syllable. But I'm afraid no others can pierce these childish confusions.

"We are and we remain," in the great and final formulation of Theodore Herzl, "whether we will it or not, a historic group of recognizable homogeneity." Wherever we have been invited to assimilate we have made a profoundly sincere effort to do so. Each time a point has arisen at which it became apparent both to us and to our Gentile fellow-citizens that we cannot wholly assimilate. The effort breaks us and renders us sterile. Yet it does not satisfy the world. We grow enfeebled and corrupt and anti-Semitism re-arises in its most cruel forms.

From this dilemma arose the philosophy of Zionism, which is fundamentally the negation of the Galuth or dispersion in its present form as a worthy or fruitful way of human life.

I commend one final observation to Mr. Boyd. There is no virtue in tolerance if as its price you demand of any human being the sacrifice and degradation of assimilation to yourself. Tolerance means tolerance of difference, respect for other and even alien values. If Mr. Boyd will read the Thorah (the Pentateuch) he will observe the constant monitions to love, to protect, to defend the stranger, the sojourner, the ger, who lives in the midst of Israel. Not at the price of his conversion or assimilation to Israel, but in his specific character of a non-Israelite. This truth which we brought with us full-fledged from the Arabian desert nearly 3,000 years ago is still news to liberals like Mr. Boyd. Well, he hears the news at last.

Burlington, Vt., July 9 LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Correction

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

My attention has been called to an editorial in the recent issue of The Nation, commenting adversely on the New York State Convention. You state that "when a few scattered cheers greeted the announcement that there had been a 'revolution in Germany,' Mr. Waldman reminded the convention that 'this is a Socialist convention and cheers for a revolution are not in order'." None of this is correct. Your statement is grossly inaccurate. The cheers were not "scattered," but quite general and lusty. And I did not say what you quote me as saying.

Believing as I do in the freedom of the press, even where the editors are clearly wrong as you appear to be in this editorial, I cannot quarrel with your indulgence in unjust conclusions about the Socialists of New York and myself in particular. But when you purport to state a fact, I have a right to expect accuracy. Your editorial writer should have known that the statement ascribed to me by him is absolutely untrue and will not be believed even by those who differ from me. They know that I could not be guilty of saying such nonsense.

For the information of your readers, I desire to state the substance of what I did say when I was told that the riots in Germany were led by Goering. I said that "this is a Socialist convention and we will cheer an uprising in Germany made by the workers and led by the workers' representatives. We cannot cheer mere riots created by Goering and his allies."

Having published the inaccurate quotation from me and having based unjustifiable conclusions on that quotation, I will request you to publish this letter together wtih a retraction.

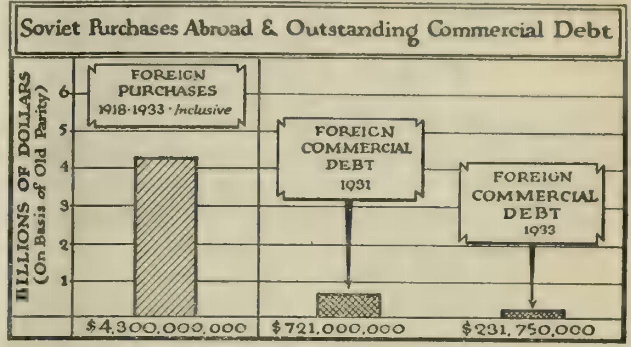
LOUIS WALDMAN

New York, July 18

[We are glad to print Mr. Waldman's correction and to express our regret at having given currency to and based con-

The SOVIET UNION
has a remarkable credit record

The gigantic program of industrial expansion carried out by the Soviet Union has necessitated foreign purchases of over four billion dollars, involving extensive commercial credits.



These credits have been paid off as they have become due. No one has ever lost a single dollar in extending credit to the Soviet Union. Commercial indebtedness was reduced in 1933 to less than 6% of the amount expended for foreign purchases. Yet this sharp reduction was made by the Soviet Union during a period when other nations were compelled to avoid or delay payment of their debts.

This remarkable credit record was possible because of the nation's rigid system of planned economy. Under this system it balances its budget each year, with a surplus; controls its foreign trade; and assumes no obligation without making ample provision for its repayment. These facts emphasize the safety of

SOVIET UNION 7% GOLD BONDS

These bonds are a direct obligation of this nation, whose capacity to pay has been so amply demonstrated.

Features of the bonds are: Principal and interest payments are based upon a fixed quantity of gold and are payable in American currency at the prevailing rate of exchange . . . Holders are thus protected against loss resulting from possible further reduction in the gold content of the dollar . . . These bonds are offered at par and accrued interest in denominations of 100 and 1000 gold roubles. (Present parity of gold rouble $0.8713.) . . . Interest is paid quarterly at the Chase National Bank of N. Y. . . . The State Bank of the U. S. S. R., with a gold reserve of more than $706 million, agrees to repurchase these bonds on demand of the holder at par and accrued interest at any time after one year from date of purchase, thus assuring long term marketability.

Send for circular N-9 for full information about these bonds

Soviet American Securities Corp.
30 Broad Street Tel. HAnover 2-5332 New York

Food and Sexual Feeling

Between food and sexual feeling there is an intimate relation. Certain foods will stimulate sexual feelings; other foods will allay sex desire. What these foods are, and how they act on the organisms, is explained by the eminent endocrinologist, Edward Podolsky, in the current issue of

The Modern Psychologist
Edited by Dagobert D. Runes, Ph.D.
OTHER ARTICLES

What Does Freud Want?
The Science of Hypnotism.
Surgery and Neurotics.
What Makes Us Cowards?
Tricks of the Subconscious.
The Psychology of Forgetting.

These are only a few of the many articles of unusual importance and interest which will appear in The Modern Psychologist this Fall and Winter. You can get a special five-month trial subscription to The Modern Psychologist for $1. Enclose bill, check, or money order, and address to The Modern Psychologist, 310 Riverside Drive, New York.

clusions upon what seems to have been an inaccurate report in the New York Herald Tribune. We are further informed by Alfred Baker Lewis, secretary of the Socialist Party, New England District, that The Nation was in error in predicting a "right" swing in the Socialist Party of Massachusetts. Mr. Lewis writes that the Massachusetts convention elected an executive committee unanimously in favor of the Declaration of Principles adopted at Detroit.—Editors, The Nation.]

Prize Essays

To the Editors of The Nation:

Commonwealth College, Mena, Arkansas, is offering three full scholarships for the best essays on the following topics: "The Fight Against War and Fascism," "The Farmer and the New Deal," "The Worker and the New Deal." Winners of the contest may attend Commonwealth free of charge during any quarter of the 1934-35 term. Their room, board, and laundry service will be given in exchange for twenty hours work per week on the college farm-campus.

Essays must be in the mail before September 1. Contestants should be under thirty-five and in fairly good health. Faculty members will act as judges and the awards will be made on the basis of intelligence and interest rather than literary style.

Charlotte Moskowitz, Executive Secretary
Mena, Ark., July 17

Hotel Workers Defense

To the Editors of The Nation:

Your readers were assuredly sympathetic to the cause of the workers of the recent New York hotel strike. Undoubtedly, too, they were outraged by the use of government agencies to break this strike.

May we appeal to these readers and sympathizers now for aid of two victims of the strike struggle—Harold Robins, organizer for the Amalgamated Food Workers Union, and Andre Gras, a striker. Gras was sentenced to from one to two years; Robins to from two to four years, for an alleged assault upon H. Bonnefoux, non-union baker. Both are now in Sing Sing.

There is every reason to believe that these workers were framed. Robins had been repeatedly arrested, on the flimsiest of charges, in connection with his activities during the strike. He was brought before Bonnefoux to be identified as one of his assailants, and Bonnefoux identified him. Yet, the testimony revealed, Bonnefoux knew Robins, had spoken with him prior to the assault. Why, since he allegedly recognized Robins, did he not at once accuse him? The identification of Gras was even more dubious.

The strikers had no occasion to attack Bonnefoux, it was revealed during the testimony. He was a chef de manger, and, as such, not eligible for their union. Both suspects had excellent reputations as sober and honest workingmen; both presented alibis. The evidence brought forward by the State, other than the identification by the victims, was of a cloudy and contradictory nature. The Robins-Gras Defense Committee, organized at the request of the prisoners and composed of representatives of various labor and sympathetic organizations, is conducting a fight for appeal. For this fight, money is needed —at once! Contributions may be sent to the Robins-Gras Defense Committee, 22 East 17th Street, Room 731, New York City.

Felix Morrow
New York City, July 13

California R. O. T. C.

To the Editors of The Nation:

Your readers will recall that almost a year ago the United States Supreme Court declined jurisdiction in the case of a conscientious objector to compulsory military training at the University of Maryland. Those of us who were disappointed in the outcome of that case because we believed it raised hitherto unadjudicated questions of Constitutional law are happy to report that a similar case is scheduled for oral argument before the Supreme Court during its coming October term.

The forthcoming case involves two student conscientious objectors who were suspended from the University of California because of their refusal to enroll in the R. O. T. C. Their defense is being briefed by an able Constitutional lawyer from Los Angeles. To finance this litigation a California committee under the chairmanship of Bishop James C. Baker is seeking to obtain funds from supporters on the coast. But additional funds —approximately $2,000—are urgently needed.

A Supreme Court decision in this case will go far toward defining the Constitutional rights of conscientious objectors to the peace-time conscription which prevails in twenty-eight of our civilian secondary schools and ninety-one of our colleges and universities. Basic civil and religious liberties are at stake. Those zealous to safeguard these—all old-fashioned Americans, those of orthodox religious views who believe the realm of conscience should be free from state domination, pacifists, liberals, and radicals alike—are urged to share in financing the defense of these conscientious objectors. Donations may be sent directly to the Reverend John Gabrielson, Box 54, Pacific Palisades, California.

New York City, July 10 Roger Baldwin,

Medical Patents

To the Editors of The Nation:

To one who is acquainted with some of the circumstances which prompt the patenting of discoveries related to matters of health, the undesirability of a protective patent is not as obvious as it appears to be to the writer of the second editorial in The Nation of July 18. I have no knowledge of the facts in the patent matter referred to as a bad example, but I do know that the patenting of medical discoveries is prompted at times by motives other than a desire for royalties or personal advantage and profit. Some investigators seek a patent for its licensing power in order to protect the public against the exploitation of the fruit of their research by extortion, quackery, improper and extravagant advertising, and in order to provide, if any income accrues, for continuing research.

I should be inclined to say that a valid criticism against these patents is not the occasional element of profit for an individual, but the diversion of effort and interest on the part of a trained investigator from his fields of scientific investigation to the foreign domain of business necessary in the administration of a patent. Very few discoveries have resulted in financial profit to anyone other than its commercial manufacturer. A well known example of an important medical discovery offering no direct profit to the discoverer but providing funds from a modest royalty for further research is insulin, which is controlled by the Insulin Committee of the University of Toronto, which committee, I understand, issues licenses for the manufacture of insulin under certain conditions of formula, advertising, and price to the public, all aimed to prevent exploitation.

Joseph Turner, M.D., Director, Mt. Sinai Hospital
New York City, July 13

Books and Music

To a Snake in Eden

By EVELYN SCOTT

I follow the preying, innocent eyes of you,
Nursemaid of loathing,
As you wind your monstrous wish
In the rim of the nest;
And you descend the tree unfuriously,
The young bird's heart already beating
In your iron throat.
Glide on to the next disaster,
You born so forgetful!
You have given horror its home.
You are the very bowels of a thought
Brought hideously to life by sun.
You had sunk your deep fang in my sorrow
Long before we met.
So you who are all incredulity—
—the very shape of unbelief!—
Having wounded a summer,
Slip out of Eden . . .
Purveyors of hospital murders,
Yet comfortable with the grass and silence,
Has faith itself, perhaps, been nourished
By some memory of the wavering pillar of your body
In its liquid stone . . .?

The Log-Book of a Soul

Magpie: The Autobiography of a Nymph Errant. By Lois Vidal. Little, Brown, and Company. $3.

THIS is a psychological self-portrait. When the old masters painted their own portraits they left out the defects; and it yet remains for an artist in that medium to paint himself with blemishes. Among writers the truth is more often told. De Quincey's "Confessions of an Opium-Eater" and Rousseau's "Confessions"—to name only two instances of stark truth-telling among literary artists—have in their time staggered the whole reading world. Lois Vidal seems almost to have done as much with her "Magpie: The Autobiography of a Nymph Errant." Writing under her own name the author tells the story of an intensely romantic and shock-ridden childhood. Just keeping herself this side of insanity, she went to all the excesses to which an unleased imagination can lead one. She believed that her brother had dug through to China; she believed that her apple-tree life was secret; and she believed that her handsome, grown-up cousin was in love with her. The exceptional thing about her is that she formulates these beliefs and the later ones which grew out of them and relates the whole with almost no reserves through a story of 400 pages. The strange adventures which form the main part of the book are the efflorescence of fantastic beliefs such as those to which she gave herself in childhood.

Miss Vidal can write. That much, at least, her family have done for her. "My writing propensities were regarded in the family as symptomatic of disorder, pathological, and in any case to be hush-hushed." She has a masterly way of creating atmosphere. Let it be a dinner-party in the shadow of Queen Elizabeth's old prison at Woodstock, or a pick-up in the pillared lounge of a Montreal hotel, or a maid-servant's choring in somebody or other's kitchen—let it be any scene from Canada to Cannes through which she has passed and with her vivid imagination she can magically restore it for you. A part of the trick is the colloquial style which allows you to see the English girl plodding through foreign and ever more foreign adventures, English to the last. She keeps her accent and her British past as intact as the neat rectitude of her dress. This and other more intangible elements give her an amazing success in the production of atmosphere.

The daughter of an English vicar, the author was born as one of the younger children—perhaps the youngest daughter—in a family of eight. Lois was one of the four only who survived into adult life. The shock of so many deaths and the mental invalidism of her father bore heavily upon her girlhood. Ambition was in the blood. The remaining family moved out to Oxford for the sake of education. There the Great War found them, called Lois forth for war work, and killed her favorite brother. His loss was, as Lois Vidal sees it, the last and final jar to her mental balance wheel. She is probably right. That she could not stick at any job more than a few weeks or months was complicated by an extraordinary compulsion to wander after this. With the failure of each employment she was off at once to some far-distant goal as if constantly and ineffectually seeking. Between jobs she would sometimes retire of her own free will to a mental nursing home for treatment. But most of the time she was on the road, "lorry-hopping" as they say in England, and meeting people in the casual and intimate fashion she calls "clicking." She seldom knew what roof, if any, would shelter her that night. "If you can't be good, be careful," said the English consul in Corsica. She was a sort of combination of George Borrow and Moll Flanders. She went out to her brother in Canada, but it was not with her brother that she stayed while there. Finally landing in the London underworld with a chap named Peter—one of the best portrayals in the book—she lived dangerously near the edge of destruction. From this time on it was very bad: the beach, or a hedge, or a traveling-van received her at night-fall. She had broken away from her family and the only helping hands extended to her now were those of professional social workers. They finally shepherded her into a Salvation Army Home where she surprised everyone by remaining, straightaway and hands down, for thirteen months.

One might deduce from the foregoing that the greatest value of Miss Vidal's book for herself was its catharsis. But it is doubtful whether this was, at any time during the five years she was writing it, her primary motive. She says herself that she began the story in Canada "partly to get it off my chest, partly as a distraction from my loneliness and pain, partly as a literary exercise." But the strictness with which she adhered to her task and the superiority of its standards would indicate that the chest was less important than the literary exercise. One suspects that Miss Vidal has long had literary ambitions. It may be further noted that in the course of the twenty years or thereabouts during which she lived the material of this book, she became a teacher of folk-dancing, a stenographer, a journalist, a teacher of small children, and a cook of sorts. Added to her literary product, these occupations enable Miss Vidal to give a very good account of herself, especially when one considers that months and even years have to be subtracted for the times when she was in the hospital with nervous break-downs.

Miss Vidal speaks once of her disease as an inferiority complex. But there is little psychiatry and less Freud in the book. The author has triumphed over sorrow and disease extraordinarily in the telling of a vivid and enthralling story.

KATHARINE ANTHONY

Facts—and Facts

The United States and the Caribbean Area. By Dana G. Munro. World Peace Foundation. $2.

THIS is official history—an account of our relations with Cuba, Panama, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Nicaragua, and the other Central American states, in which the United States appears consistently as a wise, judicious, solicitous, and even altruistic neighbor. The World Peace Foundation, according to the preface, "operates upon the policy that the actual facts concerning international relations and official international cooperation constitute the best possible arguments for lasting peace and improved international understanding."

Of course there is such a thing as emphasis and selection of facts. For instance, Professor Munro succeeds in picturing Machado as a rather benevolent president of Cuba, deprived of electoral opposition by a series of circumstances beyond his control, and gradually forced into repressive measures by his opponents who "staged a series of riots which resulted in loss of life" and made "the situation intolerable . . . by murdering public officials." Facts that Professor Munro might have presented are that Machado not merely stamped out all political opposition in order to perpetuate himself in office, but that he began his killings just 90 days after his accession to power on May 20, 1925. His first victim was Armando André, editor of the paper El Dia, which was critical of his policies. The lowest estimate of his victims is approximately 1,000, and they included the finest flower of Cuban youth and of the intellectuals. The retaliation in kind of the A. B. C. did not take place until July, 1932, seven years after Machado inaugurated his terrorism.

Thirty-eight pages, some 13,000 words, are devoted to a chapter on Panama and the Canal. Yet perhaps the most essential fact in the controversy concerning our conveyance of the Canal Zone to ourselves, Professor Munro omits—the testimony of the principal in the acquisition, Theodore Roosevelt: ". . . I took the Canal and let Congress debate."

With the American intervention in Haiti Professor Munro may claim a unique familiarity. He was in the Latin American division of the Department of State from 1921 to 1925, its assistant chief for two years, and from 1930 to the latter part of 1932 United States Minister to Haiti. No man would have a better access to the facts than he. His general attitude of course is the official one: "A state of virtual anarchy in Haiti" necessarily causing "concern to the government of the United States" in consequence of which the Wilson Administration was "endeavoring to put an end to the revolutionary conditions in Haiti as a part of a broad, somewhat idealistic program for the establishment of stable government throughout the Caribbean region." A very different thesis, with which Nation readers are generally familiar, is that certain financial interests, in particular those of a group affiliated with the National City Bank which had secured a railroad concession, and those of the bank itself which had bought a part interest in the National City Bank of Haiti and before long was to acquire complete control thereof, were among the strongly motivating factors in our intervention and subsequent performance in Haiti.

When our navy had taken possession of Haiti, had secured the choice of a president who would agree, in advance of election, to sign any treaty the United States might submit, and found subsequently that his cabinet and the two houses of Congress refused to ratify this unexpectedly drastic treaty, Secretary Daniels on August 19, 1915, ordered the seizure of the Haitian customs houses. One of the objectives of this seizure certainly was to compel the Haitians to ratify the treaty. Professor Munro alludes to this episode as follows:

> There was also much opposition to the American intervention in the capital itself and this feeling became more intense at the end of August and the beginning of September when Admiral Caperton took over several of the Haitian customs houses, to prevent the revenues from falling into unauthorized hands and also to provide funds for public works for the relief of unemployment.

Obviously altruistic, our taking over! However, Admiral Caperton later testified that President Dartiguenave had stated on October 3 that "his government was practically without funds to meet the current expenses, the government could not continue and he would be forced to resign." As the Occupation would thereby have lost the relatively compliant president, the Navy Department authorized Admiral Caperton to state that "funds would be immediately available upon ratification of the treaty." (Page 381, Hearings.) The President, however, pointed out that he could not maintain himself in face of the strong opposition to signing the treaty "if the United States Government persists in withholding all funds." (Italics mine.) The Admiral thereupon pointed out that pursuant to the department's instructions "not one cent had [has] been turned over to the Haitian government for living expenses" and recommended that under the circumstances "such funds from the customs receipts . . . as he [I] might consider necessary for its support" be turned over to the Dartiguenave Government "in view of the loss of prestige of the United States should that government fall." (Page 383.) On October 5, Secretary Daniels replied:

> You are authorized to furnish Haitian government weekly amounts to meet current expenses . . . question payment back salary will be settled by department immediately after ratification of treaty.

In other words, the seizure of the customs houses was for the purpose of starving the Haitian government into submission and not, as Professor Munro states, "to prevent the revenues from falling into unauthorized hands and also to provide funds for public works for the relief of unemployment."

After the treaty had been secured, which gave not only complete financial control to the United States but pledged the Haitians to settle foreign creditors' claims, Washington deemed it necessary that foreign interests own land in Haiti. The Navy and State Department drew up a new constitution which permitted foreign ownership of land, placed the decisions of the courts martial above that of the Haitian courts, and provided that in the absence of a legislature, a council of state appointed by the President should exercise legislative functions. The Haitian Congress refused to pass the proposed constitution, although it was prepared to pass another draft without the more objectionable clauses.

Professor Munro describes what then took place thus:

> In order to prevent the approval of a constitution different from that on which he had agreed with the Haitian authorities the President dissolved the Congress on June 19. He was supported in this action by the American military authorities and the order of dissolution was delivered by Major Butler, the chief of the constabulary.

What actually happened was that on June 18, General Cole notified Washington:

> Unless contrary instructions received, if necessary to prevent passage proposed constitution I intend dissolve National Assembly through president if possible, otherwise directly. (Italics mine.)

General Butler, then acting on orders from General Cole, dissolved the National Assembly.

This picture differs from that presented by Professor Munro, who gives no indication of the pressure brought by the United States authorities and makes it appear that the President of Haiti was acting on his own initiative, the impression which the United States authorities sought to give at the time.

In describing the "discontent with the American occupation," Professor Munro states that the upper class found their situation more difficult than before 1915 because "with the establishment of strict control over government funds and the expenditure of the revenues on public works and other constructive enterprises, rather than for the sole benefit of the ruling class, it was no longer possible for the majority of this class to expect to obtain a living from the government."

Professor Munro apparently does not give the Haitians credit for the sentiments which would animate any people in seeing foreigners drawing salaries in their own country for government administrative work. Moreover, he does not mention the sad case of Collector Johnson, the American collector-in-chief of customs in Port-au-Prince, the third highest official in the American financial control, who during Minister Munro's incumbency, in collusion with an American importing firm in Haiti, began his peculations which reached well into six figures.

One might continue indefinitely thus to analyze Professor Munro's account. By selection and emphasis, he presents a benignly one-sided picture. That in itself may not be objectionable if the reader is aware of it and balances this book by reading Jenks's "Our Cuban Colony," Knight's "The Americans in Santo Domingo," Denny's "Dollars for Bullets," Buell's "The American Occupation of Haiti," and the reports issued during the last six years on Latin America by the Foreign Policy Association. These last are not tendencious; and they give an example of objectiveness which Professor Munro might well emulate.

ERNEST GRUENING

The Bush Negro of Dutch Guiana

Rebel Destiny. Among the Bush Negroes of Dutch Guiana. By Melville J. Herskovits and Frances S. Herskovits. Whittlesey House. $3.

THE Bush Negroes of Guiana are a unique people. They are a conglomerate of uprooted African tribes from Dahomey and neighboring regions of West Africa who, brought to the New World as slaves, escaped not only from their Dutch masters but from the fate of their brothers in the rest of North and South America. These Negroes did not lose their cultural identity, they did not take their lowly place in a civilization that neither wanted them nor managed without them. Alone of the Negroes of our continent they managed to shake off the white man's yoke and to keep themselves permanently distinct as a completely self-supporting and self-respecting folk. The old African life is not preserved in its purity, to be sure, nor have the native languages survived as such, but the influence of both is abundantly manifest today and we have the intensely interesting spectacle of a well-adapted Africo-American people which roots solidly in the Old World and has taken on numerous white and Indian traits and grafted them on the persistent Negro base. There is no serious break here between African and American life, only a gradually changing culture between two continents, with an episode of slavery to give acceleration to the change. There are great differences between the relatively primitive life of the Bush Negroes of Guiana and the superficially more civilized ways of the Negroes of the Dutch capital, Paramaribo, but also an underlying unity of sentiment and belief. "The bush," as the authors of "Rebel Destiny" happily put it, "is Africa of the seventeenth century." It combines, therefore, in its present culture a greatly changed Africa with an Africa that is more conservative in many respects than the West Coast of that continent itself. This need not surprise us, for significant culture process can rarely be phrased in terms of simple change or conservatism. In some ways Bush Negro culture is reminiscent of the culture of French Canada. Here too we find an apparently abrupt break with the Old World culture from which it stems, many local adaptations to the new environment, including a not inconsiderable Indian influence, and a strong undercurrent of provincial conservatism. It is to French Canada that one must go for the richest heritage of French folk song we still possess, it is to Negro Guiana that the ethnologist must turn for the reconstruction of the basic beliefs of the West Africa of the past, even though African culture flows on more abundantly and intricately in its proper home than in its offshoot overseas.

The book which Melville and Frances Herskovits offer us out of the fulness of their prolonged experience with Negro cultures, both American and African, is not a scientific record of their field work in the summers of 1928 and 1929 among the Saramacca Negroes of Dutch Guiana. That field work, it is to be expected, will be presented in technical form to the more limited anthropological public later on. Meanwhile the less technically minded reader will turn to "Rebel Destiny" with joy and supreme satisfaction. The writers have done a difficult and delicate task with taste, with an unfailing sense of the relative strategy of incident and description in building up a picture of the daily life of the Negroes, with a truly remarkable blend of the objective and the participating attitudes. Or rather, to speak more accurately, the book is objective throughout—coolly and delightfully so—but the writers attain their objectivity not through a studied aloofness and pretense at non-participation in the life about them, but through a joyous awareness of what was going on, both toward themselves and aside from themselves. The method that they use—for it is indeed a method, however unobtrusively so—is that of a tangential or unwitting accumulation of significant cultural insights through the accidents of personal experience. Nothing is insisted upon as important, nothing is dismissed as trivial. The unflagging enthusiasm of the writers does not exploit themselves or the objects of their study, it burns itself out in the process of observation, and leaves them free to take themselves and their readers into the heart of a culture that is as exotic as you wish and as reassuringly day-to-day as home itself.

This book, then, is neither a formal monograph nor an ordinary book of travel. It has nothing of the grimness of either type of earnestness. And—thank God—it comes back with no steamily subjective news from over there of how to learn to be happy though civilized.

EDWARD SAPIR

German Socialism Still Lives

Socialism's New Beginning. By Miles. The League for Industrial Democracy. 35 cents.

THIS secret manifesto, published under the pseudonym of "Miles" by a left-wing German Socialist, smuggled out of the country, and first published by the émigré party functionaries of Prague whom it violently attacks, is now fortunately available for English and American readers. It is a voice from the grave but it proves that what the Nazis have interred is not really dead. The manifesto is first of all a passionate reaffirmation of Marxist faith and an expression of confidence in the possibility of ultimately establishing a socialist society upon the ruins of fascism. As a declaration of faith it is a symbol of the fact that Nazi terror may have silenced the voices but has not changed the loyalties of the real Marxists of Germany.

The manifesto is, however, something more than a credo.

LIBRARY

It is a vigorous criticism of the policies of the Communist and Socialist Parties. It holds both parties equally responsible for the destruction of the working-class movement in Germany. The Socialist Party, it declares, departed from true Marxism long before the present crisis and even before 1914. The essence of its apostasy was its confidence in bourgeois democracy. While the manifesto recognizes the values of bourgeois democracy for a developing labor movement it accuses the Socialist Party of having been romantic in its futile effort to preserve this democracy, either as an end in itself or as an ultimate instrument of socialism. In a period of capitalist decline, it asserts, "only dictatorial centralized forms of government can last for any length of time. . . . The only question is whether these states shall be fascist or socialist."

The Communist Party is accused of another kind of romanticism. "Instead of critically analyzing happenings in the working class and in society and their own role therein, they read into the world and into society their own subjective, even if for the most part highly revolutionary, ideas. In so doing they abandon the Marxist methodology (which is materialist) in favor of idealism, that is, subjective idealism." The illusions resulting from such idealism are held responsible for the divisive and sectarian tactics of the Communist Party. Against it the words of Marx, written in 1852, are leveled: "The minority replaces a critical by a dogmatic, a materialist by an idealist outlook. For it mere will-power becomes the driving wheel of revolution instead of actual conditions." The manifesto opposes all sectarian tendencies on the part of left-wing Socialists. It is their business to remain in organic contact with both trade unions and reformist parties so that they will not forfeit their influence among the masses of workers which compose these groups. This is not merely an individual opinion of the authors. It represents the policy of a very considerable group of revolutionary socialists who remained within the Social Democratic Party. There is reason to believe that this entire manifesto is an expression of their views. Nothing is heard of them at the present in Germany because they regard the Communist acts of defiance against fascism as heroic but futile gestures which they do not care to emulate. If they are reforming their lines they are doing so very secretly.

While the policy of the manifesto is described as a purer Marxism than that of either the Communist or Socialist Party, it departs from Marx in one important particular. It does not regard socialism as inevitable and it believes that serious mistakes in strategy are derived from this error. "For Marx and Engels the proletarian revolution was an historical necessity, and all Socialists since that time have taken over this dogma. . . . In reality socialist revolution and socialist remodeling of society are not historically inevitable but are rather a great historical opportunity placed within reach of the human race."

In conformity with this revision the manifesto does not expect an inevitable upsurge of the proletarian masses under the pressure of fascism. But it does expect the inner contradictions of fascism to create new opportunities for the success of the radical movement; and for these it wants to prepare the workers by strengthening their faith and perfecting their revolutionary tactics.

Detailed tactics are not discussed except that Russia is asked to keep hands off. The manifesto regards the activities of the Comintern in the Western world as a total loss and even suggests that the two chief policies of Soviet Russia—the enforced collectivization of the farms and the too rapid expansion of productive equipment, with the resulting lowering of living standards for the Russian masses—as perils to socialism in the Western world. With remarkable self-assurance, it predicts that some of these errors will not be overcome until triumphant Western socialism can teach the Russians a few lessons. This breath-taking lèse majesté will undoubtedly result in gnashing of teeth in all those circles in which Moscow has achieved the authority of an infallible Rome.

"Socialism's New Beginning" is, in short, a document which deserves and will receive a wide reading among those who are interested in revolutionary philosophy and strategy. The fact that it is a statement of faith and an effort to reconstruct strategy coming from men who have borne the heat of the battle in an historic struggle and may possibly be the leaders of an even more important one, gives it added weight.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Shorter Notices

Warpath. By Stanley Vestal. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

In "Warpath" Stanley Vestal has written an extended footnote to his "Sitting Bull." That chief's nephew, White Bull, never attained the fame or eminence of his uncle but from boyhood he exemplified qualities that were the glory of the Prairie Sioux, prowess in warfare and love of it for its own sake. The book was written from White Bull's spoken narrative with verifications as to historical events from military records. It is far less poetic than some of the recent biographies and autobiographies. White Bull had occasional visions, mainly of a highly useful order; he danced the Sun Dance, observed ceremonials, but he was truly himself only on the warpath; his story is harsh, astringent, bold. Now over eighty, he has been signally honored by the whites, particularly at the Semi-Centennial Ceremonies held on the Custer Battlefield. He had taken part at that battle; he may have been the warrior who killed Custer. Since the killing of a great man would enhance his own glory, he amiably hopes that this is true.

The Foreground of American Fiction. By Harry Hartwick. American Book Company. $2.50.

With remarkable and sometimes startling erudition Harry Hartwick has dug about the roots of recent American fiction to study the soil of opinion from which its stories and characters have grown. Not too acute in his treatment of individual novelists, particularly when they fall outside his categories, he barely mentions Elinor Wylie and he entirely misses the comic salt in Erskine Caldwell. He does less than justice to the part played by the Marxian hypothesis in current novels. On the whole he is not so striking in his political or social as in his moral or theological observations. His categories are soundly drawn up but uneven in execution. In Beyond Life he seems to see little difference as to merit between Cabell and Hergesheimer. In New Worlds for Old (Sinclair, Lewis, Dos Passos) he writes raggedly. He is better in Laws as Wings (Howells, Henry James, Edith Wharton, Willa Cather), where there are many cogent things to be said. He is best in The Noble Savage, which learnedly and vigorously traces the course of naturalism from Crane through Norris, London, Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, and Hemingway to Faulkner. Dissatisfied as Mr. Hartwick is with the latest "broncho excesses" of naturalism, he still cherishes its doctrines and believes that it may give up its bad habits and take on good, in a happy fusion of contrasted virtues.

Our Primitive Contemporaries. By George Peter Murdock. The Macmillan Company. $5.

Dr. Murdock has attempted to supply a gap in the literature upon primitive people, the gap between general comparative studies such as those of Fraser and Westermark, in which illustrative materials varying from a sentence to a paragraph are chosen at random from the whole primitive world, and the full-length monograph treatment of different primitive tribes. He has combed the available literature conscientiously and thoroughly and produced eighteen monotone miniature pictures in which eighteen primitive peoples of almost inconceivable diversity of social, economic, and religious patterns are treated in compact, comprehensive sketches of approximately the same length and manner. The book is an interesting demonstration of the success with which a concept like "the universal pattern of culture" can be used to blot out differences between simple nomadic people like the Tasmanians and elaborate developments like the Inca civilization. This volume falls rather under the heading of a semi-reference book in which readers may find suggestions which will lead them back to the first-hand material.

Coleridge: Selected Poetry and Prose. Edited by Stephen Potter. The Nonesuch Press. $3.50.

This volume is uniform in format and type of binding with the admirable one-volume editions by the same publishers of the prose and poetry of Blake and of Donne, the selected essays of Hazlitt, and the plays and poems of W. S. Gilbert. Like the Hazlitt volume, it runs to somewhat more than 800 pages, but it is even lighter and more compact. In order to show the many facets of Coleridge's luminous mind, Mr. Potter has presented as wide a range of selections as possible, including samples of political journalism, extracts from the notebooks and the "Aids to Reflection," miscellaneous criticism, "theologico-metaphysical" passages, the letters, and Coleridge's table talk as recorded by various listeners. The poems are printed rather fully, but the prose consists almost entirely of selections. For the most part this arrangement proves to be a happy one, and presents fewer difficulties with Coleridge than with other writers of equal rank, for Coleridge was not only very uneven, and appallingly given to digressions and irrelevancies, but full of repetitions. He had a habit, as Mr. Potter points out, of borrowing constantly from his past works "in the belief, often well founded, that nobody had read them." Yet in an edition of Coleridge of this length, it would probably have been better if Mr. Potter had included the whole of so important a volume as the "Biographia Literaria," instead of the present abridged version.

American Legal Records. Volume 1: Proceedings of the Maryland Court of Appeals, 1695-1729. Edited by Carroll T. Bond, with the collaboration of Richard B. Morris. The American Historical Association. $7.50.

This is the first volume of a series launched in 1930 as the result of the cooperation of American legal and historical scholars. It testifies to the growing interest in American colonial law, which until recently remained virtually unexplored. The reception of the English common law after the Revolution withdrew the interest of American jurists in the origins of the native legal system. They followed the opinions of the King's Bench even as American poets imitated English bards in singing of the lark and nightingale. Since the revival of interest in American colonial law the chief focus of dispute has been the extent of its indebtedness to the English common law. While it is generally conceded that in the prerevolutionary generation colonial law was substantially English, opinion is divided with regard to the seventeenth century. One school contends that colonial law bore a close resemblance to English law; another, that it was largely independent and dominated by Biblicism; and still another, that while it was substantially English it was English local rather than common law which was received; for certainly in the seventeenth century the common law was not yet a unified and centralized system but was still struggling against the local jurisdictions. The present volume of court records would seem to support, on the whole, the latter view. The influence of English law is manifest but the practice in Maryland was affected by the provision of the provincial charter which granted to the colony the considerable autonomy of jurisdiction which in the homeland belonged to the county palatine of Durham.

The MOSCOW
THEATER FESTIVAL

FOR great dates in the theater, mark September 1 to 10 in Moscow. The brilliant program announced ranges from Borodin, Rossini and Shakespeare to "Intervention" and "The Negro Boy and the Ape". Every one of the productions . . . drama, opera or ballet . . . is of outstanding importance and compelling interest.

Oliver M. Saylor of New York and H. W. L. Dana of Boston, both outstanding authorities on the Soviet theater, will lead separate groups of American visitors to the Festival. Arrangements are being made for those who attend to substitute other current performances in Moscow theaters for those on the official program, if they wish. All-inclusive costs are very low, the entire Festival may be visited for as little as $77 for ten days in Moscow—including tickets.

For detailed information and complete official program write for Theater Festival Booklet NA-8 to

INTOURIST, INC.

U. S. Representative of the Travel Co. of the U.S.S.R., 545 Fifth Avenue, New York. Offices in Boston and Chicago. Or see your own travel agent.

THE POLITICAL QUARTERLY
England's Leading Review

Editors
William A. Robson - Leonard Woolf

Editorial Board
J. M. Keynes - H. J. Laski - Kingsley Martin
Sir Arthur Salter - T. E. Gregory - A. M. Carr-Saunders

Contents for July-September includes

Education for Democracy
by SIR E. D. SIMON

International Democracy
by VISCOUNT CECIL

Socialism in Canada
by SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS, K.C., M.P.

The Internal Crisis in France
by PAUL VAUCHER

The New Scheme of Unemployment Relief
by R. C. DAVISON

The Aims of Japan

Published by MacMillan. Specimen copy free from Manager, 52 Tavistock Square, London, W. C. 1, Eng. Five shillings an issue. Annual subscription One pound (£1). Post free.

□ RESORTS □

CAMP MILFORD
KENT · CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests. Delicious meals.

Weekly Rates—July & August
$27.50 PER WEEK

Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N.H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates Today

1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PEnnsylvania 6-7842

WHAT'S NEW AT
UNITY HOUSE
FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA
J. HALPERN, Manager M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager
N. Y. Office: 3 West 16th Street

A Vacation Message to THE NATION Readers—

UNITY HOUSE offers superb facilities for play and relaxation, and the gala programs featuring many famous artists have become increasingly popular. Many new facilities this year for sport and play. $25.50 per week—July and August. Reduction to Union members. Owned by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

Always the Finest of Entertainment

Starring such famous artists as TOSCHA SEIDEL, ALLA NAZIMOVA, MOLLY PICON, SIGMUND SPAETH, ISA KREMER, and the HALL JOHNSON CHOIR.

Sound movies showing latest feature pictures.
Weekly dramatic presentation, Pinegrove Players.

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

TO BE REVIEWED NEXT WEEK

Fierro Blanco's Rico: Bandit and Dictator
by Constance Rourke

Carl Van Doren's Modern American Prose
by H. L. Mencken

Harold Nicolson's Curzon
by Oswald Garrison Villard

Douglas Reed's Burning of the Reichstag
by Ludwig Lore

Music

"The Most Faustian Art"

HARDLY had Palestrina completed his vast choral weavings, in which many voices humbly intermingle to the glory of God, than the individualistic trends of opera began to manifest themselves. In place of the ensemble of voices, none more self-assertive than the rest, we see the growing importance of the individual role; and at the same time new mechanical devices begin to show their authority in guiding the course of musical speculation. Perhaps the most significant principle of order was established when Bach, writing for the forerunner of the piano, confirmed the theory of "equal temperament" by which the ear was "rectified" in conformity with a logical dictate. Scales of precisely the same intervallic pattern could now be constructed upon any white or black key, and a contrapuntal art could be developed in easily observable systematization. The musician could select some firm sequence of notes, impress them upon the memory, and proceed to carry them through a texture of different keys and harmonic adjustments, with overlappings and transformations of the theme itself. The resultant music could gratify a very essential human concern—the delight with a kind of intricacy which is clearly constructed upon an underlying schema of order.

There followed a century or so in which this general balance of coexistent intricacy and simplicity was observed in one way or another, most notably in the perfection of the sonata form. Gradually, however, a different sort of interest began to gain prominence. If the distinctive trait of the earlier music was formal, the newer trend might be designated in general "psychologistic." With the progressive secularization of music, it had become less and less "congregational," and more and more of a "performer's art." By the time romanticism flowered we had the typical modern situation: the artists providing all the incentives and the audience merely "receiving." Romanticism seems to have attempted to reestablish communication on this new basis by stressing the emotional or passional aspect of music. Now, if one wishes to suggest states of mind—such as longing, anguish, unrest, strangeness, hopefulness—or to depict their external counterparts—such as storms, waves, processions, railway trains, and grotesques—the tonal "logic" is necessarily of a different sort. The earlier formal ideals tend to become not merely unnecessary but even positively obstructive. Perhaps Wagner's use of the Leitmotif may be considered the intermediate point between the thematic unity of classical structure and the "unifying mood" of post-Wagnerian impressionism.

Though the romantics generally thought of themselves as freeing music from many stodgy orthodoxies which interfered with complete musical expression, one might rather consider their movement as a definite change in the aims of musical expression. It is customary to pick out certain passages from earlier works, to note their "astonishingly modern" quality, and to assume that the composer was "groping" for precisely this quality and would have exemplified it throughout his work had he not been "held back" by the stupidity of his contemporaries. This is to overlook entirely the proportions which the given "modern" quality bore to the work as a whole, and to forget that a musician might have been interested in preserving precisely these proportions. It would be like finding a passage in Shakespeare that suggested Faulkner, and drawing from it the conclusion that Shakespeare was yearning to write "all Faulkner." Might we not rather consider each new "gain in musical freedom" as mere evidence of a change in the purposes to which music was put? Often, for instance, people point to the fact that a work which was once profoundly re-

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.

Intimate, colorful, alive! The most complete adult camp in the Adirondacks. Chamber music by the Compinsky Trio and the Perole String Quartet.
Dance Recitals by Pauline Koner and a complete summer stock and try-out theatre in the best Westport tradition.
Private golf course, lake and tennis courts.

Booklet on request.

GREEN MANSIONS
157 WEST 57th STREET
CO. 5-6346
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

MOON HILL ON SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS

For A Perfect Adirondack Vacation
HOTEL COMFORTS
Country Club Atmosphere
Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. (Dietary laws.) Families accommodated.

Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42. PEnn. 6-1720

CAMP ANNISQUAM

Charming
UNPRETENTIOUS on picturesque bay at Gloucester—fine spirit, whole-hearted direction. All land and sea sports. Send for booklet.

ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Gloucester, Mass.

NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB

NAPANOCH, N.Y.
Every Outdoor and Social Activity.
Write for Booklet.

Thrilling Entertainment by C.B.S.

New York City Phone: MUrray Hill 4-3802

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 300
Formerly a millionaire's estate of 150 acres, beautifully landscaped. Tennis. Handball courts. Swimming, boating, fishing. Many more attractions. Saddle horses on premises. Nearby golf. 1½ hours Erie R.R. or auto. Open all year.

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
●
Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
Penn. 6-7663

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group

August Rate $29.50

Superior Cuisine

Round Trip Fare $8.50 by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks

Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONN.
8th SUCCESSFUL SEASON

Uncas
Lodge

"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.
- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

AUGUST RATE $25 for 1 week
$48 for 2 weeks
Rate per day, $4.00
Management—DIANA AND ABE BERMAN
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE
QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $22.50 - $25.00 - and $27.50

Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

WHY NOT

? pick up your telephone and give us that classified ad for next week's issue? You will reach a group of 20,000 readers of The Nation living in and around New York, besides our readers out of town.

Rates: ½ inch....................$3.08
Additional line of 6 words .62 each
(minimum 3 lines)

THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET COrtlandt 7-3330

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the
ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N.Y.

AN ADIRONDACK CAMP
of the
BETTER TYPE
Most modern facilities for comfort and sports.

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

Warrensburg, N. Y.
Booklet "N" on Request
City Address: 545 5th Ave. (Room 1109)
VAn. [illegible]

SCAROON MANOR

In the Heart of the Adirondacks
Hotel Comforts. Complete Social Staff
COUNTRY CLUB INFORMALITY
Most Beautiful Summer Resort in America
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
NINE CLAY TENNIS COURTS
SIX HANDBALL COURTS
ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
JOS. FRIEBER MGR.-DIR.

BREEZEMONT

A resort of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.

Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

15th Season

WESTERN VIEW FARM

An Inn unique in its hospitality
On a mountain top only 2½ hours from New York. Rates: $8.00 a day by the day; $7.00 a day by the week; $6.00 a day by the month; $5.50 a day by the season.
Service a la mode Continentale
Address: EDWARD G. OHMER, New Milford, Conn.—Telephone, New Milford 440.
From all over the world comes this Farm's clientele

RED OAKS Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey

Golf, riding, tennis, all outdoor activities, 150 acre estate, private lake, beautiful country. Excellent food, spacious house, log fires. Just over the hour from New York by train or auto. Pennsylvania Railroad or Central Railroad of New Jersey to Red Bank or Sandy Hook steamer to Atlantic Highlands pier.
Management: Mascha and Hyman Strunsky
Telephone: Atlantic Highlands 264

COLONY HOUSE

Mohegan Colony, Peekskill, N. Y. On Bronx River Parkway. Lake sports. Commuting distance. Rate $18 weekly, $3.00 day. Families and weekenders accommodated. Tel. Peekskill 2733. Colony bus at station.

sented is now received without a qualm. The usual interpretation of this phenomenon is the assumption that we have now learned how to find our way about in the new music. Yet, how have we learned to find our way about? To a large extent, I believe that we have done this by learning to ask different things of a musical structure. If people are no longer "bewildered" by certain modern compositions, this fact need not signify that they have learned how to follow more intricate processes. It may also signify that they no longer attempt to follow these processes at all, tending rather to receive the music simply as a solid body of sound, precisely as they might receive a natural event or a street scene in their actual environment.

One cannot safely fix "first causes" here. One may find extra-musical factors that seem to account for the course which music has taken; or one can explain musical development solely with reference to the theory of music itself. The great influx of different instrumental textures—possibly a reflection of the "machine age" in general—might account for our increasing receptivity to dissonance: a conflict of tones is greatly lessened when these are distributed among various instrumental timbres—quite as three discordant notes would seem less discordant if one were assigned to a bell, the second were sung, and the third were struck on a drum than if all three were sounded by bells. Such freedom, once introduced, could then work by "recoil" to make us more receptive to the notes when sounded by bells alone. Again, it is quite customary to point out the stridencies of the modern city as providing a kind of "economic necessity" for our wider reception of dissonance, and dissonant music is pictured as largely an attempt on the composer's part to invent sounds which can rival in interest the accidental noises of the industrial state. In this respect, musical dissonance would merely be a tame aspect of that same movement which Griffith exemplified when introducing his noise contraptions to work upon our emotions in his "Birth of a Nation." Furthermore, however the drive toward invention and innovation may have originated, it was also doubtless greatly stimulated by the competitive conditions of an "overcrowded" art in an "expansionist" era, the great need for the artist to produce some brand of commodity which might have quick noticeability. Under such conditions, oddity, intensity, and extremity are qualities of much greater "biologic usefulness" than balance, repose, soundness, since they are more "arresting." We should expect at least as much competitive stylization in art as we find in advertising, a tendency to establish "esthetic trade names," as with soaps or automobile designs. We do not speak in a derogatory sense when we note this intrusion of chamber-of-commerce tactics into art. We mean simply that when art is highly centralized, when the artists from a hundred million standardized people must all go to one city, there to outclamor one another or to remain unheard, the natural pieties of art are necessarily confused by demands of salesmanship.

But this brings us to the subject of invention in general—and we must remember that this is the age in which the inventive man, Homo faber, has flowered. Surely there is no art which more clearly discloses the laws of progressive invention than "the most Faustian art," music. The slightest acquaintance with even the rudimentary rules of harmony can suggest ways of "extending" the production of sound in new directions. A mere rule of academic avoidance, for instance, is sufficient in the modern mind to suggest the thought: "Why not build a composition by intensely exemplifying the very thing which this rule proscribes?" Or any theory of scales or of harmonic development contains, for even the mildly adventurous, enticing possibilities for the "development of new resources." The main difficulty here seems to arise on occasion from the fact that the fate of production in music has paralleled the fate of production under capitalist industrialism in general: production tended to be isolated as a problem in itself, without sufficient regard for the problems of the "consumer." It is easily possible, by strictly methodical procedure, to erect a texture of sound which could not possibly disclose this same logic to the auditor. For instance: one may take a sequence of notes, invert them, reverse them, invert the reversal, modify the intervals and the rhythmic character, and then have all this going at once, with uneven overlappings—and though the construction may be perfectly methodical, the abilities of the inventive mind have here far outstripped the abilities of the receptive ear. The fields of production and consumption tend to become distinct: the speculative gratifications of the producer must be wholly different from those of the consumer, quite as the inventing of a new refrigerator may be the height of brilliance, but the use of it is 99 per cent bluntness. A kindred issue is notable in the later work of Stein or Joyce.

In any event, we now have available a range of resources so wide that many musicians are deliberately attempting to restore some modern equivalent of the older intricacy-simplicity combination. At precisely the moment when music had established its ability to wail, curse, convulse, exult, long, moon, and sorrow, we note the hankering after a principle of order somewhat like that prevailing in the eighteenth century . The issue is not clear, nor have the solutions been wholly promising, particularly as the "order" is sought precisely in those regions of sound and rhythm which would have thoroughly symbolized disorder at the time of the earlier classicism. Again, the texture of our sciences and business has been so thoroughly romantic as to suggest that neo-classicism itself is but a misnomer for one of the romantic schools. Even those who would complete the rationalization of the state are the arch-romantics of politics: the communists. The matter is further complicated by the fact that the aspects of modern life which really do contain something of "classical regularity"—such as standardization of "needs," railroad schedules, radio broadcasting, newspaper distribution, investors' graphs, and the prompt appearance of the gas bill—seem to have detracted from rationality much of the lure as human guidance which it must have had in earlier eras, before it was quite so generally embodied in the economic plant. Hence, even the "classical" phases of our living seem to call for a romantic antidote, as artists seek to provide greater and greater quixoticism for those who, despite all the upheavals now upon us, still move in a state of external quietude that permits and demands the maximum of internal agitation if they are to "be alive."

KENNETH BURKE

Contributors to This Issue

MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD is San Francisco correspondent of the Federated Press.

HAROLD M. GROVES, former member of the Wisconsin legislature and the Wisconsin Tax Commission, is professor of public finance at the University of Wisconsin.

WALTER WILSON is the author of "Forced Labor in the United States."

EVELYN SCOTT is the author of "The Wave," "Breathe Upon These Slain," and other volumes.

KATHARINE ANTHONY is the author of "Catherine the Great," and "Queen Elizabeth."

ERNEST GRUENING, formerly an editor of The Nation, has recently been in Cuba as a member of an investigatory commission of the Foreign Policy Association.

EDWARD SAPIR is Sterling professor of anthropology and linguistics at Yale University.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of applied Christianity at the Union Theological Seminary, is the author of "Reflections on the End of an Era."

PUBLIC LIBRARY

NRA U.S. CODE

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 8, 1934 No. 3605

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 141
EDITORIALS:
Nazism's Defeat in Austria 144
Labor and Industry 145
Too Much Weather 145
Theology and Birth Control 146
ISSUES AND MEN. ROBERT M. LAFOLLETTE, JR. By Oswald Garrison Villard 147
CARTOON: THE ENEMY BULLETS CANNOT KILL. By LOW 148
AUGUST, 1914: A SYMPOSIUM. I. THEY ALL LIED—AND EUROPE WENT TO WAR. By Lewis S. Gannett. II. A RESTLESS LONDON. By Leslie Read. III. PARIS SETTLES TO A SIEGE. By Jean Prévost. IV. GERMANY AT A LOW EBB. By Arthur Feiler. V. AMERICA WALKS BY ITSELF. By Harold E. Stearns 149
NEW DEAL BALANCE SHEET. By Frederick R. Barkley . . 155
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 157
CORRESPONDENCE 157
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
War in Minneapolis. By Herbert Solow 160
The Terror in San Jose. By John Terry 161
Labor Notes 162
BOOKS:
W. H. Auden. By James Burnham 164
The Sough of Words. By H. L. Mencken 165
Nicolson Loses His Way. By Oswald Garrison Villard . . . 165
Story of a Dictator. By Constance Rourke 166
The Old South. By Mary McCarthy 167
Shorter Notices 168
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 168

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Contributing Editor

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

AT HONOLULU, President Roosevelt made a characteristic speech even more than ordinarily full of charming and meaningless phrases. He reminded the Hawaiians that they were "an integral part of the nation," with a "fine historic tradition." He remarked on the "excellent appearance of neatness and cleanliness in the homes . . . of the islands" and noted that "you are doing much to improve the standards of living of the average of your citizenship." A touch that was not quite relevant to this local sweetness and light crept in when he added that he wished "to say a word of congratulation on the efficiency and the fine spirit of the army and navy forces of which I am Commander-in-Chief" although, of course, "These forces must ever be considered an instrument of continuing peace." The Japanese, a simple people, not quite so much given to treacle, expressed themselves as disappointed with Mr. Roosevelt's remarks. They have, so reports from Tokio declare, been trying for some time to obtain from the United States more specific declarations of amity than have been forthcoming. They would like a thought or two on Manchuria, a hint of any relaxation in our immigration policy, a mention of the naval conference in 1935. They even hoped that perhaps the American President might mention one or more of these matters when he came to Hawaii. But they deceived themselves. Mr. Roosevelt said farewell to the Hawaiians in their own language; otherwise his speech was that employed by politicians the world over when they do not wish to get mixed up in an unpleasant situation.

UNDER THE HEADING, "Dailies Helped Break General Strike," Editor and Publisher reveals that the publishers in the San Francisco Bay area formed a council and printed false information which incited the red hunt and the consequent wrecking of the radicals' meeting places by self-styled vigilantes. "On Sunday, July 15, the Examiner and the Chronicle," says Editor and Publisher, "published front-page editorials stating that radicals had seized control by intimidation and that the general strike was a revolution against constituted authority." Simultaneously William Randolph Hearst telephoned from London to announce a cable story telling how the 1926 general strike in England was crushed, and "this was published on Monday in the Examiner, Chronicle, Call-Bulletin, Oakland Post-Enquirer, and all Hearst newspapers." By this time, conscientiously reports Editor and Publisher, "the general public, which had generally been sympathetic to the alleged wrongs of the longshoremen, awakened to the menace which threatened citizen rights and that the general strike was 'revolution'." The brains of the publishers' council was Francis Neyland, general counsel for the Hearst newspapers, who "entered into negotiations with conservative labor leaders . . . who welcomed this help. Newspaper editorials built up the strength and influence of the conservative leaders and aided in splitting the conservative membership away from the radicals. The publishers believed that the situation might spread into a revolution that would sweep the country." Then came the vigilantes, and how those strike-breaking newspapers crowed with delight! They suppressed and falsified what happened. The Chronicle and the Examiner in particular whitewashed the police and put the blame on union labor. "Police started the raids during the morning but were superseded by an infuriated band of men, reported to be union strikers," reported the Examiner. And beneath pictures of demolished communist headquarters appeared descriptive lines that struck a new sadistic note in American journalism: "Here's a smashing raid on radical headquarters on Valencia Street, when aroused conservative unionists broke up light housekeeping, destroyed inflammatory literature, and helped in the swing to the right with a few right swings."

MORE AND MORE the fascist mood is creeping into news headlines and editorials all over the country. It was only a month ago that James Rorty predicted in The Nation that it would be a miracle if the FERA continued to feed strikers in the face of pressures generated by major strike situations. These pressures have already taken the form of belligerent demands upon the FERA at Washington that the government cease using tax money to feed strikers who reject the settlements proposed by government mediation boards. The Richmond, Virginia, Times-Dispatch writes: "How far should the Emergency Relief Administration go in providing food, clothing, and shelter for strikers? With the walkout of rayon workers at Hopewell now in its third week, the question is pertinent to the policy of the FERA." As might be expected, the Los Angeles Times is even more violent: "Merely to have fed these strikers with money collected from the very public they are trying to starve is a travesty upon civilization." Paper after paper recalls the strike-breaking heroes of the past—Grover Cleveland, Ole Hanson, Calvin Coolidge—and they predict a brilliant future for Governor Merriam. Recurrently the words "communist" and "foreign-born" are used to carry almost equal opprobium. Most forthright of all is the Indianapolis Star, which editorializes as follows: "Alien communists should be deported. Subversive literature should be destroyed. The need for a program of thorough-going Americanization is fully as great as it was during the war." Somewhat more subtly, the New York Journal of Commerce suggests that the breaking of the general strike has cost labor dearly, and that "perhaps the greatest loss will be a likely basic change in the attitude of the federal Administration toward pushing further organization of American labor within the framework of existing unions."

SIGNIFICANTLY, two news stories appeared side by side in the New York Times of July 29. The two headlines read: "Police Act to List All Union Leaders," and "Police 'Riot Squad' is Doubled to 1,200." One way to make trouble is to prepare for trouble, and the preparations of the police for domestic strife on the labor front are not different in animus and effect from the "preparedness" campaigns of the military crowd. According to Chief Inspector Valentine, the listing of union leaders was undertaken at the behest of the joint board of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, but officials of the Amalgamated deny responsibility for the order and denounce it as an anti-union maneuver. General O'Ryan leaves no doubt as to how these lists will be used. He said: "The purpose of the order is the more readily to enable the police, in case of labor difficulties, to distinguish between accredited labor representatives and others who claim to be representatives of the unions but are actually trouble makers." Protests against the order were lodged by the Food Workers Industrial Union, the Trade Union Unity Council and the American Newspaper Guild, and by Louis Waldman, state chairman of the Socialist Party. Such an order in the hands of the Toledo police would have provided a convenient pretext for jailing the leaders of the Unemployed League, who, by defying an outrageous court injunction, rescued the Auto-Lite worerks' strike from stalemate and brought it to a successful conclusion. Mayor La Guardia has said that there is nothing obligatory about the identification plan and second that its sole purpose was to prevent misunderstanding on occasions when union investigators checked up on employers to see if NRA regulations were observed or when there was a question about the authority of union representatives to act for the union. It may mean that and nothing more to the Mayor but the use of such an order by a fascist-minded police commissioner is something quite different.

EVEN MORE OMINOUS was the action of General O'Ryan, New York Police Commissioner, in ordering the recently organized police rifle regiment to begin drilling immediately. The new regiment will number 1,200 men—double the strength of the old "riot squad," and will consist, like a regular-army unit, of three battalions of three companies each. One company will be armed with Thompson sub-machine guns, and there is to be in addition a medical corps, a motor transport unit, and a replacement company. The order to train this quasi-military police unit followed close on the heels of the walk-out of engineers and workers in the Mid-town Hudson Tunnel which brought the threat of a general strike in heavy industries. Asked whether the regiment would be mobilized in the event of a riot, General O'Ryan said that it would depend upon the extent of the riot. By his handling of the demonstrations of unemployed and relief workers, and by his blanket approval of the increasing brutality of the New York police, General O'Ryan has repeatedly shown his hand. He is a rather typical "brass hat" in politics. If Mayor La Guardia intends to keep faith with his liberal supporters and avoid an orgy of red-hunting similar to that which now rages up and down the West coast, he should recognize that all the portents indicate General O'Ryan as Trouble-maker Number 1. In other words, the sooner New York has a new police commissioner the better. Fortunately the unions are alive to the danger confronting them. Joseph Schlossberg, general secretary of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America has declared that the organization of the rifle regiment means "a declaration of war on the unions." It is that in effect, if not in intent. As the American Civil Liberties Union points out, "Every red-baiting campaign starts with a broadside against radicals and winds up with an open assault upon all organized labor."

JUDGE BOOTH of the Connecticut Superior Court has just upheld the validity of a contract based on the closed shop. Suit was brought before Judge Booth by Peter Strong, a former member of the union, against officers of the International Union of Elevator Contractors. Strong asked for damages, charging that the officers had entered into unlawful contracts and engaged in unlawful acts which prevented him from securing employment as an elevator constructor. The plaintiff had been expelled from the union some years ago. Thereafter, whenever he found work in his craft, the union officers would notify the contractors that he was not a member, and he would be discharged. These were the "unlawful" acts complained of on Strong's behalf. As for the "unlawful" contract, it was an agreement between the I.U.E.C. and the contractors, whereby the latter pledged themselves to employ none but union help. Judge Booth's decision addressed itself to the philosophy of the labor movement. The court spoke of the attempts of wage earners, through organization, to protect themselves against "unorganized competition." The court went on to uphold the right of a labor organization to enter into contracts which would give such protection to its members. Having decided that the contract itself was lawful, Judge Booth rejected the contention that the defendants' acts, in enforcing the contract, were illegal. "The resulting damage," he held," if such followed, is an incident unfortunate but unactionable." The court's decision gives voice to a collectivistic idea with which most of our judges so far have not had much sympathy.

AS DIRECTOR of the Division of Research and Economic Planning of the NRA, Mr. Leon Henderson is supposed to hold steadily aloft the candle of statistical and economic "science," thereby illuminating the murk of pressure politics in which the codes are written, revised, and approved. How far that little candle sends its beams may be judged by Mr. Henderson's recent statement predicting an autumn rise in business, and basing his prediction on such unconventional indices as the issuance of marriage certificates, the purchase of living-room rugs, and the repayment of personal loans. Promptly the daily editorial writers, especially those unfriendly to the Administration, trained their statistical Big Berthas on Mr. Henderson and pretty well demolished him. The Herald Tribune could and did point out that during the past two months business, as measured by the accepted indices, has fallen off considerably more than seasonally. In fact, according to Economic Statistics, production has declined about 15 per cent since May. Moreover, retail trade, in department and chain stores, declined in June both in dollar value and in volume.

THESE FIGURES are real and earnest, although, of course, they do not prove that Mr. Henderson is wrong in predicting a fall upturn, or that the NRA is ill-advised to "gamble," as Mr. Henderson put it, on the prospect of such an upturn. As a matter of fact, the NRA has no choice. It is all a gamble, and a highly political gamble, based on the Administration's hope that American capitalism still retains some natural recuperative power; that the natural recovery will come along in time to save the show before the resources of the greatest showman that ever occupied the White House shall have been exhausted. For the title of Mr. Henderson's Division is obviously a misnomer. One does not plan an economy of abundance by creating scarcities, which is the avowed purpose of the AAA and of most of the NRA codes. The Division of Research and Economic Planning which, if it were what its name indicates, would be what the Gosplan board is in Russia, is merely one of the minor sideshows of the New Deal. Its function is not to plan in any genuine, inclusive sense, but to implement the struggle of the New Dealers to prevent the industrialists from greedily lapping up, under the cover of the codes, the springs of natural, unplanned recovery. Both before and after his elevation to his present position, Mr. Henderson has fought against the price-fixing provisions of the codes, and in behalf of moderately decent wage-and-hour clauses. Theoretically, the statistical muse stands aloof from such battles. Actually, one suspects that, in struggling to jam the remaining industries into codes before August 10, Mr. Henderson was tempted into using statistical blandishments; that he hoped to cajole the recalcitrant industrialists into "gambling" on the happy days to come. If so, it is not the first time that statistics have felt the influence of political exigencies.

A YEAR AGO petroleum production was rapidly increasing beyond all previous volume, this in the face of a declining market. This condition was met by an executive order of the President and a subsequent code. But ultimate control of production was denied the government by the Texas Federal Court decision of February 13 which refused the right of jurisdiction over producers not signing the code and not engaging in inter-State business. A bill providing for real regulation of oil production died in the last Congress because of doubtful constitutionality. Even the production within the scope of the code, as foreign observers remark and as the figures show, has constantly exceeded the set quota. Our stock of petroleum ending July 14 increased 95,000 barrels over the 344,092,000 barrels of the preceding week. The government, in its efforts to maintain the price level, has set a diminished quota for August; to what extent it will be observed is questionable. Yet Secretary Ickes, in reviewing the achievements of the oil administration during its first year of activity, is silent on the subject of violations as well as of the increased legal production. But he points with pride to the three-fold price increase, with the naive reasoning that "more money for less oil should encourage conservation."

THE NEW YORK DEUTSCHE ZEITUNG, which attained some publicity through the Dickstein investigation as the organ of the Friends of the New Germany and the officially supported Nazi newspaper for New York, carried the following headlines in its issue of July 26, the first after the assassination of Dollfuss: "People's revenge in Austria! Dollfuss government fallen. Chancellor dead of wounds. Bitterness of the people vents itself; the advance of National Socialism is not to be prevented." The lead article begins:

> In Austria the people have spoken! What will happen in the next days and hours cannot now be predicted; in any case the people have gotten rid of the hated Chancellor. . . . On going to press the situation was still too confused for any conjectures about the political consequences of the rebellion on Wednesday; nevertheless it can certainly be said that what now is preparing in Austria will finally lead to union with Germany—for Austria, if she is to live, a spiritual and financial necessity.

Even if one agrees with the inevitability of Austro-German union, this strident repetition of accepted Nazi doctrine is especially revealing now after the official German disavowal of all responsibility for recent events in Austria. What will the Leader do about the indiscreet honesty of Herr Kappe, editor of the New York Deutsche Zeitung? Shall we see Herr Kappe suffer the same sad fate as Herr Habicht: disavowal for continuing the doctrines of the Leader himself?

BECAUSE ONE ELIZABETH PRENDELL, some centuries back, saved the life of the little boy who was to become Charles II of England, one W. Dacre Walker, a physician of Andover, Massachusetts, will receive an annuity which he is reputed not to need. The last recipient of the King's Annuity was the late Professor Francis Walker, of the University of British Columbia. This information, which we glean from the Andover Townsman, is duly passed on to our readers, some of whom may have become careless about their daily good deeds. There is, however, a further thought which should be added by way of caution. The ability of potentates to reward posterity to the nth generation has become rather open to question of late. And the attitude of one's fellow citizens about this matter of rescues is also to be considered. For example, one recalls the anecdote about the plain man who inadvertently saved the Duce from the waters of the Adriatic. "How shall I reward you?" asked the dictator. "If you don't mind," replied the citizen, "I'd be glad if you didn't tell anybody that I did it."

Nazism's Defeat in Austria

AT the end of June it seemed a mere matter of mathematics to estimate the date on which a Christian Social-National Socialist cabinet would take the Austrian government out of Dollfuss's hands. But the inhuman murder of the Austrian Chancellor has completely altered the situation. The possibility of a coalition with the Nazis is definitely out of the picture.

The reason is obvious. The Austrian Nazis unquestionably had the support of a considerable percentage of the population. After the suppression and dissolution of the Social Democratic Party, the National Socialist Party was the strongest opposition group in the country, although it was generally acknowledged that it would be able to accomplish its purpose only with the active assistance of the German government and its National Socialist machine. Hitler's plan to undermine Austria by radio agitation from abroad and by an all-pervading apparatus financed by Germany at home, until such time as it would be possible with the assistance of the "Austrian Legion" to overthrow the existing administration, was frustrated by Mussolini's watchfulness. The German "Führer," recognizing the new situation, adjusted himself to it and tried to come to an understanding in Venice which would have brought him to his goal by another, more circuitous route. But Dollfuss, feeling that Mussolini had betrayed him, sought and found reassurance in France and thereupon refused to accept the Hitler-Mussolini compromise which would have encompassed his own political annihilation.

The putsch in Vienna was planned and carried out by a group of Austrian Nazis who felt that the compromise to be effected at Riccioni—whither Dollfuss would have gone on July 29 if he had been alive—would react unfavorably on their own aspirations. They recognized that the events of June 30 had weakened Hitler's position and were persuaded that only immediate action could win Austria for Anschluss and the National Socialist idea. Apparently they were convinced—and this conviction was clearly nurtured by the promises of the blundering German Minister—that the German government, after an initial period of benevolent neutrality, would permit the splendidly equipped and armed Austrian (Nazi) Legion stationed at the Bavarian-Austrian border to come to the assistance of its brethren in the mother country.

That was their great mistake. For even if Hitler were not the inveterate opportunist and demagogue the last eighteen months have shown him to be, he could have come to the assistance of his Austrian comrades only if he had been willing to accept war with every other European nation as the price to be paid. The Hitler regime could no longer count on the support of a blindly devoted majority which was the fundamental prerequisite for victory, nor could it count on the neutrality of the British against France which had been its greatest foreign asset in the recent past. In short there was nothing Hitler desired less than an uprising of his supporters in Austria at this moment. When it occurred he moved precipitously to absolve himself and his regime from responsibility. He closed the borders to the Austrian Legion on the one hand and to fugitive Austrian Nazis on the other. He recalled the stupidly indiscreet envoy to Vienna and repudiated Dr. Rieth's guaranties for safe conduct for the Nazi rebels. He threatened to arrest every refugee who came from Austria to German soil. All of which spelled defeat for the hopes of the Austrian insurgents before they had well begun.

The fight of the Nazis in Austria was lost, indeed, in the moment when Mussolini mobilized his troops for a possible Austrian invasion. These Italian soldiers, between 50,000 and 100,000 in number, would have crossed the border the moment developments in the neighboring republic indicated a possible victory for the Nazi insurrectionists. Mussolini demanded and was granted full power to act and all necessary support by the governments of France and Great Britain. Not even armed intervention by the German government could have brought victory to the Austrian Nazis. Yet in the face of insuperable odds they refused to accept defeat. It is probable that their premature attempt, coupled with the disintegration of Hitler's power in the Reich, has destroyed the possibility of a Nazi victory over the Austrian people.

Their opponents, to be sure, are far from united. The new government which, like that of Dollfuss, represents a coalition of Christian Social and Heimwehr forces, is torn by internal dissension. The Christian Social Party, whose chief representative in the Cabinet, Dr. Schuschnigg, carried the day against the Heimwehr chief, Prince Ernst Starhemberg, after a week of haggling uncertainty controls the important posts in the Cabinet despite the threat of the Heimwehr leaders that they would offer political resistance if the already appointed Starhemberg were removed. The appointment of Schuschnigg, a clerical bureaucrat with strong monarchist leanings, brings a factor into the Austrian situation which the Mussolini-Hitler issue had crowded into the background. Clearly the Vatican which, contrary to Starhemberg's protector, the Italian dictator, strongly favors a return of the Catholic Hapsburgs, has carried the day. The new Chancellor, though reactionary to the core, is less inclined than the adventurer Starhemberg to political extravaganzas and to the chauvinism which would have enticed that irresponsible blusterer into one international complication after the other. There are rumors that France and England have already given their consent to the restoration, that Italy and the Little Entente are to be persuaded to accept this solution of the Austrian problem by guaranteeing young Otto's promise that he and his government under no circumstances will aspire to or accept sovereignty over extra-Austrian territory, unless sanctioned by each and all of the partners to the agreement. The Holy See, one learns from reliable sources, has offered to act as "stake holder" in the deal. It would force Austria to keep its promise of territorial safety for the neighboring states and would insist on withdrawal of its demands for revision of the Treaty of St. Germain, condemning it thereby to a continuation of its present financial and economic dependence on Italy and France. But while this is the case there can be no solution of the Danubian question and no guaranty for the peace of Europe.

These rumors are confirmed by almost identical cables from Rome, Paris, and London reporting that the respective governments are about to present their ultimati to Berlin, demanding that all propaganda in Austria shall cease and that acceptable guaranties be given of the Reich's intention to keep its word. Other less convincing dispatches tell of insistence on reduction and partial disarmament of the SA and SS troops. But in this direction danger lies and England will think twice before it sanctions terms which Germany cannot possibly accept. Mussolini will withdraw his troops and Germany will accept any proposal which permits it to save its face before its people. The nations of Europe, afraid of what war will bring, will build golden bridges for Hitler to cross.

Labor and Industry

LABOR'S struggle for higher wages, shorter hours, and collective bargaining grows steadily more intense. According to conservative estimates American workers who still have jobs have lost at least 15,000,000 days since January 1 because of strikes or lock-outs. The United States Department of Labor reports that 1,926,035 days were lost in January. In May the figure rose to 3,477,893. And the figure for July, covering the period of the San Francisco general strike, will probably be even higher.

The central issue in most of the strikes has been recognition of the union; and the workers have grown more and more militant in their methods. In San Francisco, Minneapolis, Toledo, Montana, Milwaukee, and other strike centers, they have succeeded in bringing the life of the community to a standstill by means of a power often quite out of proportion to the actual number of strikers. And they have been able to do this only because they have had the sympathy of an important section of the community. In Toledo the strikers were supported by the masses of unemployed in that industrial city which collapsed early in the depression and has ever since been so prostrate that the unemployed worker can no longer look upon his employed fellow as a rival but only as another potentially unemployed worker. In Montana the strike of the miners has become the focus for the deep and widespread hatred of the Anaconda Copper Company that is felt in every community in the State. In Milwaukee public resentment against the power monopoly expressed itself in a picket line which was overwhelmingly composed of plain citizens who, like the electric employees on strike, had been exploited by the public utilities. In San Francisco the 100,000 people who took part in the strike were after all not only workers but members of the community. The mad red-hunts which later took place were not the spontaneous expression of an outraged citizenry. They were incited and carried out by a small minority of business and industrial interests bent upon discrediting 100,000 workers and citizens who asked only honorable working conditions.

These lawless raids upon the organizations and even the homes of workers in California are the most flagrant examples so far of another major development which has kept pace with the growth of labor unrest. This is the growth of fascist influences which are appearing consistently in connection with strikes. Throughout California vigilantes are terrorizing "communists" in the agricultural sections as well as in the industrial centers. In Minneapolis the Citizens' Alliance and the Law and Order League are active; South Jersey, scene of the recent strike at the Seabrook Farms, has its minute men. In York County, Pennsylvania, "substantial citizens" carry firearms by permission of the authorities.

The cleavage between the "haves" and the "have-nots" will grow more critical as continuing depression further undermines the security of the workers and the profits of employers. On many fronts bitter battles are being fought over wage demands as low as $12 a week. The NRA minimum which has precipitated so many walkouts does not average more than $15. Yet the figure commonly accepted as a bare subsistence wage is $1,500 a year or $30 weekly.

The Nation believes that its readers and the American people as a whole are deeply interested in the struggle through which so many thousands of their fellow citizens are trying to force decent living conditions. It believes also that the daily press, dominated as it is by those who own rather than by those who work, is giving an inadequate and distorted picture of the present labor unrest. For these reasons The Nation establishes with this issue a special section on Labor and Industry. Within its limited space we shall try to build up over a period of months an adequate and reliable picture of what is taking place among both industrial and agricultural workers, unemployed as well as employed. We shall give particular attention to the fascist developments already mentioned, which are so fraught with menace to a liberty-loving people. In this venture we solicit the active cooperation of men and women throughout the country who wish to see the important issues between capital and labor decided on the basis of their merit, and who feel with us that there can be no permanent labor peace until the worker obtains not only decent working conditions but the power, through collective bargaining, to control those conditions.

Too Much Weather

THE immemorial struggle between the farmer and his earth has this year taken on a peculiar intensity. From Canada to Texas, and from the Mississippi to the Rockies, the average farmer would be out all day praying for rain—except that he is too busy trying to invent ways to bring water to dying stock and parched fields. It is reported that in parts of Kansas derricks bloom as freely as in oil-boom days, but they are working day and night driving shafts into the earth to find water. Thousands of otherwise impoverished farmers are on government pay, laying pipe lines, lowering the outlets of lakes and ponds, diverting what is left of streams. Water is being pumped from sources fifty miles away to relieve the residents of Imperial Valley, California, and Lawrence Westbrook, assistant FERA administrator in charge of drought relief, reports that in one town a two-inch pipe was laid to a spring five miles away when the local water supply was exhausted and the townspeople were buying water at as high as a dollar a barrel.

What this state of affairs has done to the AAA crop-reduction program is all too obvious. Secretary Wallace is quoted as saying that, with the exception of the cotton crop, all farm surpluses may very well be wiped out by the drought. Wheat, cattle, hogs, dairy products, milk, and possibly corn—if it does not rain very shortly—will be in a state of depletion unknown for years. And there may be an actual shortage of hay, oats, and bran during the coming winter. The wheat crop averaged, from 1927 to 1931, 886,359,000 bushels. This year the forecast is for a yield of 483,662,000 bushels. In Missouri it is estimated that the corn crop lost about a hundred million bushels during July. The Missouri oat yield is thought to be about 10 per cent of the normal crop; grass for feed is about 15 to 20 per cent of normal. In Oklahoma federal statisticians reported the corn crop a failure in nine counties, and not more than 10 per cent normal in twenty-one counties—more than a third of the whole State. The Kansas corn crop declined 50,000,000 in about three weeks in July, leaving about a third of the normal yield.

It is almost impossible to compute the financial losses implied by these failures of the earth to yield its accustomed harvest. The crop damage in Nebraska alone is estimated at $156,000,000; and it would be easy to extend similar computations—to include stock as well as grain—until the total ran near the billion mark. The federal government has already allocated some twenty million dollars for the relief of the drought areas, and there is no doubt that millions more will be needed. Secretary Wallace promises that from four to seven million head of cattle will be purchased before the year is out, and will be made into canned beef to be distributed to families on federal relief. And work relief now takes the form of increasing the water supply and driving starving and thirsty cattle to ranges where food and water may be had.

This is a problem which immediately and directly involves about a third of the country—in area if not in population—and involves the rest by the threat of a limitation in the food supply. O. W. Roberts, chief of the Bismarck (North Dakota) Weather Bureau Station, who has spent years studying meteorological conditions in that area, feels that the problem is only a temporary one. That a season of normal rainfall will bring the soil back to its customary moisture. There are plenty of others who believe that much of the present drought region is gradually approaching desert conditions. The sub-surface water is sinking lower and lower. There was a time when twenty-foot wells sufficed; now the artesian wells which followed them currently run dry. In the light of this view of the situation, the government plan for the creation of a forest windbreak 1,300 miles long from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico is about to be undertaken. The project will be in the nature of an enormous relief scheme, it will take about ten years to complete, and will cost upwards of $70,000,000. If it succeeds —that is, if the trees are planted and live—there is small doubt that it will materially improve the moisture conditions of the affected regions. It may even prevent a drought similar to the one we are now experiencing. In the meanwhile we have the problem of some half a million farmers who may need actually to move from their present farms to land which they can cultivate. And we face a possible sharp rise in food prices next winter as a result of a shortage of grain and breed stock. Farming is a stern business; and in the age of the machine it is perhaps a little humbling to see how firmly it is guided by the authority of the wind and the rain.

Theology and Birth Control

MANY readers have commented by letter upon our recent editorial The Paradox of Birth Control. For the most part, non-Catholics contented themselves with reiterating medical doubts concerning the reality of the so-called "sterile period," but several members of the Catholic church have protested that we did not recognize the logic of their position. The method sanctioned by its propagandists is, they say, "natural." Contraception by mechanical or chemical methods, on the other hand, is "unnatural." Or, as an editorial in a Catholic newspaper declared, "the sterile period was created by God," while the methods advocated by the birth-control clinics "defeat God's purpose."

With the best will in the world we are unable to see in all this anything except the most trivial quibbling and we do not believe that our failure to be convinced is, as one correspondent suggested, due exclusively to the fact that we have given up all faith in God. If He ordained the "sterile period" then surely He also consented, at least, to the invention of chinasol, and we find it impossible to conceive how a chemical reality can be any less "natural" than a physiological one. Nor, if the question is theologically a question of "use" and "abuse," do we see by what means it can be proved that deliberately to take advantage of the "sterile period, is to "use" a natural fact while to take advantage of an equally natural chemical fact is to "abuse" it. If we were concerned with theology we should hesitate to assume that "God's purpose" could be defeated and we find it difficult to believe that it is wrong to accomplish with scientific certainty what it is right to attempt by relying upon a vulgar —and possibly erroneous—belief. Superstition is not somehow sacred and science somehow impious.

It is strange to find the Catholic church reviving a type of argument which we thought of as now current only in those remote communities where airplanes are still regarded as a defiance of God's law and the employment of any medicines not compounded out of "herbs" is thought to constitute black magic. One does, to be sure, still occasionally hear it said that efforts to render childbirth less painful are impious because "if God had not intended women to suffer he would not have ordained labor-pains at all." But the official attitude of the Catholic church on birth control strikes us as peculiarly benighted—almost exactly parallel to that taken a hundred years ago when Morton introduced ether. It is hard to imagine now how anyone could have seriously believed that to render a surgical patient insensible to pain was to commit a grave sin. Yet we ourselves feel very sure that, a century hence, hair-splitting discussions of the distinction between "natural" and "unnatural" methods of birth control will seem quite as fantastic.

Once it has been admitted that the number of offspring ought to be consciously controlled, it seems difficult to maintain without absurdity that this control becomes sinful as soon as it ceases to be bungling and uncertain. Whatever it is legitimate to do at all it is certainly legitimate to do in the surest and safest way possible.

Issues and Men

Robert M. LaFollette, Jr.

SENATOR ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR. entered public life under difficult circumstances. He was the son and namesake of his father, a great man and a true patriot, whose wisdom in opposing America's entry into the World War has now been justified a thousand times over—even Senator Borah admits the dreadful mistake the country made. Now sons of distinguished fathers are usually so overshadowed by their sires as to be afflicted with a complete inferiority complex; the sons of great men are usually failures, or inconspicuous, or "monotonously good," as a charming and vivacious Belgian woman once remarked of her distinguished but dull American husband. Robert LaFollette, Jr., was his father's secretary and therefore all the more likely to play second fiddle. Beyond that, he was always delicate and was so ill for a long time as to be unable to go to college; instead of having a number of professors, he sat at the feet of only one, from whom he learned much that is never acquired in class-room or laboratory. The only time the senior LaFollette was ever known to absent himself from his Senatorial duties was when, for months and months, he sat by the bedside of this beloved son, fearing to lose him.

When the father died, the Republicans of the State of Wisconsin, ashamed and repentant of their treatment of him during the war, offered his place to his widow. Her undue modesty forbade, so it went to the older son. Naturally his election placed him in an extremely difficult position. He was young—barely over the legal age. He had made few public appearances; he had travelled little and knew other countries not at all. Able to address an audience easily, he was conscious of not being an orator. He was equally conscious that his every act and every speech would be compared to his father's; people were sure to say: "How much less able he is than his sire." Again, he was aware that his youth placed great restrictions upon him; the older Senators were likely to disregard him because of his boyish appearance. Four things were in his favor: He realized all of these things; he was modest and entirely without conceit; he had extremely good common-sense and knew just what he was and where he stood; and his long experience with his father had made of him an extremely good parliamentarian, familiar with Senatorial practice and the machinery of the Senate's Committees.

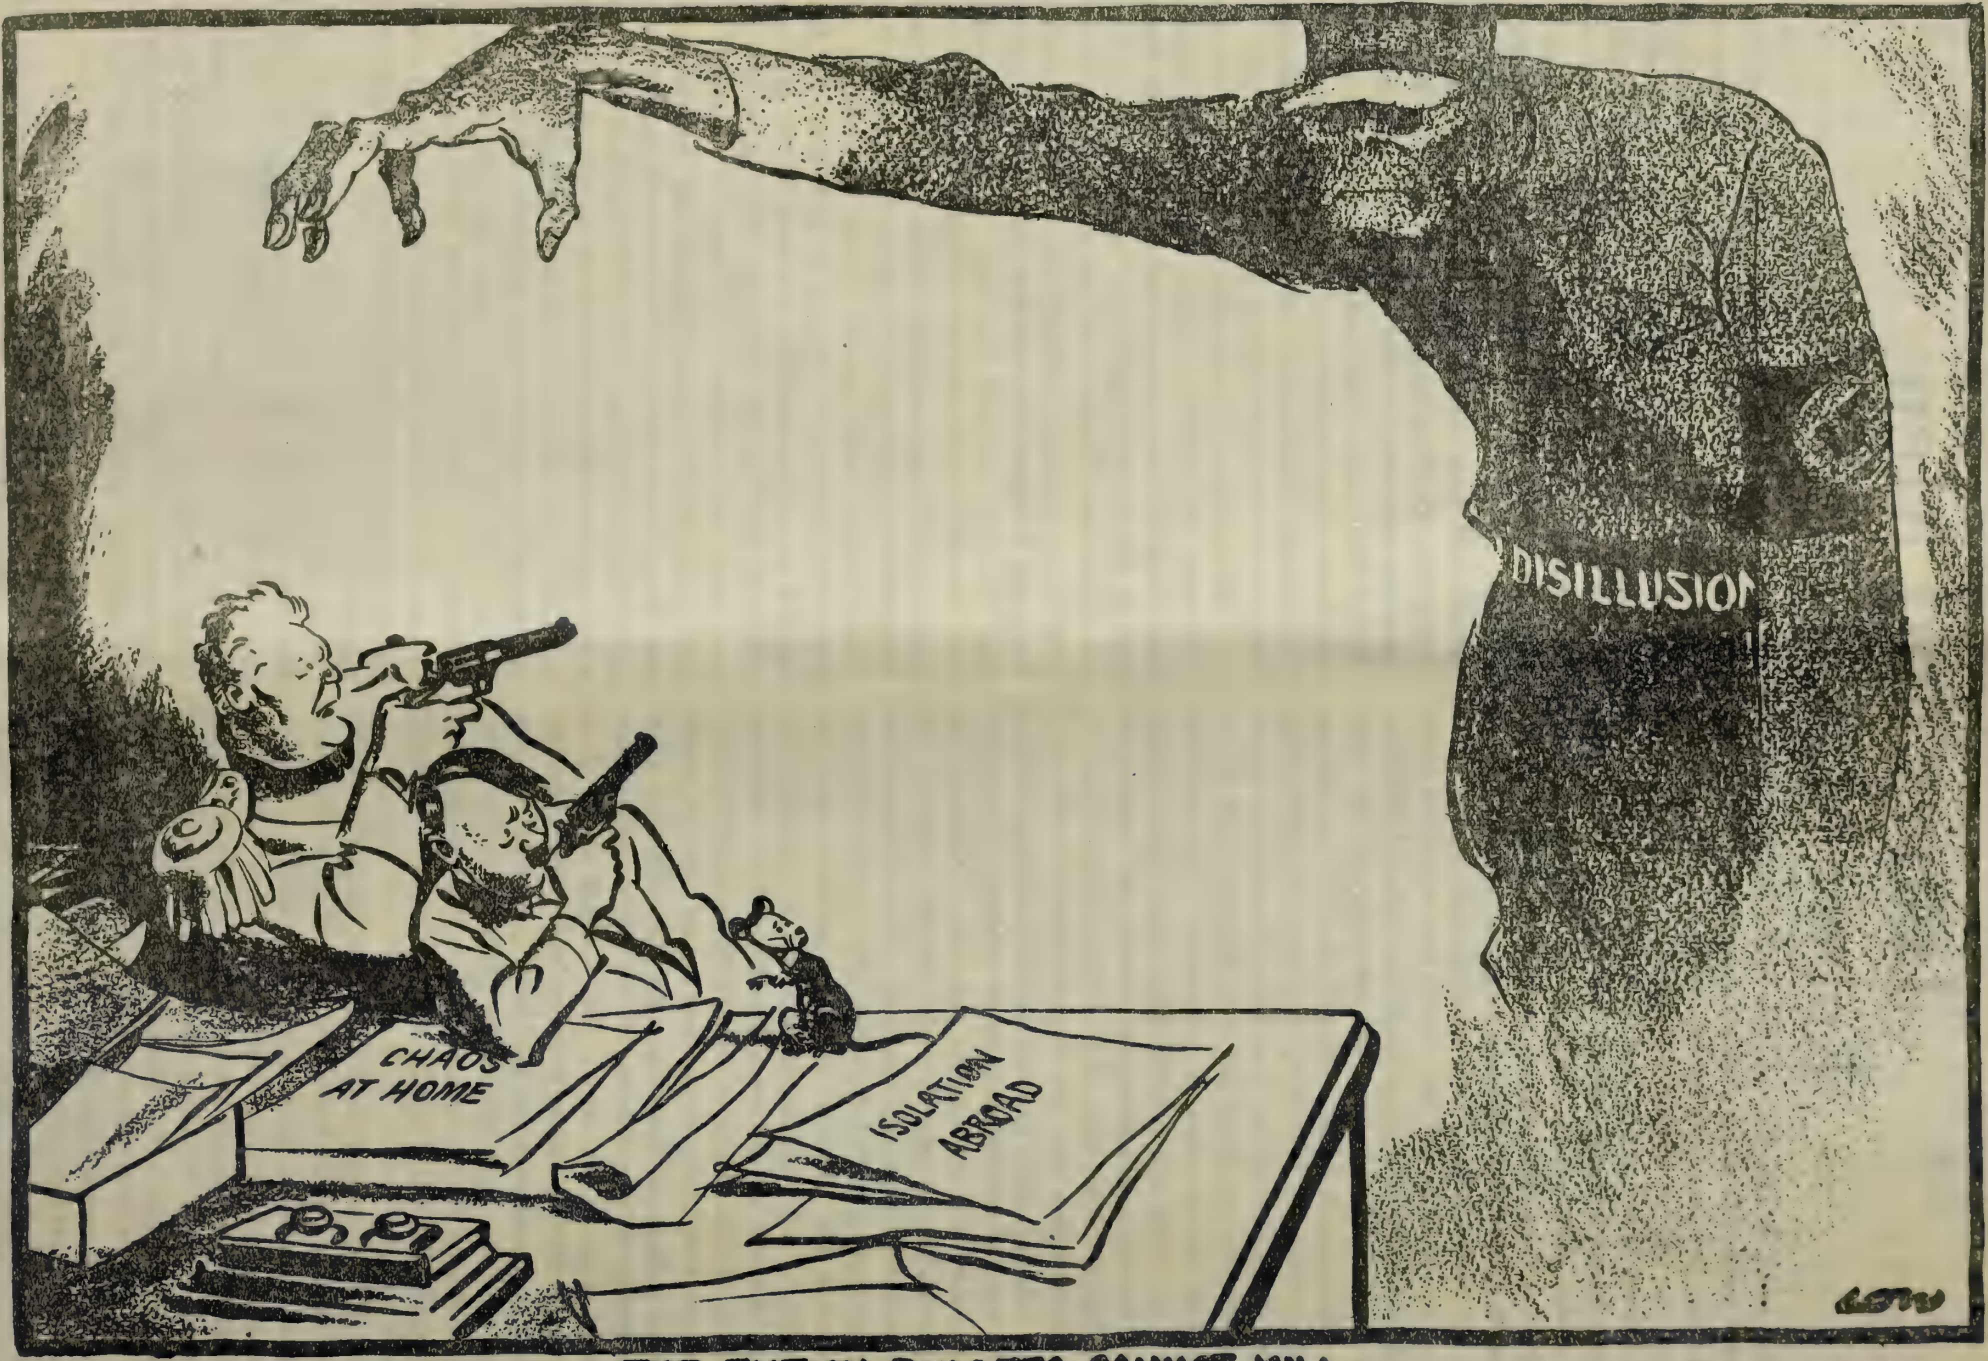
With this equipment he kept his feet squarely on the ground. The fact that he knew that he owed all to his name kept his head from being swollen. He at once began to read biography and works on government to widen his knowledge. Best of all he profited by the example of our senior Senator from New York, old Doctor Copeland, the radio-advertiser and "dinner-bell," who talks endlessly and says nothing, and others of this type. I think it was a full year before he made a real speech; he lost nothing and gained a lot by the delay. Having served for nearly two terms he is no longer the "baby" of the Senate and for years past older Senators have come in to listen to what he has to say. Not an inspired orator, his delivery has steadily improved, while his speeches are always well-documented and solid. In the committee-room, too, the other Senators have come to respect and admire him; he has warm friends among those who are diametrically opposed to his political views—friendships based upon regard for his earnestness and sincerity and his refusal to play the political game to his own advantage. In short, he has become more and more useful and valuable as his years of service have lengthened. He is now one of the veterans, for to his nine years in the Senate Chamber must be added all those years as his father's aide and assistant. No one knows Washington better. Others may be more brilliant, more spectacular, may make the first pages far oftener. This Senator is one of the steady, hardworking, creative men who form a choice minority in that body. No one calls him "wild-eyed," or sensational. He moves along a straight path, and he is lured neither to one side nor the other.

Hence it would be a public misfortune if the voters of Wisconsin should fail to return Senator LaFollette to the chamber which he ornaments and enriches. The difficulty is that, as the Nation's readers are aware, he has had to leave the Republican Party and set up a new standard to which honest men, disgusted with both the old parties, might repair. Long ago I urged this upon him; but, in his judgment, the time was not ripe until this year. It was an anachronism that he and his father and brother called themselves Republicans, even if they weakened the dose by calling themselves Progressive Republicans. Now the two brothers can no longer stomach what is left of the Republicans, and the Democratic Party of Wisconsin is no better. So they have decided to put themselves at the head of the growing radicalism of their State by creating a third party, the Progressives, under whose banner the Senator is running. He was quite ready for the change himself and realized some time ago that it was inevitable. Wisconsin is bitterly disappointed by many things in the NRA and its lack of enforcement, and the failure of Roosevelt to live up to the pledge to labor in Section 7-a of the recovery law. It is fed up, too, on the Democratic State Administration which is just another political gang. Of course, the Senator speaks favorably of the President and the New Deal, but, like many of us who do so, he makes his reservations and exceptions and records his dissents. The NRA does not go far enough for him and his followers.

Meanwhile his evolution is steady if slow. He still does not grasp the full significance of the part the tariffs have played in bringing about the political corruption, the privilege, the predatory wealth he has so long fought. But he will see that yet. Meanwhile I wish to help him to victory as far as I can by recording my complete faith in his rectitude, his unselfishness, his earnestness, and his devotion.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



DISILLUSION
CHAOS AT HOME
ISOLATION ABROAD
LOW

THE ENEMY BULLETS CANNOT KILL.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

August, 1914: a Symposium

They All Lied—and Europe Went to War

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

EUROPE, in that first half of 1914, was a serene and pleasant land compared to the Europe we are watching in 1934. It seemed so to me then, a student at the University of Freiburg, ecstatically tramping the hills of the Black Forest and reciting German poetry to the fir-trees; it seems so to me now, looking back at the structure of international intrigue which we now say "inevitably" led to the World War.

Crisis had followed crisis; yet the constantly prophesied world war had been evaded. There had been a dramatic moment in 1908, when Austria had annexed Bosnia and the Entente had threatened to veto the action, and had then backed down; there had been a Morocco crisis from which both Germany and France had emerged a little humiliated; Italy had actually waged a desultory war against Turkey in 1911; the First Balkan War had exploded in 1912, forcing Turkey to make peace with Italy; and the Second Balkan War had followed in the summer of 1913. Germany was building up her navy; France had installed three-year military service; "Berlin-to-Bagdad" and "Cape-to-Cairo" were inflammatory slogans. But the Powers, for all their hostilities, for all the inflamed passions which burst out in the newspapers, had contrived to "localize" the conflicts; world war had been staved off.

There were no unbalanced Hitlers in Europe in 1914, and no Mussolinis. There was a Kaiser in Germany, an emotional fussbudget with an exaggerated ego; but the records revealed since the war show that, silly as he was, he did not expect or want a world war. In Austria the chief of staff, Conrad von Hötzendorff, sincerely convinced that troublesome Serbia must be punished, was ready to take any risk to win his end. In France Poincaré as sincerely believed war ultimately inevitable; for years he had been working to cement his system of alliances in preparation for it, and thereby helped to make it genuinely inevitable. He had allies in the Russians Izvolsky and Sazonov; and there was a party in Petersburg which believed that a good, quick war would arouse pan-Slav patriotism and end revolt. In England the pious Sir Edward Grey wobbled, ready to go a little way in any direction, and was solemnly, virtuously ignorant what any step in any direction meant.

No one really knew what was happening, not even the statesmen. The British had been negotiating with Germany for a division of the Portuguese colonies and a settlement of the controversies centering about the Berlin-Bagdad Railway; the Germans thought that meant no British interference in a Continental war. But the British had also been permitting their naval and military authorities to conduct, with the French specialists, discussions as to common action in case of war, which naturally convinced the French that the British were definitely on their side. It was all very confidential; and a noble gentleman like Sir Edward Grey saw nothing wrong in concealing half his acts from half his colleagues, or in framing verbal formulas intended to deceive the sovereign British Parliament. "The Cabinet was never informed of these vital arrangements," says Lloyd George, one of the Cabinet members kept in ignorance, "until we were so deeply involved in the details of military and naval plans that it was too late to repudiate the inference."

"The nations slithered over the brink into the boiling cauldron of war without any trace of apprehension or dismay," says the same eloquent gentleman, looking back with less sense of personal responsibility than some of the more apologetic memoir-writers. Even in the last week of July, "I met no responsible Minister who was not convinced that, in one way or another, the calamity of a great European war would somehow be averted. . . . In looking back upon the incidents of those few eventful days . . . the impression left on my mind is one of utter chaos, confusion, feebleness, and futility, especially of a stubborn refusal to look at the rapidly approaching cataclysm."

If, looking back after twenty years, the individuals in charge of Europe's destiny in 1914 seem both less able and less deliberately wicked than they seemed, say, ten years ago, their role toward their own peoples appears no less despicable. No group of statesmen were honest to their own people. The German white, the British blue, the Russian orange, the Belgian grey, the French yellow, and the Austrian red books—all the rainbow books—were tissues of deliberate deception. They selected documents, omitted dangerous phrases, added words that were not in the originals, with as little sense of responsibility to the truth as the Hitler propaganda-sheets, which have replaced what was the German press, show today. They all lied.

The world press in 1934 is perhaps somewhat more healthily cynical toward the revelations of diplomatic policy vouchsafed the peoples by their government than in 1914. But not much. If there is no longer a Czarist government bribing, with the cynical connivance of the French Foreign Office, virtually the entire Paris press, there are international armament firms to take its place. And Hitler and Mussolini are undoubtedly less honest, more emotional, and more irresponsible today than were the Kaiser and Poincaré in 1914.

But there is one important, and really encouraging, difference between the Europe of 1914 and the Europe of 1934. There is one Great Power today which is bound by no alliances, secret or open, which is genuinely determined not to become involved in a world war which would spell defeat or set-back of a domestic program to which it is passionately devoted, a Power which all the other Great Powers in varying degrees hate and fear. Soviet Russia, of course. Soviet Russia is the chief check-rein on Western Europe today; the only encouraging feature in a sky which otherwise looks so much more troubled than the horizon of 1914. While Austria shivers under the impact of civil war, the Powers stand by, determined to prevent the re-formation of the old Austrian-German alliances—and with a respectful eye cocked in the direction of the most formidable of all European nations. In July, 1914, when Messrs. Feiler and Prévost, Read and Stearns were surveying their Europe, they had no slightest inkling of the portent to the East.

A Restless London

By LESLIE READ

MANY accounts have been written of the significant events of 1914—the comings and goings of ambassadors, the grave speeches, the fateful telegrams flashing across Europe through the hot July nights, the mobilizations, and so on. But much less has been written of the trivia of that year.

The London of 1914 is now an almost forgotten city, but to me—a young man newly arrived from what was then known as "the Colonies"—it was a strange and exciting revelation. The reason for the strangeness, of course, was obvious, but the excitement, I believe, was felt by maturer and more sophisticated persons. Almost every day a new sensation seized the interest of the public, and it is curious and significant to recall how many of these sensations, or pseudo-sensations, were used by the press to arouse and flatter the patriotism of the British public.

In May, for example, the German steamer Vaterland set out on her maiden voyage to New York, where she had considerable trouble in docking. The British Aquitania, likewise on her maiden voyage, had no difficulty whatever in New York, and so the press excelled itself in congratulations over this latest proof of Britannia's command of the seas.

At that time Germany was less sensational than Ireland, but nevertheless the existence of the German menace had been thoroughly inculcated into the consciousness of the British public, and had percolated even to the schoolboy level. While my elders had been stirred with pictures of the coming German invasion such as those contained in the play "An Englishman's Home" and Erskine Childers's novel "The Riddle of the Sands" (incidentally one of the best adventure stories ever written), my generation had revelled in horrifying stories like "The Swoop of the Eagle," a serial which ran in a very popular magazine. The end of the story, I recall, somewhat daringly described the meeting between the king and his prisoner the Kaiser after the defeat of the invasion. " 'Cousin,' the Kaiser began with an ingratiating smile. 'Sir, you have forfeited your claim to that title,' the king interrupted sternly. . . ."

But for the most part Germany meant nothing more than a vague scare, commercial travelers, and itinerant bands. Flying provided a minor sensation that summer. An odd airplane or two over the Hendon flying field invariably drew a crowd, and somebody was always flying, or trying to fly, round Great Britain. As often as not the aeronaut broke his neck, but then he was usually a Continental. On Saturday afternoons a number of large yellow balloons drifted over London, but they were too ordinary to provide any excitement.

Indeed the important things were Ireland, the suffragettes, and sport. Nobody, young or old, could escape Ireland. The names of Carson, Redmond, Bonar Law, and "F. E." were shouted from every newspaper billboard. I had difficulty in discovering what it was all about and just as I was beginning to solve the riddle a new factor appeared. This was described as the "Curragh Incident," and in blunt English it meant nothing more or less than a mutiny in the army. That was too much for me, for I knew that a British soldier (1) did or died, (2) was equal to innumerable Frenchmen, (3) thundered into the jaws of death without reasoning why, but never, never disobeyed an order.

The suffragettes, on the other hand, were simpler. In a sweets shop one day I saw a row of hideous dolls, dressed in felt hats, white blouses, and check tweed skirts. At their feet was a card with the words, "We are the suffragettes. Votes for women." In short, they looked very much as the Times described them: "Fanatical and irresponsible creatures who did their own cause nothing but harm." The idea of slashing a beautiful painting shocked me as much then as now, however worthy the cause of the slasher might be, but later when I chanced to see a policeman dragging away a woman, who looked no less a lady than my own mother despite her bleeding face, and heard her jeered at as a suffragette, it illogically flashed into my young head that there must be more to these "fanatical creatures" than the mutilation of the Rokeby Venus or the burning of country houses.

But as for sport, a child could understand that—and did. Even now I doubt whether all the post-war sporting booms of one kind or another ever equalled the sheer craziness of that era. It was not necessary in that year for the press to whip up sporting excitement; the public did it themselves. Sir Thomas Lipton's yacht Shamrock IV, which was "certain" to bring back the America's Cup, became almost a symbol of imperial greatness. As regards polo, one Sunday morning from the top of a bus I read a newspaper poster roaring of "England's Smashing Polo Victory," and although I did not know whom we had "smashed" I was patriotically elated. There was cricket galore, there was lawn tennis, and above all there was boxing. Another Sunday morning in the park I was in the midst of a sudden rising of men and shutting of ladies' parasols to behold the awful progress of a huge and resplendent Negro, who was accompanied by a rather frightened-looking white woman. There was a murmur as the legendary name was pronounced, "Jack Johnson." But it was not so much the heavyweight champion of the world, who made boxing what it was, as the French "White Hope," Georges Carpentier. Nobody who wants to give a true impression of the London of 1914 can omit a reference to the French boxer. I believe in France he was vaguely confused with Joan of Arc, and in England he was at least a national character. As Carpentier had recently disposed of the British champion in very few seconds, the honor of England demanded that Carpentier himself should be humbled. Accordingly, amidst immense excitement a British amateur boxer went over to Paris, and there in a secret rendezvous did in fact hold off the Frenchman longer than had the British professional champion. The amateur, who remained conscious, I believe, well into the third minute of the first round, was carried shoulder high on his triumphant return. But Carpentier himself was popular (was not France somehow vaguely sworn to friendship with us?), and so when he came to London about the middle of July to fight the American, Gunboat Smith, he too had a passionate welcome at Charing Cross. Even the Times, which its noble and magnanimous owner had recently placed within the reach of all by reducing its price to one penny, admitted that "London had gone fight mad." Other papers shrieked of "the climax in the boxing boom," hawkers sold Carpentier's picture in the streets, and shortly the whole thing was described as a "fiasco." Mr. Smith had punched, or was alleged to have punched, M. Carpentier while the latter was on the floor, and consequently the fight was awarded to the Frenchman on a foul. Like millions of my countrymen, I anxiously awaited the exhibition of the film to decide whether or no Carpentier had in fact been fouled. The capital was divided into two camps over that historic punch, and the controversy lasted for the greater part of the twenty-odd days which remained of pre-war England.

Apropos of the cinema I recall seeing about this time what must have been a very early example of a talking picture. It was short, I believe it was in color, and it showed a number of young men singing to the accompaniment of a banjo. Some of the popular plays of the summer were "Potash and Perlmutter," "The Belle of New York," "Broadway Jones," and "Kismet." My family went more often to Covent Garden, and I constantly heard the name of Caruso.

As for London's outward appearance, the women wore long tight dresses and huge hats, and many of the men wore straw boaters. It was still possible to find a horse bus in South London, and it was not possible to avoid drunken people in any part of London. After twenty years I retain a clear picture of the horrible junction of the Harrow and Edgware roads one Saturday night with a screaming mob of drunken women, most of them pushing perambulators.

But at about the time the newspaper posters found a new sensation in the trial of a certain Mme. Caillaux, and the King was once more being worried by the Irish business, my parents unexpectedly returned from the Continent and said there was going to be a war. Carpentier and his foul suddenly—and disappointingly—yielded place to a thing then known as "Servia." On a Saturday morning—it must have been August 1—I went to the City with my father, and stood near the Exchange watching a long queue of people outside the bank while all about were excited murmurs of "a run on the bank." The following day I was in Whitehall amid a great crowd which had assembled to watch the arrival of Ministers for a Cabinet meeting—on Sunday! Of the Monday I remember nothing whatever, but on Tuesday afternoon, August 4, I was playing a little friendly cricket with some young cousins and others on a private lawn. Near by were a group of people, mostly friends of my parents, who were talking with much animation and excitement. They were presently joined by a young man known to me as "Archy." I immediately left the field to induce Archy to join the game. Besides being a good bat he was a painter, and it seemed that he had just arrived home from the Continent, where he had been painting at a town called Ypres. Like the good fellow he was, Archy came and played with us. Next day he came along and told us gleefully that "he had taken the King's shilling."

We were immensely excited. It was August 5, and we were at war. Britannia ruled the waves, the Irish had shaken hands, gallant little Belgium (or Servia?) had defied the world's greatest bully, we yelled "Vive la France!" (and Carpentier!), and "God save the King" above all. The Times, with commendable promptitude, was good enough to begin a series of articles on "How to Be Useful in War Time," and just seven months later my friend Archy was blown to pieces—oddly enough at the town of Ypres.

Paris Settles to a Siege

By JEAN PREVOST

On that particular August 1 one might well wonder what the people of Paris were going to do. Where government and generals were concerned it was a satiric and mocking people; it hissed parades and it loved peace. The orator that it most liked to hear was Jaurès, the Socialist and pacifist, and Jaurès was assassinated July 31. Germany was already in a state of siege. According to the calculations of the military chiefs, 10 per cent of the potential soldiers was expected to desert in case of French mobilization.

During the day two posters covered the walls; the first denounced the murder of Jaurès and declared: "The assassin will be punished." The other poster, appearing toward evening, was the order for general mobilization.

The Parisians snatched the morning and evening papers; crowds stood in front of the offices of the important ones (especially that of the Matin on the Boulevard Poissonnière). The emotion was so great that the police had to forbid wandering newssellers to shout the news. A government proclamation declared: "Mobilization is not war," but that very evening the crowd, glancing at the papers, spread instantaneously throughout the city the news of the declaration of war between Germany and Russia; everyone was convinced that a general war would follow. Though the newspapers tried to veil and minimize it, a terrible apprehension aggravated the fever: England had not yet announced her decision. The next morning it was learned that the first German patrols had entered French territory—in the zone ten kilometers wide left unoccupied by the French troops. The evening papers published the news that German troops had entered Luxembourg.

Now came the first day of mobilization. The average number of deserters was not more than one in seventy-seven instead of one in ten. The crowd began to surge toward the Gare de L'Est; those who were not accompanying mobilized members of their family got provisions which they distributed to strangers. That day and the days following, the population amiably helped in requisitioning trucks and drivers; the theaters contributed the military costumes of their supers to dress the auto drivers and impromptu soldiers. The equipment and personnel of the railroads were insufficient to move the troops. There was also some apprehension concerning the attitude of railroad employees who, during the last forty years, had played a large part in general strikes. But the mechanics and engineers disposed of all initial difficulties by working forty-eight to seventy-two hours at a stretch.

On August 3, the windows of the German Embassy were broken and Germany's declaration of war came at 6:45. The public, however, still did not know that Berlin had demanded the return of Toul and Verdun as guaranties of French neutrality. The Ambassador, de Schoen, who was taken to Switzerland in a private car, had not transmitted this demand, but the cause of the declaration (French airplanes over Nuremberg) drove the crowd into a fury.

On the morning of August 4 a great wave of joy broke over the city again: England entered the war.

Compulsory circulation of bank notes had been declared; to Parisians, accustomed to gold and silver as the only form of money, were distributed the first "coupures" of ten francs; they were accepted without dispute. A great many women, disturbed and remembering the siege of 1870 with its famine, hastily laid in provisions of rice, flour, and canned goods: this panic did not last. The Parisians readily became accustomed to receiving two official communiqués, one in the morning, one in the evening; the circulation of the evening papers, which had been small for fifteen years (except when some important trial was on), grew greatly and continued to prosper throughout the war.

From this moment on Paris unanimously followed the movement of the army. The government, making a gesture of confidence, burned the list of suspects; revolutionists showed themselves the most enthusiastic patriots. A great wave of joy greeted the first success of France in Lorraine—soon followed, alas, by a defeat the circumstances of which were not well understood. The invasion of Belgium aroused, during the first few days, more indignation than fear; Parisians grew enthusiastic over the resistance of Liège. But on August 15 commenced a great trial for Paris, harder to bear because the first enthusiasm had been so great.

The refugees from Belgium and from the Ardenne commenced to cross Paris. This reflux of peoples was a clear evidence of the invasion. But above all, the refugees, worn out with fatigue, terrified (especially the Belgians who have not the tradition of 1870) by the violence of the invasian, spread rumors and thus magnified the legend of German atrocities.

Between August 24 and the end of the month, half a million Parisians, largely women and children, left the city. Nevertheless the morale of the rest of the population remained firm. Hope was based partly on a false idea: that of the invincible power of the Russian army, the "steam roller" as the newspapers called it, which was bound to overwhelm Germany in the east; but it was supported, besides, by a very sensible trust in England. On the other hand it was known that the French flanks had been turned; nevertheless people were convinced that this yielding was not defeat. The first bombardments from German airplanes, which cut off the leg of a little girl, had been received with anger but also with curiosity; the police were obliged to advise against going into the street or climbing onto the roofs when the alarm was given.

On August 26, Gallieni was named military governor of Paris. At this moment Paris expected a siege; the General wrote in his diary: "No provisions, no munitions, no soldiers, and in eight days we may have the German cavalry before Paris." But Gallieni, the same day, went to work; if the last days of the month were to bring Parisians the worst tidings of the entire campaign, nevertheless their morale rose high.

On August 30 the rumor spread that a battle had been won at Guise (it was this one which enabled the French troops to straighten their lines). Confidence in the French cannon, the seventy-five, began to counter-balance the alarm which had been created by the heavy German cannon, victors at Liège and capable of crushing Paris. In addition, Gallieni mobilized all the resources of Paris as a fortified city; light fortifications would prevent that penetration which took place at Liège; trenches would reinforce the antiquated fortifications of Paris.

That habitual amusement of Parisians, a change in ministry, at this moment passed almost unperceived. Though Millerand had been attacked by the extreme right and the extreme left, his reputation for energy made him welcome at this moment. Nevertheless, neither the army nor the government seemed to have confidence in Paris. On August 25 the quartermaster-general contemplated a retreat to the Loire; during the last days of the month the government prepared to move and organized an evacuation of the Banque de France and the museums. Nevertheless the terrible communiqué ending "our positions remain the same from the Somme to the Vosges" created no panic in Paris. If the American ambassador prepared posters to protect Americans from menaces and requisitions, if a prefect of the police gone mad had prepared arm bands in German colors for the policemen, the city seemed to have received too much bad news to be troubled by more. It considered itself completely mobilized for the care of the wounded and for the spontaneous reprovisioning of troops in transit. On the thirty-first Paris did not yet know that the German right-wing was moving toward the east; in foreign countries the fall of Paris was regarded as inevitable. The city itself, nevertheless, was not disturbed; it was ready, the following week, more completely than it had been three weeks before, to cooperate with its garrison in preparing for a victorious offensive. Paris had removed its mask and taken on the qualities of the French peasant: patience, tenacity, silence.

Germany at a Low Ebb

By ARTHUR FEILER

GERMANY entered 1914 in a seedy mood. The preceding year had produced ostentatious jubilees—the hundredth anniversary of the war of liberation against Napoleon and the twenty-fifth anniversary of Wilhelm II's accession to the throne. These festivals were pompous and mechanical, as all festivals were during the reign of this monarch—an abundance of gala uniforms and bombastic orations; the emperor, surrounded by his paladins, wearing his cuirass and his silver helmet with the eagle on its top. But in the words of a contemporary writer, "there was no fire flying through the streets, no contagious gladness among the people in the streets, the spirit stopped and we remained poor." Moreover, it was during these months of officially prescribed happiness that the impoverishment of Germany's political institutions was once more strikingly revealed. The emperor, who had so often excited public opinion by his irresponsible speeches, once again antagonized the people. In an agricultural meeting he introduced himself as an agriculturist, delivering a talk in which he proudly recorded the magnificent achievements in a manor owned by him in Pomerania. He had expelled an incapable tenant; he had begun to cultivate a quite unknown variety of rye with marvelous results; now all the farmers of this province were scrambling for his rye seeds in order to increase their harvest. So he said. As a matter of fact the story was nothing but bluff. Every sentence was wrong. The famous new kind of rye had been cultivated throughout the province for twenty years. The contemptible tenant was a highly esteemed leader among the farmers of the community. And he had not been expelled but had gone to court to fight for his tenancy and had returned victorious. Germany laughed, but the laughter was bitter and full of humiliation.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Also the emperor's eldest son, at that time thirty-two years of age and already flattered by special groups as "the Emperor of the Future," began to compete with his father in such extravagances. He publicly applauded pan-German propagandists, even when the responsible German government was strongly opposed to their aspirations. During the centenary he compelled the Magistrate of Breslau (the capital of Silesia) to stop the presentation of a play written by Gerhart Hauptmann, at that time Germany's most famous poet, because this play gave the honor for the liberation of 1813 not so much to the princes as to the German people. And when at the end of 1913 the Zabern case excited Germany, he exhibited his martial feeling by sending a provocative telegram to the general involved. This Zabern case was itself one of the significant events of that time. A young lieutenant in a small Alsatian garrison attacked a civilian who he believed had insulted his uniform. He was backed by his superiors. From this incident developed a serious struggle between the military and the civilian administrations, revealing the whole unsolved problem of the army as a state within a state.

Because of this struggle the German Reichstag, half a year before the war, voted lack of confidence in the government, with a majority composed of the parties of the left together with the Catholic party. But this procedure only demonstrated the inadequacy of parliamentary rights in Germany. The imperial government did not even consider resigning. It depended on the confidence of the monarch, not of the parliament. The government was backed by the Prussian Diet, where the old Prussian conservatives, led by the big estate-owners, represented the real ruling classes, whose power was based on the three-class franchise which had proved impossible to abolish in spite of all attempts. Moreover, the opposition majority in the Reichstag wanted only to demonstrate, not to rule. It was satisfied by its own courageous vote, and did not expect anything serious to come of it. The same was true of the general political mood. There was a lot of criticism in the press, in public meetings, in private circles. Jokes about the emperor circulated even in the highest ranks of society. Sometimes a courageous speaker, a courageous writer, displayed the emptiness under the splendid surface, and sometimes such a disclosure succeeded in making an impression, at least for a time. But generally all this criticism consisted merely of talk.

This was especially true among the bourgeoisie. The more progressive part of it was at that time organized in the so-called "Hansabund," and the president of this organization very aptly characterized the prevailing mood as one of "comfortable despair." There was, indeed, a kind of despair in this urban middle-class of manufacturers, bankers, overseas merchants, and so on. They regarded the great German economic development of the past decades as their accomplishment, and with sulky discontent they saw that their rapidly growing importance in German economic life brought with it no increase in political influence, that for the old rural aristocracy even the biggest captain of industry remained the "Industrie-Klempner." But this despair was entirely comfortable. It was accompanied by the satisfaction of growing profits, of growing wealth, of growing economic power in the growing fields of economic activity. Satisfied in this way the well-to-do middle class could easily put up with their political insignificance.

Even in the labor movement this mood became more and more prevalent. The Social-Democratic Party and its trade unions increased immensely in membership—the elections of 1912 brought 110 deputies of this party into the Reichstag—but the revisionist element overwhelmed more and more the original revolutionary idea. Eventually the party grew content to avert the worst things, to attain step by step a little progress for the workers and help them to get their part of the general prosperity. And even this became increasingly difficult. At the peak of the business cycle the masses of the employees suffered more from the high prices of commodities, especially food, than they enjoyed from the nominal increase in their wages and salaries. In 1913-1914 a depression set in, but the decline remained relatively small.

During these last peace years in Germany there were some tendencies in the direction of a new attitude toward life. The feminist movement tried "to secure to the woman the free development of all her forces and her full participation in the cultural life." The youth movement, setting in at that time and making evident the separation of the generations, claimed for the younger generation the right of developing their own lives in their own way, not bound by the conventions, the rules, the forms of life of the older generation. And this was allied with new forms and methods in education, represented especially by the new movement of the Landerziehungsheime. All these movements were more or less individualistic in their roots, aiming at a greater freedom, a freer development for the individual. But at the same time there was a deep desire, wide-spread and strengthened by the memory of 1813, not to remain permanently a single individual, but to be one of a united people.

Such was the situation in Germany when war broke out. Germany had increased her army in 1913 with enormous expenditures, just as in the same year France had prolonged military service from two to three years. There was a pan-German nationalistic agitation in Germany, just as there were imperialistic and nationalistic agitations in other countries. But also in Germany as well as in other countries many of the best men and women were fighting against the brutal senselessness of war, fighting for a common understanding of the peoples and for peace. In the early summer of 1914 nobody in Germany believed that war was possible, nobody acknowledged that war was imminent. Even after the murder of Sarajevo it was weeks before the German people realized the impending catastrophe.

All this is now twenty years behind. War went through the world, changing the features of the nations, destroying men and material wealth in unthinkable measures, degrading humanity, leaving consequences still unsolved. For Germany these twenty years have been one coherent sequence of passion—the war, the defeat, the inflation, the economic crisis, the National Socialist revolution. Only the few years from 1925 to 1928 gave a little rest to the tormented people. This fact must be borne in mind in order to understand how far back pre-war Germany is from the Germany of today, so far back that actually it is difficult to remember these old events. Nevertheless, even these old forgotten times held some of the roots for what has happened since in Germany. Now even after these terrible twenty years the German passion is not yet ended. There is at least a lesson to be learned from that experience.

America Walks by Itself

By HAROLD E. STEARNS

WELL, I also remember pretty vividly July 1, 1914—just twenty years ago. I was a young man, only a year out of Harvard, and I was on the ocean going towards England and France for my first trip abroad. The fox-trot, the "X-ray skirt," and the music of "Sari" were the thrills of a New York then reading the satire of Don Marquis, under the caption of The Almost Perfect State in the Evening Sun, while Doris Keane in Edward Sheldon's "Romance" represented the last word in histrionic ability, unless it was John Drew in W. Somerset Maugham's "Jack Straw" or Ethel Barrymore in the same prolific playwright's "Lady Frederick." The general intellectual and social mood was that of an almost hysterical optimism and self-assurance. Progress and continued prosperity were accepted as axioms; dire poverty had been abolished; war—an historical anachronism in that enlightened age, we were told—was swiftly being so; our present was amusing, and our future glorious. To be "liberal" meant in essence to be a person of good-will, and (outside, perhaps, the few spectacular "robber barons," as Mr. Josephson has termed them, whom we would have missed had they not been there, if only because they were a foil to the otherwise almost universal mood of social service) pretty much everybody was precisely such a person.

It seems difficult to believe now, but the prevalent popular notions about Europe were tinged with an amiable contempt, a kind of carry-over of the laughable experiences of Mark Twain with a French barber, such as he describes in "Innocents Abroad." From the then American point of view, European militarism was simply barbarism—a picturesque barbarism, if you wish, but a real barbarism nonetheless. We were enlightened; we knew the blessings of peace (the Civil War did not count, of course; that was our own private quarrel); we should never have arrogant officers, conscription, and the drill-sergeant; we had cast the temptations of imperialism far from us—did not Cuba prove it? Of course the monarchist, Czarist, and peasant-minded European populations might be expected still to linger in the shadows of superstition—for us, the wide open spaces, two oceans which guaranteed us immunity from invasion, and a free democratic spirit that would never tolerate tyranny or "the man on horseback." Besides, we were having pretty good luck with our democratic experiment, not merely politically but economically and scientifically. (Though we were still, to be sure, a bit self-conscious about our own literary and artistic efforts; still, that did not count for much—we could always import that, when necessary; we could even buy a whole castle, stone for stone, as one ambitious and successful merchant in actual fact did.) Europe could "stew in her own juice"—that was the mood then, precisely as it is a mood recommended on a large scale today by a not unfamiliar popular publicist.

That I do not exaggerate (indeed, almost understate) will be readily agreed to by anyone who happened, as I did, to be "caught" in Europe when the war came. The instinctive turning homeward was carried out not merely with a sense of relief that we were not involved—it was much deeper than that, I think. It was the conviction that we could not be involved. We were "different"; we were pacifically-minded; we were Americans. And for the first time many people became almost sentimentally aware of that last truism. It is nowadays almost a cliché to remark—I have been guilty of saying it myself—that we became a nation in 1917, when the first boat-load of "our boys" sailed for "over there." But if we must set a date for this new, post-Civil-War nationalistic self-consciousness, I think a better one would be an earlier one, that of August, 1914, when Europe gave us a dramatic demonstration that she was still the Old World—and we, of course, the New. During those historically momentous last five months of 1914 not merely were we proud of our isolation but we were, too, relieved because of it. Gladly we snuggled in our new-found protective nationalistic blanket of isolation; with new-found historical fervor we re-read Washington's advice about "entangling alliances," and from a popular point of view our early neutrality was instinctive and honest, so that we did not regard it as at all surprising when President Wilson asked us to be neutral not merely in overt acts, but in thought as well. The earlier Roosevelt might affect to despise this pussy-footing, but if one looks at the record today, "Teddy's" detestation of a Wilsonian peace at almost any price was of much later growth, that is to say, it was a subsequent political hot-house plant rather than any flower of the native American prairie. Go back and read the headlines of those months of 1914 in the newspaper files—the tone was of a great show in a lunatic asylum; and I shall never forget a newsboy crying out at five-thirty of a late September afternoon, 1914, in Times Square, "Extra! Giants and Germans lose! Extra!"

But I remember even more vividly the Saturday afternoon in Paris, only a few weeks before, when the Order of General Mobilization was posted up all over the city at four o'clock in the afternoon. I had arrived in Paris (and my first trip to the Continent, too!) Thursday afternoon from Ostend, where I had spent a couple of days with Walter Lippmann. That evening Jaurès was assassinated, and—my first evening in Paris—I went through the streets of the city joining with the crowds that were demonstrating and singing the "Internationale." It had looked as if the pacifist and working-class forces might stop the war—re-read Brand Whitlock to obtain an idea of how strong the movement was in Belgium, too. All day Friday was one of tension, tremendous heat, and wild rumors. Saturday at noon I went out to the Pavillon Bleu at Saint-Cloud, coming back by one of the little Seine river boats, alighting at the Concorde Station I should say around quarter past four. I walked up the Rue Royale and followed a crowd to the outside of a small postoffice building on the walls of which was posted up that fatal "Order of General Mobilization of the Armies of the Land, the Sea, and the Air." It was war! I knew it, despite the phrase towards the end, which said, "Concitoyens, n'oubliez pas, la mobilisation n'est pas la guerre." But all around me I heard the phrase I have never since forgotten: "Ça y est! ça y est!"

The newspaper stories from Paris that day were hysterical. But the citizens were not—never let anyone persuade you of that. There were "demonstrations" again that night—patriotic ones this time, with "C'est Alsace et la Lorraine" sung to the plaintive tune of "Under the Bridges of Paris"—but they were sad and subdued "demonstrations." There was a sense of relief from long waiting and tension, but there was no hilarity, no joy. On street-corners you saw fathers kissing their sons goodbye; the railroad stations were jammed, of course, but I didn't hear much singing. You felt that these people knew what this war meant—death for many of them, perhaps death to the whole civilization they had learned to love. I was glad to get out of Paris the next day; for once in my life I was glad to set foot on English soil on Monday morning, August 3. I had talked with people—mostly English, with a sprinkling of rather hysterical Americans—both on the train from Paris to Dieppe, on the crowded Channel boat, and on the train going up to London. For most of them it was like the end of the world, and I think they meant that, too. There was a sense of foreboding and disaster.

That is why the next day—or rather the next evening, for the ultimatum to Germany expired at 11 o'clock (and newsboys ran through the streets of London shouting, "England at War with Germany")—I was not able to understand the curious quality of the English "demonstration." People in the National Liberal Club, of course, sat around weeping and wondering—but why didn't they go into the streets? For, quite unlike Paris, London was gay and drunken and festival-like that evening of August 4, 1914. Taxicabs would scoot down Charing Cross Road, girls on the roof, with their dresses above their knees, singing. I was a young man; I had only read about "Mafeking Night." I thought the demonstration—especially its insane, carnival-like quality—was just another proof of English "insularity," and perhaps I was right. For the very next day, all over London, blossomed forth those signs that a bit later were to seem so ironical: "Business as Usual."

If the war had been a short one—as everybody I then talked with in London either believed, or wanted to believe—those signs might have later been solemnly brought forward by historians as proofs of the fact that the English do not easily become rattled, instead of being cited, as now, as confirmations of obtuseness. But at the time they really expressed something else—the deep desire for stability, for an orderly world, where wars were merely "continental adventures," designed to preserve the balance of power. Certainly the bulk of French people didn't want any war in 1914—the way they acted in Paris convinced me of it. Certainly the bulk of English people wanted to ignore the war in 1914—the way they acted in London (remember always I am speaking of before the Battle of the Marne) convinced me of it. How the Germans felt, I don't know; as Mr. Will Rogers says, "I only know what I read in the papers." But it struck me as strange and hateful—I remember a wave of helpless rage that flooded over me a Sunday or two later at Saint Albans, where I saw youngsters drilling—that the political and international structure of the civilized world was such that two normally pacific nations could be caught in the toils of a great war, when I knew that the ordinary citizen in both countries had as much immediate interest in the quarrel as he had in that of the bloody differences between two brigands in Corsica.

New Deal Balance Sheet

By FREDERICK R. BARKLEY

Washington, July 27

EVEN before he was nominated, although the incident seemed generally overlooked at the time, President Roosevelt had voiced an insistence on the redistribution of the national income which heartened those grown weary over talk of prosperity reappearing around that still unlocated corner. In a speech at Oglethorpe University in Georgia in which he referred to the failure of wages during the boom period to "rise proportionately to the reward of capital," he said specifically that the need was for "a wiser, more equitable distribution of the national income."

Any idea that this was only campaign palaver—for that thought had found lodgment even in the minds of some captains of industry—should have been dispelled when the President spoke out as recently as last March 5, a year after his inauguration. Then, extemporaneously addressing several hundred unenthusiastic code-authority officials summoned to Washington by General Johnson, he was still more specific.

"What we seek," he said, "is a balance in our economic system—balance between agriculture and industry and balance between the wage earner, the employer, and the consumer. . . . The methods and details of that reorganization [of "a disintegrating system of production and exchange"] may and will change from year to year, but it is very certain that the American people understand that the purpose of the reorganization was not only to bring back prosperity. . . . The reorganization must be permanent for all the rest of our lives, so that never again will we permit the social conditions which allowed vast sections of our population to exist in an un-American way, which allowed a maldistribution of wealth and power."

This was even more heartening, and it gave validity to the Oglethorpe diagnosis of 1933. But were these promises fulfilled? The first great hope, of course, was from the NRA, probably largely as a result of the unrivalled ballyhoo which General Johnson built up around that mushroom organization. The ballyhoo may have been of some psychological benefit—there had to be some quick tricks while possibly sounder plans were being studied—but if the NRA has transferred any current income from those who have too much to those who have too little no one has ever collated the figures or raised any paeans about it. Probably it has been more successful in "sharing the work" than the still-born Hoover-

Teagle scheme, and that, in a day of desperation, was something. Probably it set effective wage minima in certain industries, although such shockingly low ones that the mind sickens in contemplating them. Probably it gave some encouragement to labor to go out and try to beat wages higher than these minima out of their employers, but when one reads of the recent action in the Harriman mills case the encouragement pretty well disappears. In sum, the NRA's accomplishments seem to have been to create higher prices to go with allegedly higher wages, with a dubious prospect that the wages will ever catch up with the prices, let alone pass them. The General called on God to inspire the employers to keep prices down, but not with much success.

The AAA, brought into being at about the same time but with much less fanfare, has been more successful. According to the latest figures, it has collected $385,000,000 in processing taxes, of which something more than $200,000,000 already has gone to the farmers in benefit payments, land rentals, and surplus purchases. The curtailment of production coupled with these payments undoubtedly has played a part, too, in bringing higher crop prices. Total farm income, including the benefit payments, has increased 25 per cent, or at the rate of a billion-and-a-half dollars, in the last year. Much of this increase naturally has come from increased consumer purchasing power, some probably from depreciating the dollar. The rest represents real "redistribution." But when it is noted that the index of farm purchasing power—which does not include the benefit payments—has risen only one point since June, 1933, it can be seen that the "redistribution" is limited pretty much to that paltry $200,000,000 in benefit cash. The farmer is still getting a far smaller return than he did twenty years ago. And the benefit cash—despite the wails of the processors—is obviously coming mostly out of the pockets of the small wage earners who need real "redistribution" nearly as much as the farmers do. Certainly no one on the heavy side of the unbalanced system Mr. Roosevelt referred to is giving up in these processing taxes any appreciable amount of income.

Scraping around among other New Deal agencies produces a few more figures, but not many. A billion dollars' worth of farm mortgages have been refinanced under the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act at an estimated saving to farmers of $15,000,000 a year in interest. Several million more has been saved the farmers, the Farm Credit Administration experts believe, through additional legislation requiring reduced interest rates on other farm mortgages, and through the fact that Government-refinanced mortgages do not have to be renewed every few years at a 1 or 2 per cent premium—a hoary scheme for jacking up the legal interest rate. The New Dealers have also induced farm-mortgage holders to scale down mortgages to the amount of $40,000,000—another pittance to be added to the right side of the redistribution ledger. They believe, too, that the Government's lower rates have compelled private mortgage lenders to cut their demands, although perhaps they would have had to anyway.

Another $15,000,000 in interest, plus unestimated savings in mortgage-renewal charges, has been saved urban home owners by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, its experts believe. They also think that government competition has induced private lenders to reduce their charges to some extent. Another pittance for the right side of the books.

This $270,000,000 about exhausts the figures, although there are some more items—encouraging in their trend but dubious in their weight—which may be jotted down in the redistribution ledger. The Securities and Stock Exchange acts, for example, may result in preventing the transfer of some of the income of small investors from their own pockets to those of sundry brokers, speculators, and promoters—if the "investors" do not find new wheels on which to stake their little surpluses. The Tariff Trading Act may bring the reduction of a few tariff gouges, although it is hardly safe to start spending the possible savings. The first hearing on a trade treaty last week produced a modicum of improvement in tariff-making procedure. The Civilian Conservation Corps, if made permanent, should do something in transferring to jobless youth some income which it is hoped will come partly out of great fortunes made in looting the public domain the corps is now trying to rescue.

The Tennessee Valley Authority and other public power projects of the New Deal are obviously going to keep more money in the pockets of power consumers and put less in those of the power trust. Some of the valley communities are already cashing in through purchase of T. V. A. power, and it seems likely that many of the "voluntary" rate reductions throughout the country in the last year have been owing to the T. V. A. and other public "yardstick" threats. Senator Norris once estimated that the power interests were receiving $700,000,000 a year in excess profits. If the New Deal can cut this 10 per cent, it will mark a measurable redistribution of income. The T. V. A., in fact, is one of the most encouraging "redistribution" agencies of the Roosevelt Administration. Perhaps there should have been included among the figures the $10,000,000 the New Deal has saved the taxpayers by cutting down air-mail subsidies. Perhaps a line should be granted also to the Electric Home and Farm Authority, subsidiary of the T. V. A., which promises to sell electric appliances to public-power users at smaller profits.

With all this properly allowed, there remains in the "redistribution" picture only what prospects may be seen in the President's "social-security" and tax-revision programs to be tackled by Congress next winter. Not a few New Dealers, who themselves have been disappointed at the paucity of redistribution accomplished so far, are now looking hopefully toward these two programs. In his message to Congress, the President dealt pretty vaguely with the first, his chief specification being that funds for social insurance—unemployment and old-age pensions—"should be raised by contribution rather than an increase in general taxation." The other elements of the social-security program are better urban housing, and land reclamation coupled with shifting of stranded community groups. These policies may lessen the ferocity of the effects of maldistribution, but if there is any measurable amount of redistribution of income involved it is not readily apparent. Industry, however, is regarding with alarm the tax-revision study now being made by the Treasury Department, fearing it means heavy increases in taxes on corporation profits and large incomes to meet the cost of New Deal beneficences. If the fears are sound—and the action of the last Congress in plugging tax loopholes and raising surtaxes a bit may indicate that they are—some measurable redistribution may be accomplished by the clumsy, inequitable, and expensive taxation method.

Thus, all in all, the amount of Rooseveltian redistribution already begun or definitely planned is pathetically small. It is easy to become enthusiastic about the trend because it marks such a tremendous reversal in federal public policy. Mr. Roosevelt's pledges are brave and heartening, and it may be he is moving as fast as public opinion will let him. But is it fast enough? Can it be made to go fast enough to prevent a limping economy from bogging down into uncontrolled inflation or into a wallow of bureaucratic ineffectiveness that may lead to a fascist purge?

To my mind—although I realize it is generally considered unsporting, or something, to bring the matter up—the President unconsciously put his finger directly on the reason for failure of his redistribution aim in his social-security message. "In a simple and primitive civilization," he said, "homes were to be had for the building. The bounties of nature in a new land provided crude but adequate food and shelter. It was always possible to push back the frontier, but the frontier has now disappeared. Our task involves the making of a better living out of the lands that we have."

Indeed! The frontier may be gone, but the lands are still here in all their richness, coupled with far greater human skill in exploiting them. We have made a better living out of them before, and every authority agrees we can make a still better living out of them now than we ever have made. But we don't—and shall not—in the mass, because they are not "our lands" as they were largely when the frontier existed. Instead, they are the possession, so far as prime values and uses are concerned, of an increasingly small group who collect billions yearly for letting us live on and use them—and without returning an iota of service or goods to the national income pool for those billions.

Let Mr. Roosevelt and his New Dealers find some means of halting or checking that maldistribution and his goal of an enduring and real prosperity may come into sight.

In the Driftway

It has often been said that the newspapers do not make the news. They merely reflect the attitude and prejudices which are prevalent among their readers, and by emphasizing these attitudes and prejudices they attract more readers who share them. Thus crime news would never receive front-page prominence if the reading public as a whole did not devour every word of it. It is interesting to note that the only thing which drove the details of the Dillinger case off the front page of a New York tabloid newspaper of large circulation were two-and-a-half-inch headlines which announced the likelihood of another European war. But it is fair to say that Dillinger was already three days dead when this happened, and the real test of the news value of the two stories would have come if Chancellor Dollfuss and America's leading bank robber since Jesse James had met their fate during the same twenty-four hours. They would undoubtedly have had to fight it out in 180-point type on the same page.

* * * * *

EVERY once in a while this influence of public opinion—if it may be dignified by any such name—comes out very clearly. The Golden Book Magazine for August prints such an example, and the Drifter offers it as food for thought to all newspaper editors. It may make them humble, and may exalt their readers to an unseemly pride in their own power. But at least it leaves no doubt about who writes the news. The Paris newspapers faithfully reported in their headlines from March 9 to March 22, 1815, the march of Napoleon across France on his return from Elba—and incidentally on his way to Waterloo. His progress was described as follows:

March 9
The Anthropophagus Has Quitted His Den
March 10
The Corsican Ogre Has Landed at Cape Juan
March 11
The Tiger Has Arrived at Cap
March 12
The Monster Slept at Grenoble
March 13
The Tyrant Has Passed Through Lyons
March 14
The Usurper is Directing His Steps Toward Dijon
March 18
Bonaparte is Only Sixty Leagues from the Capital
He has been fortunate enough to escape his pursuers
March 19
Bonaparte is Advancing with Rapid Steps, But He Will Never Enter Paris
March 20
Napoleon Will, Tomorrow, Be Under Our Ramparts
March 21
The Emperor is at Fontainebleau
March 22
His Imperial and Royal Majesty arrived yesterday evening at the Tuileries, amid the joyful acclamations of his devoted and faithful subjects

* * * * *

AMONG whom, the Drifter has no doubt, were the editors and headline writers of the Paris press, who had not neglected to send up a special prayer to Heaven that His Imperial and Royal Majesty had not had time to read the news on his triumphal march from Anthropophagus to Emperor.

The Drifter

Correspondence

Was the Trial Misconducted?

To the Editors of The Nation:

This letter is prompted by what appears to the writer as a rather unfortunate clouding of the issues at stake in the article headed "The Crawford Case: An Experiment in Social Statesmanship," published in The Nation for July 4. The record of the defense as stated by Messrs. Houston and Ransom, when considered in the light of the article by Helen Boardman and Martha Gruening, takes on the aspect of serious self-condemnation, in view of counsel's failure to deal with the vital questions raised. The latter part of the article by the attorneys for the defense, which seeks to justify their action on the basis of social expediency, indicates an apparent ruthlessness toward a man who, cowed, perhaps betrayed unwittingly by his own blood, fell into helpless submission to the necessities of the larger ends of a "social experiment" of dubious value.

Why, it should be asked, did not counsel investigate the rumor that Mrs. Ilsley and Mrs. Buckner were killed by a white man? If they did, and found it had no basis, surely so primary a point deserved explanation in their article.

Why, "if the N. A. A. C. P. is in the fight to stay until every Virginia Negro enjoys all the rights, powers, and privileges of every other citizen of the Commonwealth," was the defense deterred from examination of Paul Boeing merely because his friends said he was "unnerved"?

Counsel stated that they can hardly be held responsible for the failure to see two of the Boston alibi witnesses. Why can they not be held responsible? Just what is the nature of a "misunderstanding" that justifies this supreme error? Miss Boardman and Miss Gruening were able to see these witnesses, and they had not the responsibility vested in them as was in the case of counsel. Surely this "misunderstanding" is worthy of detailed description.

Counsel studiously avoid mention of Crawford's confession, "fully and freely" to his attorney. Yet the article states that "Crawford had received justice in fact, if not in law." Their opinion that the accused is guilty is abundantly evident. But even assuming his guilt, does that justify the defense in acting like prosecutors?

New York City, July 5 H. VAN VLECK GEIGER

Is This Legal Lynching?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I, too, was shocked and bewildered by the outcome of the Crawford case, and therefore read the recent exchange in The Nation with great interest.

Mr. Houston and Mr. Ransom are in a different position from Miss Boardman and Miss Gruening: they are out to justify procedures which have been subjected to criticism. One is reminded of this when they fail to answer details of this criticism; one has to bear it in mind when their statement is contradicted by Miss Boardman's and Miss Gruening's. And this quite apart from the fact that Miss Boardman and Miss Gruening have probability on their side in some instances.

Consider this one: Counsel for Crawford decided not to use his Boston alibi because of testimony that he had been in Virginia (instead of using the alibi against the testimony). They say: "It has been suggested that these witnesses were under duress; but they certainly did not appear to be under any duress," et cetera. Against this there is the following in Miss Boardman's and Miss Gruening's article: "The circumstances as explained by Mr. White were that shortly before the opening of the trial Mr. Houston had interviewed Bertie de Neal . . . in the jail where she was detained as a material witness for the prosecution. Though very reluctant to speak at first, under prompting from the sheriff she admitted that she knew Crawford was in the vicinity of Middleburg the day before the crime was discovered." And what we know about the testimony of Negro witnesses prompted by Southern sheriffs leads us to accept as more probable the contention that in this case the testimony was given by "frightened and helpless Negroes who were rounded up and held for questioning."

And in this matter of the appeal Mr. Houston and Mr. Ransom use similar tactics. "It was his case and his life. . . . If he was unwilling to gamble with his life to challenge further the issue of jury discrimination in Virginia, quite frankly that was his business." But are they really frank? The case was concerned not with Negro juries but with justice for Crawford; nor was jury discrimination the only reason for his conviction and the only ground for appeal. Counsel themselves list four grounds for appeal, among which is the admission of the Boston confession—"unsigned, repudiated by Crawford, and obviously obtained by illegal methods," as Miss Boardman and Miss Gruening put it. Apart from this confession, they contend, "the State had evidence of nothing more than Crawford's presence in Virginia. It had no eye-witnesses to the crime, none who could place him at the scene of the crime within seven or eight hours of it, no finger prints to connect him with it, no bloodstained clothing, murderous weapon, or recognizable loot found in his possession." And the decision of counsel not to appeal must be considered in the light of their flabbiness in the conduct of the trial itself.

New York City, July 5 B. H. HAGGIN

The Crawford Interview

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Both of your articles on the Crawford case, that by Helen Boardman and Martha Gruening and the reply to that article by Charles Houston and Leon Ransom have referred to the interview with Crawford published in the Norfolk (Virginia) Journal and Guide of February 10, 1934. We were informed from a source connected with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People that a high official of that organization has said the interview was faked; in view, moreover, of the misleading brevity of the mentions of the interview in your two articles, and the skepticism implied therein, we feel that a statement of facts surrounding the interview is due us.

We assigned our regular Richmond correspondent to interview Crawford following a tip from a salaried employee of the N. A. A. C. P. that if we did interview Crawford we would get a story which this source indicated would be something of a sensation. Following an exchange of letters and telegrams, we assigned our man to see Crawford.

The Henrico County jail warden—Crawford was then in this jail, following his first conviction—said we would have to get the permission of Prosecutor Galleher and Defense Counsel Houston. Necessary permission being obtained, after several days our correspondent, accompanied by another employee of the Journal and Guide, visited the jail and was permitted to interview Crawford. A jail guard was present. Our correspondent took shorthand notes and sent in his story.

Crawford, as is well known, declared he was innocent, had been framed, suggested he was not entirely satisfied with the conduct of his defense, and denied all knowledge of "Charlie Johnson," named by the defense as the real killer, whose identity could never be established if Crawford, the only man who could do so, were electrocuted. This interview came just a few days before Crawford was arraigned for the slaying of Mrs. Ilsley's maid, Mrs. Buckner. At this trial the interview was introduced into the record, discussed by the court and attorneys, and repudiated by Crawford. Nevertheless, Crawford's counsel as a result of the interview and the statements made in it by Crawford, refused to take the responsibility of pleading for Crawford, with the court's permission. Crawford pleaded guilty, "of my own free will," and received another life sentence—only, the judge told him, because he believed Crawford did know Johnson and could identify him. But for this the judge said he would have given him the death sentence.

The correspondent who wrote the story had been in the employ of the Journal and Guide for many years, and his accuracy and honesty in reporting has never been questioned. He was fully cognizant of the significance of the statements made by Crawford, took them down through shorthand as rapidly as made. His story was given a new lead by our managing editor, and was subjected to the usual editing, but not a word of a single direct quotation was altered, nor was the import of anything reported in his release to us changed.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

When Mr. Houston wrote us following the publication of the interview and the imposition of the second life sentence upon Crawford, we gave his communication front-page prominence equal to the Crawford interview, and ran on another page a statement from our correspondent who obtained the interview concerning the circumstances surrounding it. He vouched for it and restated our claim of entire authenticity. In this he was corroborated by the other Journal and Guide employee who accompanied him and heard the entire interview. Neither the jail guard nor anybody else has ever contradicted this interview with anything factual or otherwise, except Crawford. Crawford was told why they had come and that they were reporters.

By the testimony of Crawford's own attorneys he is a colossal liar. He led them to believe almost up to the hour of his trial that he was innocent. Then he confessed privately to his attorney that he was guilty. Then he gave us an interview, and subsequently for reasons best known to himself denied having made some of the statements attributed to him. He never denied the visit and questioning of the reporters, whom he said he knew to be newspapermen at the time.

It has come to my attention that the wisdom of Dr. Charles H. Houston, leading counsel in the defense of George Crawford, in abandoning appeal on the jury issue and permitting Crawford to plead guilty to the Buckner indictment has been questioned in some quarters.

I have had occasion to discuss this case with several judges, prominent lawyers, and the editors of leading newspapers in the State, and almost without exception, I found that they had followed the case closely and were of the opinion that the manner in which it had been conducted by Dr. Houston gave them a most favorable reaction to the proposition of removing barriers to jury service upon the part of qualified Negroes. Especially were they impressed with the extraordinary legal ability displayed by Dr. Houston and his associates, and this seemed to have heightened considerably their respect for Negro lawyers.

Since the trial, Negroes have been called to jury service in several places in the State. The judge who tried the case summoned fifteen colored men to serve as petit jurors during the last term of his court. I have seen no unfavorable newspaper comment, nor heard by word of mouth any criticism of Judge McLemore's action. I take this to mean that the outcome of the case had a decidely beneficial effect upon race relations.

Norfolk, Virginia, June 15 P. B. Young, Sr.,
Editor-in-Chief, Journal and Guide

From the Presiding Judge

To the Editors of The Nation:

Dean Charles H. Houston of Howard University has asked if I would give my impression as to the conduct of the trial and results thereof in the Crawford case, intimating that he had been criticised because of the manner in which he had handled the case and especially in failing to appeal the constitutional question growing out of what was termed "discrimination against Negro jurors in Loudon County."

My very decided opinion is that, with the facts in this case, there was no hope of an appeal being successfully terminated. I think it was highly improbable, in the face of the testimony of the judge of that court and of the jury commissioners, to have had the proceedings set aside in the higher court.

I am decidedly of the opinion that the case, as made out by the defendant's counsel, has directed the attention of the courts to this particular question with the same practical results as though it had been appealed; probably with more favorable consideration to the Negro in making up jury lists than if the case had been appealed and the appellate court had failed to set aside the conclusions of the court in the Crawford case.

What will be the effect of placing Negroes on the jury lists in those counties where there is a large Negro population and whether it will redound to the betterment of the race and to a more cordial relationship between the races is certainly open to honest differences of opinion. In my nearly thirty years on the Bench, I have so frequently seen the Negro get the better end of a controversy at the hands of a white jury because he was a Negro, that I am not prepared to say that his rights will be any better protected than at the present time. The race question is a very delicate one, and where they have lived together as they have here, about equally divided, so many years without a racial conflict or clash, I am not prepared to venture the opinion that the recognition of their legal rights would add anything to the spirit of good-will which I believe prevails in this part of the State.

I may say in passing that Dr. Houston and his colleagues handled this case in excellent taste, with a display of very decided ability and in a manner that, I think, presented the cause of the Negro as well as it could have been presented, certainly better than I had ever heard it presented before. Dean Houston presented his arguments with great ability, with excellent self-control, and left nothing undone within the bounds of propriety in order to win his case, and especially his points on the constitutional assembling of the jury. I say this out of justice to him.

Suffolk, Virginia, June 16 James L. McLemore

RACIAL ARTS OF LOVE

PRIVATELY PRINTED

MATURE READERS AND COLLECTORS OF AMATORY CURIOSA OF ALL RACES
SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ON SCIENTIFIC SEXUALIA
ANTHROPOLOGICAL ESOTERICA
UNEXPURGATED CLASSICS EXOTICALLY ILLUSTRATED
MAGICA SEXUALIS

LIMITED EDITIONS

All FALSTAFF scientific and anthropological Books on the Love Relations of Mankind are enthralling and highly informative documents by authorities of international repute. That is why the FALSTAFF list of permanent subscribers reads like a "Who's Who" of America's Sophisticated Intellectual Aristocracy.

FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. 12-NA, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Please send me free illustrated catalogs of Amatory Curiosa.

City.......................... State............
Address ....
Name.. Age

Labor and Industry

War in Minneapolis

By HERBERT SOLOW

Martial law was established in Minneapolis on July 26, a day after this article was written, when the employers refused to accept the terms of settlement proposed by the federal mediators and approved by the workers. As we go to press the deadlock continues.

Minneapolis, July 25

THERE are about 5,000 trucks in Minneapolis used for general goods transport. Ordinarily each moves three loads or part-loads daily. An average business day means some 15,000 truck movements. The Citizens' Alliance of Minneapolis yesterday boasted that twenty-seven trucks had moved. The city, to use a local idiom, was tied up as tight as a bull's eye in flytime.

Ever since the flour-milling industry moved East, Minneapolis has been primarily commercial rather than industrial, a gathering and distribution point for Northwestern agricultural produce and manufactured goods destined for farmers' consumption. Since trucks challenged rails as a means of transport, trucking has become to a large extent a key to the economic structure of Minneapolis. Truck drivers are an entering wedge into every business and industry in the city.

When, consequently the coal drivers' successful strike of February was followed by an organization drive of the General Drivers, Helpers, and Inside Workers Union, Local 574, A. F. of L., the economic rulers of Minneapolis determined on a bitter fight. They recognized the danger to them inherent in the unionization of the drivers: the unionization of the entire city.

Forced to strike in May, the drivers tied up the industry 100 per cent, routed in hand-to-hand conflict an army of 1,500 armed and deputized thugs and gentlemen, and squeezed from the employers important concessions including de facto union recognition. On the morrow the union began to grow at the rate of twenty-five men a day. The workers were seeking a shield and a weapon. They were in miserable condition. I have met not a few who were often paid with damaged vegetables. One father of four children was getting eight dollars weekly for sixty hours' work. The workers looked to their leaders for continued struggle, and they did not look in vain.

The employers forced an issue by stalling on the question of wage arbitration and by refusing to deal with Local 574 on matters concerning inside workers—shipping and receiving clerks in warehouses, and all sorts of produce craftsmen (celery trimmers, coolers, tomato men) who had joined the union. Thus they broke the agreement which concluded the May strike. The United States conciliation agent, Dunnigan, proposed compromise. How, asked the union leaders, can we compromise? Either we have a right to represent our members, or we have not; if the bosses say we have not, we'll go out.

They did, on July 17, and the workers flocked behind them. The bosses, through a clergyman and a scab, organized a "rank-and-file revolt" against the union leaders. The anti-strike rally, as the Minneapolis press unanimously confessed, turned into a strike demonstration when the union leaders took the platform for discussion. A second "rank-and-file revolt" was arranged by the Stalinists. It consisted of a mimeographed leaflet. In the words of President Bill Brown of Local 574, "the Stalinists have not only discredited communism out here; they've discredited the mimeograph machine."

The bosses launched a campaign of red-baiting against the union leaders, quoting from the Militant, the national organ of the Trotzkyites, to prove that among the strike leaders are advocates of a Fourth International. The strike leaders hit back hard, affirming the right of a union to choose its own leaders and exposing the divisive aims of the bosses in raising the red scare. The workers refused to fall for the scare; not even news of the San Francisco raids caused them to turn against their leaders.

Next the bosses tried terror. On July 21 Police Chief (Bloody) Johannes provided a convoy of police to move a truck containing a few sacks. When unarmed pickets approached, the police, on orders from the chief, fired at point-blank range. Some fifty were wounded (mostly in the back) and one was killed. The result was a stiffening of the ranks, a rush of aid from many unions, general public sympathy. Three days later Henry B. Ness, shot by the police, was buried; the funeral cortege was the greatest demonstration in Minneapolis history, except for the long-forgotten NRA parade. When Albert Goldman of Chicago, the union's counsel, speaking in front of strike headquarters, pledged his audience to continued struggle, some 40,000 workers responded.

On the day after the shooting, the bosses wrote all strikers, ordering them back to work by July 24. They hoped that because of the red-baiting and shooting enough would return to make possible large-scale truck movements. Their threat was 99 per cent ineffective. Not a truck moved without a convoy of fifty armed cops. The city was divided into districts patrolled by cruising picket cars. A contact man in each district was in communication with strike general headquarters. When a truck shoved its nose out of a garage or crossed the city line, a truckload of pickets whirled out from general headquarters to stop it. The estimated cost to the taxpayer of moving $1 worth of general merchandise was $200. The great mass of people regard the bosses as responsible for these expenditures.

The strikers have dug deep into the populace for support. They have been joined by almost 5,000 Emergency Relief workers who demand a living wage and a thirty-hour week. Several thousand unemployed, organized in the Central Council of Workers, are helping on the picket line. Many unions have adopted resolutions of support and given support, cash, technical aid, pickets and so on. Thousands of people have signed petitions for the ousting of Johannes and his superior, Mayor Bainbridge.

In the May strike there was conflict with nearby farmers. During this strike all farmers displaying the joint permit of Local 574, the Farm Holiday Association, and the Market Gardens Association have been able to bring in produce for sale to retailers and consumers in a special strike market. In return, the farmers have picketed outlying districts to stop commercial trucks and supply food to the strike commissary. The Independent Grocers and several veterans' organizations have backed the strike. The Commissary is the show-place of working-class Minneapolis. The Ladies Auxiliary of 574 dispenses about 10,000 meals daily. The auxiliary also runs an emergency hospital and distributes relief.

Eighteen hours daily a loud-speaker fills the air at the union headquarters with orders to pickets and picket cars, news items, a steady stream of phrases voicing the workers' views, condemning the enemy, reviving flagging spirits. From 7 to 11 P. M. a crowd of about 4,000 blocks the street to listen in on "Station 574."

The strike committee of 100 publishes a daily paper, the Organizer. Its editions of 10,000, distributed by the newsboys' union and the ladies' auxiliary, counteract the lies and propaganda of the united boss press. Priced at one cent, it has brought as high as $3. The strikers swear by it, every union leader in town is awe-stricken by it, the employers press the county attorney to arrest the editors for criminal syndicalism, and the Citizens' Alliance (a mysterious organization with no known membership but immense power and resources), by bringing pressure on printers forces the editors to move to a new plant each day. The newspapers are inciting vigilantism, and indictments are being asked. But remarkably little jailing, for criminal syndicalism or anything else, has been done in this strike.* Not a cop has been seen within a quarter of a mile of strike headquarters since the strike began. Minneapolis truck drivers would just as soon crack a cop as drink a beer.

Governor Floyd B. Olson, Farmer-Labor idol of many workers, comes up for reelection soon. The Citizens' Alliance wants him to use the militia to break the strike. Thousands of workers hope he will use it to prevent scab truck movements. Thus far the militia remains in the barracks, reluctant schoolboys who, for all their armament, are scared to death of the redoubtable truck drivers, victors in the May battle. The federal government has sent the Reverend Francis J. Haas to mediate. First he tried to slip things by the strike leaders, but he met his match. Yesterday's epochal funeral cortege, the hardness of the strike leaders, seem to have made a dent in his consciousness. He has abandoned his efforts to sell the strikers an unfair compromise dressed up in fancy language. His latest proposition—a minimum wage involving substantial raises with possible further increases after arbitration and an election to determine the union's right to represent workers, said election to be held on a basis which makes victory for the union certain—has been accepted.

If the employers accept, 574's third strike in six months will have resulted in another step forward in establishing decent conditions and laying the basis for a city-wide unionization drive. If the employers refuse, a new upsurge of strike sentiment, perhaps involving other industries, is to be expected.

The strike leaders are not out to abolish capitalism or overturn the government by means of this strike. They are out to build a union, to get workers better conditions, to strengthen the whole Minneapolis labor movement, to teach the workers some elementary lessons not only in halting scab trucks, facing down armed cops, and tying up a city, but also as to the true nature of the capitalist government, revealing itself in this strike, and as to the need for working-class unity and militancy.

The outcome of the present struggle is uncertain. But win, lose, or draw, Local 574 will have put on a justified and an able and a glorious fight. It is making labor history in the city of Minneapolis. Its victory will be a boon to the whole American labor movement.

---

* James P. Cannon, editor of the Militant, and Max Schachtman have since been arrested for "disorderly conduct by criminal syndicalism."

The Terror in San Jose

By JOHN TERRY

San Jose, California, July 24

MOB hysteria and vigilante terrorism have returned to this city, fifty miles south of San Francisco in the heart of Santa Clara Valley, one of the most intensive fruit-growing regions in the United States. Here, where Brooke Hart was kidnaped and murdered last fall and where 6,000 men, women, and children jammed St. James Park last November 26 to watch lynch-hangmen jerk Thomas Thurmond and John Holmes into the air, citizens have again overthrown adequate legal machinery and turned to violence—this time in the name of "anti-Communist, anti-red Americanism."

As a result, thirteen residents of this community, one of them a woman, have been taken from their homes, banished from the city, and driven from county to county as fast as deputy sheriffs could herd them along. Nine of them, according to local press reports, were beaten with pick-handles. The outrage, cruelest and most primitive of a series of hysterical anti-red demonstrations conducted during the past week by police and citizens in various central California cities in the wake of the San Francisco general strike, occurred on the night of July 19. Vigilantes (estimated as high as thirty in number, armed with pick-handles whose grip ends were bound with raw-hide thongs) seized Mr. and Mrs. Jess Tanner in their impoverished home on Stowe Avenue in east San Jose. Thirteen-year-old John Tanner was taken to county detention headquarters by an unidentified man. The vigilante mob then moved on to a nearby cottage to carry off thirty-year-old Cecil Hausler, this time leaving behind a terrorized sister and a prostrated mother.

In further visits by automobile in and about San Jose that night the vigilantes rounded up ten more persons, after failing in their efforts to locate John J. O'Rourke, candidate for the county board of supervisors in the August election, said to be a Communist.

What followed that night and on successive days remains, despite the comparative uninterest of the press, one of the most ominous spectacles in recent California history, well calculated to swell the ranks of intelligent and stupid radicalism alike. The lead of a story printed on page one of the San Jose Mercury-Herald of July 20 supplies part of the picture:

> Armed with bright new pick-handles, their faces grim, eyes shining with steady purpose, a large band of "vigilantes," composed of irate citizens, including many war veterans, smashed their way into three communist "hot-spots" here last night, seized a mass of red literature and severely beat nine asserted radicals.

Among the prisoners seized that night by vigilantes was one Antone Meshler. Again quoting the Mercury-Herald, Meshler "was asked where the reds were meeting that night, but said he did not know. A shirt was tied over his head, and fists and pick-handles were plied in an effort to freshen his memory."

Properly "freshened," the thirteen prisoners were taken by their captors to the adjoining San Benito County boundary and turned over to sheriff's officers. So far as can be learned no attempt was made by the San Benito County sheriff's office to apprehend the vigilantes for kidnaping and assault. San Benito County Undersheriff M. T. Hubler refused to answer this correspondent's questions. By two o'clock on the morning of July 20 the band of thirteen had been turned over to the Monterey County sheriff's office in Salinas and jailed on vagrancy charges on complaint of Sheriff Carl Abbott. When asked why vagrancy was charged against persons who had been seized in their homes by night-riding terrorists and driven to prison, a member of Sheriff Abbott's office replied with admirable logic, "Because they were disheveled, their clothes were torn, and they had no place to go."

Released without trial on their own recognizance on the evening of July 20 with the understanding that they would not return to Monterey County within a year, the thirteen were herded south from Salinas by deputy sheriffs through Monterey and San Luis Obispo Counties to Santa Barbara County, the authorities having proceeded on the familiar reasoning that the solution of social problems lies in hustling vagrants, alleged and otherwise, out of the community. The present whereabouts of the thirteen refugees is apparently unknown here. Neither the Tanners nor Cecil Hausler had returned to their homes by today, while reports are lacking for the others, who are Antone Meshler, Fred Bovee, John Orozzo, A. Kodick, Sam Anderson, M. Mettio, Albert Bega, Sam and Nunzio Pesco, and Ben Pesco, Sr.

Meanwhile the wave of anti-red hysteria, engendered in large degree by San Francisco newspaper stories dealing with the general strike, has swept the length of Santa Clara County, including the town of Palo Alto, seat of Stanford University and home of Herbert Hoover. Ill-defined "security leagues" in Palo Alto and Los Gatos and a "Committee of Safety" in San Jose and the county in general are enrolling several thousand citizens and creating new deputy sheriffs wholesale for such varied purposes as "combatting communism and fascism," conducting "educational campaigns," supplying the sheriff with an immediately available army in case of labor trouble in the orchards, and furnishing civil authorities with a body of citizens "ready to act in cases of emergency, such as earthquakes." (There was an earthquake in 1906!)

From the standpoint of civil liberties, one finds in the San Jose newspapers an attitude toward vigilante activity which is anything but reassuring. The Mercury-Herald's enthusiastic news story of the July 19 episode was somewhat tempered by an editorial condemning vigilante violence, but the San Jose Evening News has been outspoken in indorsing the recent terrorism. The vigilante mob which carried pick-handles drew from the News on July 20 a story introduced by the following purple lead: "The mongoose of Americanism dragged the cobra of communism through the good Santa Clara Valley orchard dirt last night." And on the twenty-first the News carried the following editorial commendation of terrorism:

> The citizens who accomplished that feat were doing their plain duty, the same as they are doing in San Francisco—raiding every place where they find Communists and driving them out. . . . The News offers its congratulations to this committee and wishes to say to them that every time they clean up a den of Communists and lead them boldly out of the county they are accomplishing a great result and will receive the commendation of the public in general.

More reassuring is the attitude of Sheriff William J. Emig of Santa Clara County. Despite anti-red hysteria he has denounced vigilante activity, has promised to exert every effort to apprehend the unknown terrorists of July 19, and has told this correspondent: "I can't go about rounding up 'reds.' And I won't. When laws are broken, I'll act promptly." Palo Alto's Security League, its secret membership said to be divided along "conservative" and "direct action" lines, already shows signs of decline. The Committee of Safety in San Jose denies connection with perpetrators of the July nineteenth outrage. In San Francisco Municipal Judge Lazarus has dismissed eighty-four Communist "suspects" and is quoted as saying that they "were not agitators but merely penniless unfortunates."

Nevertheless the "red round-up" continues in San Francisco. And in San Jose the County Detention Home, when asked what will become of thirteen-year-old John Tanner, replies: "We can't answer that. We are giving him a home and protection until something is decided. John is a good bright boy. He won't talk. We hardly blame him."

Labor Notes

Revolt in Utopia

TWO strikers were killed and forty injured in Kohler, Wisconsin, famous as a model industrial town, in a battle between 400 "special village deputies" and employees of the Kohler plant who are demanding recognition of their recently organized A. F. of L. union, the thirty-hour week, and an increase in pay. National Guardsmen have taken control of the town. The first act of the military commander was to disperse 200 of the "special village deputies." Twenty-six unions of Sheboygan County have demanded the arrest and prosecution for the shootings of the president of Kohler Village, E. R. Schuelke who led the deputies, and Village Marshal John Case.

Walter J. Kohler, former governor of Wisconsin, who is president of the company, has challenged the right of the A. F. of L. to represent his workers and has blamed the strike on "outside labor agitators." Since the strike began the plant has been so closely picketed that the 150 employees within the factory have been virtually prisoners. The blockade has been so tight that at one point the company obtained food for its beleaguered employees only by sending the packages through the United States mails. The strikers are backed in their fight by the Sheboygan Central Labor Council; 5,000 workers representing twenty unions took part on July 22 in a mass meeting at Kohler organized by the Council to demonstrate the solidarity of labor in Sheboygan County. Negotiations between the company and a representative of the Chicago Regional Labor Board have so far failed.

The Issue: $10.80 a Week

FIFTY or more persons were injured in Red Lion, Pennsylvania, on July 26, in connection with a lock-out of 5,000 cigar-workers which has turned into a strike. Red Lion is one of the quiet country towns in York County, long left undisturbed by the hand of industrial progress, which have within the past few weeks taken on the semblance of armed camps. Private guards patrol the streets, substantial citizens carry fire-arms by special permission of the sheriff, and thousands of cigar-makers picket the fifty factories which locked them out. This tense situation, as was to be expected, finally culminated in pitched fighting between the pickets and deputy sheriffs guarding the cigar plants when a truck manned by non-union workers attempted to run the pickets' blockade. The burgess of the borough of Red Lion has asked Governor Pinchot for State police, and seemingly more trouble is ahead. "York County citizens are amazed at the action of the workers in this section, a community which has been noted for peace among laboring men and women," as one newspaper describes the situation. "There is no large percentage of foreign employees." It must indeed by something drastic to stir these peaceable workers out of their somnolence, but on inspection the issue turns out to be nothing more esoteric than a $10.80 weekly minimum wage, as provided by the NRA code governing the industry. The workers demanded their twenty-seven cents an hour minimum, and the factory owners retaliated by declaring a lock-out, asserting they could not afford to pay it.

The difficulty in York County is that the NRA wage is based on conditions in the machine production of cigars, while these Pennsylvania workers, like their fathers before them, have been manufacturing cigars by hand, to be sold at extremely low cost. The employers point out that to increase wages, the price of their cigars must be raised, and the cigars, being made of Pennsylvania tobacco, simply are not worth more than the two-for-five scale predominant. In other words, they can't compete against machine-made cigars, and should not be bound by the latter's code. The argument is a tenable one, but unfortunately there is little for the worker, whichever way it is looked at. If machines are introduced, many of the old-time craftsmen will lose the only jobs they know how to do; if the old wage scale is continued (it averages about $6 weekly) they are not much better off. The NRA cigar-manufacturing code authority has appointed a cost-finding commission to learn whether the employers actually cannot afford to pay $10.80, but what will happen if it is determined they cannot is anybody's guess. Meanwhile strike-breakers have begun operations in some of the factories, at the old wage scale. Out of the tangled situation two facts clearly emerge—that the striking workers are at a decided disadvantage, and that the $10.80 scale, despite the protests of the employers, is the absolute minimum for their long hours of arduous toil. Whether they will get it, however, is another matter.

NEXT WEEK

Your Government Is a Strikebreaker

By Colston E. Warne and Leo Huberman

On Strike

The following is a representative but not exhaustive list of strikes in progress throughout the country.

BETWEEN 13,000 and 20,000 workers in twenty-four textile mills in Alabama are striking for union recognition, a thirty-hour week, a minimum wage of twelve dollars weekly, and abolition of the stretch-out and speed-up.

In Montana more than 5,000 workers in the mines, smelters, and newspaper print shops owned by the Anaconda Copper Company are continuing their strike for higher wages, shorter hours, and, in the mines, safer working conditions and the check-off system.

In New York 12,000 painters are on strike against a cut in wages; a general strike affecting 75,000 building-trades workers is threatened because of working conditions on P. W. A. projects.

In the union stock yards at Chicago 800 workers are on strike. They maintain that the Union Stock Yards and Transit Company has failed to live up to the arbitration agreement by which a former strike was settled. A general packing strike involving 8,400 additional workers is threatened.

In Holt, Alabama, 800 foundry workers are on strike for the closed shop and the check-off.

The strike of onion workers in the 17,000-acre Scioto Marshland in Ohio is now in its seventh week. The workers, organized in an A. F. of L. union, are demanding thirty-five cents an hour instead of twelve-and-a-half cents with the use of living quarters.

By a vote of 389 to 1 Omaha street-car men have gone on strike for an increase in pay.

LOUIS ADAMIC

... has written the tremendous record of social violence in America—and, by the addition of more than fifty pages, has brought up-to-date his full, dramatic history of the bloody strife which has marked the increasingly serious struggle between labor and capital in the mills and mines, on the railroads, on the docks and across the plains. Sinclair Lewis writes: "That this should not have a huge sale is a disgrace to the entire country."

DYNAMITE

The story of class violence in America, 1826-1934, first published in 1931 and now re-issued, completely revised to date, at the popular price of $2 (Formerly $3.50).

THE VIKING PRESS, 18 E. 48TH ST., N. Y. C.

Books

W. H. Auden

THE peculiarities of the depression book business in this country have prevented American readers from learning about a group of young English writers whose development is of considerable literary importance. No books of their has been published here, and only a few magazines (notably Poetry, the Hound and Horn, and the Symposium) have given them serious attention.

The easiest approach to these writers as a group is through two anthologies, "New Signatures" and "New Country," which include samples in both prose and verse of the ablest representatives. They should be approached as a group, for in this way we can see them to be part of a definite movement that is somewhat more than literary. Like young French writers, they publish manifestoes, and proclaim themselves. They want very much to know what they are doing.

All of them, in spite of sound Public School training, are or claim to be communists, at least to the extent of accepting, and wishing to work in their own way toward, a classless society. "I think," Michael Roberts writes in the preface to "New Country," "and the writers in this book obviously agree, that there is only one way of life for us: to renounce that [capitalist] system now and to live by fighting against it." They are all, moreover, acutely conscious of the problem of the relation of their social views to their creative writing. Indeed, their current writing is a series of experiments probing various solutions of this poet-breaking problem.

More technically, this revolution of the social spirit has, in the group, its stylistic parallels. These writers have managed to take a hurdle that has been standing for some time impassable in the literary way. They have absorbed the lessons of Joyce in prose, and of Pound and Eliot in verse, and have gone on from there. I don't of course mean that any one of them has yet shown himself the equal of Joyce or Pound or Eliot. I mean simply that whereas before them writers either didn't know what Joyce and Pound and Eliot were about and thereby belonged to a past generation or were forced to be imitators, these young men do know, and knowing go about their own business. Their newness comes out in a number of ways: in the influences they draw from —Gerard Manley Hopkins and the English eighteenth century, for example, instead of the French poets and the seventeenth century; new enthusiasms, the very willingness to be enthusiastic, in contrast to sterility and despair; a looking forward, instead of chiefly back; and, as always in a genuinely new development, the direct thrust for metaphors into immediate personal experience.

There are several promising writers by whom the group can be tested: Stephen Spender, Cecil Day-Lewis, Michael Roberts, William Plomer, Richard Goodman. So far, however, W. H. Auden is the most considerable. He has published more than the others: a volume of "Poems" (besides those appearing in the anthologies and in magazines), an unclassifiable work in both verse and prose called "The Orators," and, most recently, a kind of masque called "The Dance of Death." The sometimes startling figures, the intricate structure, and the often fascinating semi-rhymes of the early poems—

> Which of you waking early and watching daybreak
> Will not hasten in heart, handsome, aware of wonder
> At night unleashed, advancing, a leader of movement,
> Breaking like surf on turf on road and roof,
> Or chasing shadow on downs like whippet racing,
> Then stilled against stone, halting at eyelash barrier,
> Enforcing in face a profile, marks of misuse,
> Beating impatient and importunate on boudoir shutters
> Where the old life is not up yet, with rays
> Exploring through rotting floor a dismantled mill—
> The old life never to be born again?

these are frequently more accomplished than his recent verse, with its jog-trot rhymes and the attempt to translate prose rhythms directly into verse forms—an attempt that sometimes ends simply in flat verse. Indeed, oddly enough, though primarily a poet and known as such, Auden has perhaps written more successful prose than verse, a prose that at its best is colorful, swift, and flexible—

> Next the defective lovers. Systems run to a standstill, or like those ship-cranes along Clydebank, which have done nothing all this year. Owners of small holdings, they sit by fires they can't make up their minds to light, while dust settles on their unopened correspondence and inertia branches in their veins like a zinc tree.

However, the reason for Auden's uneven development is the reason why he is a writer of potential importance. He has not been content to master the technical surface, nor to fall back on a "message" and let the surface go. His social vision is for him more than the formula it has become for so many of our literary racketeers. He finds that he must reintegrate his personality in its light; and re-fuse his personality and his art. This is not an easy job for a writer who takes writing seriously.

"The Orators" marks for Auden the change and the reorientation. It is his intellectual and emotional break with the present order, his realization of the intensely personal problem this break involves for the poet, and his statement of certain prerequisites of a solution. Partly through elaborated symbols (many of them recurring in his poetry) and partly by sharply direct observation, he surveys once more the spiritual wasteland of contemporary civilization. In the longest section, "Journal of an Airman," he seems to be examining the possibilities of the romantic attitude, summed up in the figure of the airman, as a way out of the wasteland. (Nearly all this group, together with a number of the younger English novelists, in their early writing assert a romanticism in modern dress against both the neo-classicism of Eliot and the fashionable low realism of the 'twenties.) But the airman, though noble as an isolated individual and embodying certain values that must be part of the cultural solution, is inadequate, and before the end himself realizes the inadequacy ("Three days to break a lifetime's pride"). He takes off into what is clearly his last journey.

It was, I am told, just after completing "The Orators" that Auden became a convinced communist. And it should be noticed that Auden, like the others of the groups, sees in communism not a destructive force nor a mere economic revolution. They find it valuable, as poets should, "in so far as it removes the vested interests which by enforcing standardization, oppose all genuine education, the full development of the individual. . . ." It is this that concerns them.

JAMES BURNHAM

The Sough of Words

Modern American Prose. Edited by Carl Van Doren. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

RATHER curiously, some of the worst writing in this anthology is by T. S. Eliot and some of the best is by Theodore Dreiser. Most fanciers of prose, I take it, would agree that Mr. Eliot is an appreciably more adroit maker of it than Mr. Dreiser, and among them I'd certainly be inclined to put myself. But here we have Mr. Eliot starting off a study of Dryden with a series of sentences so feeble and clumsy that any college tutor of English would blue-pencil them, and here we have Mr. Dreiser writing about his brother Paul in a way that is not only simple and honest, but also innocently beautiful. Did Mr. Van Doren make these selections with malice, seeking to take a poke at what is generally believed? Not having access to his conscience, I can't answer—but it must be manifest that there is a lesson in them for the judicious.

His book is confined to authors who have come into notice since 1914, and is arranged, not in the order of their ages, but in the order of publication of the writings reprinted. Thus Miss Gertrude Stein, who began to write in infancy and is still full of adolescent fire, has the first place, and Ludwig Lewisohn, who is a venerable Tzaddik in a thirteenth century kittel, comes far after her. The arrangement makes for the grotesque propinquities which so often give a raffish humor to indexes. Joseph Hergesheimer is parked beside John Reed, John Dos Passos and Ernest Hemingway are between Thornton Wilder and Glenway Wescott, and Waldo Frank and William Faulkner are cheek by jowl. But these shocking juxtapositions are only proof, after all, that Mr. Van Doren is a tolerant fellow, and devoid of prejudice. That his private taste finds delight in each and every one of his selections is too much to assume, but he is plainly aware that sound writing is a gem of many facets and cannot be reduced to a formula.

It is astonishing how many of the pieces here reprinted endure a second reading. They include some of the best short stories done in this country since the war—for example Ring Lardner's The Golden Honeymoon, Ernest Hemingway's The Killers, and William Faulkner's That Evening Sun—and they include also a great many extracts from books that seem destined to a considerable longevity—for example, Sinclair Lewis's "Arrowsmith," William Beebe's "Jungle Days," Pearl S. Buck's "The Good Life," Willa S. Cather's "The Song of the Lark," and Joseph Hergesheimer's "San Cristóbal de la Habana." It is possible, of course, that most or even all of this stuff will pass out on some near tomorrow, as the work of Henry Harland, Frank R. Stockton, and many another has passed out, but it surely does not seem likely. All of it has already outlived its immediate era, and some of it appears to be better esteemed today than ever before. There is a tumult of opposition to it in certain quarters, but that opposition is mainly puerile and much of it is not even honest. Some of the other things that Mr. Van Doren reprints look to be less durable, but not many of them are downright trash. Nearly every piece shows a serious approach to the sacrament of letters, and very few fall outside the main current of American thought in the years following the war.

The compiler has given right of place to "narratives and studies of character," and in consequence he has had to sacrifice some work in other fields that would have adorned his collection. The only contribution that will be unfamiliar to a reader in reasonably wide practice is a shrewd and charming essay on history by Dr. Carl Becker of Cornell. If Mr. Van Doren had been willing to proceed further in this direction he might have unearthed some capital writing by Dr. William Morton Wheeler, Dr. Fielding H. Garrison, Dr. Raymond Pearl, and Dr. William Allen Pusey, to name but four men of science who are also the proprietors of clear and resilient prose styles. And if he had been on the lookout for first-rate writing in fields commonly regarded as non-literary he might have found it in the work of E. W. Howe, William Allen White, and Bishop Francis C. Kelley, to go no further than the Middle West. Mr. Howe has been widely praised as a sage, but few seem to have noticed that what he has to say is much less remarkable than the workmanlike and effective way in which he says it. As for Bishop Kelley, he is kept too busy in a heathen diocese to write much, but when he seizes pen in hand he shows extraordinary skill, and if our literary scouts were more alert we'd be hearing about an American Newman.

Mr. Van Doren's collection runs to 939 pages of relatively small print, but its price is only $2.75. Apparently, the NRA has yet to do its worst to book publishing. The typographical arrangement by Robert Joseph deserves a word of praise, and so does the printing by the Quinn and Boden Company of Rahway, New Jersey. Although, the volume lifts itself clearly above the common run of anthologies. But why did the compiler omit an index? His table of contents does not answer, for it is not even arranged alphabetically.

H. L. MENCKEN

Nicolson Loses His Way

Curzon: The Last Phase. 1919-1925. A Study in Post-War Diplomacy. By Harold Nicolson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

THIS is the third volume of Harold Nicolson's trilogy intended to be a survey of the old and new diplomacy. The first volume was his brilliant and discerning life of his father entitled "Portrait of a Diplomatist: The Life of Lord Carnock," which was a study of the old diplomacy, and his second was his successful "Peacemaking 1919." This latest product of his pen is a great disappointment. It is, of course, well written and well informed, as it is by one who has himself been behind the scenes in the Foreign Office and can therefore characterize the actors in the drama with the surety of touch and the understanding which only an insider can have. Like its predecessors, it contains brilliant flashes, delicious wit, and striking descriptions of events and individuals, often with a grim touch of malice in them, as when he describes Chicherin as a "golden, although mangy, cocker spaniel liberated from the leash" and writes of Enver Pasha as a "small, ruthless, arrogant little man with the appearance of a Berlin barber and the cruelty of a Kurd." Again, he characterizes our own play-boy diplomat, Richard Washburn Child, as the maker of remarks to the Lausanne Conference "so foolish and irrelevant that the diplomats who witnessed this unhappy scene gazed at each other in bewildered embarrassment."

Despite all its life, movement, and information, one lays down the book with justified dissatisfaction with the meal spread before one. This is due in no small measure to the author's failure to clarify in his own mind just what he was driving at and how he was going to present his material. The result is that we have a work that is partly a sermon and partly a life, with a sketch of Curzon subordinated to the effort to set forth Mr. Nicolson's preachment, namely that modern diplomacy should be carried on by experts behind closed doors as of old, and then have its results as to policies revised, if necessary, and always controlled by democratic public opinion or new-school politicians. This curious thesis he sets forth finally in an appendix which he calls Terminal Essay, after having belabored it again and again throughout the book. It is a pity that this proposal was not wholly restricted to this excellent section of the book—excellent even if one cannot agree with his plan. It sounds well but is entirely vitiated by the simple fact that behind their closed doors the diplomats can maneuver any country to the very brink of war and can withhold vital information from the electorate, as McKinley did before he asked for war with Spain. Then there is no time left for reconsideration, or for the democracy to frame a real picture of what is going on. The diplomats and the executives then at once call upon the democracies to stand by them and their proposals because the national honor is at stake—precisely as the British people were told in 1914 that the secret commitments with Belgium and France involved the country's honor and their honor, and must be upheld at the cost of a million lives.

The trouble with the book and with Mr. Nicolson is that he is plainly the victim of contrary forces within himself. A liberal streak makes him desirous of ending the evils of the old diplomacy, the character of which he showed up so remarkably in the life of his father, but a distrust of democratic processes holds him back. Next he is not clear as to public opinion and its relations to the statesmen. But above all his efforts to think things through and even to be just to other peoples, towers the Britisher in him. He cannot forget that it is Britain's will to dominate other peoples when it comes to enforcing one of its fundamental tenets of national policy, such as the defense of trade routes to India. His finest tribute to Curzon is his description of that noble lord's success at the Lausanne Conference in 1922, when he completely dominated the conference and achieved everything Great Britain wanted by his ability and extraordinary knowledge, and his readiness to take advantage of every weakness of his adversaries. If he does not go as far as Curzon in the desire to have England a modern Rome regulating every inferior race, he still is all for those fundamental tenets of English policy and heartily applauds Lloyd George for, consciously or unconsciously, upholding them.

When Mr. Nicolson comes to deal with the old question whether public opinion in a democracy controls public policy, or whether the statesmen dominate, his vacillation is seen at its worst. He begins by saying that the Allied statesmen in Paris were "the victims of their own public opinion," and he attributes the break-up of the Allied front and the collapse of British diplomacy between the end of the war and 1925 to the "determination" of the democracies of Europe "now that victory had been achieved, to renounce all further physical effort. On the other hand, they expected their statesmen to obtain and preserve for them the most triumphant spoils." Anyone who was present at Paris and saw the reception of Woodrow Wilson by the multitudes in the countries he visited will not subscribe to this doctrine; there was every evidence that the masses wanted only an immediate and a just settlement and not triumphant spoils. But while Mr. Nicolson here represents the statesmen as the pitiful victims of their own democracies, to which they had lied, falsifying and misrepresenting war conditions from the beginning to the end, on page 169 he declares that at the time of the Peace Conference it was impossible for "any British statesman to foresee the almost limitless capacity for surrender" of the British public "which had lost its gift for imperialism"; which in turn explains why Lloyd George brought home such tremendous spoils from Paris! On Page 216 he explains in connection with the reparations, not that the public demanded impossible sums, but that the statesmen of Europe had "raised popular expectation to a point where it became unreasoning" and "they were then afraid to disabuse that opinion of the fallacies which they themselves fostered!" Finally, on page 220, he declares that the disastrous delay which wrecked Germany and threw Europe into chaos was in the main due to "democratic opinion in France and to a less extent in Great Britain." He then blames the House of Commons for not understanding the reparations situation although, as he says, Lloyd George, Lord Curzon, and the experts did. But was this the fault of the House of Commons or the failure of Lloyd George, Lord Curzon, and the experts to inform the House? They had no difficulty in misinforming the House when they wished to do so.

In short, Mr. Nicolson's book should have been carefully revised by a friendly hand before it was allowed to appear in a shape to do him much harm. Thus three times (pages 244, 269, 356) the reader is told that a "fortunate attack of phlebitis" confined Lord Curzon to his bed at Hackwood where "with ill-concealed delight" he observed Lloyd George's failure at the Genoa Conference. Aside from numerous misprints not worthy of a usually meticulous publisher, Mr. Nicolson places the Afghan attack on India in March, 1919, instead of in May, just after saying that it had been planned in April. But even these blemishes do not compare with the lack of coordination and clear thinking so marked that one wonders whether the author has been sincere with himself, his subject, and his public. Certainly he has not even given us the brilliant and well-rounded and absolutely frank sketch of Curzon we had the right to expect. Oswald Garrison Villard

Story of a Dictator

Rico, Bandit and Dictator. By Antonio de Fierro Blanco. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

THIS tale is less gorgeous than "The Journey of the Flame." but no less compelling and strange. The arrogance and scorn belonging to Antonio de Fierro Blanco's earlier book are here as part of his own character and interwoven with that of the figure of whom he writes. Rico, a bandit, became dictator of a province south of the Rio Grande some forty or fifty years ago. He was, supposedly, the son of an Austrian archduke, a Hapsburg who had been mysteriously exiled. His mother was an Indian woman; her father was a priest of the forbidden faith of the Crimson Bird. According to tradition, their race had first lived in Sibele, the Lost Continent, of which many legends are told. Some of these are linked with tales of the Seven Cities of Cibola. Later, ruined cities of this ancient race were found in the jungle, where the forbidden faith of the Crimson Bird was celebrated with human sacrifices.

The progress of Rico from banditry to dictatorship was accomplished under the sway of the ancient and hideous woman tyrant of Atlan, who taught him to "govern men by fear, by superstition, by self-interest, by admiration for thyself." He succeeds after brutal changes of fortune, and is guarded in his later years by the hag-ridden Ismael, who comes to him from the jungle. As dictator he knows ministers from Europe; there are allusions, for the most part disdainful, to the Great Republic to the North. He rules by fear and a diabolical tact; he never thinks twice, not wishing to permit judgment to destroy instinct. Here and there his encounters with women are described, with La Gloria, who joined him on the battlefield and whom he loved without knowing it. There was the Argentine Miss, a vengeful young Amazon who died by her own hand, cunningly seeking his death. There was his ugly secretary, La Silva, and finally the mysterious Englishwoman, with whom he may have disappeared. He was suddenly and finally lost to view at the height of his political power.

At the outset Blanco denies that this character ever existed, but he speaks throughout as though he had known Rico, as though his book were a labor of love and honor. If the tale is fiction, then the dramatization of apparent source materials is in itself a triumph. The intensity of the writing, the concentration of the narrative—and of the many small narratives that compose the whole—give the book its compulsion. If Rico is a mysterious figure, the writer, now an old man, is no less mysterious; little is known of him. At the beginning of this tale he briefly mentions his ancestry. He is descended from a Norseman who fought against the Moors in Spain, and also from a companion of Cortez in Mexico, who when he was seen by the Aztecs was thought from his fair coloring to be the White God whose appearance had long been prophesied. This Conquistador married the daughter of Quauhtemotzin, commander-in-chief of the last Aztec emperor.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Blanco's ancestry suggests an endless treasure-house of fact and fable. It is to be hoped that he may choose to draw upon this still farther. If in all his writing one can never be sure where fact leaves off and fable begins, this with his gift of style creates great color and dimension.

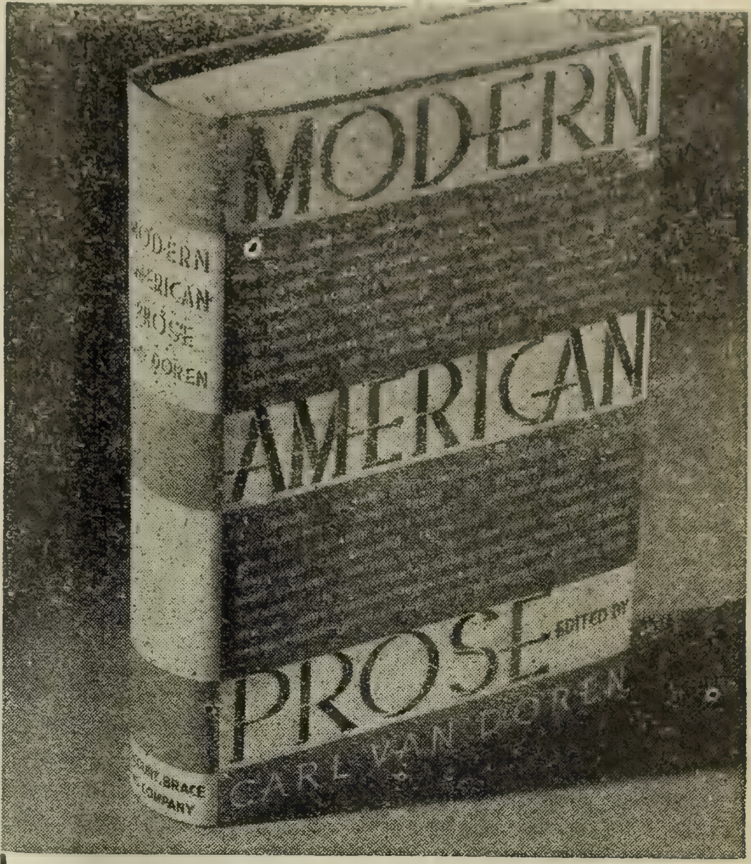
CONSTANCE ROURKE

The Old South

So Red the Rose. By Stark Young. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

STARK YOUNG's "So Red the Rose" is a study of the effects of the Civil War on a small civilian segment of the old South. Mr. Young tells of the planter society of Mississippi, a comfortable, highly developed, eccentric lot of people, and his account of them is one long, slow caress. He perhaps imagines that he has written a dispassionate account of the ways and feelings of these cultivated individuals; he does, in fact, make every attempt to be fair, to see all sides of the case. Nevertheless, his story of the McGehees of Montrose and the Bedfords of Portobello is not truly a history or a novel, but a poem of glorification. He presents us with a group of highly varied individuals, full of quirks, and full of character. If Mr. Young were to be believed, it would appear that even the bores of old Mississippi were amusing. There is Malcolm Bedford, a tipsy gentleman who amuses himself by writing obituaries of his living relatives; old Mary Cherry, virgin battleaxe, whose speech is as downright as it is vulgar; Senator Ruffin whose pompous, polished conversation seemed quaint even to his contemporaries; and finally Sallie Bedford, Malcolm's wife, indomitable but feminine, who quoted Lord Byron and the French epigrammatists freely, and even in bed of a night was ever ready with a reference to Lucretius.

The first glimpse one has of these people is tremendously exciting. For a moment, one thinks that Stark Young has been given miraculous penetration, that he will recreate a dead world in true and living terms. But it is soon evident that he is not interested in truth, but in romance. He quickly gives up the fascinating business of creating people for the more routine job of pleading their cause. After a magnificent two hundred pages, there is no development of character. The McGehees and the Bedfords stop still in their tracks, and the novel stops with them. The Civil War is fought, young men are killed, Negroes desert their masters, plantations are looted and burned to the ground, but these events are not presented with the sharp intensity of the first chapters. They are blurred, as in a dream. Indeed, the total effect of "So Red the Rose" is that of a dream—long, luscious, and finally cloying. The air, winter or summer, is heavy with the scent of camelias; the characters are seen dimly through a pastel-colored mist. Love and death are so clouded with glory and charm that their sting is never felt. Even for the final tragic dissolution of the Southern order, the



A virtual library of living literature assembled in one book, Carl Van Doren's new anthology collects a large, representative body of American prose in its most recent and brilliant period—from 1914 to the present.

SYNOPSIS OF CONTENTS: Twelve episodes from famous novels; four novelettes, seven short stories; six sections from notable biographies; ten portraits of actual persons, ten studies of places; six studies in literary criticism; "What Price Glory" in full; a chapter from the best American book of war experiences; and many vigorous discussion pieces.

PARTIAL LIST OF THE SIXTY AUTHORS

MAXWELL ANDERSON
SHERWOOD ANDERSON
MARY AUSTIN
WILLIAM BEEBE
THOMAS BEER
VAN WYCK BROOKS
PEARL BUCK
JAMES BRANCH CABELL
ERSKINE CALDWELL
WILLA CATHER
E. E. CUMMINGS
FLOYD DELL
JOHN DOS PASSOS
THEODORE DREISER
T. S. ELIOT
WILLIAM FAULKNER
WALDO FRANK
ERNEST HEMINGWAY
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RING LARDNER
PAUL ELMER MORE
LEWIS MUMFORD
DOROTHY PARKER
JULIA PETERKIN
GEORGE SANTAYANA
BURTON RASCOE
JOHN REED
CARL SANDBURG
EVELYN SCOTT
GERTRUDE STEIN
CARL VAN VECHTEN
THORNTON WILDER
EDMUND WILSON
ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT
ELINOR WYLIE

Literary Guild August Book 900 pages, $2.75

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 Madison Ave., N. Y.

brash invasion of the carpetbaggers, Mr. Young has no bitterness, only a softer, more sugared melancholy.

It must be admitted at once that Mr. Young is a master at creating this lush, unreal atmosphere, and one cannot of course blame him for romancing if that is his special desire. One can only be sorry that his book, though fine enough in its way, does not live up to the strange promise of its first chapters.

MARY McCARTHY

Shorter Notices

Defy the Foul Fiend. By John Collier. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.
Brain Guy. By Benjamin Appel. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

These two novels, so completely different in temper and style, are in many respects the same story. They each describe a gifted young man who would rather do anything than earn what is described by old-fashioned persons as an honest living; the two heroes are both agreeable wastrels, in short, with no regard for their elders and betters and with an irresistible attraction for charming young ladies—the one for amateur, the other for professional whores. But not to pursue the comparison too far, it should be said hastily that Mr. Collier's novel is urbane, intelligent, and a delight to the ear; and beneath its witty and cruel casualness is a deep foundation of tradition and sober virtue, along with an ability to render the English countryside in terms that make it tender and real. Mr. Appel's novel, on the other hand, is one of the more unfortunate examples of the tough-baby, put-'em-on-the-spot, but-I'll-always-be-true-to-my-little-girl type of modern fiction. There is every reason to expect that "Brain Guy," however, will have the same sort of success, although it is not so direct or so sharp, as "The Postman Always Rings Twice." While "Defy the Foul Fiend," it is to be feared will be read only by that comparatively small group of persons who appreciate excellence, particularly when it is combined with wit. If advice from a reviewer is pertinent at this point, it might be wise to borrow "Brain Guy" from an obliging friend, and to spend the required sum to make "Defy the Foul Fiend" one's own.

The Adventurous Thirties: A Chapter in the Women's Movement. By Janet E. Courtney. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

A hundred years ago women in England were freer and more enterprising than they were thirty years later. The thirties were adventurous, the sixties Victorian. The feminist bud of that early spring was nipped by a variety of frosts, including the Queen, respectability, piety, and the swiftness of the economic change. But the women of the thirties that Mrs. Courtney portrays for us are a fine and fettlesome lot: poets and editors, publicists, philanthropists, just ladies, outspoken social critics, adventurous travelers. With the exception, perhaps, of Harriet Martineau and Caroline Norton they were not in the later feminist tradition, or indeed consciously in any, but they were all personalities, and the author delights to give us the "little realities" about them that make biography vivid. So we see them not only as links or examples but as women. And the charming portraits of some of them add to our knowledge. We like Felicia Hemans's buxom and gentle femininity and her ringlets. She wrote delightful letters and supported five small sons after a never explained separation from her husband. Casabianca supplied the family with shoes and the stern and rock-bound coast produced a crop of square meals. Caroline Bowles sent her poems to Southey and thereby became Mrs. Southey. L. E. L. wrote verses that were much admired, and mysteriously committed suicide. The travelers to India, delicately bred ladies, suffered untold hardships, or rather they were told in their letters, not too absorbingly. But it's a different matter when we come to those two real human beings, Frances Trollope and Harriet Martineau, to say nothing of Elizabeth Fry, a saint who also remained human. There are others, rich and poor, austere and worldly, pretty and plain, each with a special flavor, a fine, vigorous, pungent flavor for the most part, to recommend her. The women of 1934 will do well to become acquainted with those of 1830.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Europe Between Wars? By Hamilton Fish Armstrong. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

The velocity of events in Europe is too swift for the comfort of writers who poise for a moment over the scene and hope to suggest the direction of coming action. Mr. Armstrong's short and thoughtful analysis has been overtaken by the happenings in Germany. He had been a shrewd enough observer to allow for them, but naturally he did not try to leap ahead and foretell the effect of what he only vaguely foresaw. His picture of Central Europe remains generally sound. But the study is too brief to justify his title. No attempt is made to guage the influence of Russia in the regrouping of European forces, nor to estimate the trend to a temporary system of the Unbalance of Power. His canvas is too limited to include the Far Eastern crisis, probably the outstanding danger today to European peace. And he does not go into the quite cogent consideration of how an early European war is to be made. Assuming Germany is to wage it, few in Europe can believe she has rearmed enough to win against the countries who would be sure to throw themselves against her. Nor can she hope to reach this strength in her present poverty. Europe probably is between wars, having always been between them or in them. But an early war does not appear inevitable on the basis of Mr. Armstrong's facts.

Contributors to This Issue

LEWIS S. GANNETT, formerly an associate editor of The Nation, was the author of an article entitled "They All Lied," which appeared in the issue of October 11, 1922.

LESLIE READ is the author of "The Shattered Lamp."

JEAN PREVOST is a noted French essayist and novelist.

ARTHUR FEILER, author of "America Seen Through German Eyes," and "Experiment in Bolshevism," is now connected with the University of Exile.

HAROLD E. STEARNS, editor of the well-known symposium, "Civilization in the United States: An Inquiry by Thirty Americans," has recently published a volume called "Rediscovering America."

FREDERICK R. BARKLEY has been the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Evening Sun since 1923.

HERBERT SOLOW is secretary of the Non-Partisan Labor Defense Association.

JOHN TERRY is a newspaperman in Palo Alto.

JAMES BURNHAM, professor of philosophy at Washington Square College, New York University, is one of the editors of Symposium and the author of "Philosophical Analysis."

H. L. MENCKEN, until recently the editor of the American Mercury, is at present working on a revised edition of his "American Language."

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of "American Humor: A Study of the National Character" and "Davy Crockett."

MARY McCARTHY is a regular contributor of reviews to The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 15, 1934 No. 3606

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 169
EDITORIALS:
Hitler Coordinates 172
The Abundance of Scarcity 173
"Second to None" 174
ISSUES AND MEN. HINDENBURG—PATROIT AND TRAITOR. By Oswald Garrison Villard 175
CARTOON: GANG WAR. By LOW 176
WAS EUROPE A SUCCESS? I. THE QUESTION ASKED. By Joseph Wood Krutch 177
THE PROBLEM OF THE GENERAL STRIKE. By Harold J. Laski 179
COMMISSIONER O'RYAN: TERRORIST. By Walter Wilson . 181
COAL PRICE-FIXING IN ST. LOUIS. By Curtis D. MacDougall 183
WHAT DO WOMEN WANT? By Marion B. Cothren 184
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 185
CORRESPONDENCE 185
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The Kohler Myth Dies. By Gunnar Mickelsen 187
Your Government Is a Strike-Breaker. By Colston E. Warne and Leo Huberman 188
Labor Notes 190
BOOKS:
Warning to the Good. By Vincent McHugh 192
The Noble Sport of Ballad Hunting. By Constance Rourke . . 192
The Mystery of the Reichstag Fire. By Ludwig Lore 193
Road-Map to Chaos. By Elliot E. Cohen 193
Alexander the Eccentric. By Mary McCarthy 194
Reactions to Our Tariff Policy. By Maxwell S. Stewart . . . 195
Shorter Notices 196
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 196

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Contributing Editor

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; in Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE CALIFORNIA RED-HUNT continues, although liberals in San Francisco and elsewhere are mobilizing their meager forces to rescue whatever shreds of civil liberty are left. Barring an injection of anti-rabies serum into the veins of William Randolph Hearst, there is apparently not much chance of an early return to sanity. From Carmel, that serene haven of the arts, Ella Winters reports that Langston Hughes, revolutionary Negro poet, has been forced to leave town; that a Citizens' Internal Defense Committee of 200 has been organized to watch the John Reed Club, which can no longer rent a hall for its meetings; that bricks have been thrown into the houses of radical sympathizers in Berkeley, where liberal professors are terrorized with threats of expulsion. Meanwhile a committee of 800 liberals, with Austin Lewis, the veteran labor lawyer, acting as the chairman, has held an open-air protest meeting in Berkeley, and Travers Clement and Lillian Symes, acting for the American Civil Liberties Union, have obtained a number of conservative signatures to a statement protesting against vigilante lawlessness. But two protest meetings called by the Socialist Party were broken up by members of the Teamsters' and Chauffeurs' Union. The American Civil Liberties Union is attempting to launch an investigation of California's white terror on the lines of the Reichstag-fire investigation. Liberals will do well to give prompt and effective support to this enterprise. The California industrial, financial, and publishing interests can scarcely be shamed, but they may be scared if sufficient national publicity is focused upon the sun-kissed State.

THE REACTIONARY VIOLENCE of vigilantes and minute men in San Francisco, Seabrook (New Jersey), and other localities becomes insignificant beside the enormity of reaction just proposed by a New York citizens' association. The New York State Economic Council, claiming a membership of 50,000 taxpayers and headed by Merwin K. Hart, William Breed, and former Attorney General George W. Wickersham, has adopted a program declaring that it favors "withholding from all persons receiving public unemployment relief the right of suffrage during the period in which such relief is being received." (This because the unemployed could by their votes hinder economic recovery.) The program denounces general strikes, prohibits trade unions from requiring members to make contributions to a political fund, refuses State employees the right of belonging to political organizations, prohibits the closed-shop clause in any public-works contract, and urges court injunctions against the use of trade-union funds for the support of illegal strikes. It opposes any form of compulsory health or sickness insurance, any extension of New York's old-age security law, and the ratification by the State Legislature of the federal child-labor amendment. It demands the revision of State pension laws, and provides for a 2 per cent limit on all real-estate taxes. The council has previously opposed the housing bill. Regarding education it says, "Taxpayers are required to furnish elaborate high-school education for 36,000 pupils who can't use it." The council is not the only organization of its kind. The Public Administration Clearing House of Chicago recommends, along with educational and social retrenchment, increased police efficiency. Other organizations of "taxpayers," "investors," and "citizens" are in the field with platforms scarcely less reactionary.

THE PRESIDENT'S COMMITTEE on Economic and Social Security, appointed on June 29, has finally entered upon its studies. Professor E. E. Witte, of the University of Wisconsin, has been put in charge, under the quaint title of "production manager." The output resulting from these studies, it is expected, will be laid before Congress when it reconvenes next winter. But one must be naively optimistic to hope that the result will be a comprehensive program of social insurance covering unemployment, old age, sickness, industrial accidents, and occupational diseases. In appointing Professor Witte, Secretary Perkins declared that emphasis will be laid on "prevention of economic hazards rather than the care of its victims." "I like to think of our program," the Secretary mused, "as democratic rather than socialistic. And it differs from the European method in that we are seeking to prevent social-security hazards. That approach, I believe, is typical of the American mind." Miss Perkins's distinction between "democratic" and "socialistic" procedure is not altogether clear. What is clear is that if it is not possible to plan and order the capitalist economy sufficiently to achieve a minimum security for workers, then cushions of social insurance must be provided to protect wage-earners against the rearings and plungings of our economic machine. Neither alternative is socialistic in any real sense since neither disturbs the base of ownership and control on which the society rests.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

WHEN WILLIAM GREEN talks socialism, then the millennium is—right where it was: at the end of a long road of militant labor struggle which Mr. Green, certainly, has done little to hearten and help. But that Mr. Green should, by implication at least, envisage a revolutionary objective for labor is significant to say the least. Mr. Green's tall talk was delivered on the eve of the annual meeting at Atlantic City of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor. It followed the publication of the August Monthly Survey of Business of the A. F. of L., in which the labor economists showed clearly that industry and banking are jammed in a stalemate; that production per man hour has increased 22.3 per cent since 1929; that profit-motivated business is apparently unable to operate the machinery of production and reemploy our ten million jobless workers. "Will it be necessary for society to take over the means of production?" declaimed Mr. Green. "Will the government be forced, because of industry's failure, to invite the eager and willing workers to march into the idle shops and throw the levers of the machines that will again pour out the endless amount of goods our people require? . . . Whatever may come, labor will stand on the side of complete utilization of our productive capacities. . . ." Does this mean that Mr. Green stands on the side of the militant, radical rank-and-file blocs in the unions which are trying to wrest control from the hands of Mr. Green's reactionary lieutenants and march toward precisely the objective Mr. Green indicates? Scarcely that. But Mr. Green has heard murmurs from the grass roots. He has answered with big words. The day may not be far off when he will be forced to match these words with deeds.

HOW MANY PERSONS on relief rolls are unemployable because of age or infirmity and are likely to be permanently dependent upon some type of public assistance? To obtain an answer to this question the FERA will send out 2,600 investigators into 800 industrial centers throughout the country, and for the first time we shall have reasonably approximate census data showing the total of the industrially halt, lame, and blind. The findings of this study will be turned over to the President's Committee on Economic Security now mapping out a legislative program. Carrington Gill, assistant administrator in charge of the study, is tough-mindedly ready for the worst. The findings, he is reported to have predicted, will probably be "a terrific shock to the nation." They will disclose, he is said to expect, that even a return of prosperity will not wipe the relief rolls sufficiently clear to warrant stopping future federal aid. That the FERA should devote itself to gathering data of this kind and that proposals for legislation may be expected is good news. Still more valuable would be a study of the problem of how many of the 10,000,000 currently unemployed will ever get their jobs back, assuming the return of prosperity. How many of the able-bodied and the young among the working population must the government reckon with as a permanent army of unemployed?

AFTER FIVE YEARS spent in wrecking America's school system by implacable demands for "economy," for smaller school budgets, for lower teachers' salaries, for larger classes—demands which have reduced our annual school expenditures from $2,250,000,000 in 1929 to a prospective expenditure this year of $1,750,000,000 and have closed entirely about 1,000 schools—American business has suddenly sprung to the rescue of that high, pure thing, education. The sudden change of heart, however, is not mysterious. The business men, especially the manufacturers of building materials and of school equipment, such as desks, pencils, typewriters, and the like, had it called to their attention by the school administrators that the "school is America's biggest business," and that the loss of markets consequent upon jettisoning the school system was costing them more in profits than they could hope to save in taxes. Accordingly they allied themselves with school officials in organizing a campaign to revitalize education—or at least the market for school supplies, which is perhaps not quite the same thing. The opening move will be the first National Schoolmart and Schoolview to be held from August 15 to 24 in New York City's Port Authority Building, the former consisting of exhibitions by book publishers, pencil manufacturers, typewriter manufacturers, motion-picture manufacturers, and so forth, and the latter being round-table conferences on problems of school administration and maintenance. Since PWA grants of federal funds have already "primed the pump" of school construction—the first quarter of 1934 showed a gain of 700 per cent over the same period last year—the movement may well be successful; one of its incidental by-products may be a little more money for teachers and even a little more education of a sort for children. This last seems not quite business-like. Why the children? And why the teachers? Unless, carrying commercial logic to its extreme application, the teachers teach the children to destroy the desks, books, and buildings, thus creating business for the suppliers.

BY THE TIME these words appear in print, the National Labor Relations Board may be hearing the case of John Donovan versus General Johnson and Gustav Peck. Following a conference last week with representatives of the NRA Employees' Union, and after the union representatives had agreed to abide by the board's decision, the board fixed August 6 as the date for a public hearing. General Johnson, however, has not yet indicated whether or not he is willing to be bound by such a determination; and the matter must remain unsettled until he returns to Washington. It is hardly likely that the General will draw back. If he does so, he will stand publicly revealed not only as animated by an anti-union bias but also as possessed of a conviction of guilt. The hearing before the board will probably be confined to the narrow issue: Was Donovan discharged because he was "incompetent" and "insubordinate," as Johnson and Peck allege? Or was he let out to penalize him for his activities as president of an aggressive labor organization, as his fellow union members maintain? Nevertheless, as readers of The Nation must be aware, the true issue is much more complex than this. The Labor Advisory Board has stood by, supine, while the NRA has done nothing to bring the benefits of collective bargaining to the vast bulk of America's unorganized workers. Donovan (like Silverman, who still remains suspended) was a gadfly who tried to stir the board into performing its most essential function. His effort, so it appears, vexed the board's trade-union members, because it embarrassed them in driving their private bargains with the NRA. And the board not only refused to protest against Donovan's discharge, but on two separate occasions has refused even to review the circumstances of the case.

THREE CONTROVERSIES heard by the National Labor Relations Board last week involve fundamental issues of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 7-a. As soon as rulings are forthcoming on these issues, the public will have a clear idea of the board's theory of industrial relations and will be able to contrast it for better or worse with that evolved by the Wagner board. In the case of the Houde Engineering Company of Buffalo, New York, the United Automobile Workers' Federal Union No. 18839 won an election of representatives for collective bargaining by a vote of two to one. The union maintains that it is now the exclusive agent of the employees; the employer denies this contention. We have here the principle of majority rule which the old board upheld in the Denver Tramway and Real Silk of Indianapolis decisions. In the case of the National Aniline and Chemical Company, also of Buffalo, the employer does not deny the representative character of the union, but refuses to execute a collective agreement. In a previous ruling on the same case the old board held that the employer was obliged to enter into a bilateral contract with the recognized representatives of the workers. In the Tamaqua, Pennsylvania, Underwear Company case the employer has seemingly entered into a closed-shop agreement with a company union. Specifically, the by-laws of the Tamaqua Underwear Employees' Association permit the union to recommend to the management for discharge any worker who is "inharmonious." On this ground the management has refused employment to a number of workers who are members of Local No. 133 of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. The old board never had occasion to rule formally on a similar dispute. It may be noted, nevertheless, that a closed-shop, company-union policy was at the bottom of the Milwaukee Electric Light and Railway case, in which the board brought about the removal of the Blue Eagle because of the company's discharge of eight trade-union workers.

IT IS NOW the advertising agencies, those stalwart defenders of the good, the true, and the beautiful, which present themselves to the NRA for codification. Their proposed code probably marks high water in pious hypocrisy and sanctimonious pretense. They suggest that the agents themselves, the advertising media, and the advertisers confer for the purpose of working out safeguards against false and misleading advertising. (They have in fact been conferring for over a year with the object of beating the Tugwell bill and all attempts to establish government grading.) They suggest also that it be made the high crime of unfair competition for one agent to bid away the employee of another agent without first consulting the worker's present boss. The copy writers and the commercial artists will certainly be pleased by this solicitude of their masters, who would attempt to regulate the labor market on a plane of transcendental morality. But the bosses would also protect themselves against temptation. They suggest that it be considered unfair competition for any agent to split part of his commission with the advertiser. It will be interesting to observe the reactions of the Labor Advisory Board to the proposal that the advertising agents restrain themselves from making a brisk market for their hired hands.

ON THE SURFACE prospects for peace in Europe appear hardly brighter than they did twenty years ago. But the realization on the part of European statesmen that any international conflict may within a few months turn into a class war militates against an outbreak of hostilities in the near future. Both Italy and Germany are ruled by minority governments. The Fascists have successfully driven all opposition underground, but this does not mean that the Socialists and Communists have disappeared. In 1921, the year previous to the March on Rome, the Socialists were by far the strongest element in the Italian Parliament. They held 173 seats, 86 more than their nearest rivals, the Liberal-Democrats, and 145 more than the the Fascisti, who held only 28 seats. A similar situation existed in Germany before the Hitler revolution. In 1930 there were 13,500,000 German Socialists and Communists, more than double the number of Nazis. Neither Hitler nor Mussolini is so obtuse as to think that these masses of organized, class-conscious workers have been completely wiped out. A war would without doubt arouse them to open revolt. In France the government cannot possibly ignore the potential power of the Socialists and Communists, who have joined to combat their common enemies—war and fascism. In England the Labor Party threatens a general strike if it becomes necessary to prevent England's participation in any armed conflict. In time of war the general strike might easily be a forerunner of revolution. European statesmen also know that in the event of a proletarian uprising Soviet Russia would have to be reckoned with. Fear of revolution may not prevent war in Europe, for Hitler, despite his protestations, would doubtless stop at nothing in a final effort to preserve his regime. But other governments will proceed cautiously.

THE NATION takes pleasure in announcing that with this week's issue Maxwell S. Stewart, formerly with the Research Bureau of the Foreign Policy Association, joins the staff as associate editor. Mr. Stewart brings with him a wide knowledge of economic and international affairs. He spent a number of years in the East, where he taught in the Shanghai American School and in the Yenching University in Peiping. Leaving China in the fall of 1930, he spent the next eight months in Russia. He has twice since revisited the U. S. S. R. Mr. Stewart's writing for the Foreign Policy Association has been chiefly economic. He is the author of several of the association's reports on such subjects as the Administration's monetary policy, war debts, and tariff bargaining, and he has also written on these and kindred subjects for The Nation.

Hitler Coordinates

IN his recent communication to Dr. Frick, Reich Minister of the Interior, Adolf Hitler declared that "all authority of the state must proceed from the people and by them must be ratified in free, secret election." Therefore the plebiscite of August 19. The "Leader Chancellor" predicates his claim to the dual office he now holds on the assumption that the nation will stand unanimously behind the National Socialist regime. The coming elections will doubtless make good his boast. One hopes, to be sure, that the events of June 30 and the total collapse of the Nazi national economy will double the number of dissenting votes cast in the last Reichstag election, but it would be futile to expect more than that. Goebbels, in his capacity as election commissar, has already declared that no effort will be spared to poll a 100 per cent pro-Hitler vote, from which one may safely conclude that the next two weeks will outdo all previous campaigns in the use of both propaganda and terrorist methods.

Americans do not realize how little the German reader of the National Socialist press knows of what is happening in the Reich. Today, five weeks after Hitler's day of reckoning, he has only the vaguest idea who were its victims. The first official announcement told of Röhm's execution and that of eight other SA leaders; later the public in Germany learned of the death of Schleicher and his wife. What others belonged to the seventy-seven dead admitted by Hitler, the average German can only guess. No German paper has thus far reported the shooting of Gregor Strasser, of Bredow, of the former Bavarian Minister President von Kahr. The death of Minsterial Director Dr. Klausener became known through announcements and obituaries in the Catholic press from which every indication of the way in which he met his death was deleted. Now that all foreign newspapers in the German language are forbidden in the Reich, the German citizen must take a trip abroad to find out what is happening in his fatherland. Even the death of President Hindenburg came as a complete surprise to the nation. Eight days before the end there was a peremptory denial of the report of his serious illness. Two weeks before, Goebbels's Propaganda Ministry had forbidden newspapers and publications to discuss the possibility of a change in national leadership or the question of the presidency as an institution in the Third Reich. This prohibition was repeated when Hindenburg's death was announced. When an official communique finally informed the press of the new state of affairs it came with the suggestion that "no editorial comment be made until the Führer himself presents his version of the new order to the people."

These conditions make it difficult to estimate the reaction of public opinion to Hitler's latest departure. Is Hitler still master of the powers he invokes? How strong are the forces working for his overthrow?

One may accept as proved that the forces representing the industrialists and the Reichswehr demanded and won the reduction and reorganization of the SA detachments. The June 30 massacre gained Hitler the official support of the Reichswehr generals; this much is certain, since under no other circumstances would it have been possible to bind the official army by personal oath of allegiance to Hitler. He who knows the meaning of German discipline will appreciate the significance of the individual pledge which holds every last man in the Reichswehr, the navy, the state police, and the SS detachments to the Chancellor's personal service. The SA, on the other hand, has lost its significance as an independent instrument of power. It continues to serve as a defense against proletarian opposition, but the dominant position it used to hold by virtue of numbers and special privilege is gone. Today it is no longer feared and hated by the Reichswehr as the competitor of the official army. Cooperation has taken the place of distrust and rivalry. What Hitler and his associates lost on the one hand they gained on the other. Sentiment among the industrialists, who were beginning to regard the Third Reich with a coldly critical eye, is friendly once more. By sacrificing their importunate radicals, the National Socialist rulers have gained the support of those elements which hated and feared the growing power of the proletarian SA.

To a great extent this explains the boldness of Hitler's assumption of presidential power. General von Blomberg admits to negotiations between Hitler and the Reichswehr. A similar understanding with the heavy industries undoubtedly exists; the Minister of the Interior spent the last days of Hindenburg's illness in the Rhineland in conference with prominent industrialists. Two months ago Krupp von Bohlen explained his resignation as chief of the Nazi captains of industry by citing the fact that German industry had moved to the right. Since then Hitler's economic policies have moved so definitely in the same direction that nothing stands in the way of their renewed cooperation.

His conquest of the Reichswehr and the return to his camp of the nation's industrialists are Hitler's present assets and explain, in large measure, the boldness of his assumption of presidential power. But serious liabilities also exist. There is the monarchist opposition which, now that Hitler has made himself nominal as well as actual head of the Reich with the power to appoint his own successor, will move from secret to open opposition. There is tremendous and growing sentiment among former republicans for a constitutional monarchy with liberal leanings, on the basis that "anything is better than Hitler." The government is fully aware of this menacing development and will stamp out monarchist propaganda as ruthlessly as it crushed the Marxist opposition. It is not generally known that Prince Auwi, the ex-Kaiser's dull-witted son, until recently one of the most prominently displayed of Nazi leaders, was charged with treason and that only the intervention of General von Fritsch, the man who saved Papen from certain death, prevented the execution of a deportation order against all the Hohenzollern princes. In addition, the Communists and Socialists find new hope and courage in the disintegration of the Storm Troop detachments. When Hitler came to power, these parties sent Red Front and Reichsbanner fighters into the SA ranks. Hitler's anti-labor policies furnished fruitful soil for their propaganda. Never has "boring from within" been more successful. Recognition of the class-strugle idea has permeated elements never before touched by radical teachings.

Revolutionary labor will not be first to profit by a Nazi overthrow, but economic developments are moving so rapidly in the direction of a complete collapse of capitalist dictatorship that one may look into the future with an optimism that would have seemed frivolous six months ago. Germany's finances, particularly since Hjalmar Schacht has to all intents and purposes replaced the more staid and less adventurous Dr. Schmitt as Minister of Economics, will go from bad to worse. It is not likely that this man whose financial policies have suffered such unexampled defeats will acquit himself with greater credit in unraveling the tangled web of Germany's industrial and commercial affairs.

In its foreign relations Hitler's regime has been no more fortunate. Time after time it has overplayed its hand; and each apparent advantage has left it more alone, more isolated than before. Since the Austrian interlude its fascist stepbrother, Italy, has turned abruptly in the direction of France, and the old Entente—France, Italy, and Great Britain—is preparing once more to consolidate its hegemony on the Continent. German fascism is slipping. Hitler may equip himself with every outward symbol of power in the gift of the nation, but he will not escape his fate.

The Abundance of Scarcity

A FEW months ago Secretary Tugwell, with his appointment hanging fire in the Senate, was suavely telling his inquisitors that far from being the farthest left of the Brain Trust, he was a "conservative." But the required majority in Congress for which the Administration is now campaigning won't be elected by conservative votes, and in his radio speech on August 1 Mr. Tugwell wasn't wooing any of them. Instead he denounced his critics as "tories" and "reactionary obscurantists."

Mr. Tugwell's emotion seemed genuine enough, and in the following passage he came close to forthrightness:

> We felt that with industrial America controlling its production in order to maintain profitable prices, with absolute indifference to the fate of the millions who depend upon industry for a livelihood, agricultural America could not survive without corresponding measures of readjustment and self-control. We felt that under the old order America had become, economically, a house divided against itself, which could not stand unless it became all of one thing or all of the other. Either industry must prefer abundance to scarcity or it would compel agriculture to prefer scarcity to abundance.

One could scarcely ask for a clearer statement of the Veblenian opposition between business and industry; between the full use of the means of production, both industrial and agricultural, which alone could materialize our as yet hypothetical "economy of abundance," and the "sabotage" of production by profit-dictated restrictions. While remarking that "there are undoubtedly many who believe that not the farmer but the business system is at fault," Mr. Tugwell attempted to justify the scarcity-promotion measures of the Administration as temporary expedients "which could be modified or abandoned as industry attuned itself to an economy of abundance."

The last phrase is meaningless. Industry shows every intention of continuing to attune itself to the necessities of the profit system by restricting output "with absolute indifference to the fate of the millions," and agriculture under the direction of the AAA has attuned itself similarly although with compunction, manifested in the Adminstration's agricultural relief measures and in the FERA. But government, no less than industry, has promoted not abundance but scarcity. That, as Mr. Tugwell explains, was the mandate the Administration received from the people:

> We are living in a democracy and we know that the American people have given no mandate for the abandonment of our traditional business system. . . . It [the authority given] was to readjust relationships among our old institutions, to overhaul them . . . to make them work if they could be made to work . . . to modify them when they failed to function, and to demonstrate by the old method of trial and error which of these institutions could be readjusted to the new economic environment of the post-war world. . . .

It was a difficult mandate. Almost, Mr. Tugwell seems to be confessing, an impossible mandate. But for this much of frankness we should give thanks. It is Mr. Tugwell's farthest left.

Almost coincidentally with Mr. Tugwell's speech there appeared the August issue of the New Outlook, containing an article by Robert R. Doane, research director of the National Survey of Potential Product Capacity, entitled Is It a Surplus Economy? By the too simple device of opposing an estimated consumption requirement against the 1929 peak production of industry and agriculture, Mr. Doane arrives at the correct conclusion that in 1929 we had a deficiency of twenty-seven billion pounds of milk, as well as heavy deficiencies of meats, tomatoes, vegetables, and other agricultural products, with only a few surpluses such as flour and sugar. But it does not in the least follow, as Mr. Doane appears to believe, that the means of production were then or are now inadequate to produce an economy of abundance if utilized to their full capacity.

Mr. Doane was promptly taken to task by his superior, Harold Loeb, director of the survey and author of "Life in a Technocracy," who pointed out that "if our farmers had a market in which to dispose of their products they could supply all the milk required in a few years and the meat in at most two."

The most flagrant example of Dr. Doane's statistical irresponsibility was his statement that although our housing necessities required the building of 2,000,000 houses a year, our capacity, owing to limitations of transport and construction technology, is only 200,000 houses a year. It is a matter of record that in the year 1928 we built more than 700,000 houses; with profit restrictions eliminated we could certainly build at least three times that number.

In searching for an explanation of this nonsense, we discover that Mr. Doane is author of "The Measurement of American Wealth," and coauthor, with Virgil Jordan, president of the Industrial Conference Board, of "The American Consumer Market." It may be unjust to judge Mr. Doane by the company he keeps. But certainly the National Industrial Conference Board is not giving Mr. Doane or anybody else a mandate to recognize, or even speculate about, an economy of abundance operating outside the profit system. The editorial writers of the New York Times are similarly inhibited. In commenting on Mr. Loeb's rebuttal of Mr. Doane the Times remarks sagely, "Buying power is merely another name for income, and our national income, in its broadest sense, is merely another name for our national production." One doubts that the Times can be as innocent as all that. The survey that Mr. Doane and Mr. Loeb are fighting about was a survey of potential productive capacity, and obviously our national income under the profit system is no measure of the potential productivity of industry under a system of production for use.

"Second to None"

THIS is the new slogan of the militarists: "An air force second to none." It has just been voiced simultaneously in the United States and Great Britain, while France with its determination to hold its supremacy in the air will also not be content with a force second to that of anyone else. That Hitler and Göring are demanding equality in arms everybody knows. And Mussolini? He knows very well that Italy's future lies not on the sea but in the air; and he announced on May 26 the increase and renovation of his flying forces. That is why he has backed such ventures as that of General Balbo to the United States. So we face the fact that the United States, England, France, Germany, and Italy are all determined to have an air force "second to none." The United States, if Congress heeds the voices of Assistant Secretary of War Woodring and General Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff, will be "second to none in quantity of planes, pilots, and morale within two years." That is a big undertaking, and it considerably exceeds the program of the Aviation Committee headed by the ex-pacifist Newton D. Baker, which demanded on July 22 a ten-year building program to give us in that time a force of 2,320 planes. But Harry Woodring and Douglas MacArthur are quicker on the trigger. They will save eight years of precious time. They admit before all the world that of our 1,500 planes "many are obsolescent, some in stations for survey before salvage, while more than half of the remainder are regarded as unfit for combat duty"—this after all the millions squandered upon them! The 2,320 up-to-date planes in two years are to be a minimum.

Well, of course, if we are to have an air fleet second to none, that figure is the purest guesswork. Here is Great Britain announcing through the voices of its Air Minister and its Acting Prime Minister, Stanley Baldwin, that its present air force of 850 fighting planes is to be doubled at once—1,650 airplanes is the present goal. Mr. Baldwin, who has repeatedly warned the world that "our civilization will not survive if another great war comes," made this startling announcement of a vast geographical change in Great Britain: "Since the days of the air, the old frontiers have gone and when you think of the defenses of England you no longer think of the chalk cliffs of Dover. You think of the Rhine. That is where today our frontier lies." But while the new British frontier may be the Rhine, the immediate objective of the British Air Ministry is the air fleet of France. Its front-line planes today number 1,650, in addition to which it has, however, 1,350 other reserve or second-line planes. When Messrs. Woodring and MacArthur discover this, will they not inist on 3,000 American airplanes in two years? They must—if we are to be "second to none." True, Secretary Swanson suggests a reduction of 276 planes in his original plan to build 2,184 planes, but his present goal of 1,910 planes still represents a great increase even if it is below the treaty provisions for this country.

More than that, France is not standing still. True, the Paris press sees nothing wrong with Great Britain's building up its front-line fleet to equal France's, but at the same time it does not conceal the fact that just before its recent adjournment the French Parliament, despite the colossal budgetary deficit, voted the vast sum of 980,000,000 francs to increase further its front-line air forces—almost exactly one-fifth of the tribute it had to pay to Germany after the Franco-Prussian war. This being second to none is a difficult, if not an impossible, game! For the other fellows refuse to stand still but go on building just when you think you have caught up with them.

Here at home there is only one dissenting voice—that of the stormy petrel of aviation, General William Mitchell, former head of our army's air force. Most unkindly he denounced the Baker report and declared that "the only reason to build 2,300 airplanes is to feed hungry contractors. It's not the number of planes that counts, but their efficiency." He added that 400 completely modern aircraft would be adequate for our national defense and declared that "one modern airship could cause the evacuation of New York City and three could demoralize and destroy Japan." That in turn recalls the statement in "Hitler Over Europe," by Ernst Henri, that one of the new type German airplanes will carry, besides its terrible load of bombs, gun-turrets for two twenty millimeter automatic-firing guns and a conning tower armed with machine-guns enabling it to fight off enemies coming from all directions. He also declares that Germany can produce 20,000 such airships in a single year—Messrs. Woodring and MacArthur please take notice!

Under the circumstances, we have an important and constructive suggestion to make. Let us have another international conference at once to fix just what constitutes "second to none." Why not have an agreement that the United States, France, Italy, Germany, Russia, Japan, and Great Britain shall fix the minimum force that they all want. Conferences to set maximums have invariably failed. Let us have a majority vote as to whether the minimum for each nation shall be 2,300 airplanes or 3,500, and then let every nation agree to impoverish its taxpayers to that extent. Then all will be on an equality; there will be no rivalry; everybody will be second to none, and regular replacements can also be assured by treaty agreement. And such a treaty should also provide that anybody, like our pestiferous General Mitchell, who dares to question, in any country, the wisdom of this arrangement or the need of the number of airplanes arrived at shall be put in jail for ten years. Anyone mad enough to suggest that the countries which sign this treaty would be just as well off if they all agreed to have no airplanes and to save the cost of each fleet will, on being found guilty, be publicly drawn and quartered.

Issues and Men

Hindenburg—Patriot and Traitor

THAT Hindenburg will rapidly grow into a German saga goes almost without saying. He will doubtless be endowed as the years pass with more and more virtues and talents which he never possessed; that is the way which history has with the most successful destroyers of their fellow-men. In Hindenburg's case the process of attributing to him superhuman qualities began with his first extraordinary winning of fame in the war; and it must be said that few men have had a more astonishing career, or one that lent itself more readily to portrayal as that of a great hero, a superb titanic figure, Jovian in his power to hurl thunderbolts at the enemy and to crush him. Nothing could have been more unexpected or dramatic than the winning of Tannenberg and the battles of the Masurian lakes. Four weeks before Hindenburg was a forgotten, retired general in Hanover with his uniform so threadbare that when the unexpected call came to him to report for active duty in Berlin, he was ashamed to put that uniform on. That he, nearly sixty-seven years old, would be asked to command a group of armies and assume the supreme task of driving back the Russians who were advancing so rapidly into East Prussia, he could not have imagined when he took the train to Berlin. The sole reason for it was that he had for some years commanded in the invaded region and knew it well.

By September, 1914, he appeared a veritable military genius. But long ago the partisans of Von François, Ludendorff, and Hoffmann, the dictator of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, began disputing Hindenburg's honors by insisting that their particular hero furnished the brains as well as the strategy for the emergency. That Ludendorff deserved a lot of the credit is indisputable—Hindenburg was soon dominated by him—but there are numerous writers who are profoundly impressed by the part played by General Hoffmann, Ludendorff's right-hand man. Hindenburg was himself later defeated at Augustowo, although deemed by that time to be quite invincible. From September, 1914, on Hindenburg was the great German war god. He overshadowed the Kaiser and all his generals. But the fact undoubtedly is that the Field Marshall was a dull, routinized commander blessed only with the luck to pick, or to have assigned to him, some men of great, or passing, merit and with the readiness to accept their decisions. It is also obvious that when he and Ludendorff were transferred to the western front, Ludendorff came more and more to be looked upon as the real commander, showed himself utterly unequal to the task, and both failed. Hindenburg never seems to have lost his nerve and yielded to panic as did the younger man, but that may be because he was less sensitive, duller-witted, and more the rigid Prussian general of the old school.

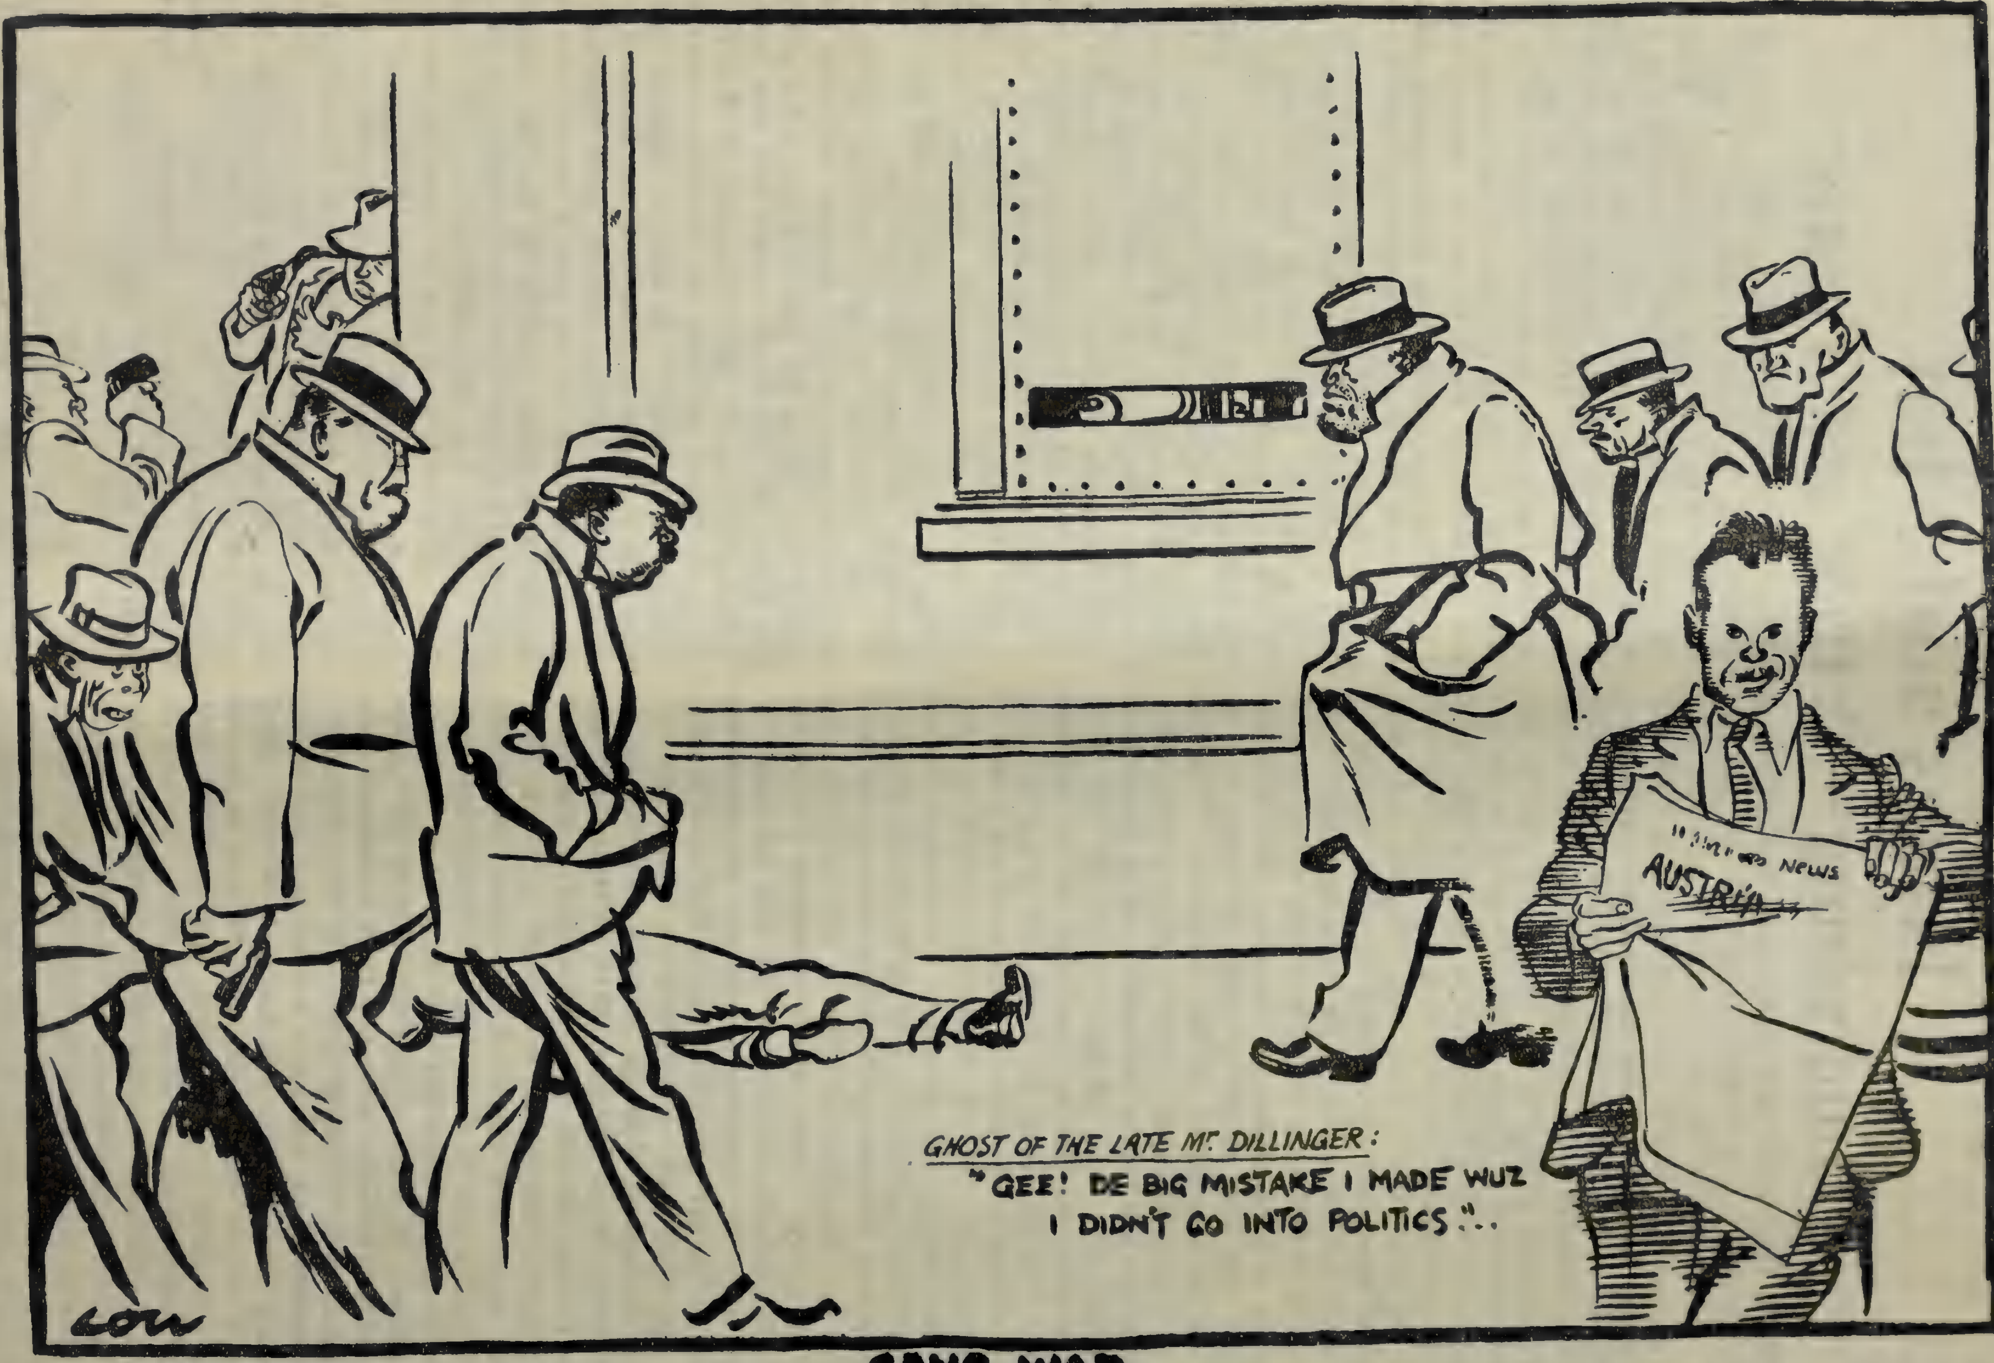
At any rate, while Ludendorff smashed his own reputation, that of Hindenburg remained untarnished in the eyes of the German people. After the war, even in retirement, he seemed to them colossal, Gibraltar-like, in days when his associates and his caste were scurrying to their holes, when many bubble reputations besides Ludendorff's burst over night. He remained dignified and aloof. He had no vision of the future; he offered no leadership. The move to nominate him for the presidency did not originate with him. But his successive elections seemed to give stability to a situation already gravely menaced. While the liberal forces everywhere witnessed his first election with alarm, he agreeably disappointed them. He seemed loyal to the republic; he was loyal to it until he finally yielded to Hitler. He appeared, indeed, entirely praiseworthy in his support of men and institutions to which he was by instinct, inheritance, life-long training, and his caste loyalties utterly opposed. It is a profound pity that he did not die in 1930 or 1931.

For then he would have appeared as a true patriot who lived up to his sacred oath of office. But the rest of the story is sordid indeed. It has recently been set forth in detail in "The Berlin Diaries." He sold himself for the estate at Neudeck, which was not presented to him by a grateful nation, as is alleged, but by a group of money-bags and Prussian Junkers who wished to make him more than ever one of themselves. They were successful in large degree because of the influence of his son over him; and the old Field Marshall even cheated the tax-gatherers by having the estate put in his son's name so that there should be no inheritance tax to pay. One gets in this period more and more the impression of a limited, confused mentality trying hard to know what it was all about politically and more and more being influenced by those immediately about him.

Just how normal Hindenburg's mind has been during the last two years we shall doubtless not know for some time, if ever. Berlin has been, of course, filled with rumors and stories like that which credited him with saying after reviewing thousands upon thousands of Hitler's Storm Troopers: "I did not know we still had so many Russian prisoners in Germany!" It must be admitted that there have been few cases in history—Franz Joseph in 1914 is another—where decisions of such great importance were forced upon a man as "far gone in years." His absolute reversal of his former position, his base and traitorous destruction of the republic, his abject surrender of his country and countrymen to the tender mercies of Hitler and his allies, the great business men of Germany, were probably due to other wills than his own. In November, 1932, he declared that he would not appoint Hitler because, in his own words: "I fear that a Presidential Cabinet led by Herr Hitler would inevitably develop into a party dictatorship with the evil result of intensifying still more the dissensions within the German nation, and I cannot answer to my oath and my conscience for taking such a step." Three months later conscience and oath went by the board. By Hindenburg's own act, Germany's darkest day dawned.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



GHOST OF THE LATE MR. DILLINGER:
"GEE! DE BIG MISTAKE I MADE WUZ I DIDN'T GO INTO POLITICS."..

GANG WAR.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press.

Was Europe a Success?

I. The Question Asked

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN an essay published some years ago M. Paul Valéry pointed his trembling finger at a map of the world and called attention to the fact that Europe is—from the standpoint of geography—merely a rather small promontory upon the vast and mysterious continent of Asia. He then went on to marvel at the predominant part which the inhabitants of this restricted area had played in the history of mankind, and expressed a fear lest its civilization should succumb in no very distant future to the merely numerical strength of those who are alien to it.

M. Valéry seemed to have no doubt as to the intrinsic worth of what his tiny fragment of mankind had accomplished. Though mere life had gone on in many other parts of the globe, it was, so he seemed to imply, useless to suppose that this could mean very much to the kind of creature which Europe had produced and of which he himself was a typical specimen. The human spirit which he knew and loved was something which could exist only in the civilization which Europe had produced, and the destruction of that civilization would mean the destruction of the only thing which he and his fellows could regard as humanity.

Doubtless the possibilities of man as a biological organism are almost infinitely varied. Doubtless that organism can survive and even flourish under an almost infinite variety of conditions. But humanity as Europe knows it cannot be imagined apart from the social order which Europe has created, the sensibilities which European art has developed, and the realm of thought which European philosophy has set in order. To the taxonomist a Hottentot or a Malay may be a representative of the species Homo sapiens. But he is not man as man was conceived of by Descartes, and neither is he part of that humanity which Roman law proposed to save in this world and the Roman church proposed to save in the next.

Now M. Valéry is a fashionable intellectual. There is in his writing a tinge, at least, of preciosity, and a tendency to attribute to what he calls "civilization" a certain hothouse delicacy which may perhaps belong to himself alone. Yet the fact remains that he seems here to have felt, well in advance of less delicately poised intellects, a situation which has become rapidly clearer since his essay was written. For nothing is more characteristic of much contemporary thought than its tendency to be literally "radical," that is to say, to carry its criticism on to a point where it becomes, not a criticism of certain defects or maladjustments of society, but by implication at least a criticism of the whole complex of institutions, traditions, and standards of value which M. Valéry includes within the meaning of the term "Europe"—and which is, indeed, almost exactly what is now more often referred to as "bourgeois civilization."

Most of those who make the all-inclusive criticism did not begin with anything so sweeping and many of them do not realize even now just how far its implications carry them. For the most part they began with a revulsion against some specific ugliness or some specific injustice, and discovered only after they set about to remedy it that it had its roots in a general political or economic situation. As a result of this discovery they developed from crusaders against some specific phenomenon into critics of the social order, and then, by a similar process, from "reformers" of the sort they now despise into "revolutionists" ready to make a clean sweep of the familiar institutions of government. Nor is even this all, for though many would doubtless have preferred to stop there at last, neither experience nor the criticism of their opponents would permit them to do so. Presently it began to appear possible that the social order is itself bound up either with human nature or at least with the whole psychology of the creature whose history from the rise of the Greek state to the Western Europe of today we are inclined to identify with the history of humanity. Hence the political revolutionary sometimes finds himself the enemy, not merely of government as we know it, but also of man as we know him.

More concretely, your revolutionist is usually one who began by desiring either that others should enjoy his advantages or, if he happened to be himself one of the dispossessed, that he and the others like him should share in the richer life of the more fortunate. What he wanted was essentially that all should enjoy both the material goods and the culture of the favored few. But by now he has come, whether rightly or wrongly, to conclude that anything of the sort is impossible, and he has been driven therefore to the necessity of believing that it would not even be desirable. If collectivism destroys the culture which it once planned to distribute, if what the "European" called liberty, individuality, sensitiveness are incompatible with it, then the answer is that these things are neither genuine nor desirable but are, instead, the poison and delusion of the bourgeois world. Hence the full success of the Russian project, for example, depends not only on a new form of government but also on both the destruction of "European" culture and the creation of a new man.

It involves, in other words, the end of things which M. Valéry regarded as identical with Western humanity itself, a beginning anew with the materials furnished by the human organism, and the start of a line of development which cannot possibly long continue to maintain any sort of contact with European history. The new man, if he ever actually came into existence, would be really new, taxonomically a mere variety of Homo sapiens, but no more than the ancient Mayan man identical with the man of European philosophy or poetry. No one can guess what his potentialities will be; they may be far richer than any we have developed. But not even the most ardent of his now living protagonists—since they are really only the last of the old line—can hope to be able to understand him.

To think of things in terms of these ultimate possibilities has the advantage of clearing the air and establishing a fundamental basis upon which the distinction may be made between a real conservative and a real radical. No one, to be sure, can say with certainty that a via media is impossible, and it may be that "Europe" can be saved while the political and economic basis upon which it rests is changed. But it is obvious that none can be sure that this is possible, and the most aggressive proponents of change are sure that it is not. One must therefore be prepared to take one's stand on the one side or the other, to say, in effect: "I am a conservative because nothing except man as I know him is worth saving," or "I am a radical because I am willing to embark upon the adventure which may consist in destroying the man I know and beginning a new line of psychological as well as economic and political development."

Stated in these terms the issue is both clearer and more fundamental than that which is commonly drawn between the various schools of political opinion, and the failure of persons equally anxious for "a better world" to agree on doctrine or tactics is usually due to the unrecognized importance of their diverse estimates of the value of the European heritage. Behind the impatience of the champions of a new beginning and behind the caution of those liberals who hesitate to abandon too quickly or too completely certain accustomed ways lie the willingness of the one to cut loose from the European soul as well as the European political system and the fear of the other that certain achievements of that soul—unique in the general history of mankind—will not easily be duplicated. Hence what the Marxian likes to term his opponent's "stake in capitalism" is not, as he prefers to imply, necessarily no more than his stake in material things or his accumulation of a hypothetical "security." It is a stake in a culture—something which includes not merely a way of life and a heritage of philosophy and art but the very sensibilities and forms of thought which made that heritage possible.

When a conservative, reluctant to jeopardize that stake, considers the "mass" art and thought of Russia, it may seem to him that, so far at least, it is actually not very different from the mass art which has frequently existed side by side with higher products in previous civilizations—that, despite a new terminology, its uncritical enthusiasm, its quasi-religious faith, its utilitarian emphasis, its stress on the common denominator, and its impatience with refinements perceptible only to cultivated sensibilities are merely the defects characteristic of thought and expression in any crude society. He might, accordingly, be inclined to suppose that the future would see a development similar to that which once took place in modern Europe, and that the art of a new collectivist society would emerge from its middle ages into a renaissance and, finally, into a modern phase, each stage being not essentially different from that which Europe knew. But he is forbidden by the more extreme radicals themselves to believe any such thing. According to them, collectivist thought and collectivist expression are to separate themselves more and more clearly from anything known in the past. What, to the bourgeois observer, seem their present defects are not defects at all but the beginnings of new virtues which he cannot appreciate, unsatisfactory only because artists and thinkers have not yet been able to free themselves wholly from European habits of thought and feeling.

Thus by the insistence of the radicals themselves one is brought back to the fundamental question of the worth of the whole complex associated with European political institutions and declared to be incompatible with a revolutionary as opposed to a continuous development of them. By the revolutionists themselves we are forbidden to suppose that only our material possessions—if we happen to have any—are threatened, or that—if we have none—there is "nothing to lose but our chains." Something else is threatened, and that something we may agree to designate by the convenient word "Europe." Is it, or was it, something so precious that the first question to ask of any proposed change is the question whether or not that change would put it in danger; or was it something so obviously defective that we may wisely take our chance of making something worse in our earnest endeavor to make something better? Was Europe a success?

If our question were so limited as to apply only to achievements in certain fields, then it would admit of only one answer. Despite the fact that we are still too much a part of Europe to achieve any adequate detachment, we are probably right in supposing that the man which Europe produced realized more of his potentialities than did the man developed in any other portion of the globe. All things considered, it is probably true that European thought and European art are superior to all others, and that the European man has been the most successful in exploring that realm of consciousness which appears to be exclusively human. Something in his institutions has favored his tendency to achieve ends which the animals cannot even conceive, and of all the cultures, the culture of Europe is probably the one which has produced the smallest amount of that suffering and cruelty which are the by-products of all civilization. It is, in fine, impossible not to share M. Valéry's admiring amazement when he considers his little peninsula, and it is impossible not to conclude that on it man has succeeded in being a more remarkable creature than he has succeeded in being in any other part of the globe. No other culture which we know anything about seems (to our perhaps prejudiced judgment) to exhibit a comparable richness or variety or to favor the existence of so flexible a creature.

And yet even Europe's success is less than moderate if judged by any standards other than those of historical comparison. There is no one of its achievements which was not accompanied by events so ghastly that whole schools of philosophers have wondered if civilization itself was not a mistake and if the "noble savage" was not more to be envied than the heir to Europe's culture. The mere outward order which law and habit establish was achieved only through a system which arbitrarily distributed wealth and power in a manner condemning the mass of every population to hardship and want, while every other human achievement was bought at a price. Not only did chivalry bring slaughter, and religion bring persecution, but the very cultivation of intellect and beauty always implied their cultivation at the expense of thousands shut out from the enjoyment of the arts or even the comfort of adequate goods. Only a fundamental pessimist could maintain that, in any absolute sense, Europe was a success, because to proclaim it as such is to accept as inevitable the fact that misery shall be the natural lot of most men at most times.

The Athenian accepted slavery because he did not see how the good things of the Greek civilization could be achieved without it, and Europe has always accepted an essentially similar attitude, not merely in regard to the political and economic subjugation of its population but in regard to the more general fact that the cost of every civilized institution is tremendous. Indeed, its boasted spirituality—its tendency to put honor and loyalty above material profit, its emphasis upon the beauty of its poems in contradistinction to the ugliness of its history, and that pride in the nobility of its cathedrals which disregards the brutality of the age which produced them—is merely an aspect of its pessimism. It is based upon the assumption that such intangible triumphs are possible only at the cost of tangible failures, and that the noblest humanity is the humanity which recognizes the fact. But it is surely only when measured by these by-products that Europe is a success, and it is less to the historian than to the poet, the artist, or the mystic that it can seem to be such. No failure could be more utter than the failure which culminated in the World War, and it may seem hard to believe that anyone could insist without irony upon the necessity of saving that civilization.

The one certain thing is that Europe's "success" was by no means absolute, that no one has a right to regard it with mere complacency, and that our original question now tends to divide itself into two. How important—or perhaps how real—were the triumphs, and to what extent must others like them be purchased at the price which Europe paid?

[This is the first of a series of articles by Mr. Krutch. The Question Considered will appear next week.]

The Problem of the General Strike

By HAROLD J. LASKI

London, July 20

WHAT is really significant in the San Francisco strike for an English observer is less the passionate events to which it gave birth than the implications it involves. It throws a clear light not only on the Roosevelt experiment, but also upon the nature of the state itself; and its significance will have been wholly missed unless the latter implication is fully emphasized.

It is, of course, important that the San Francisco trade unions were fighting against employers as reactionary as any in the United States. But that is rather a detail which has exacerbated an inevitable struggle than one which has been the primary cause of its precipitation. Everyone knows that modern industry cannot be equitably conducted upon the principles of the open shop; as Mr. Justice Holmes said in his famous dissent in Coppage versus Kansas, liberty of contract begins where equality of bargaining power begins, and without a full recognition of trade unionism the industrial workman is in fact the slave of the employer. So that the dockers of San Francisco have been contending for the most elementary principles involved in the modern industrial relation. To fail to secure it is to make any attempt at organization devoid of meaning. Without collective bargaining there can be no effective protection of the worker's interest.

That was the underlying thesis of Section 7-a of the National Recovery Act. It emphasized the legal right of the workers, if they so wished, to bargain for their conditions of labor through the medium of trade unions. The failure of the Roosevelt Administration to secure the admission of the principle is one of the gravest weaknesses in its record. In coal, in steel, in automobiles (most notably in the case of Mr. Ford), its attitude has made it clear that the workers must count upon their own strength to implement the right granted to them by statute. The government will cajole and threaten; it will speak those winged words which remain in the impalpable air so long as they are not supported by action. But wherever the employers choose deliberately to evade the implications of the law, the government does not move seriously to its enforcement.

This is surely a case when not to act is to act decisively. A right offered on paper, however solemn its statutory form, is not a right realized in action. A government which leaves employers free to evade statutory obligations is in fact conniving at their evasion. It is leaving fundamental issues to the realm of private conflict and declaring either its powerlessness or its unwillingness to bring them within the realm of law. It therefore leaves the workers with the choice between fighting for their rights or accepting the defeat which the sabotage of Section 7-a by the employers makes the only alternative. And it leaves them with that choice in the background of the knowledge that each such successful piece of sabotage is an encouragement to employers in other industries to further sabotage of the same kind. From this angle, for the workers to accept defeat is the same thing as acquiescing themselves in the sabotage of the law.

A general strike is, of course, something more than a threat to a particular set of employers. It involves, by its very nature, the whole of the community involved within its ambit. It is a stark weapon which seeks to paralyze that continuity of services which is the heart of the modern governmental process. The government, clearly, has an elementary duty so to act as to assure the threatened continuity, since without it the life of the community is jeopardized.

But anyone who examines what happened in San Francisco cannot help a sense of amazement at the implications of the governmental process. The workers' right to strike is beyond legal challenge; and the workers' right to strike to enforce legal rights conferred upon them by act of Congress cannot be questioned by anyone who accepts the principles of constitutional government. In a conflict such as this, a government which claimed impartiality between capital and labor would really have no choice. It would decide that the source of the trouble lay with those who refused to accept the law. It would declare that the employers at the San Francisco docks, by refusing to accept Section 7-a, were the responsible authors of the threat to continuity of service, and move directly against them.

That is not, significantly, what occurred. Under pretext of maintaining law and order, the government set out to assure the continuity of essential services. It drafted troops, machine-guns, and all the implements of modern warfare into San Francisco to protect what it called "the community." It knew that such protection meant, and could only mean, in effect, nullifying the effort of the strikers to obtain their end. It knew that so long as essential service continued, no pressure on the employers was likely to be successful. It did not inquire into the incidence of fault; it assumed, indeed, that this had no relevance to the dispute. It took up an attitude which could only have the result of placing all the coercive authority of government on the side of the employers. It insisted, in a word, that what law had given to the unions of San Francisco they might only obtain by persuasion of the employers. Once that persuasion received the "sanction" of a general strike, the government, which had done nothing to uphold the majesty of law, moved over to the side of the employers. It called this acting in the name of the community. By refusing to consider the relevance of the causes of the dispute as something which should determine its action, the government offered the employers the full protection of the state in their fight to evade their obligation to the law.

The implication is, I think, a clear one. The nature of the state in a capitalist society compels the government to be the servant of the vested interests in that society. For in the performance of its function as the guardian of law and order what, in fact, it is bound to do is to protect capitalist law and capitalist order. Once the instruments of production are in private hands, the government must protect those which are essential to the life of the community; and to protect them, under these circumstances, means the use of its coercive authority to protect that private ownership regardless of the circumstances under which that private ownership is exercised. Those, accordingly, who challenge any one of those circumstances, even if, as with the strikers in San Francisco, they are seeking to realize a right conferred upon them by the law, are bound to meet the state as an instrument upon the side of their opponents.

That, after all, is the situation we confronted in the British general strike of 1926. The case of the miners was not as strong as that of the San Francisco dockers; for the former were not implementing a right conferred upon them by law. So soon as their fellow-workers came to their aid, they confronted not the owners of property but the state, which, acting in the name of the community, was in fact making the interest of the "community" identical with the interest of the mine-owners. The British general strike was defeated because no body of men can challenge a government without having the means at their disposal successfully to overthrow it. Once we assume that the community demands the continued functioning of essential services; once, further, we assume that the ownership of those essential services may legitimately be left in private hands, it is clear that the function of government becomes the protection of private ownership. To attack the latter is necessarily to challenge the government. No such challenge can be maintained in constitutional terms. A general strike, in a word, must logically become more than a general strike if it seeks the full attainment of its objective. That, I think, was the obvious implication of the British experience.

I believe that it is bound to be the lesson of American experience as well. It is hopeless to expect the state to be neutral in a capitalist society; for the postulates upon which it acts prevent, a priori, the possibility of neutral action. If it be said that the object of the San Francisco strikers was merely to obtain the recognition of a legal right, the answer is, I think, the inescapable one that the manner of obtaining it comes into direct conflict with the fundamental law of capitalist society, namely, that under a system of private ownership in the means of production it is the legal right of the owner to do what he wills with his own. And since the life of the society will depend upon the owner's ability to act in this way, the government will find itself compelled to support that ability to the full extent of its powers.

These, at any rate, are the realities of which the political theorist must take account. He cannot, given the terms of the equation, regard the state as above the battle, concerned only with the attainment of maximum social good. The state, in operative fact, is a body of men who, in the America of 1934, are concerned to attain maximum social good within the terms of the system they administer. Part of that good is assumed to be the maintenance of essential social services. Once these are in private hands, the state power is behind them because, in a crisis, it deals with a system in being and not with the assumptions upon which the system is based. In a crisis it does not inquire whether, granted the assumptions, maximum social good is in fact attainable. It acts as the protector of the status quo.

Those, therefore, who seek to use a general strike as a weapon in conflicts of this kind must realize that the power of the state is bound to be utilized against them unless, in the course of their effort, they can change the nature of the state. This they can only do under two conditions: (1) they may transform a general strike into a revolutionary act in which they themselves become the government and are therefore able, by the exercise of the new authority they thus attain, to alter the assumptions upon which the society rests; or (2) they may be able, within the existing framework of law, by reason of the public opinion they are able to evoke on their side, to obtain emergency action in their favor upon the particular issue for which they have struck.

It is obvious that the first condition has no application to the situation in San Francisco. It was not the purpose of the strikers; it would have met with little or no support from American public opinion in general. The second condition seems to me, on analogous experience outside the United States, not less unlikely. For (1) a government which has not accorded the recognition of a legal right claimed in terms of reason is not likely to accord it under the threat that a general strike involves; (2) the psychological effect of any general strike which is not revolutionary in purpose is to deflect attention away from the central issue in dispute to the challenge to law and order of which I have spoken. The effect is to unify the interests of private property, which sees in the success of such a strike a general threat to its security, and, after the first enthusiasm, to weaken the solidarity of labor, which depends upon rapidity of success for its own well-being, and has no visible and direct relation to the declared objectives of the strike. The employers, in short, under the position which a general strike creates, have only to wait in order to count upon the government coming to their aid. Once that occurs, the injection of the political aspect into the issue means that the strikers are bound to be beaten unless they take up the political aspect. But this they cannot do without changing the objectives of the struggle. For to take up that political aspect is to embark on the path of revolution.

Commissioner O'Ryan: Terrorist

By WALTER WILSON

PROTESTS from citizens of New York are flooding the desks of the Police Commissioner, Major General John Francis O'Ryan, and of Mayor LaGuardia. These protests are occasioned by police brutalities—clubbings of demonstrators, including bystanders, men, women, and children; the ruthless suppression of picketing of taxi drivers, bakery workers, and other strikers; and brutality against individuals not connected with any labor disturbances. Hardly a day passes but that one sees headlines in the metropolitan press dealing with police brutalities. Here is an example taken from the World-Telegram of July 13 which reads: "Police Brutality Caused Stillbirth Says Mother, Charging She Was Beaten During Relief Riot."

Police Commissioner O'Ryan surely is acquainted with and responsible for what goes on in his department. What has his attitude been toward these abuses? Let him speak for himself. In a letter to Relief Commissioner Hodson which was quoted in the New York Times of June 12, Mr. O'Ryan said: "We have already placed on trial several policemen for failure to use all the force at their disposal and necessary for the purpose of suppressing violence, and charges will be prepared against any officer of the department who fails to act promptly and effectively in such instances." Violence to him means strikes, picketing, demonstrating. "I don't believe in times of emergency in letting crowds collect," he said during the New York taxi strike (New York Times, April 10).

The Police Commissioner has just organized a special militarized unit of 1,200 picked men, a sort of military police corps. The Herald Tribune on July 29 gave two full columns to this important event. Its headline read: "Ryan Arms Rifle Division to Quell Riots." The subhead was: "Machine Guns Included in Police Unit of 1,200 Designed for Service in Labor Disturbances." The news story which followed said in part: "The personnel, it is understood, has been selected from men interested in military tactics or with military training or war experience. Mr. O'Ryan, himself commander of the Twenty-seventh Division during the World War, has displayed tendencies ever since he took office last January to turn the Police Department into a highly trained military unit." The story continued: "Although no accompanying explanation was issued with the organization order, and Mr. O'Ryan . . . would make no statement other than that the regiment's purpose was 'to increase the efficiency of the force,' it was learned at headquarters that Mr. O'Ryan had contemplated the move for some time in anticipation of any labor trouble which might break out in New York."

Mr. O'Ryan gave an inconsistent denial in the New York Times of July 31 that the new organization had any connection with anticipated major labor disturbances in the New York area. In the same denial he said that the unit would be a good protective measure and would be likely to command respect from any group of agitators "as soon as they appeared on the scene" of disorder.

What kind of man is this who has begun his term of office with a record of sanctioning brutality and who now aspires to be commander-in-chief of America's first completely militarized police force? Who is this man who points with pride to his military training? What was that training?

In 1919 Commissioner O'Ryan, then a major general, was appointed by Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, as one of the four members of the so-called Kernan Board which investigated charges made by returning soldiers against the administration of justice in the army, especially in the American Expeditionary Force. Literally thousands of soldiers testified to the arrogance and brutality exhibited toward the enlisted personnel of the army by the officer caste. They charged that a strict, senseless, goose-stepping discipline was maintained in the army, not only during the war, but long after the armistice; that there was an unjust, autocratic system of military justice, administered solely by officers (it has been estimated that there were 375,000 courts-martial during the year prior to the armistice in an army averaging 2,000,000 men); privates were given twenty-five years at hard labor for being absent without leave for a few days (such cases occurred after the armistice) or for talking back to an officer. Several were given terms at hard labor for appearing at mess and inspection, months after November 11, 1918, with a button missing or a collar unfastened. The third degree was generously used in many of the above cases.

The places where the offenders had to serve these hard-labor sentences were literally the "chain gangs of the A.E.F." There beatings with fists and blackjacks drove some of the inmates to suicide. Prison guards admitted that everything charged was true; one sergeant testified at his court-martial trial that he personally beat up over a hundred men. They all said that the brutalities had been ordered from higher up—a general or two being implicated but never tried. Several minor officers including the infamous "Hard-boiled" Lieutenant Smith, in charge of Prison Farm Number 2 outside Paris, were court-martialed and given light sentences. It was brought out that the purpose of these inhumanities was to discipline the army and that many innocent men were sent to the prisons without trial. Ninety per cent of the prisoners had seen service at the front and many had been wounded.

This was the situation the Kernan Board, of which Major General O'Ryan was a member, was to investigate. What did O'Ryan and the other three members think about the "justice" dealt out to the private soldier in the war? They found, and their findings are a matter of public record, that the system of military justice in use in the American army during the World War had virtues seldom found in human institutions, and in effect that the enlisted man got what was coming to him; that terrorism was necessary to maintain discipline; that military justice was not to be judged by ideas of natural or ordinary legal justice and that the justice or injustice of it did not matter; that military justice cannot be regulated by law but must be left to the supreme authority of the military commander; that the military caste and not Congress has the supreme authority over the citizen-soldier and that Congress should be ignored if it attempted to exercise such authority.

These findings were not a complete surprise to some of the military associates of the board members. The man with the most experience and information about military justice, Brigadier General Samuel T. Ansell, Acting Judge Advocate General during the entire period of the war and a former professor of military law at West Point, testifying before a Senate committee, said of them: "Of course, I know these gentlemen rather well—their personalities, their habits of thought, and something of their views with respect to the military establishment. If the Secretary of War had gone out deliberately to appoint the most reactionary set of men in the United States he could not have improved upon his selection—Major General Kernan, Major General O'Ryan, Lieutenant Colonel Barrows, and Lieutenant Colonel Ogden." In The Nation for December 27, 1919, General Ansell again referred to the personnel of the Kernan Board: "Consisting of two regular army officers of high rank, one national army officer 'militarized' . . . and a national guard major general [General O'Ryan, of course] dependent for his success, if not his place, upon the good graces of the War Department."

Commenting upon the board's report Mr. Ansell said: "I think we all anticipated that this report would be a reactionary one, largely sustaining the present system; nobody, even on the other side, anticipated that it would be as reactionary as it is. . . . Does not the whole report proceed upon the predicate that we get discipline through terrorism?"

The Kernan Board was not the first committee appointed by the War Department to investigate the enlisted men's charges. The department first appointed a committee from the American Bar Association to do the job. Critics charged at the time that this committee and its witnesses were handpicked so as to present only the ultra-militarist viewpoint. However, in the midst of its hearings the chairman of the Bar Association committee suddenly announced that he had been converted and that he would find that the system of military justice in use in the American army was autocratic and unjust and should be thoroughly rooted out. Soon after this announcement we have the strange coincidence of the War Department's picking a strictly military committee to do the same job the Bar Association committee was to do as impartial investigators. There would seem some justification for the charges of critics who said that the Kernan Board was appointed to do a whitewashing job.

J. B. W. Gardiner, a graduate of West Point and former instructor of law there, wrote a letter to Senator James W. Wadsworth on September 11, 1919, in which he spoke of Mr. O'Ryan: "Because of the kingly origin of our military conception, we have come to regard military discipline as resting very largely upon fear, and the club which engenders this fear is the court-martial. That this is true is shown by the testimony of Major General O'Ryan given but recently before your committee. . . ."

The testimony Mr. Gardiner refers to was given by our present Police Commissioner in 1919 before a Senate committee hearing on "a bill to establish military justice."

Testifying before this committee Mr. O'Ryan said that the Kernan Board report expressed his views on the army and military justice. He repeated his stand for terrorism for the purpose of maintaining discipline when he said: "The object of courts in an army, especially during time of war, is mainly to deter the mass of the soldiers from the commission of offenses which have brought some of the soldiers to trial."

But even with a court-martial system over which he was the king, judge, jury, and supreme court, as the commander of a division, O'Ryan was not satisfied. He used another kind of terrorism. Men who went AWOL or committed minor offenses like petty theft while the army was at the front were arbitrarily punished, not by imprisonment or by reprimand, but by being sent to the most dangerous points in the first-line trenches. This is a part of the terrorism advocated and practiced by General O'Ryan which Mr. Gardiner refers to in his letter to Senator Wadsworth.

It should be kept in mind that it was amply proved in the controversy over the system of military justice in the World War that the court-martial system operates to maintain discipline and not to get facts and to deal out justice. Whether innocent or guilty some enlisted men had to be sacrificed in order to "deter" others who might be tempted to go AWOL. As has been shown by the foremost authorities on military law, Ansell, Runcie, Morgan, and others, the enlisted men had an impossible task of proving innocence or mitigating circumstances after charges had been preferred against them by an officer. We know for a certainty that many men who went through the A. E. F. chain-gang mill were innocent. Many of them were subsequently given honorable discharges with character marked excellent. Might not the same thing have occurred in the divisions whose officers made it a practice of arbitrarily sending enlisted offenders to almost certain death in the front-line trenches?

Senator Chamberlain asked General O'Ryan if he thought enlisted men should be allowed their rights as citizens to jury service and be allowed on courts-martial when in the army. Mr. O'Ryan showed his contempt for the rank-and-file soldier by his reply:

"Frankly, I do not, Senator . . . I have a firm conviction that that thing is wholly impracticable and undesirable in the army. . . . I think it is one of the most interesting things about the development of any army to note the change that takes place in the personnel . . . they [enlisted men] become in a measure children . . . so their efficiency to serve as jurors would be adversely affected, due to the narrow life that they necessarily lead."

This is a partial picture of John Francis O'Ryan, former commander of the New York National Guard, commander of the Twenty-seventh Division in the World War with rank of Major General, who was appointed Police Commissioner of New York City by a liberal mayor. This is the man who is the supreme commander of a force of 1,200 military police which was organized recently in the expectation that New York was about to experience important strikes. Recent news indicates that such strikes are imminent, especially in the construction field. What the Commissioner's views and activities will be in such an event can be seen by his attitude toward strikes and demonstrations since his installation. In the controversy with Mayor LaGuardia which arose when the Commissioner wanted to use even more force than he did use against the taxicab strikers, Commissioner O'Ryan said: "My background has been military, and my training hasn't much to do with liberalism."

Coal Price-Fixing in St. Louis

By CURTIS D. MACDOUGALL

St. Louis, July 31

FOR the evidence it furnishes of the wisdom of General Johnson's order of June 7 forbidding price-fixing in future NRA codes and of the advisability of making that order retroactive, the present situation in the retail coal industry in the St. Louis marketing area is significant.

On July 21 the coal division at Washington disapproved the minimum price list announced on May 20 by Divisional Code Authority Number 32 of the Retail Solid Fuel Industry. This unprecedented action seemed at first to have averted a serious test of the recovery program. Its immediate effect was the cancelation of a public hearing to discuss coal prices which the Code Authority had called for July 24 upon the demand of Attorney General Roy McKittrick of Missouri, who threatened to invoke the Missouri anti-trust laws and protect chiselers unless the list were revised downward.

Optimism disappeared, however, when Charles P. Melton, administration member of Division Number 32, issued a vehement defense of the list of May 20, criticized Washington severely for setting it aside, and announced a public hearing to be held August 6 to determine whether an emergency existed in the industry to justify a new price list.

Backed by the Consumers' Council of St. Louis and by several organizations of Illinois coal operators and independent coal dealers (dealers unaffiliated with the St. Louis Coal Exchange, a trade association of 134 large dealers which named thirteen of the fifteen members of the Code Authority), the attorney general has served notice that unless Washington dissuades Division Number thirty-two from further price-fixing activities, a legal battle between the federal government and the State of Missouri is inevitable. He also has demanded Mr. Melton's removal from office, together with that of Clarence C. Beck, executive secretary, and William J. Miller, president of Division Number 32.

The "psychology of the situation" before Mr. McKittrick entered the picture three weeks ago was one familiar during the prohibition era: there is no moral compulsion to obey a bad law, especially when there seems to be no likelihood of its being enforced. That attitude, shared alike by consumers, mine operators, and independent dealers, was well known to members of the Code Authority, who met scores of complaints with either a deaf ear or insulting retort.

The reasons given by the research and planning and legal divisions of the NRA in recommending the disapproval order were similar to the criticisms which were directed locally at the price list:

That an insertion in the classified-advertisement section of one St. Louis newspaper on April 1 was improper and insufficient notice for the emergency hearing on April 2, which was attended only by about 150 coal dealers, mostly large, and by no consumers.

That the basis on which the price list was prepared was faulty, inasmuch as the cost sheets of only twenty-nine companies were considered and because to the average cost of $2.75 a ton (not including cost of the coal at the mines and transportation) was added an arbitrary and unexplained twenty-three cents.

In addition, coal operators of the Belleville, Illinois, area, fifteen miles from St. Louis, where about 75 per cent of the coal consumed in St. Louis is mined, claimed that raising the retail price of that coal from $2.75 a ton, for which it sold last winter, to $5.90 a ton would discriminate against them in favor of better grades of coal from more distant points, chiefly Franklin and Saline counties in southern Illinois. The principal retailer of the latter product is the Hawthorn Coal Company, representative of the Insull-controlled Peabody Coal Company. President Miller of the Code Authority is president of Hawthorn.

The first consumer to be affected by the code price list—significantly the largest single consumer in the area—was the St. Louis Board of Education, which had advertised for bids before the list was announced. After first threatening to reject all bids, the school board finally voted unanimously to award approximately one-third of its contract to the Coal Service Company, a frank chiseler. Two days later the school board of University City, the largest St. Louis suburb, rejected all coal bids as excessive. At present all bids for coal for various departments of the City of St. Louis are being held up. Officials of the St. Louis Real Estate Exchange and of the St. Louis Building Owners' and Managers' Association have predicted that their members will patronize chiselers if the Code Authority repeats its former action.

Instead of yielding to the deluge of criticism from all sides, the Code Authority has cited legal justifications of its actions and has issued a series of orders to tighten its power. In answer to the charge that insufficient notice was given of the April 2 hearing, it has replied that the ruling defining adequate notice as meaning ten days and individual notices to all interested parties was not issued until April 24 and was not retroactive. The Consumers' Council retorted that no action of Division Number 32 became official until approved by Mr. Melton after his appointment on May 7, and that the spirit if not the letter of NRA was violated in any case.

When the Board of Education and other consumers were suspected of planning to buy coal directly at the mines and paying to have it hauled to St. Louis, a midnight meeting of Division Number 32 was held to rush through two preventive orders. One declared that anyone engaged by a consumer to truck coal from the mines should be considered a retail merchant and subject to code prices; the other sought to put the mines themselves under the retail code in case they sold directly to consumers.

The Code Authority also tried in vain to get the Belleville Group Coal Association of mine operators to guarantee a uniform and standard B. T. U. (British Thermal Unit) test for standard coal. The result of the operators' refusal to do so was that some dealers, including Code Authority members, made abnormally high B. T. U. and abnormally low ash-content guaranties, the idea being to obtain contracts and pay rebates when failing to meet requirements.

In its replies to critics Division Number 32 has taken the lofty point of view that any and all criticisms are attacks upon the government of the United States and come from "parties either entirely ignorant of the work of the Code Authority or out of tune with the times." Speaking of Melton's attitude McKittrick declared: "He seems to think he's the federal government."

To be "in tune with the times," in the opinion of Melton, Beck, and Miller, is to favor price-fixing which will "weed out" the industry for the benefit of the most strongly established dealers who "represent the backbone of the industry."

After telling the attorney general that the small dealer and consumer never can expect a square deal from men with that ideology, the chairman of a group of coal haulers expressed the attitude of the little fellow in part as follows:

"We are patriotic Americans and enthusiastic in our support of President Roosevelt. However, there has been so much chiseling since the code price list that unless some change is made, everything that has been accomplished under the NRA to improve the wages and working conditions of coal miners and laborers will be lost. We cannot stand by indefinitely and see our business snatched away from us with no effort being made to prevent the large dealers from violating the rules they themselves have set up."

That is the situation which Attorney General McKittrick stepped in to stop and which he insists shall not recur. Unless Washington again intervenes to check the activities of Division Number 32, the NRA may be faced with one of its most important tests.

What Do Women Want?

By MARION B. COTHREN

Paris, July 15

JUST "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal" were the resolutions passed by the International Council of Women in answer to the heartbreaking appeals of women throughout the world today. Presided over by Lady Aberdeen, now nearly fourscore years of age and strongly resembling Queen Victoria, 300 delegates from 30 different countries held their congress in Paris in July. They came from Europe, from Asia, from Africa, from North America; from points as widely distant as Australia, India, South Africa, China. Thirteen came from the United States. Well-known women were there: Fröken Hesselgren, a member of the Swedish Parliament; Princess Cantacuzène, of the Municipal Council of Bucharest; the Maharani Sahebi of India; Mme Maria Vérone, France's most famous suffragist. The quota from the United States included Ruth Hanna McCormick Simms, ex-Congresswoman from Illinois; Grace Thompson Seton, explorer and author; and Lena Madesin Phillips, president of the Women's Business and Professional League. Alice Paul, at the last minute, did not sail.

Their resolutions were vacuous, not because the universal plight of women was unknown to the delegates. Again and again the speeches emphasized the fact that everywhere married women are being dismissed from their jobs; equal pay is becoming a joke; in Italy and Germany women are practically barred from all fields of endeavor except that of domestic service. In Germany only 10 per cent of the students in colleges can be women. As for political recognition, even in countries where there is woman suffrage, women are not given a voice in government councils. Certainly a Frances Perkins in the Cabinet, a Ruth Bryan Owen in Denmark, a Florence Allen in the United States Court, an Anna Moskowitz and others scattered in city and State offices throughout the nation can hardly be called political recognition for fifty million women who have been voters for twenty years.

In fact, save for the right of women to choose their own nationality, that principle which Doris Stevens had inserted in the Pan-American treaty and which was made a federal law by our last Congress, the story of women's advance during the past few years was a doleful tale of ignominious retreat.

The council failed to achieve anything vital in spite of immediate compelling events. There was the fact that the German delegates, at the last minute, were not permitted to attend the congress. The Führer refused them their visas. Also known to many was the plight of Frau A. and Frau B. in Germany. These two women had often aided the members of the council in their work for women. Today their homes have been looted and their possessions and money seized by the Nazis, not because of race or creed but solely because they believe in peace. And yet Germany is not supposed to be at war. Added to these incidents was the news spread over the columns of the Continental press of the outrageous treatment of women political prisoners in Italy. If there ever was a direct challenge flung at a gathering of feminists, it was flung at the International Council of Women in those days from July 2 to July 12.

The council answered it by a medley of resolutions on every conceivable subject. Most of them lacked both direction and vitality. Fear seemed to hover over the delegates' heads at a time which called for courage, initiative, and clear thinking. For example, "A Charter of Rights" for mothers, married and unmarried, was introduced. The opening clause was, "The woman who accepts the sufferings and duties of motherhood is entitled to respect." But the delegates punctiliously voted out the word "respect."

There were a number of resolutions on peace such as, "We desire to dedicate ourselves afresh to the supreme task of surmounting the barriers of race, creed, caste, and nationality." These resolutions were good but not original, following closely the ideas of various committees of the League of Nations. All work for peace is tremendously needed; but after all peace today is no orphan child. Both men and women are working furiously for it. But in the light of past experience no one is going to save the women from economic and political drowning in war but the women themselves.

Lena Madesin Phillips, after much work behind the scenes, did get the delegates to indorse the idea of a woman's right to choose her own nationality. After that, merrily on marched the procession of resolutions: on suffrage, of course; also on drugs, movies, broadcasting, prisons, sex hygiene, equal pay, school budgets, and the admission of children to barrooms. Then the council passed, shoulder to shoulder with disarmament resolutions of world-wide importance, one on tonsils and adenoids. And topped them all off with a motion to save the little fishes and birds from death by the discharge of oil from ships at sea.

Fish and tonsils! When women the world over are being sacrificed in the name of the god of the economic crisis! When in a few months many women lost the things gained after their struggle of decades! The time was ripe for those crusaders from thirty different nations to hurl forth to the four corners of the earth a ringing manifesto of women's wrongs and women's rights in this year 1934. But these 300 women missed their opportunity. Small wonder that the Paris press summed up the work of the International Council of Women in a headline saying: "Women Quit Talking After Asking Lots."

In the Driftway

IT is some 442 years since Columbus first set foot on American soil. And the Drifter, climbing one step upward on his little individual Ararat as the roaring tides of chaos rise higher and higher, wonders if it wouldn't have been a good idea if Columbus when he returned to Spain had said simply: "I found nothing. There is nothing there." The Drifter will leave it to his readers to mull over what might not have happened if Columbus had just kept still about his discovery. But discoverers have always talked and even now they have not learned the wisdom of silence.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is led into these reflections by a piece of news that has just come out of Australia. In the center of New Guinea a group of Australian government scientists have discovered a new "promised land," a grassy, fertile country where 200,000 "fine, healthy blacks" have been living for centuries completely shut off from the world. Ranges of high mountains, and the theory among scientists that New Guinea consisted entirely of wilderness, swamps, and jungles, guarded the blacks and their beautiful plateau from discovery until one day a group of airplanes stuck their noses over the mountains—and the game was up.

> We just rubbed our eyes [said Mr. Chinnery, one of the discoverers]. We couldn't believe what we saw. Instead of endless jungle we saw beautiful rolling country ahead of us with rivers meandering through green valleys. . . . Most of the plateau is between 5,000 and 6,000 feet above the sea and the climate is cool and pleasant.

Having discovered the land, the scientists in the planes must needs go into it on foot and explore it thoroughly. The Drifter can understand this. But he feels that in the present state of the world a scientist should have better sense than to make public the existence of a corner of the earth that is still comparatively happy. Mr. Chinnery seems to be aware of his mistake. He seems to be as sorry as the Drifter that he ever brought the matter up. "It is a pretty big responsibility," says he, "to add 200,000 natives to the British Empire and make sure they won't be exploited." "For the present," he continues, "we are trying to introduce a system of indirect rule under which one man from each village is chosen to do the government work of keeping law and order." He fails to say how law and order were kept before and why it wasn't a good system. "I don't expect trouble," he goes on sadly, "unless gold is found in the new lands. Then prospectors will pour in and it will be difficult to keep the country for the natives." And he ends on an ominous note. "Some gold has been found already. . . ."

* * * * *

IT is a tribute to the early church fathers that they recognized the dilemma in which Mr. Chinnery finds himself. For them paradise was forever beyond reach of mortal man. No rust could corrupt it, no empires could steal away its bright desirability. It was paradise, indeed, merely by virtue of the fact that man could not attain it until he had lost his human nature and become an angel. Unfortunately this does not help the 200,000 happy natives in New Guinea who have now been duly delivered into the hands of the British Empire. It is just too bad that Mr. Chinnery and his companions, when they returned from that fateful journey over the mountains, did not retort simply: "We found nothing. There is nothing there."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Help Herndon!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The readers of The Nation do not need to be told of Angelo Herndon, Negro organizer of the unemployed, who has been sentenced to eighteen years on a Georgia chain gang, charged with inciting to insurrection. Actually, he led a demonstration of blacks and whites to demand relief after the Atlanta authorities had expressly invited all those who were not being properly cared for to present their grievances.

But the readers of The Nation may not have heard that Herndon will go to the chain gang on August 3 unless bail of $15,000 is raised first. Contributions in cash or Liberty bonds should be sent to the International Labor Defense, 80 East Eleventh Street, New York. Corliss Lamont, Robert W. Dunn, and Anna Damon will act as trustees of all funds sent in for this purpose.

New York, July 24 QUINCY HOWE

Teachers in Distress

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Again the children of New York State are being made the victims of false and outrageous economy. Under the Friedsam Act the amount of State aid required for the coming school year is $116,000,000, but the State has thus far appropriated only $102,000,000. Since the education budgets of municipalities throughout the State were computed on the basis of the full statutory quota of State aid, those communities which are unable to increase their income from local taxation now find it impossible to maintain their educational standards. New York City, for example, is faced with a shut-down of the schools and another payless furlough for teachers in December unless the full allotment of State funds is forthcoming.

All friends of free public education are urged to bring pressure immediately on Governor Lehman and Senators Jeremiah Twomey and John Dunnigan, to live up to the provisions of the Friedsam Act by providing the necessary complement of State aid.

New York, July 21 PAUL GASTWIRTH,
Chairman Legislative Committee,
Clasroom Teacher Groups

Lenin, Trotzky, and World Revolution

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The vehemence with which the Stalinists here and the Trotzkyites abroad are cursing me for my article The Tragedy of Trotzky, in The Nation for May 2, suggests that I told a truth uncomfortable for both of them. As for Elliot E. Cohen's rejoinder the following week, I must in the first place violently protest against the "summary" of my article with which he begins. It is as unnecessary as it is misleading.

I did not say that Trotzky's trust in the world revolution was a "heresy." I said it was a mistake. It was a mistake for a statesman to base his policy between 1924 and 1927 on the supposition that a world revolution would come soon enough to rescue the Soviet Union from the capitalist decay into which he thought it was relapsing. It is one thing to believe in the coming of the world revolution. Stalin declares that we are approaching a new "series of wars and revolutions." But for Trotzky to have set up world revolution as an alternative to Stalin's program of building socialism in one country meant that he expected an actual world revolution within a few years. Here he was definitely in error. For at no time between 1924 and the present has the world revolution been so near as to warrant a Soviet statesman in including it as a factor in the formulation of policy. Where would the Soviet Union be today if instead of trying to build socialism and to reconcile itself to normal relations with bourgeois Powers it had assumed, as Trotzky assumed, that the proletariat's relation with the peasantry could wait while it sacrificed every consideration to the prosecution of the world revolutionary cause? The Soviet Union would have suffered, but nothing the Soviet government might have done could have brought about the world revolution.

I said in my original article that "there is reason to believe that toward the end of life, seeing the likelihood of world revolution diminish, he [Lenin] inclined to Stalin's present view that socialism could be established in the Soviet Union." Mr. Cohen does not believe that there is any evidence for the assumption that Lenin took the view of socialism in one country. Here is the evidence:

In May 1923, eight months before he died, Lenin published his famous and much discussed article On Cooperation. "We are forced to recognize," he wrote, "a fundamental change in our entire point of view on socialism. . . ." "For us it is enough now to carry out this cultural revolution in order to become a completely socialist country. . . ." "For us now the simple growth of cooperatives is identical with the growth of socialism." To become a socialist country, Lenin said in his last paragraph, Russia must raise its cultural level and develop its material means of production. These are the very processes which have been pushed so intensively ever since he wrote those words but especially after 1928.

Lenin's assertion in 1923 that "our entire point of view on socialism" had undergone a fundamental change was not a sudden inspiration. It was his deduction from five and a half years of Soviet history. Prior to 1917 all Bolsheviks of course believed that a socialist regime could not be established permanently in agrarian Russia unless a world revolution came to its aid. But the moment the Soviet government was formed it became necessary to decide in each instance whether the given possibility of furthering revolution abroad warranted the Bolsheviks in taking the risks connected therewith.

When the New Economic Policy was inaugurated, many Bolsheviks asked: For how long? Lenin replied in a short speech on May 28, 1921. Naturally, he affirmed, a policy intended for many years may be scrapped if the world revolution arrives. At the moment, capitalism was somewhat more stable. Nevertheless, revolution was still possible. "We, however," he stated, "cannot resort to guesses in this matter [of the advent of the world revolution—L. F.]. At present we exert our main influence on the world revolution by our domestic economic policy." And again: "If we solve this problem [of Russia's economy] then we will have certainly and finally won on an international scale, too."

This is Stalin's present policy of furthering the world revolution by achieving economic progress at home. Lenin's advice was to push the building of socialism in Russia and not to depend on guesses regarding the imminence of foreign revolution. Trotzky did not take this view in 1924 or at any subsequent date since he did not believe in the socialization of the peasantry. He did not conceive, therefore, of socialism in the U. S. S. R. without foreign revolutions. In 1919, in a pamphlet entitled "Results and Prospects," Trotzky discussed a program of socialist agrarian reform. "But how deeply," he asked, "can the socialist policy of the working class affect Russia's economic conditions? One can say with certainty: it will encounter political obstructions much sooner than it will be checked by the technical backwardness of the country." That is, peasant opposition would prevent the socialization of agriculture, and technical progress is therefore not the way to achieve socialism. "Without direct government support from the European proletariat," Trotzy accordingly asserts, "the working class of Russia cannot retain power and convert its temporary domination into a prolonged socialist dictatorship." This is the principle of "permanent revolution," a doctrine of pessimism regarding Soviet internal developments. Trotzky felt that before Soviet industrial progress overcame peasant opposition, peasant opposition would overcome the Bolsheviks—unless the world revolution saved them. Events have proved this theory completely wrong. The world revolution is as far away as when Trotzky was expelled from the Communist Party but socialism in the U. S. S. R. is much nearer at hand. The Trotzkyists do not believe this. They reject the Soviet Union. Mr. Cohen denies that assertion. But I have read enough Trotzkyist literature to know that it is true. And I have also read Mr. Cohen's articles. "Facts mountain-high confirm Fischer's news of Moscow's repudiation of Leninism," he writes. Of course I did not say that Moscow had repudiated Leninism. That is only Cohen's "summary." It is Mr. Cohen who affirms that Moscow has repudiated Leninism. The dilemma of Rakovsky is the dilemma of all Trotzkyists. They cannot approve of Soviet policy. (Let Mr. Cohen say that he does, or let him distinguish between Stalin's program and the Soviet government.) And the world revolution on which they base their hopes is rather slow in making its appearance. Liberals and foreign Communists can afford to wait for it. But the statesmen in Moscow had to formulate a policy. The result has not always been such as to satisfy the delicate sensibilities of outside observers like myself and Mr. Cohen, who would love to see a 100 per cent observance of revolutionary mores. But this is a realistic world and it makes ugly demands on politicians. It was with Lenin's knowledge that Chicherin went to Genoa in 1922 in top hat and cutaway and bowed to a king and clinked wine glasses with the Pope's representative. It was while Trotzky was a member of the Politburo that friendly relations were established with Mussolini. The rest is a question of degree and of execution. If you must trade with the capitalists, and the Bolsheviks must, and if you want some guaranty of peace, then you must have friendly diplomatic relations with the bourgeois Powers—and they exact their price. This is very sad—but it is so. It would be much better if there were Soviets in the United States, England, and France. But there aren't.

Moscow, July 1 LOUIS FISCHER

Labor and Industry

The Kohler Myth Dies

By GUNNAR MICKELSEN

Kohler, Wisconsin, July 29

NEWSPAPERS have given their account of the Kohler strike and massacre. There is more to the story. The two men that died in hospitals shortly after the attack by a privately hired company army of not less than 500 men were shot in the back. The backs of the legs and thighs of five women were riddled with buckshot and bullets. At least fifty others were hit with gunfire. The attack and attitude of the company deputies became so savage that Father J. W. McGuire, federal mediator, known as a friend of labor, urged the governor to send troops to protect the strikers. With the evening and night of terror, the myth of the "Kohler Utopia" was smashed forever. The story behind the strike is the story of the rise and fall of America's most widely advertised venture in industrial paternalism.

For eleven days a picket line made up 90 per cent of employees and former employees of the company had patrolled the plant, with only a single minor occurrence of disorder. The strikers' committee claimed a membership in the A. F. of L. union of 1,900 out of a possible 2,500 employees. Throughout the State newspapers sided militantly with Walter J. Kohler, who issued a statement to the press charging the strike was fomented by "outside radical agitators." But newspaper reporters, in discussing the strike among themselves, agreed that they had been amazed at the type of men represented in the picket line. They were average, simple, good-natured German American workingmen who believed they were acting under new laws with the sanction and urging of a new kind of President. They were the men handpicked by the Kohler personnel experts.

While the pickets marched, the company prepared. Reporters learned from deputies stationed within the plant that the strike had been anticipated. Machine-guns had been placed at many points. Cots and food supplies for the guards were on hand. Several hundred lead-loaded billies were made in the plant. Two days after the strike began, the Kohler unit of the National Guard arrived from camp in several trucks, drove into the factory grounds, and stored their rifles and ammunition in the plant. All members of the unit are company employees. Two days before the massacre Anton Brotz, village mayor and research engineer for the company, publicly announced that trouble might be expected.

On the twelfth day of the strike the company evidently decided its preparations for the clean-up were complete. In the morning 150 armed deputies rode in steel-sided trucks down the picket line, "shaking it up." After the long period of peace the pickets were surprised at the sudden assault and made no resistance when their willow canes were taken from them and their shelters smashed. The entire situation had suddenly changed. From an atmosphere of peace, the air had become charged with apprehension and ill-will.

That evening crowds began assembling near the plant. In it were the wives and children of the strikers in greater number than before. A flung stone struck the spark that set off the disturbance. The crowd was several blocks from the center of the plant front, the office building. Pickets still marched back and forth. More stones flew. Windows broke. The crowd began to yell and cheer. It moved down the row of factory buildings, breaking windows as it went. So far there was no move on the part of the guards either inside or outside the plant. Richard S. Davis, veteran correspondent of the Milwaukee Journal, described this part of the event as follows:

> And then without warning it came—the angry answer of the waiting deputies . . . it was so sudden, so completely overwhelming that no one out there could do more than gasp and run. The strategy of the deputies had been well planned. The plan was not to forestall the costly attack, but to annihilate the attackers at the height of their destructive fury.

The company, the sheriff, and the mediator, each for reasons of his own, joined in an appeal for troops. The first act of the troops upon arrival next morning from Milwaukee was to disarm and disband the company army and to permit the strikers to reform their picket lines. Numerous machine-gun nests, on roofs and behind barricades, were pointed out by pickets and ordered removed by the troop commander. For perhaps the first time State troops were cheered by pickets as they marched through the town. In the face of as ruthless a slaughter of defenseless men and women as labor annals of the country can show, newspaper editorials went so far as to censure the deputies and to refer to Kohler as the "paternalistic executive" whose management of the strike situation was done "in blindness."

Kohler village deserves the praise it has got for the outward beauty of its houses and the arrangement of its streets and parks. It is not, however, as has been popularly supposed, the home of a majority of Kohler employees. Actually only about 16 per cent of those normally on the pay roll live there. Of the 400 employees living in the village, at least 150 are single men, housed in the dormitory. Most of the executives have their homes, larger than those of the workers, and in most instances removed from them by gullies or parks, in the village. Many foremen also live there, leaving but a very small percentage of rank-and-file shop employees as occupants of the model homes. In the face of these figures, the charge by Mr. Kohler that only a small percentage of the village residents were in the picket line loses all its intended significance.

In the belief that satisfied workers produce the most and the best work, Kohler began the building of a model factory village about twenty years ago. Land and homes ready to occupy, on streets that were already paved and parked, were sold to the employees through the Kohler Investment Company and financed by the Kohler Building and Loan Association. (Today foreclosure actions are pending against many of the homes.) Kohler agents met German boats at Ellis Island and urged the young and strong men among the immigrants to make their new home in Kohler.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC

In Kohler village and Kohler factory, Mr. Kohler was king. So long as business boomed, wages were average. There were few complaints, and those who made them were quickly weeded out. Within the walls of the plant itself the Kohler management ruled with no less an iron hand than the management of any other open-shop factory. Time study and the speed-up are the order of the day at Kohler. But the majority of the men upon whom the heaviest labor fell had come from countries where those things were taken for granted. Here at Kohler they had an employees' benefit association. It is true it deducted a monthly sum from their pay checks but then did it not pay them one dollar a day for thirteen weeks when they were ill, and $100 to their family if they died? It is true there was no summer vacation for shop workers, but every man Jack got a goose for Christmas if he was married, and a wallet or pocket knife if he was single. If the men in the sand-blasting department contracted silicosis in alarming numbers, that was too bad; but after all the pay of six dollars a day was good pay.

There was no doubt a sincere effort to retain men on the pay roll after the slump cut into sales, but early in 1932 there were already 225 Kohler employees and their families on the relief rolls of Sheboygan. The company has maintained that it built up large and costly inventories to keep the men at work, but no proof has been offered and the workers deny that any great stocks exist.

About a year ago hundreds of the shop employees were laid off indefinitely. Other hundreds were given but one or two days' work a week. Only a small percentage worked full time, and most of these were residents of the village. The 2,000 men and women that lived in Sheboygan and Sheboygan Falls were either on county relief rolls or lived with the help of their familes. Yet the regular dues for benefit, insurance, and athletic associations were deducted from the part-time checks. At times these deductions took the whole check. Besides, there were the fines for faulty work and breakage of machinery. It was then the men began to think. They knew, for instance, that a State law passed in 1931 made it illegal for employers to charge the men for faulty work and breakage unless gross negligence could be proved.

When the NRA granted labor the free right to organize, there was a spontaneous rush of Kohler employees to join the A. F. of L. union. One of the foremen in the plant, a village resident, was chosen president. Besides union recognition, the men wanted seniority rights in the allotment of work and sixty-five cents an hour for semi-skilled labor, which had been grouped with common labor at the forty-cent minimum rate set by the code (Walter Kohler is a member of the plumbing code authority that fixed the wages). Mr. Kohler countered with a company union and scores of those who had joined the workers' union were discharged for various given reasons. Complaints by the workers to the code compliance board had been shelved. Appeals to Washington were met with evasive answers and postponements. Recently union committees began calling upon Mr. Kohler. They were received, their demands listened to, and evasive answers given. Finally a fourteen-point demand was sent to the company. It replied with fourteen answers that were typical of all employers antagonistic to unions. The strike was called as a last effort to get the attention of Washington and compel the enforcement of Section 7-a.

Much has been said of the sincere interest felt by Walter Kohler in the welfare of his workers. Kohler is a member of the Wisconsin Manufacturers' Association, was at one time its president. As one who has often attended its meetings the writer can testify that its attitude toward workers is one of incredible enmity. One of its major functions is the lobbying for anti-labor legislation at Madison, and this work was no less vicious during the Kohler presidency than at any other time. In 1923 the Kohler Company sent a letter to all State legislators "respectfully requesting" them to vote against a "revolutionary and discriminatory measure" that proposed to reduce factory working hours from nine to eight a day. When it came to a final question of Kohler property or Kohler workers, it was gas, cracked heads, gunshot wounds, and death to the workers for the sake of the property. The crash of windows shattered on that sacred property was reason enough to loose a stream of lead into the well-loved employees.

Your Government Is a Strike-Breaker

By COLSTON E. WARNE AND LEO HUBERMAN

THE strike of the Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Union, affiliated with the Trade Unity League, on the 3,200-acre Seabrook produce farm in South Jersey, was recently "settled." Small wonder that strikers all over the country are suspicious of federal mediators and arbitration boards. The government in this instance seems to have played its usual role of effectively sabotaging a going strike while arranging for what is apparently a packed board to take up the issues in the future. Before examining the settlement as proposed by the federal conciliator, we should like to report the results of an investigation of a committee of the Philadelphia Civil Liberties Union on Saturday, July 7, when the strike was still in progress.

Identical questions were put to C. F. Seabrook and to the strike committee. The substance of the answers obtained is given here:

QUESTION: How did the strike start?

MR. S.: It's all the work of outside agitators. The strike was caused by Communists. For five years we've had no trouble whatsoever with our contented South Jersey labor. Then this man Henderson and his wife and Leif Dahl and his wife came down and started all the trouble. Henderson openly boasts that he is a Communist and I have a letter from him headed "District Organizer of the C. P."

STRIKE COMMITTEE: The strike started because Mr. Seabrook broke his April agreement with our union. Conditions had been so bad and wages so low on the Seabrook farm that we were compelled to strike in April. We won that strike and secured from Mr. Seabrook a one-year agreement to pay us thirty cents an hour, which was double our previous wage.

QUESTION: Are all the workers on strike?

Mr. S.: Most of these workers would have been laid off at this time anyway. They don't count as strikers. The workers in the cannery have not gone out.

Strikers: All of the 350 workers are out with the exception of eight or nine tractor drivers who report for work but do not work.

Question: What is the dispute about wages?

Mr. S.: I have been paying my men thirty cents and upwards an hour and the women twenty-five cents. I never did cut wages. All of these reports in the Daily Worker and other papers that I wanted to pay eighteen cents and even sixteen cents are so many lies.

Strikers: Before the April agreement wages averaged fifteen cents an hour for men, twelve and one-half cents for women, and five cents for children (from seven years up). By the terms of our agreement we were to get a flat rate of thirty cents an hour for men, twenty-five cents for women, no more child labor, and time and a half for overtime and Sunday work. Here is Seabrook's letter telling us that he must cut wages, and at our meeting with him he told us he would have to return to an eighteen-cent scale. He also stated in his letter that "unless you accept this offer before 6 a. m. June 25, we expect to suspend permanently all operations other than those that can be carried out largely with mechanical equipment and to make such arrangements for workers to take care of these operations as we see fit and we do not propose to recognize or have anything further to do with your organization."

Question: Do the workers live on the farm?

Mr. S.: Yes, the company has provided houses and barracks for its help. Rent is very low and in many cases it is never paid and we don't bother about it.

Strikers: The workers are divided into three sections, whites, Negroes, and Americans, with the rents for their houses ranging from two dollars a month to ten dollars. The Negroes are given broken-down sheds such as you see here, most often without water, light, or sanitary facilities. The Italians, who form the white colony, pay higher rent for better houses. The tractor drivers and sub-foremen are the Americans who live in the best houses. In the winter months, when we are laid off, rent continues just the same, only it is added up and deducted from our spring pay checks. When we are working the rent is deducted in advance from our weekly pay checks. Here are pay-check stubs to prove this.

Question: Is there also a company store?

Mr. S.: No, but there is a store on the property where most of the workers buy their food.

Strikers: It's not a company store but everything we buy there is deducted from our pay check same as our rent. We get our checks at the store. Prices of most things are a penny or two higher than in the stores further along.

Question: How do you explain the violence reported in the press?

Mr. S.: It's the result of these Communist agitators. Yesterday two men, a constable and a tractor driver, went to the hospital after being beaten and stoned by strikers. We haven't had adequate police protection. Our man Saunders has done a good job, but our loyal workers have not been adequately protected in their right to work.

Strikers: Our picketing has been peaceful. We are not armed in any way. The company has had as constable Red Saunders, a man with a criminal record, who has slugged and beaten the picketers often with the aid of other armed thugs employed by the company. We have been tear-gassed and arrested on fake charges. This morning Seabrook tried to break up our picket line by hauling the pickets one by one into his office where the magistrate was holding court. When seven of our men refused to sign statements saying they would go off the line, they were sent to the Bridgeton jail on charges of vagrancy, and assault and battery with intent to kill. Seabrook's lawyers questioned us and the judges sentenced us in Seabrook's own office. We did not beat up the tractor driver and Red Saunders until after he knocked hell out of us with his one-and-a-half-foot blackjack.

Question: We understand that yesterday morning some of the strikers were run down by a company truck driven by Courtney Seabrook. Is that true?

Mr. S.: Absolutely false. Not a single person was even bruised. I have reports from my confidential observers that at the union meetings they practice falling down in front of trucks without getting hurt—just like they do in Union Square. They fall down and shout that a cop has beaten them.

Strikers: They drove right through our picket line full speed. Here is one of our men who was taken to the hospital with a smashed ankle. These two women just jumped out of the way in time or they would have been killed.

The foregoing testimony is clearly conflicting. Some light on the veracity of the witnesses may be thrown by the facts uncovered concerning the operations of the vigilantes in the area. When we questioned Mr. Seabrook concerning the activities of the vigilantes and the Ku Klux Klan he said he hadn't spoken to the leader of the vigilantes for seven months. We later learned that Seabrook had spoken at the meeting of the vigilantes the Monday previous! Also, during our conversation, Mr. Seabrook left the room and returned saying that Dave Jaggers, leader of the vigilantes, had just phoned him offering fifty shotgun deputies for Monday morning's clean-up of the strikers. Later in the day we interviewed Mr. Jaggers at his Deerfield garage and recognized him as one of the men who had been present during our whole meeting with Seabrook!

Dave Jaggers told us that his committee was "prepared to go to the Seabrook farm Monday morning to run out of the county any strikers or strike agitators. If they aren't satisfied with their pay, let 'em get out." His efforts are backed up by the Klan, which has already frightened away the leader of the April strike by burning crosses and firing shots.

Mr. Jaggers and his vigilantes were on hand Monday morning. Our committee watched the peaceful picketing which was in progress. In spite of this, nine pickets were arrested for disorderly conduct and the use of tear gas was threatened by C. F. Seabrook. When he thought that observers had disappeared from the scene, an attack of tear and nausea gas was launched on the strikers. A wagon of beets came in from the fields. Two women ineffectively took handfuls in expression of their indignation. They were beaten by deputies who started a mass attack upon the picket line, followed by the use of the fire hose. Strikers retorted to both with shingles, sticks, and an occasional half-brick. At this point the battle cleared and the wagon of beets was rolled into the shelter of the cannery. Then the deputies started a punitive expedition on the strikers' village. Tear and nausea gas was thrown along the row of pathetic cottages behind which the workers had sought shelter. Belford Seabrook, son of the proprietor, himself threw a bomb into a house then occupied only by an Italian mother and two very small children. He had previously shouted to his men: "Get this woman; she talks too much." The bomb, hurled through the window, landed on a bed and set the sheets ablaze. The rooms were so filled with smoke and gas fumes that the place was uninhabitable for more than two days. These children, as well as a number caught unawares in other houses in the row, suffered ill effects from the dose of tear gas. At the close of the attack, twenty-four more of the strike leaders were jailed.

Basic in the Seabrook dispute are the low prices of produce and the low wage scales generally prevalent in South Jersey—generally averaging about fifteen cents an hour. The Seabrook Farms have been aided by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Farm Credit Administration to the tune of $200,000. The existence of this loan, accompanied as it was with government supervision of expenditures, said Mr. Seabrook, had forced curtailment of wage payments.

Other government assistance came last winter from the CWA. But just as the food, clothing, shelter, and the courts in that township are all Seabrook, so the government agency fell into line. Mark Loper, field manager of the Seabrook Farms, was made CWA administrator. Instead of taking on those workers already laid off in the slack winter season, he transferred those favored workers still employed on the Seabrook Farms to the CWA pay roll to do work on Seabrook's private roads!

This, then, was the set-up when Federal Conciliator John A. Moffett made his appearance on Tuesday, July 10. After an all-day conference with Mr. Seabrook and the attorney for the union, an agreement was evolved by which the management agreed to continue the thirty-cent rate for men and twenty-five cents for women; to take back as many strikers as possible without discrimination until all were rehired; and to care for all future disputes through a board of adjustment of five members, two to be named by the Master of the Pomona Grange, one to be the County Agent, and one to be "a public-spirited citizen" selected by Judge Leroy W. Loder; the fifth was to be the federal conciliator himself. In order to gain an idea of the impartiality of the board set up by Moffett, it is significant to note that the Pomona Grange is representative of the "substantial" farmers, who last spring in the New Jersey meeting protested that the CWA wage scale was too high to permit of profitable agriculture. Furthermore, Judge Loder has been under attack by the union throughout the conflict.

Mr. Moffett, formerly legislative agent of the American Federation of Labor, gave as his parting shot: "The trouble at Bridgeton was mainly due to the radical element, the Communists. We want to make the board a permanent institution not only to settle the trouble at Bridgeton, but to adjust difficulties of the workers and canners all over New Jersey."

Thus the government continues its role as strike-breaker. Already gross discrimination against militant Negroes has appeared in the reemployment of workers. Outsiders are being hired in place of the strikers. Clearly, Mr. Seabrook owes the government a vote of thanks.

Labor Notes

What Is News?

As American workers grow more militant in their demands and methods, the police and those who control them grow more ruthless in the suppression of labor activities. The brutality with which pickets were shot down in Kohler, Wisconsin, is described in this issue of The Nation by Gunnar Mickelsen. For the benefit of those who doubt Mr. Mickelsen's story of the shootings, as well as of certain other aspects of the Kohler strike, because it differs from most of the reports from Kohler that have appeared in the daily press, The Nation wishes to put on record the testimony of Father McGuire, member of the Chicago Regional Labor Board and one of the federal mediators in the strike. In a speech before the session of the Sheboygan County Board at which it was decided to ask Governor Schmedeman to hold the State troops in Kohler pending a settlement, Father McGuire spoke in part as follows:

> I have been in many strikes but I never saw such needless and ruthless killing by supporters of the law. . . . When it is understood that most of the people were shot in the back last Friday, the ruthlessness is evident. You don't have to shoot people in the back when they are running away! I examined a score of wounded, and all except two were shot in the back. . . . A deep wrong has been done.

We take the account of this speech from the Milwaukee Journal. It would seem that as a mere matter of news such a statement by a federal mediator in a violent strike warranted national publication. The New York Times found space for an extremely wordy "special" story from Kohler more than half of which was taken up with sentimental and sympathetic sentences about Walter J. Kohler. Mr. Kohler, it pointed out in three different versions, is not disillusioned even yet. The Kohler contention, which Mr. Mickelsen effectively challenges, that the pickets are not Kohler employees—"they do not even live in Kohler village"—was also repeated at least twice. But the speech of Father McGuire a few days later was not reported in either the New York Times or the Herald Tribune.

Eyewitnesses who were also pickets in the Minneapolis shootings have said that it was a cold-blooded attack by heavily armed police on completely unarmed pickets. They maintain that many of the victims were shot in the back and that some of them were shot in the back as they stooped to pick up wounded comrades. Such witnesses would be the last to claim impartiality but the following letter from an outside observer closely confirms their statements. It comes from E. E. Fagereng, secretary of the University of Minnesota Press, and it reads in part:

> On last Thursday and Friday the so-called "Citizens' Alliance" (an employers' organization) decided that they must break the strike, and determined to terrorize the strikers and then to throw a "red communistic" scare into the all-too-gullible public. On Friday afternoon, July 20, Father Haas called at the office of Chief of Police Johannes and had the understanding with him that there would be no police intervention until there had been time to arrive at peace terms, and he stated he had reason to believe that the difficulties would soon be ironed out. At the very moment of this conference the police were having a showdown with the strikers under orders from Chief Johannes. Apparently the employers feared that the Reverend Haas had too much sympathy in his heart for the workers and that any settlement he might negotiate would give some recognition to the workers' unions. The Minneapolis employers are fully determined at all costs to do everything in their power to break the unions and to keep Minneapolis an open-shop town. Last Friday they decided to begin moving trucks under armed guard. Hundreds of policemen were called into action, and a test truck containing only a few small boxes was the first to be moved. Naturally the pickets sensed what was being done and gathered to resist. The "pitched battle" referred to in the local newspapers was a cold-blooded shooting into a group of entirely unarmed men. Not a single one of them carried a weapon. The first victim to die, Henry Ness, a Scandinavian World War veteran who is survived by a poverty-stricken widow and four small children, was buried yesterday. Forty of the forty-five victims are reported to have been shot in the back, some of them as far as three blocks away.

Two Blue Eagles

I

FEW incidents in the history of the NRA are so scandalous as the recent agreement by which the Blue Eagle was restored to the Harriman, Tennessee, Hosiery Mills. The Blue Eagle was removed, on the recommendation of the Wagner Board, because the company played fast and loose with Section 7-a and stubbornly refused to try negotiating a collective contract in good faith. Furthermore, the company consistently drew back from reinstating some 300 former strikers, not to speak of the thirty union workers whose discharge precipitated the strike. The NRA's agreement with the company has not a word to say about any obligation on the management to negotiate a contract with the local of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers. Provision is made, not for the reinstatement of 300 strikers, but for the rehiring of twenty-five within sixty days and of twenty-five more by January 1—if, as, and when the mill adds to the present total of its working force. Moreover, the promise of reinstatement is hedged about with contingencies which transform it into a mere scrap of paper. Naturally enough the return of the Blue Eagle under such circumstances aroused the resentment, not only of the hosiery workers' union, but also of the Labor Advisory Board, of William Green, of Major Berry, and, it is said, of Secretary Perkins. Responding to these protests, General Johnson has commanded that the Blue Eagle shall be withdrawn unless the mill rehires fifty workers "immediately," and unless the management "agrees to collective bargaining." But General Johnson is silent about the 250 remaining strikers and does not explain what he means by the term "collective bargaining." Indeed, there is reason to believe that General Johnson had a part to play in the agreement. Mr. Glancy, a subordinate who negotiated the agreement, would hardly have acted as he did on a matter of major policy unless he had authority to do so. Meanwhile the mill is operating with the NRA's blessing.

II

THE NRA code for men's clothing is one of the few codes providing minimum pay rates for semi-skilled and skilled workers over and above the basic unskilled minimum. Moreover, it is one of the handful of codes of which it can be said that the labor provisions are the fruit of genuine collective bargaining between a trade union and employers. That this particular code prescribed a wage scale rather than a bare minimum was due entirely to the skill and force by which the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America brought pressure to bear last summer upon both the NRA and the non-union manufacturers. L. Greif and Brothers, Inc., of Baltimore, second largest manufacturer of men's clothing in the United States, running open shops in some ten plants, complied with the basic minimum of approximately $15 per week, but all other pay schedules were kept below levels prevailing in plants which met the code scale in full. This brought Greif into conflict with the industry's Code Authority, which ordered an upward adjustment of pay schedules and restitution of $100,000 in back wages. The management ignored both orders, the Code Authority turned for help to the NRA Compliance Division, and there ensued proceedings which led to the recent action depriving the Greif firm of the right to use Blue Eagle labels on its merchandise. Apparently, however, the company intends to ignore the Compliance Division and continue to use Blue Eagle labels until the matter is passed on by the court this fall. The issues here are simple yet fundamental: Can semi-skilled and skilled workers expect no protection under the codes? Shall employers be permitted to level down all wage rates toward the sheer minimum? In industries where workers are organized, shall a manufacturer be permitted to whittle away the union scale?

Rubber "Settlement"

HERALDED as a victory by newspapers, including the Daily Worker, the settlement of the General Tire and Rubber Company strike in Akron, Ohio, was actually a severe setback for labor. The strike of 1,100 workers, which started early in June, was begun primarily to obtain labor recognition. This was not granted. Instead, the company in an eight-point program agreed to meet with any committee of "our employees" duly appointed to discuss grievances. This statement and the fact that the eight-point program was addressed to the employees were accepted as recognition by union leaders. The next day President William O'Neil of the company cleared up that point by saying that it did not mean recognition. Six of the eight points dealt with wage increases—minor ones at best—and provisions for seniority rights in lay-offs. No provision was made to prevent lay-offs. The A. F. of L. union leaders refused to let O'Neil add the provision that he would recognize the union when other rubber barons recognized their employees' unions. This at least would have shown the workers that the settlement which they accepted did not include recognition. This peculiar type of settlement has since been effected in two other Akron strikes—one at the Enterprise Manufacturing Company involving 200 union men, and one at an ice company affecting 50 workers. It is highly probable that other settlements in the tire industry will follow the Akron model. Meanwhile the coming of the slack season makes a real strike more difficult.

A Problem for Mr. Ickes

THE management of the second largest refinery of Andrew Mellon's Gulf Refining Company, at Girard Point in Philadelphia, has defied the order of the Petroleum Labor Policy Board that 900 men who went out on strike for wages set in the petroleum code be taken back to work. To take back the strikers, J. H. Drake, president of the company, pointed out, would mean dismissal of the hundreds of faithful men who came in—at wages higher than the code scale—to break the strike. Drake's admission that strike-breakers were hired happens to be at variance with the statement of his manager to the Petroleum Board that no new workers were hired after the strike was called on June 27. But aside from the question of wages, the Gulf management declares that the strikers have lost whatever rights they may have possessed because they withdrew from the stand-pat American Federation of Labor union in the oil industry and formed their own labor organization, which they call the Independent Oil Workers' Union. Mr. Ickes is here confronted with another neat problem in labor relations.

BURLINGAME
PUBLI

Books

Warning to the Good

By VINCENT McHUGH

Enmity has no color,
Neither red nor gray.
Discoverable in a knife
Or a child at play,
Or in the fair good-morning
Whereby the throat is gored,
As if it could afford
Enmity speaks the pleasantest word
The magnanimity of grace,
The latitude of the heart.
Expect no miser in the race
Of those that kill by art.

The Noble Sport of Ballad Hunting

UNMISTAKABLY it is a sport, combining uncertainty with trophies. Ballad hunters are often matched against each other, chasing the illusory line, and a code exists for them in the great Child collection. Hunting in the Southern highlands they enter a romantic preserve where they may dwell for days, even weeks, according to their tact or their kin or their introductions. They may travel picturesquely in jolt wagons, and have the pure delight of listening to the song of a people to whom song is as natural as speech and often as freely used.

In all ways the sport seems noble, and it is very unworldly. But isn't there danger that it may join in kind with falconry, archery, the collection of antique jewels, and other quaint reversions to the past? To know that the lovely patterns of the ballads have long been spread through the underply of American life is important, even thrilling; but the charting of these areas, the work of collection, is now finished in the main. We have learned that the Scotch and English ballads have been handed down not only in the South but in New England, the Ohio Valley, across the Mississippi, in the far West. State by State, tabulations have been made, and the most minute variations in phrasing have been recorded.

But it often seems to be forgotten, particularly of the ballad-singers of the South, that these people are not an enchanted folk out of an old tale. They may live on subsistence farms; just over the way are coal mines and textile mills. They are irresistibly linked with the present, and, though this has been generally denied, they have always shared in the life of their time. According to a rather pretty notion Elizabethan life has been preserved among them almost intact; the ballads are offered as triumphant evidence, with ancient tools, customs, and superstitions. But more often than not the Elizabethan ballads have been reshaped to tell of events within the memory of the singers, or within local tradition, or hearsay of a tradition from over the next ridge. Mingled with remnants of the great era are many ballads from the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. Victorian music-hall songs may be heard. And ballads and fiddle tunes ring out for which no simple ancestry may be traced. Not every mountain dance tune goes back to "Old Mother Oxford."

Life in these coigns has had its ebb and flow; the songs prove it, and new levels of fancy have constantly appeared, with fresh fusions of form. Even in the Southern mountains the Child ballads are only part of a rich inheritance some of which has been greatly neglected. Too often, rowdy, salty native stanzas and unfamiliar dance tunes have been passed by in the search for a perfect version of "Lord Randal."

Nor are the Scotch and English ballads a highly contrasted aristocracy in our folksong, as is often assumed. I have heard an old Michigan lumberjack sing "The Banks of the Pamanaw" with the rapt, faraway air that is a classic possession of the ballad singer. The crude tale of the "loveli squaw" was set to a simple tune, unmistakably English in origin. Even with a cracked voice the old lumberjack kept that purity of musical outline which traditionally belongs to the ballad—that impersonal style which is likely to make all romantic renderings of song seem strained and coarse.

It seems high time to consider the Scotch and English ballads in relation to our other truly vast possessions in folk music: our voyageur songs, sea-chanteys, schooner songs of the Great Lakes, lumberjack and cowboy ballads, white and Negro spirituals, Indian chants, railroad and hobo songs, prison ballads. On all sides the record is now very large, quite large enough to justify the beginnings of a critical approach. Quirks of native idiom, characteristic metaphor and shapes of story-telling, kinds of humor and tragedy, repetitions of given musical patterns, consistent style, typical divergences from ancestral forms—these irreducible creative elements belonging to us could be made to appear.

Research of any kind into the past is likely to be carried on in a dream world, and fox-fires often lead into bogs of mere accumulation. Perhaps the noble sport must go on; it is true that ancient men and women possess rare fragments of our folksong, and they may soon be gone. But something else may soon be gone. There is a final difference between using traditions while they are still alive, and returning to them, as to some dim arcanum, when their living force is spent. Our folksongs still have a powerful hold upon American feeling; the crude renascences over the air in the past two or three years are an indication. And the creative energy which produced this music in the past is by no means a thing of the past. In remote corners of the land folk music is still taking shape. Yet the general feeling for this music may easily dwindle and vanish. In many ways the frontier, where it flourished, is as remote as the pyramids; each decade whirls this phase of our experience farther away. But in these songs lie our most widely spread musical traditions. It may even be argued that here the stream of native poetry runs deepest. Surely it is true that no music, no creative expression of any sort, has developed without use of tradition; this may be transmuted or most deliberately left behind, but it must exist for fresh departures.

Criticism may clarify these traditions and build up an outline of what is distinctively ours; but beyond this, for any living use, this music must be heard, not alone by a few musicians seeking themes or folklorists tracing origins, but by an obscure generality of people who will merely enjoy it. For the most part these songs are buried in a museum of books. In many instances the collectors have thought that only the words were important. The National Folk Festival held at St. Louis last spring gave an unparalleled opportunity for hearing native music from many parts of the country; and regional festivals like that at White Top and Jean Thomas's at Ashland make it possible for fairly large groups to hear folksongs of the South. Such festivals seem a natural uprising. Undoubtedly others will be held. Interest in this music seems to come warmly to the surface even among those who know of it only by hearsay. But festivals are only one means of making these songs known. There are others, requiring drudgery, tact, or even genius, such as grappling on a large scale with the snares of broadcasting. Instead of following the noble sport in a dream world, those who know and love this music might attack the problems whose solution may mean its life or death.

CONSTANCE ROURKE

The Mystery of the Reichstag Fire

The Burning of the Reichstag. By Douglas Reed. Covici-Friede. $3.

THIS appears too early and too late, is the thought with which the reader takes this book in hand: too early to be accepted as a historic evaluation of that dramatic episode the Reichstag trial, too late for a thrilling piece of journalism reviving the persons and the important incidents of this most important judicial drama of our times. But one need only read the first chapters to revise this preconceived opinion. This is neither history nor journalism. With admirable skill a practical journalist has taken the thousand tangled threads that made up the warp and woof of Reichstag fire and trial, assembling them in orderly precision for the reader who seeks first-hand and accurate information, and has woven them into an exciting romance of plot and personality, leaving it to the reader to find the answer.

Mr. Douglas Reed, Berlin correspondent of the London Times, brings to the task unusual qualification. A fortunate accident led him past the Reichstag just as the fire was discovered and he was one of the first to enter the burning building. Then and in the days and months that followed he watched the actors play their parts with first interested, then skepical detachment: the embarrassed judges, anxiously conscious of each frown on the face of the powers-that-be; Dr. Sack, Torgler's defender, one of the victims of Hitler's purging of June 30; the witnesses Göring, Heines, and Count Helldorf, who with their cracking whips dominated this three-ring circus; the four defendants who, through fifty-seven endless days of court proceedings, submitted passively or with defiant courage, according to their various natures and capacities, to the register of calumnies, lies, threat, and perversions with which the Third Reich tried —and failed—to convince the world of their guilt; and last of all the strange and still unexplained Marinus van der Lubbe.

The effect on the reader of "The Burning of the Reichstag" is the greater because the man who wrote it is not a revolutionist, not even a radical. Douglas Reed is a typical journalist, a man without political or national bias, whose job it is to report what he sees with professional impartiality. But a sensitive understanding of human nature lifts what would otherwise have been a bare record of widely publicized facts into the realm of vivid historic narrative, in which a keen understanding of psychological impulses paints an illuminating background against which two figures stand out in bold relief, the Bulgarian Georgi Dimitroff and the Dutch Van der Lubbe, the two antipodes in the Reichstag trial. About them, with excellent dramatic effect, the author builds his story. "He shambled obediently, unprotestingly," so Mr. Reed describes Van der Lubbe's last journey to the block, "like an elderly retriever, trained to heel but heavy with age, to the guillotine."

But it is the figure of Dimitroff which gives "The Burning of the Reichstag" its arresting vitality. "If the quality of Dimitroff had been more widely known," the author comments with grim humor, "the agents of the German law might have been tempted, like the schoolboy with the newt, to put him back again. Certainly they caught a Tartar when they took Dimitroff." Here, in the person of an unknown Bulgarian revolutionist, is the mighty force that will yet encompass the downfall of the Nazi horror. It is Dimitroff's voice that calls to a dormant working class, helpless in the clutch of an unscrupulous band of adventurers: "Whether I stand or fall, does not matter." Because it is a record of this man's greatness, this book will live.

All this does not detract from its value as a source of carefully verified and documented information on this period of the Hitler regime. The author has rendered a real service in giving to the public of today and tomorrow exact yet thoughtful and eminently readable source material concerning one of the most passionately discussed happenings of our times.

LUDWIG LORE

Road-Map to Chaos

New Careers for Youth. By Walter B. Pitkin. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.

DR. PITKIN is very superior to parents, teachers, authors of competing books on vocational guidance, and other "elders." They have misled "the lost generation," American youth in search of a livelihood. They have palmed off on him a "Guide Book to Yesterday." Dr. Pitkin, however, with the assistance of a research staff of thirty, plus 500 "key-men" in various fields of enterprise, offers the first reliable ("235 pages of fact; no bunk") "Road-Map to Tomorrow."

"A man named Herbert Hoover" gets a sound thwacking from Dr. Pitkin for his "ridiculous statement": "The American boy and girl have even better opportunities and chances than ever before." Dr. Pitkin then proceeds to put the boys and girls wise to the facts of life. The flush days are over. This is the Age of the Machine. Every decade, as the machine advances, jobs disappear by the million; whole industries change, are wiped out. From the top to the bottom of society there is a contraction of opportunity. This, then, is "the pattern of destiny" for Americans in the "New Era." At each level, men of the highest ability and training will win out. The others, having proved to be "unfit," will step down a peg, to force the denizens of the lower level down a further peg, or be themselves forced down again. At the bottom, the hordes of "the grammar-school crowd and the illiterates will fight it out—to see who will be the hewers of wood and drawers of water." What of the rest? These unfit millions, the permanently idle, "will live along the railroad tracks out in the wilds of the Southwest, on the beaches of the two oceans, in the green fastness of the forests."

Such is the quest for bread in the New Era. Learning, intellectual achievement, art? Forget it. "Culture is a luxury, and often one of dubious worth." Today a young man would be foolish to seek it, "unless rich and safely settled." For "these years into which we all enter will be full of hardship, adventure, experiment, guessing, migration, broken homes, wars, revolutions, and perhaps even world-wide catastrophes."

A desolate country, this Land of Tomorrow. Where in this wilderness are the promised new careers for youth? Dr. Pitkin is not America's most successful soothsayer for nothing. Suddenly the black thunderclouds of the future are turned inside out, blaze with silver linings. Wolves on the stoop become blue birds. Unemployment finds a pleasanter name, "leisure." The chaotic maelstrom of our industrial system is blessed as inevitable change; which in turn imperceptibly becomes progress. "All progress is change." "America is moving onward and upward." The machine, implacable devourer of millions of jobs, simultaneously creates—we are not told how, or how many—"new opportunities." Poverty vanishes. "The very rich and the very poor are disappearing." Great rainbows now drape the sky, and visions of untold pots of gold.

> There are hundreds of hopeful signs that you young people will live more abundantly and work in a healthier and more interesting fashion than ever your parents dreamed of. Today the storm begins to clear, and light shines through in a wholly unexpected way. While your opportunities for an ordinary, old-style job are slim, those for a career are frequently more promising than ever. . . .

So Herbert Hoover was right after all.

Alas, Dr. Pitkin cannot deliver the goods, any more than the unhappy Herbert Hoover. The 500 "key-men," summoned to the stand to report "new opportunities," are confused, vague, contradictory, and for the most part, unhopeful. Their testimonies give the book its only value. They will help few boys and girls to jobs; but they give vivid documentation of the chaos and bankruptcy of our social system and its leaders when confronted by what is after all the crucial test of any civilization: what future can it offer its youth?

The door of opportunity which 500 "key-men" cannot unlock Dr. Pitkin spends the rest of the book trying to pick with assorted whimsies, tips, and admonitions. Such pearls as: "Could everybody living in 1950 speak English, this would be the most powerful deterrent of war yet invented." Such advice as: Start a private school. Start a small factory. Start a chain of inns. But dearest to Dr. Pitkin's heart are the jobs that cluster about "Quality Service," his own invention. People who have money to live don't know how to live. A Big Business of the Future will be understanding the Art of Living, and Selling It. To train for this you must understand people. "You must spend hundreds of hours talking to strangers, noticing how they act, what they prefer as to food, drink, clothes, furniture, music, girls [sir!], religion, and books." "You are now ready to serve," says Dr. Pitkin, "the Forgotten Man." Who pays whom, and for what, Dr. Pitkin omits to mention.

Other inventions are apprentice jobs (where you persuade the boss to let you work for years for nothing); merger jobs (which means that the man who can't get one job should get three and merge them); and cute little Hop-lite jobs. (Remember the Hop-lite Ladies?) Baking cakes. Selling flowers to neighbors. Tending gardens. Selling your cousin oranges.

The rest is exhortation. Life is a struggle. "Success is not a flower to be plucked in passing." "It is still true you can't keep a good man down." "The fittest will survive." "Make a job for yourself."

"Make a job for yourself." This is Dr. Pitkin's ultimate wisdom. Lift yourself by your own boot straps, boys and girls.

Chorus of boys and girls: Thanks for nothing, Dr. Pitkin.

ELLIOT E. COHEN

Alexander the Eccentric

Alexander the Corrector. By Edith Olivier. The Viking Press. $2.50.

IN this, her first venture into biography, Edith Olivier reintroduces to the world Alexander Cruden, an eighteenth-century eccentric. The very name of this fantastic character has long been forgotten by the general public. He is probably remembered only by Bible scholars and text-hunting clergymen, who still find his "Complete Concordance of the Old and New Testaments" invaluable. Since his life was infinitely more lively than his exhaustive dictionary of Biblical words, Miss Olivier is to be thanked for exhuming him.

He was born in Aberdeen of a solid middle-class Presbyterian family. His conventional classical education was unmarked by any unusual incident. It was not until he fell in love, at the age of twenty-one, that he exhibited the peculiarities that grew on him in later life. The girl did not return his passion, but he continued to pursue her with dogged zeal. It was impossible for Cruden, at any time in his life, to take no for an answer. When it finally became clear that the girl, so far from caring for Alexander, was actually pregnant by her own brother, he promptly went insane, and was confined for a short time in an Aberdeen prison. He recovered, but found it more pleasant to leave Aberdeen for London. There he supported himself for the rest of his days as a proof-corrector, a tutor, a scholar, and a bookseller. He lived obscurely enough for some time, and only rose once more to absurd prominence when he became embroiled with the Earl of Derby. He got a post as French reader to the cultivated Earl, and things went smoothly enough until it transpired that he could not pronounce a single word of the French language. The Earl promptly fired him, but Cruden refused to be fired. He deluged his employer with letters, he hung about the estate, and in general made a great and silly nuisance of himself. It took a threat of physical violence at last to dislodge him.

He returned to London to work diligently on his "Concordance," which, when published, had a gratifying success with the clergy. He was on the way to making an illustrious name for himself when, disastrously, he fell in love for the second time. The lady was a comfortable, securely fixed widow, a kindly soul, but fearful of Cruden's persistent and violent attentions. She and her friends had the harmless little man confined in Bethnal Green madhouse. He escaped after quite a stay there, and was peaceful enough until his sister and some of her friends, finding him involved in a street fight, caused him to be locked up again, this time in Chelsea. He was released and brought a ridiculous and futile lawsuit against his sister and her associates. Then for a third time, he fell in love, now with a well-born lady whom he had never seen. He was as relentless as ever in his courtship, and it was a year before his terrified victim persuaded him that his suit was hopeless.

All this time, his insane egotism was growing on him. He was no longer content to display it in private life, but yearned for public honors and royal notice. He took for himself the title of the Corrector of Public Morals, and thereafter referred to himself as Alexander the Corrector. He would walk about the streets with a sponge with which he would delete any inscription he saw that seemed to him harmful to the public morality. In this character, he made a triumphal tour of England, stopping at Oxford and Cambridge to appoint deputy correctors. He wrote long letters to the King and to Parliament on the evils of swearing and sabbath-breaking, begging them to bestow on him officially his self-assumed title. He had himself nominated as a candidate for Parliament. He pelted the King's lords-in-waiting with requests for a knighthood. In a calmer spirit, he interested himself in judicial and prison reforms, and managed to save the life of an unjustly condemned convict. And throughout all these activities he kept at his scholarly labors, publishing late in life a concordance of the works of Milton. At the age of seventy-one he died saying his prayers, and was found by his servant woman, a prostitute whom he had regenerated.

Telling this absurd, pathetic story, Edith Olivier uses the same simple, childish, whimsical style that characterized her novels. This naive way of writing is not very well suited, I think, to the life of Cruden. The clear, obvious exposition, the elementary structure of her biography, are altogether lacking in surprises. Sometimes her method becomes so oversimplified that one imagines one is reading a college paper done by a hard-working, unoriginal student. Often Miss Olivier falls into the use of the biographer's stencils, the "Now we find Cruden . . .," "We can imagine how he felt . . ." sort of thing. A style more ornate, less deliberately bare would surely be more becoming to the extravagant Cruden. The biography as it stands is pleasant and charming, but I am afraid that Miss Olivier in 243 pages has done little more for Cruden than a good encyclopedia article might have done.

MARY MCCARTHY

Reactions to Our Tariff Policy

Tariff Retaliation. By Joseph M. Jones. University of Pennsylvania Press. $3.

ONE of the amazing features of the economic crisis in the United States has been the dearth of scholarly books analyzing recent American tariff policy. It is with especial warmth, therefore, that we welcome Mr. Jones's penetrating study of the repercussions of the 1930 Tariff Act. While it has been generally recognized that the passage of the Hawley-Smoot bill was the signal for a world-wide race in economic armaments, the fact that no direct retaliatory action, labeled as such, was taken against the United States has tended to obscure our special responsibility for the extremes to which economic nationalism has developed in the past few years. This responsibility becomes more apparent if we accept the somewhat broad definition of retaliation proposed by Mr. Jones, and include all cases in which the psychological or the indirect effects of America's action have served to tip the balances of governmental policy in the direction of higher tariffs. The Hawley-Smoot bill was enacted at a moment when debtor nations throughout the world were finding it extremely difficult to secure sufficient foreign exchange to meet their obligations. These difficulties were substantially increased by the erection of additional barriers to the American market. Under the circumstances it was inevitable that there should be great indignation and resentment against the United States, and that this bitterness, coupled with the necessity of obtaining a favorable balance of trade, should have led to a new wave of trade restrictions.

Spain was first to take action against American exports by passing the Wais Tariff of July, 1930. This move only became definitely discriminatory, however, in the following year when Spain concluded treaties with France and Italy granting significant tariff reductions which were not passed on to the United States. Italy met the challenge of the American tariff by shifting her purchases of machinery, wheat, and petroleum products to Germany and the U. S. S. R.; while Switzerland, unfavorably affected by the increased duty on watches, retaliated by an unofficial but successful boycott of imports from the United States. France, Britain, and Canada also adopted measures which materially curtailed American export trade.

These retaliatory steps, according to Mr. Jones, were both

Genius, Moralist, Madman
Alexander Cruden, curious little Scotsman, dreamed of reforming ribald 18th Century London, created, page by page, under a flickering candle, his great Concordance to the Bible . . .
London knew him as a little man equally capable of windy, futile preaching and amazingly effective acts of goodness. Employing the unique talents which marked her Dwarf's Blood and The Love-Child, Edith Olivier recreates this earnest Don Quixote who wrote an immortal work and was thrown into a madhouse because he fell in love! VIKING PRESS. $2.50

ALEXANDER
the Corrector

The Eccentric Life of Alexander Cruden
by EDITH OLIVIER

□ FILMS □

Beginning Sat., Aug. 11th—1st American Showing!
AMKINO Presents New Soviet Talkie
"HOUSE of GREED"
Based on Famous Russian Novel "Gentlemen Golgvlev,"
By SALTYKOV-SCHEDRIN
With V. GARDIN (of "Shame", Etc.) (English Titles)
ACME THEATRE 14th St. and UNION SQ. | Midnight Show every Saturday Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

IN OUR NEXT ISSUE
JOHN GUNTHER
ON
THE AUSTRIAN-GERMAN MIS-ENTENTE
Mr Gunther will picture the outcome of the recent Nazi shootings and the desperate efforts for stabilization of Austrian sovereignty put forth by the Great Powers.

FORBIDDEN FRIENDSHIPS

"There isn't a man on earth," says the medical authority who writes this article, "who has a Chinaman's chance of holding his wife against a Lesbian, once the Lesbian has thoroughly seduced the woman." He states legal cases, and explains completely the medical aspects of forbidden friendships in the current issue of

The Modern Psychologist

Edited by Dagobert D. Runes, Ph.D.

OTHER ARTICLES IN CURRENT ISSUES:
What Price Superiority Complex?—Erwin Wexberg
How to Interpret Dreams—Sigmund Freud
Why People Fail—Alfred Adler
Tricks of the Unconscious
Methods of Inducing Hypnosis
Food and Sexual Feeling
Alcohol and the Emotional Life

Enclose $1 (bill, check, money order) for special five-month subscription. Address

THE MODERN PSYCHOLOGIST
310 Riverside Drive New York

the result of the traditional American system of tariff making and the cause of the decay of the principles on which that system is based. American commercial policy has been based on a single-schedule autonomous tariff, insuring "special concesssions to none, equal treatment for all." But in negotiating commercial treaties the United States has sought unconditional most-favored-nation treatment, even from states possessing contractual systems of tariffs with differential rates. The principle of equal treatment became merely an "equality of negation," Mr. Jones asserts, when we raised our tariff to such a height as to shut out goods which we did not and could not produce in quantities sufficient for our needs. To make matters worse, many of the duties established in the 1930 act, although general in application, were in fact discriminatory in their bearing on the highly specialized industries of certain countries. It is not surprising, therefore, that European nations have more and more tended to reject our pious theory of equal treatment, and have refused to pass on to the United States the concessions granted in bargaining treaties with other countries.

The remedy which Mr. Jones suggests for the obvious weaknesses of American commercial policy is a program of tariff bargaining not unlike that recently adopted by the Administration. In his anxiety to present the possibilities of bilateral negotiation in as favorable a light as possible, the author is, however, surprisingly oblivious to the dangers inherent in the bargaining principle. Moreover, he ignores the clear necessity on the part of the United States of making a substantial unilateral tariff reduction if international equilibrium is to be restored. Lapses of this type mar but do not destroy the fundamental validity of Mr. Jones's argument. A better book on the subject is conceivable, but it has not yet been written.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Shorter Notices

The Origins of Modern Spain. By J. B. Trend. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

It is a wonderful thing how easily, with what slight material, with what blithe aloofness to fundamental economic and social forces, writers of the type of Professor J. B. Trend of the University of Cambridge set out to interpret the modern history of an entire people in the light of a few casual biographies of some outstanding men of the recent past. Professor Trend calls his book nothing less than this: "Origins of Modern Spain." What he actually writes is a history of liberal education in Spain from the middle of the nineteenth century to the beginning of the twentieth, as seen in the lives and ideas of the leaders of the Institucion Libre movement. Within these limits, the book is nicely written and informative, useful especially to students of academic method and thought. However, it has a grave fault: the men and movements Professor Trend writes about are presented almost completely without relation to the conditions in Spain out of which they arose. Instead the author emphasizes the influence of British and German thought on their work. As history the book is not genuinely valuable. As a study of an intellectual circle and movement, it is informative, and therefore useful for names, dates, and personalities.

Prison Letters of Countess Markievicz. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

With a preface by President de Valera, a biographical sketch by Esther Roper, and poems and articles by Eva Gore-Booth, this volume might have been a valuable tribute to a brave and interesting woman, one of the finest personalities in modern Irish history. Constance Gore-Booth was one of the leaders of the Sinn Fein rising in 1916 and was condemned to death by court-martial, but her sentence was commuted to imprisonment. An artist herself, and the wife of a distinguished Polish artist, Count Casimir Markievicz, she was born into a well-known West of Ireland family of the utmost Union orthodoxy. In her girlhood she went through the usual routine of fashionable life, but finally renounced everything to devote herself to the cause of labor and eventually to that of Sinn Fein. When the Treaty of 1921 was signed she took her stand with de Valera and the Republican irreconcilables, and from that time on her sufferings and adventures and imprisonments were many, until her death after an operation in 1926. Such a life is a dramatic and illuminating commentary on Anglo-Irish relationships, but here it is unfortunately sketchily outlined, mixed up pointlessly with the wholly different career of her sister, Eva Gore-Booth, the charming poetess, and filled out with Madame's not very important letters from prison. A labor of love, quite clearly, the book can well call for little criticism, but it will satisfy neither the friends of Countess Markievicz nor the general public. It is a regrettable fact that, with the exception of Casement, not a single Sinn Fein leader has had a competent biographer who could do justice to the extraordinary movement and the astonishing tragedies and heroisms which it engendered.

To One Who Mourns at the Death of The Emperor. By Kimi Gengo. Pilgrim House. $2.

Kimi Gengo is a Japanese woman living now in New York. Strange as it may seem, her poetry is much better when it turns from Oriental forms or ideas to the expression of personal emotions in the precise English lyric form. If this little book proves anything, it proves that a foreign girl brought up in this country writes like other American girls. Kimi Gengo is, as a matter of fact, quite expert in writing the romantic love song. She is not, as yet, a very good poet; neither is she a bad poet. She has a certain precision of language, a certain excellence of form, which indicates that she may some day write well.

Contributors to This Issue

HAROLD J. LASKI, author of "Democracy in Crisis" and other books, is professor of political science at London University.

WALTER WILSON is the author of "Forced Labor in the United States."

CURTIS D. MACDOUGALL, formerly lecturer in journalism at the University of Wisconsin, is now on the staff of the St. Louis Star and Times.

GUNNAR MICKELSON is a Milwaukee newspaperman.

COLSTON E. WARNE is associate professor of economics at Amherst. LEO HUBERMAN is the author of an American history for young people, "We, the People."

VINCENT MCHUGH, author of the novel "Sing Before Breakfast," has published verse in various periodicals.

CONSTANCE ROURKE, author of "Trumpets of Jubilee," "American Humor," and other books, directed the Michigan lumberjacks at the National Folk Festival.

LUDWIG LORE, formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung, now conducts a daily column, "Behind the Cables," in the New York Post.

ELLIOT E. COHEN is a New York journalist.

MAXWELL S. STEWART, formerly economist on the staff of the Foreign Policy Association, is now an associate editor of The Nation.

Sep 5

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

NRA U.S. CODE

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 22, 1934 No. 3607

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 197
EDITORIALS:
Twenty Million on Relief 200
Making China "Safe" 201
Who Owns the Air? 201
CARTOON: PLAYTIME IN THE EUROPEAN NURSERY. By LOW 202
ISSUES AND MEN. THE WAR ANNIVERSARY. By Oswald Garrison Villard 203
AFTER THE DOLLFUSS MURDER. By John Gunther 204
THE RELIEF BUSINESS IS BOOMING. By James Rorty . . . 206
HUEY LONG'S "REVOLUTION." By Alexander Kendrick . . . 207
WAS EUROPE A SUCCESS? II. THE QUESTION CONSIDERED. By Joseph Wood Krutch 209
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 211
CORRESPONDENCE 212
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
New York's Relief Crisis. By Isidor Feinstein 213
Coddling the Bums. By James P. Mitchell 214
Flop-House. By David Scheyer 216
Labor Notes 218
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 219
BOOKS:
Clinical Note. By Vincent McHugh 220
Poem. By Clinch Calkins 220
A Morality of Pointlessness. By R. P. Blackmur 221
Assurance Through Social Insurance. By Paul H. Douglas . . 221
Honest Bewilderment. By Lincoln Reis 222
Baruch or Benedictus. By Eliseo Vivas 223
Hitler and the Church. By Ludwig Lore 224

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

SPECULATORS AND SENATORS from the silver-producing States will rejoice in the Administration's latest silver moves. The former are now in a position to dispose of their holdings of the white metal to the government at 50.01 cents an ounce, thus realizing a tidy profit, while the latter can go before their constituents this fall with proof of what a highly organized, determined minority can accomplish irrespective of the public welfare. The rest of us will foot the bill without any clear understanding of why the holders of silver have been singled out for a bounty. Actually, of course, the effect of the whole program has been greatly exaggerated by the press. The seizure of existing silver stocks is in itself of no particular importance, although the issuance of silver certificates at double the purchase price of silver may be expected to exercise a mild inflationary influence. As in the earlier gold-buying program, however, the effect is bound to be slight as long as purchases are confined to domestic sources. Consumer purchasing power, except for the above-mentioned speculators, will be virtually unaffected, while the actual expansion of currency will be small in comparison to the credit contraction of recent years. Yet although a renewal of monetary uncertainty may tend to undermine business confidence, the most fundamental injury wrought by the new measure lies in the encouragement given to vested interests to strengthen their Washington lobbies. Not the least of the paradoxes involved, moreover, has been the announcement that the Chinese government is planning defensive measures against a step which has been heralded by its advocates as a means of restoring the purchasing power of the East.

NEGOTIATIONS for the settlement of outstanding debts and claims between the United States and the Soviet Union, which have been under way at Washington since July 25, are reported to have reached a critical stage. Little progress has apparently been made on the crucial issue of the size of credits which the United States is willing to advance to Moscow in exchange for partial payment of the claims against the Soviet government. If trade relations are to be satisfactorily developed, it is generally agreed that these credits will have to be substantial. But what is good business is not necessarily good politics. The Administration appears to fear that an agreement with the Soviet Union which would be sufficiently liberal to aid American exports would draw fire from the professional red-baiters. Perhaps an even more significant explanation of the Administration's apparent indifference to the resuscitation of Soviet-American trade may be found in the fact that Robert F. Kelley, known for years as notoriously anti-Soviet in his sympathies, has been allowed to retain his strategic position as head of the Eastern European Division of the State Department, and to play an important role in all negotiations with the Soviet Union. Mr. Kelley was in charge of Russian affairs during successive Republican Administrations, and is credited with being an important factor in delaying recognition. He is also a member of the board of the Export-Import Bank, which is responsible for the resolution withholding all credits to Soviet Russia pending a settlement of the debts. It is high time that American business men became aroused over a delay which is costing us at least $10,000,000 a month in trade and is contrary to the fundamental purpose of the New Deal.

WAR CLOUDS have once more appeared over the Far East as a result of the apparent breakdown of negotiations over the sale of the Chinese Eastern Railway. Reports from Moscow indicate that the Japanese have been conducting a veritable reign of terror against the Soviet employees of the railway in an effort to force the acceptance of terms favorable to Tokio. Within the last few weeks it is alleged that scores of Soviet citizens have been arrested by "Manchoukuo" police; Soviet organizations have been raided, and an unprecedented number of railroad accidents and bandit outrages have occurred. Despite these provocations, the Soviet government has definitely rejected all of Japan's offers to date, while Japan has similarly refused even to consider the greatly reduced price suggested by Moscow. As a result of the deadlock, Chuchi Ohashi, Vice Foreign Minister of Manchoukuo, is reported to have left Tokio for Hsinking. The situation is grave but not hopeless. It is safe to say that neither country desires war at this time, and if the new Japanese Cabinet can curb the excesses of the local military group in Manchuria, no war will occur.

THE PROSPECT of a Canadian New Deal at the hands of the Conservative Party met an untimely end when Harry Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Dominion Government, withdrew a pamphlet which he had prepared revealing gross malpractices on the part of some of the most powerful business groups in Canada. Following a protracted investigation by a royal commission of which he was head, Mr. Stevens charged that "unscrupulous financial and business men had exploited Canada's consuming public, starved her producers, sweated her workmen . . . and left the country faced with a choice of reform, dictatorship, or revolution." But the timely intervention of Mr. Bennett, Dominion Prime Minister, has apparently saved the country from any one of these three choices. The Conservative Party is, temporarily, at least, to be held intact, and the Canadian public can only guess at the names of the corporations which Mr. Stevens had in mind. Meanwhile, the new Liberal Government in Ontario, under the leadership of a thirty-eight-year-old dirt farmer—Mitchell Hepburn—is stealing much of the limelight by a spectacular profession of interest in the forgotten man. His Attorney General, Arthur Roebuck, created a minor sensation recently when he informed a group of hunger marchers at Toronto that the only way for them to secure a decent living was to organize and make their demands effective. Mr. Roebuck has also announced that he will introduce legislation to establish industrial codes as a means of eliminating sweatshop conditions, but that price-fixing will be rigidly prohibited. Hepburn's influence is entirely confined to Ontario, however, and at Ottawa there is little to distinguish the two major parties. The new radical party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, is not yet a threat in federal politics, but has run second in two recent provincial elections and might possibly obtain a balance of power in the Dominion Parliament in case the anticipated Liberal landslide fails to develop.

A HEARTSICK SILENCE hovers over the headquarters of the Friends of New Germany. "Recent events" in Germany and Austria have delivered staggering blows to those Nazi blow-hards who sought to emulate Hitler and his lieutenants over here, and to the weak-kneed German American civic leaders who submitted to their rule. In Cincinnati there is open rebellion. A new and large group of citizens of German extraction have organized as the Friends of Truth, to combat Hitlerism in America. In New York City the Anti-Nazi Federation reports a marked increase in membership. Heckling has almost completely disappeared from its street meetings, held in former Hakenkreuz territory. Hitler was recently hissed when his picture was flashed on the screen in a Yorkville movie theater. Truth to tell, the more sober-minded members of those German American societies which capitulated to the Nazi secret agents were never entirely content with the antics of Spanknöbel and Gissibl, the Hitler emissaries. The solid citizens, the respectable burghers, viewed with dismay the capture of their choral Vereins, bowling clubs, and civic federations by the Nazi bullies. But what could they do? There were the relatives in Germany to be considered, and the German trade connections. These considerations, which still exist, explain why the revolt against Hitlerism has not been more open. What actually has happened over here has been a "cleansing" similar to the one in Germany—without the blood bath, of course. The storm troopers here, too, have been furloughed, their uniforms stuffed away in closets without benefit of mothballs. The conservatives are in full control.

THE CONGRESSIONAL SUBCOMMITTEE investigating un-American activities moves across the country like one of George White's road shows in an atmosphere of well-conceived and meticulously sustained musical comedy. In San Diego they discovered that the Silver Shirts, armed with Springfield rifles bearing the government mark and with ammunition allegedly purchased from the North Island naval base, had planned to capture the San Diego City Hall, following a May Day demonstration by the Communists. The latter were expected to take the city by storm, after which the Silver Shirts were to stage a counter-revolutionary coup. Neither Putsch materialized, of course, and attempts to involve the German Vice-Consul at Los Angeles seem to have broken down. Trouping up the coast, the committee received the testimony of Captain William F. Hynes, of the Los Angeles police intelligence service. Captain Hynes declared as he emerged from the closed hearings that contributions to the Communist Party are coming from noted Hollywood players and that the names of these players would be disclosed "at the proper time." "Most of those who have given large sums were once poor persons," explained Captain Hynes. "They feel . . . that they should do something to help out the poor man. However, they would probably feel differently about it if their salaries were taken away from them." He added that "the studios have promised to cooperate with us," and that no immediate boycott of red stars was contemplated. Since the stars are quite within their rights in contributing support to a legal party, one hopes that they will tell Captain Hynes and the movie magnates to go to Paphlagonia.

AS A PIECE of masterly prose and ingenious logic we present herewith fragments of an editorial which appeared in a recent issue of the Daily Californian, official student organ of the University of California. Introducing the article with Voltaire's exemplary sentiment—"I may disapprove of what you say, but will defend to the death your right to say it"—and announcing this as "the policy of the university in its instruction and research," the editorial rather surprisingly arrives at the conclusion that college radicalism should be stepped on. "How," the Californian asks itself, "can we justify ourselves in suppressing radicalism?" It replies:

> The university will defend to the death the rights of its students and faculty . . . freely to discuss and study all subjects, yet it most firmly opposes any student action, or the encouragement of any student action, to overthrow our government. And there are methods of prevention. . . .
>
> Just as there are vigilantes in the East Bay community there will be vigilantes in the university community, designed to blot out student Communists. Just as action and > force are being employed outside the campus to quell reds and radicalism, Social Problems Club members will face action and force when the regular session starts in August.

>
> That action and force will be generated by student vigilantes and will meet with the approval of the university community.

Thus the little Hitlers of California trot obediently in the footsteps of their elders, the officials of State and city and university and employers' associations.

"BOSS BILL" VARE is dead, and there is none, save family and friends, to mourn him. With his passing is concluded the most sordid chapter in Philadelphia's mottled political history, and, since he was the "last of the bosses," with him closes a significant era in the American chronology. Vare's kind of politics—the door-bell-pushing, groceries-at-Christmas, get-your-boy-out-of-jail, vote-for-me-and-I'll-take-care-of-you kind—has largely passed from the scene, crushed by social and economic forces and implications of which it never dreamed. "Practical politics," as Vare himself called it, has given way to political science, as a tenable theory at least, if not yet as a downright actuality. Yet it is interesting to recall that Vare's rise to power was absolutely in the best American tradition. He was the poor farm boy who made good. He hitched his ash-wagon to the waxing star of his native city, and as it grew he grew with it and his single ash-wagon became a fleet, busily engaged in holding a monopoly on all city contracts. He did not want the power and the glory sought by Boies Penrose; the contracts were good enough. He never outgrew the concepts of a ward-heeler; always he wanted to sit in the United States Senate to show a vague "them" that he was "just as good as they." He won his Senate seat but was refused admission. A paralytic stroke followed, and general debility. When he died, "Boss" Vare was no longer that, even in name. But "Vareism" still clouds Philadelphia—its stultifying effects, its gross waste, mismanagement, and extravagance, its political puppet shows, its identification with anti-social, anti-labor interests.

THE LONG-THREATENED aluminum strike has at last been called, to darken still further the country's labor horizon. Stung to action by the unconciliatory attitude of the management, 7,600 workers in the four largest plants of the Mellon-controlled Aluminum Company of America have walked out, demanding union recognition, a closed shop, and a wage scale with no sectional differentials. Despite its apparent hesitancy and unwillingness, the American Federation of Labor is supporting the strike, and labor leaders see in it the showdown that might have been provided by a national steel strike. The Aluminum Company is perhaps the greatest single monopoly in the country, and company officials, pointing to a three-year supply of crude aluminum in their yards, declare that they can last out any labor siege. But the aluminum workers' union, besides having the sympathy and full power of organized labor behind it, is formidable in its own right. A strike last spring in the New Kensington, Pennsylvania, plant won an 11 per cent wage increase and added greatly to the union's prestige and membership. Excellent discipline prevails and the picketing is of a model kind. The stage is thus set for a long-drawn-out battle which may have results that will affect the status of all labor.

AT THE CONCLUSION of the hearing before the National Labor Relations Board last week precious little was left of the charge that John Donovan was inefficient and incompetent. True, Dr. Peck gave testimony to that effect, to the point of stating that Donovan was on a list for dismissal some time before General Johnson fired him. But Dr. Peck was extremely vague regarding details. Donovan, he said, was "irresponsible, but you couldn't put your finger on it." To offset this impressionistic appraisal, the union presented a mass of detailed and specific evidence. It showed, indeed, that Donovan had been so highly efficient (or indiscreet?) in the matter of the pulp and paper code, as to go over Dr. Wolman's head; as a result, the labor provisions of the code are now being revised in accordance with an executive order of the President. The General's attorneys tried hard to exclude all evidence purporting to show that Donovan had been a good and faithful servant. They virtually admitted that the immediate occasion for his discharge was his conduct as president of the union. Not that the General was opposed to union activities as such, but that Donovan's activities impressed him as being annoying, impertinent, and high-handed. The union, naturally enough, sought to show that Donovan's behavior as its president and as leader of its delegations—particularly the Luke delegation of June 18—was proper, correct, and tactful. Unfortunately, General Johnson saw fit to absent himself from the proceedings. It is now up to the National Labor Relations Board to weigh the evidence as given, or to reopen the hearings if Johnson decides to appear in his own behalf.

OUR CANDID CONTEMPORARY, Printers' Ink, publishes in its issue of August 2 a double-page advertisement by the even more candid J. Walter Thompson Company, advertising agents. The title of the advertisement, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is encircled by the lash of Simon Legree's whip, and the text describes with extraordinary directness how the J. Walter Thompson Company uses the whip of advertising to stimulate the reflexes of lethargic magazine readers:

> If "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is not a great literary work, at least it is the shrewdest piece of selling ever written. Here was the ultimate blossoming of the Negative Appeal. The halitosis of slavery was shown in all its dreadfulness . . . unmercifully it flayed the finest emotions of its readers . . . no author since has been willing to be so inartistic—so devastatingly common and understandable. The power of advertising to influence great numbers of people depends on the extent to which the methods of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" can be used. First, the product must be associated with an idea—the idea of freedom, of sex attractiveness, of power, or acquisitiveness. . . . Then, in order to make this idea felt quickly, it must be given an emotional expression.

The J. Walter Thompson Company is one of the largest advertising agencies in the world, if not the largest. The "ideas" used to advertise Lifebuoy soap, Scot Tissue toilet paper, and Woodbury's facial soap are J. Walter Thompson "ideas," and this company can justly claim that they are successful. Admirable fellows, these literary sadists who wield the whip in the J. Walter Thompson advertising office! As Brailsford says of Hitler's use of the word Brutalität to express Nazi tactics, they make one feel "bruised all over." Bruised, and a little savage.

Twenty Million on Relief

SOME five million American families, or about 20,000,000 people, are receiving relief in some form from the federal government, according to official figures recently released. These figures do not include, of course, other thousands who are receiving local relief, although in most communities local funds are merged with federal as a result of the system of matching appropriations, or following the breakdown of local relief both public and private. About 60 per cent of all relief funds at present come from federal sources. Nor do these figures include the 2,000,000 farm families that are expected to augment the relief rolls as a result of the drought.

Next to the aggregate size of the FERA and the other alphabetical relief organizations, their most significant aspect is their acceptance by the public as permanent developments, and by thousands of the unemployed as a way of life, at least for a long time to come. Even among diehards the theory that the only men out of jobs are those who won't work is mouthed with an ever-waning conviction; and the necessity for relief is coming to be more and more a reproach, not upon those who receive it, but upon a system which cannot find a more satisfactory way of using and distributing the resources of the richest country on earth.

Since President Roosevelt repudiated the blind and antiquated relief policies of Mr. Hoover, the government program has grown so fast that its magnitude and ramifications have scarcely been realized by the public. For that reason The Nation devotes the present issue to a critical examination, by no means complete, of the forms and efficiency of federal relief. In later issues we shall round out the picture by consideration of such projects as subsistence homesteads—forty-eight are so far projected—and the CCC. These experiments, because they are picturesque, have already received perhaps more attention than their importance warrants.

By far the great bulk of relief is in the form of made work and direct doles to the unemployed. And unfortunately, in almost all its phases the efficiency of relief falls far short of its aims. This is not surprising in view of the stupendous problem with which the agencies of relief are faced. To give each needy family the quite inadequate sum of $30 a month would require the expenditure of $135,000,000 a month. Actually only about $60,000,000 is being spent by the federal government, the States, and local communities combined. To begin with, then, the river of relief is less than half the size it should be. And by the time it has run through the porous canyons of inefficiency and the muddy channels of State and local politics it too often emerges as a faint and unclean trickle inadequate to sustain life. On another page Mr. Feinstein indicates that the administration of relief is neither adequate nor just even in New York City, where a liberal Mayor is in power and the family-relief budget is the most generous in the country. At the other end of the scale are to be found such States as Huey Long's Louisiana, where 15,000 unemployables, consisting not primarily of plain bums but of "unearning mothers and those physically disabled," have been dropped from the relief rolls and thrown back upon private charity, if any, because the State legislature failed to match the available federal funds. In varying forms the same crisis in relief is to be found in almost every State in the union. And relief has come to be the dominating political issue in many States. Time was when a Huey Long or an "Alfalfa Bill" Murray could stage a "revolution" consisting mainly of personalities. Today Huey Long's revolution and Governor Langer's spectacular battle have their roots deep in the misery of the unemployed.

Every indication points to a deepening of the relief crisis, both State and national. We have already noted that where at the very least $135,000,000 a month is needed, $60,000,000 is being spent. But the numbers on relief are increasing and will continue to increase. Industry under the NRA has admittedly reemployed only about 1,000,000 men (its profits have been relatively much higher). Month by month the persons among the 10,000,000 unemployed who are not yet counted among the 5,000,000 on relief get closer to the end of their resources. And there is no doubt that the needs of a family on relief grow as the period of their dependence lengthens. Figures show that the number on relief is greater this year than last. In New York City there were 77,000 more families on relief in June, 1934, than in June, 1933. Yet reports from all over the country show that funds are being cut even as the need increases. At Greenville, South Carolina, a textile center, following the NRA order to cut cotton-goods production and therefore pay rolls, relief payments were also drastically cut. In New York City 10,000 men were recently dropped from the work-relief rolls as part of Commissioner William Hodson's "campaign to keep the cost of relief within the resources available." The relief business, like any other, is capable of being rationalized.

This cursory review of the relief problem is enough to convince the average person that relief is an expensive, blundering, and cruel substitute for the thing most people want—a job at a decent wage. It is the realization of this fact, no doubt, which causes the relief administration in Washington to assure itself and the world that its program somehow will lead back to reemployment. Aubrey Williams, assistant administrator of the FERA, has put it this way: "True relief should be obliged to do more than merely supply the minimum needs of those in want. . . . It should pull them back into the shelter of the economic roof." The trouble is that the old "economic roof," even if it did not leak like a sieve and rest on a rotting frame, was long ago demonstrated to be inadequate to accommodate the majority of Americans. Unless the economic structure is rebuilt on a functional basis, the destitute will increase, the dole will be stripped of its alphabetical finery, and ultimately the problem of relief will become so great that it will come down to a mere matter of keeping millions of Americans alive. This is a prospect that decent people like Mr. Williams and many another in the Roosevelt Administration dislike to face.

And it is true, of course, that such a situation would not last indefinitely. The masses of the people are growing more conscious of their needs and of their strength. The organization of the unemployed and of relief workers, and their solidarity with those still employed, is a straw in the wind.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Making China "Safe"

WHEN Japan intimates the possibility of abandoning its sword-rattling, lone-wolf policy in China in favor of a joint understanding with the Powers "based on realities," as reported in the New York Times, there is reason for grave anxiety. In the light of the recent strengthening of the jingoist elements in the Japanese Cabinet, only two interpretations of this abrupt reversal in attitude are possible: that Japan has won all that it desires for the moment in China and is anxious to consolidate its position, or that it is faced by a threat of sufficient proportions to cause it to reconsider its former policy.

Recent events suggest that both of these considerations are operative. Within the past few weeks the Nanking government has made a series of concessions which give Japan very nearly a free hand in North China. Railway traffic has been resumed between Peiping and Mukden; tacit recognition of the independence of Manchoukuo has been given by the establishment of customs stations along the Great Wall; and arrangements are reported to be under way for lifting the postal ban against the new puppet state. Last but not least, China has announced a schedule of tariff rates which are incredibly biased in favor of Japanese products. It is scarcely surprising, therefore, that Tokio should suddenly veer toward defense of the status quo.

The dramatic appearance of the Chinese red army at the gates of Foochow is, however, probably the most urgent reason for Japan's newly awakened interest in international cooperation. For despite Chiang Kai-shek's sixth annual campaign for the extermination of the "Communist-bandits," the Chinese soviet armies appear to have taken over a large section of the province of Fukien, which the Japanese consider to be within their sphere of interest by virtue of its proximity to Formosa. On this occasion, as on previous ones when the Communist troops occupied or threatened a port city, the foreign Powers, including the United States, France, Japan, and Great Britain, have unhesitatingly dispatched gunboats to the aid of Nanking. In the past these vessels have made it impossible for the red armies to hold any important city, for the pretense of non-interference in Chinese affairs has never been extended to cover the so-called "Communist horde." Nor have the Powers allowed petty differences over the interpretation of treaties to stand in the way of joint action against the anti-imperialist challenge of the soviet districts. On this issue, at least, one witnesses such diverse and mutually antagonistic elements as the Japanese, the Protestant and Catholic missionaries, the Kuomintang "patriots," and the League of Nations working shoulder to shoulder. Even the Rajchman plan for rural reconstruction, which Japan so bitterly opposed a few months ago, was apparently designed as a foil to the growth of the Communist areas.

That the Western nations should unite against the threat of communism is perhaps not surprising. Success of the Soviet cause would remove the raison d'être of thousands of foreigners who are living comfortably in the treaty ports of China. But quite apart from the ethical implications of armed intervention in Chinese affairs, it is evident that to cooperate with Nanking at the moment is to play directly into the hands of Japan.

Who Owns the Air?

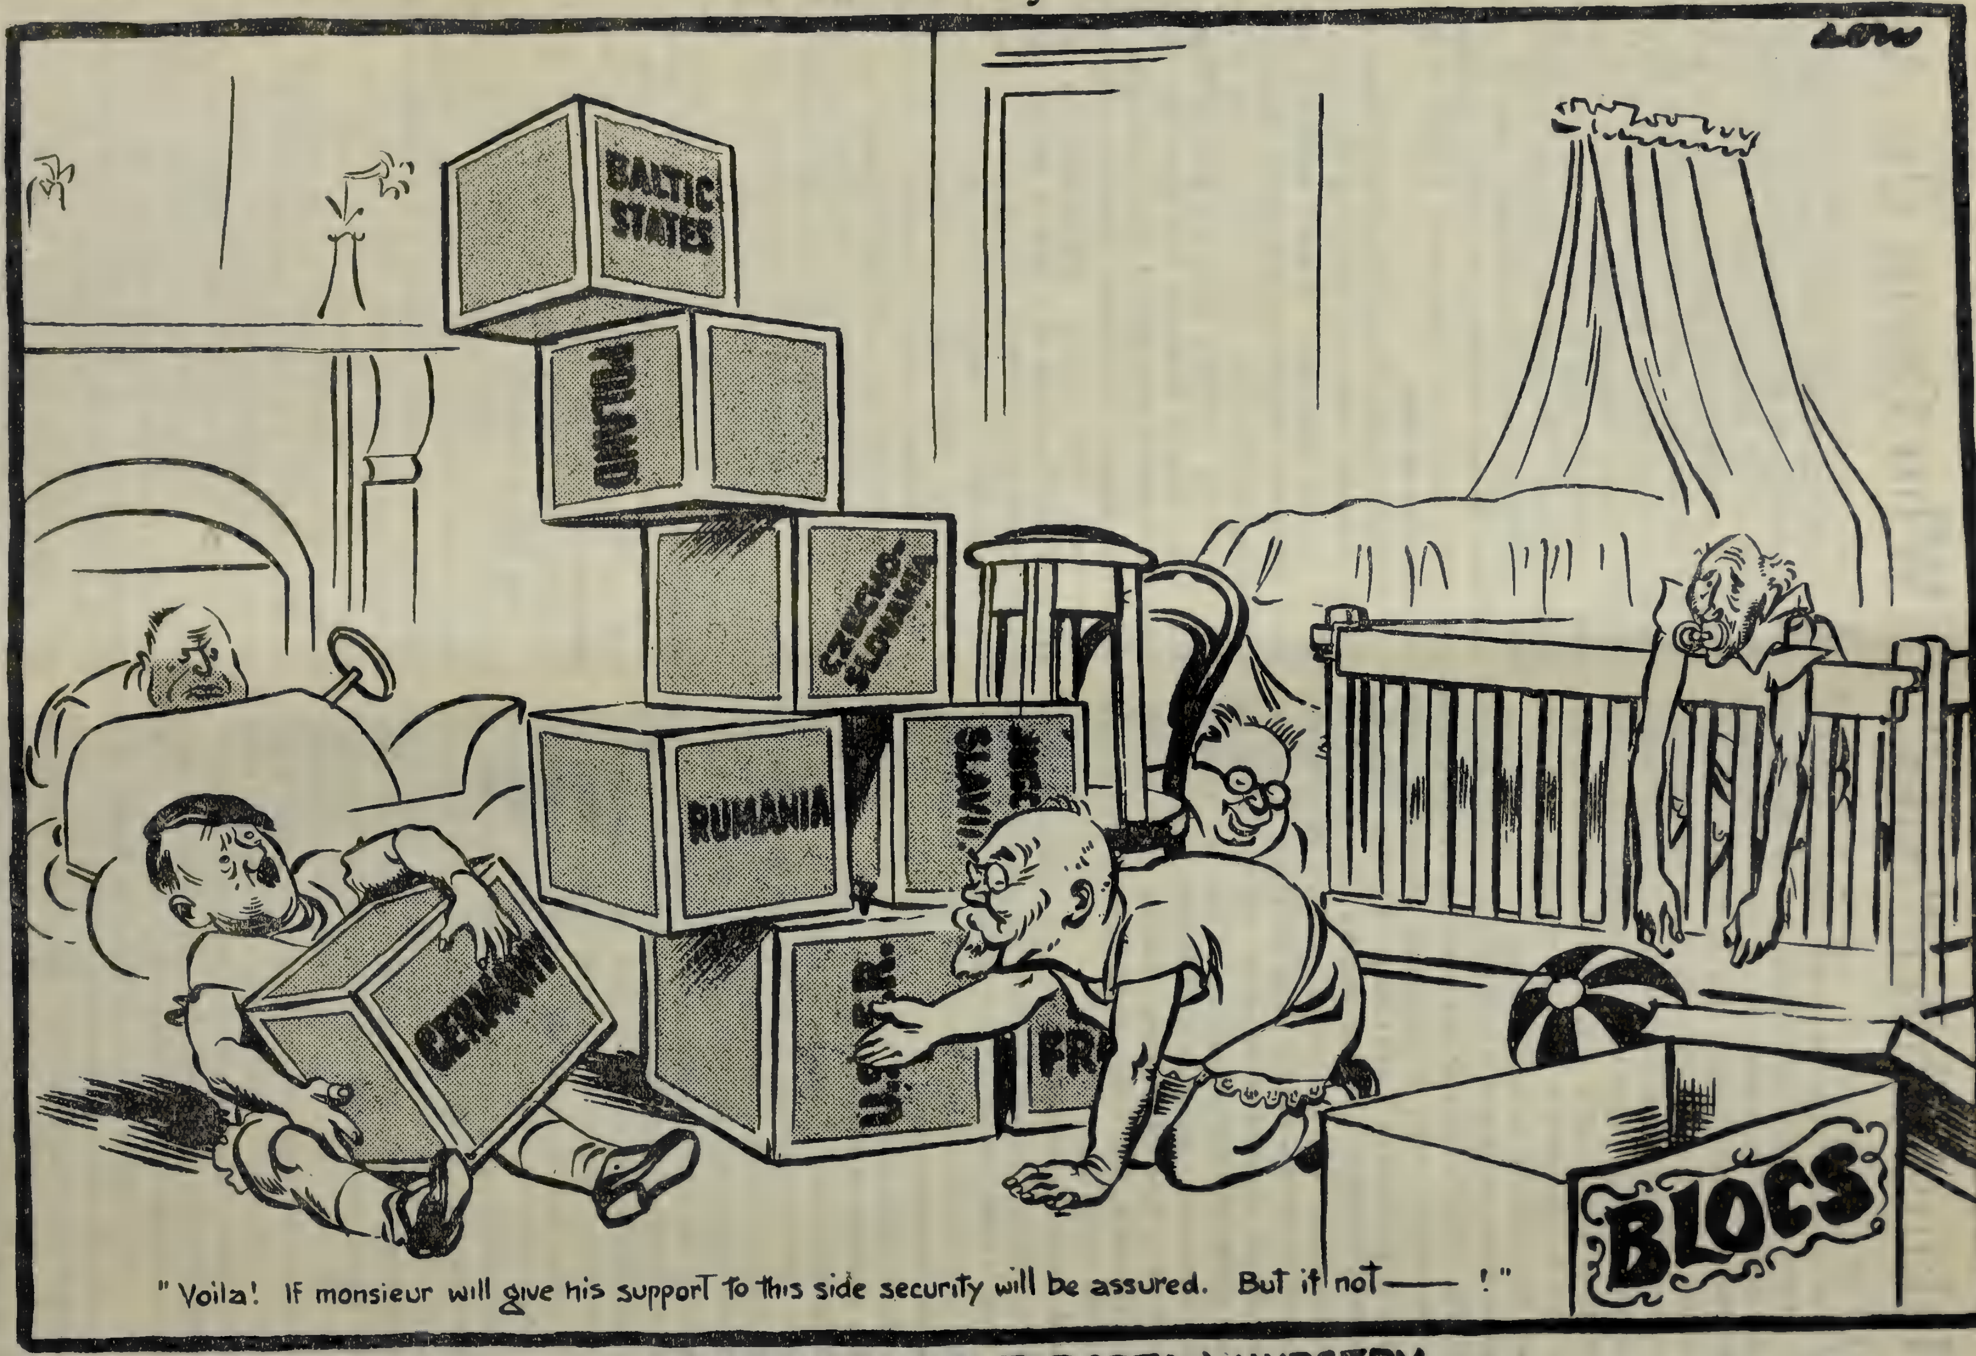
IN May of this year the National Committee on Education by Radio held a conference in Washington. The proceedings of the conference have just been published in a substantial pamphlet called "Radio as a Cultural Agency," and anyone who wishes to realize the full absurdity of the attitude into which our government has drifted is hereby recommended to glance at its pages. We cannot, however, promise that he will get much more than the realization referred to or that he will find much hope for the immediate future. The committee, obviously divided upon various fundamental issues, recommended a federal commission and passed general resolutions, but there is no reason to suppose that anything very fundamental is likely to be changed for some time to come.

Professor Jerome Davis of the Yale University Divinity School presented with vivid simplicity the results achieved by the present radio law. When it went into effect there were ninety-four educational institutions engaged in broadcasting; today difficulties put in their way are so great that many, including Columbia University and the Massachusetts State Department of Education, have given up entirely, while many of the others are rendered almost useless by the policy of the government, which always favors the large advertising enterprises at their expense. The listener has little choice. His legislators have seen to it that he will get ballyhoo for Cocomalt and Ex-Lax whether that is what he wants or not.

The problem is really a unique one, because the radio differs from all other means of communication in possessing a definitely limited number of channels. Theoretically at least, competition is free in the field of books, periodicals, the stage, and the movies. But since the possible number of radio programs is limited, the most inveterate defender of laissez faire is compelled to admit that some central authority must assign to certain agencies the exclusive right to specific air channels. Unless some such control were exercised, the ether would become a babel of voices amid which nothing could be distinguished. But it does not follow that the licensing authority should adopt, as apparently it has, the general principle that the best right to any channel is the right of the person who can make the largest profits out of it.

We are by no means certain that the English system is the perfect one. We are not convinced that the majority should not be allowed a very large measure of what it wants —provided only that the minority is not entirely deprived of its rights—and we should hate to see a government monopoly placed in the hands of a bureaucracy of educators. But since the Radio Commission is bound to exercise authority and to confer privileges, it is surely not too much to ask that it recognize the educational institution as having at least an equal claim with the advertising agency to the highway of the air. Professor Davis suggests, reasonably enough, that a tax might at least be imposed upon all time used for purely advertising purposes by the holders of government licenses. But that is not all. The government, we think, might also very reasonably insist that certain hours of certain days be reserved for non-commercial agencies and that ballyhoo should not always and inevitably take precedence over everything else.

A Cartoon by LOW



LOW
BALTIC STATES
POLAND
CZECHO-SLOVAKIA
RUMANIA
JUGO SLAVI
U.S.S.R.
GERMANY
FR
BLOCS

"Voila! If monsieur will give his support to this side security will be assured. But if not——!"

PLAYTIME IN THE EUROPEAN NURSERY.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

Issues and Men

The War Anniversary

I HAVE read carefully various articles on the twentieth anniversary of the beginning of this world's nearly successful attempt to commit suicide, and am heartened by the absence of braggadocio and by the frankness with which the loss of the war is now admitted. For example, writing in the New York Herald Tribune, Leland Stowe sums up the net results of our attempt to end war by more war and to safeguard democracy by mass murder as follows:

> Twenty years after the outbreak of the war "to make the world safe for democracy" 354,000,000 out of Europe's 550,000,000 people are living under dictatorships in twelve European countries, and democracy is banished from four-fifths of Continental Europe. Twenty years after August 1, 1914, Europe's political and social foundations are beset by the most serious disintegration yet recorded in the peace times of the twentieth century. Today, more than ever, Europe soberly realizes that the peace treaties have brought anything but peace.

Sir Philip Gibbs has this to say—he has done valiant service for the truth since he first announced that "Now It Can Be Told":

> Looking round the world today one sees no assurance of peace. The nations are arming again. Men who remember the last war seem to be preparing for the next. Nothing was learned, nothing was settled, by that monstrous struggle. The ruin of it still exists. The economic downfall of civilization is due to that and to nothing else, because of the heritage that was left in men's minds and the destruction of intelligence.

Then we have Senator Borah's frank speech of July 4:

> We went into a foreign war, a war having its roots in wholly foreign policies. We left our dead on foreign soil. Those policies of those countries remain the same. Europe is no nearer peace than before. We have our dead and crippled, our maimed and insane, our wrenched and twisted institutions, while Europe retains her bitterness, her dissension, her old balance of power. . . . The Versailles treaty was a result of the war we helped to fight—one mad round of war and vindictiveness and dictatorship and repudiation seems to be the most pronounced result of our entrance into European affairs.

But vastly more thrilling to me than this was the recent confession of a friend who was a high official in the Wilson Administration. With some trepidation I asked him if his conscience did not trouble him when he lay awake nights because of his vote to put us into the war, he having just said that "all our financial and economic troubles are due to our having gone into the war." Without a moment's hesitation he answered me with two words, "It does." Naturally I recalled to him how some of us had labored with the Administration in 1917 not to make the ghastly mistake of committing us to a European war with which we had really nothing to do, and how we were derided and accused of being pro-German for doing so. Those were tense days in Washington! Those who wanted to put us into the war were like bloodhounds after their prey. They were brutally intolerant and ready to smash anyone who opposed.

I was struck, too, by the absence of paeans to Woodrow Wilson in the articles I read. There are still plenty of his admirers; few now fail to admit the loss of the war and of its objectives but many still look upon him as a great leader whose defeat at Paris is not to be laid at his door but to be attributed to the malevolence of Henry Cabot Lodge and to Orlando, Lloyd George, and Clemenceau. How can one fail to indict Wilson's judgment when one reads Mr. Stowe's summary, when one witnesses the complete breakdown of the Disarmament Conference, the virtual collapse of the London Naval Agreement, the increased armaments everywhere? In his admirable little volume just published by Macmillan entitled "Europe Between Wars," Hamilton Fish Armstrong quotes General Tasker H. Bliss—a real statesman in uniform—as replying thus when Newton Baker, of the War Department, at a critical moment in the war asked him his view of its duration: "By the analogy of other great wars, I should say thirty or forty years. There may be a pause—an armed truce—while both sides lick their wounds and collect their forces. . . . But then the war will go on until one side or the other is obliterated as a fighting force, or until civilization ends in a chaotic breakdown." Is not this remarkable prophecy dreadfully ominous today?

The defenders of Wilson will now rise to ask how I or anyone else could possibly have expected him to read in the stars all that was to happen. "He had to judge the things as they were," is the usual phrase. Yes, but his speech of January 22, 1917, conclusively showed that he then read the stars correctly. For he declared that there must be "no victors and no vanquished," because if there were victors, there would be a dictated peace which would not last. That was a much more remarkable prophecy than the vision of General Bliss. What caused him to change his mind is the great mystery of Woodrow Wilson. I have asked a number of his intimates, but they can throw no light on the subject.

But these are backward looks. Today we face the disasters the war produced. We read of General Göring's plan to overrun and conquer all of Europe by means of aerochemistry and airplanes. Ernst Henri declares that "the new vast German aeroplane industry which has arisen in a few months in the middle of Europe . . . can turn out 2,000 machines every four weeks." These will carry 5,000 kilos of new gas which no gas mask can ward off, and also great loads of plague bacilli, cholera vibrions, pneumococci, and influenza germs, "which are being cultivated by special Brown staffs." When one reads things like this, even though they may be exaggerated, the mind stands still. Twenty years after 1914 the world plans its complete destruction!

Oswald Garrison Villard

After the Dollfuss Murder

By JOHN GUNTHER

Vienna, August 2

I SAW Dollfuss about a week before his murder. He was cheerful and bright and with his usual disarming simplicity asked how all of us, us Americans in town, were feeling, where my wife was spending her vacation, and so on. I felt a little resentment that a man whose policies I had so often attacked could be so personally charming to me. I saw him again shortly after his murder, the blood sucked from his small body, his face distorted with the terrible pain of his death. In the intervening week Europe had tottered nearer war than at any time since 1918, the Nazis had given the world yet another example of intolerable beastliness, and Austria, the heart of it all, had been—saved.

For Dollfuss dead is stronger than Dollfuss alive. Living, the little man was a serious liability to the unity of the country, because both the Social Democrats and the Nazis so hated him personally; his death allays some of the rancor of the Socialists and has united the people in a storm of bitterness and indignation against the Nazis. The Dollfuss-without-Dollfuss Government now in power would get a clear majority vote, I think. The Nazis murdered not only Dollfuss but themselves.

I do not mean by this that the Nazis are not capable of attempting another coup. Austria almost certainly faces a long, trying period of latent disorder. The Nazis are gangsters, which means that they are cold-minded and desperate at the same time, and they are irrational, which means that they are unpredictable. What the murder of Dollfuss on July 25 does show is that (a) Nazi strength in Austria was vastly exaggerated; (b) Hitler, at the decisive moment, crawled like a coward and whipped back his Austrian Legion; (c) Mussolini, enraged at Hitler, will certainly go to war if the Nazis ever attempt another Putsch. The Hitlerite assault on Austria has definitely failed and the Hitlerite dreams of a Nazi Mitteleuropa are blasted into remote fatuity.

If I had written this article yesterday I should have gone on to say that Hitlerism, even in Germany, crumbling under economic stresses, could not long survive the moral disaster of the bloodshed of June 30 and the unsuccessful Austrian revolt of July 25. But today, the twentieth anniversary of the World War, Hindenburg died, and as I write I hear that Hitler has assumed the presidency of the Reich in combination with the chancellorship. This does not make him absolutely impregnable but it enormously strengthens him, as must be obvious to a child. He is now commander-in-chief of the Reichswehr, and if the Reichswehr doesn't mutiny in about the next ten minutes it never will, German officers being what they are. An hour ago Hitler might easily have been booted from the chancellorship. Now nothing can shake him except formal revolution, I believe.

Dollfuss caused his own death. He paid the penalty for the tragic blunder of February when the Socialists were stamped out by his artillery. This maneuver, which he hoped would strengthen him against the Nazis, had the opposite effect. It deeply embittered those who should have been his allies, and so upset the equilibrium of the country as to make him more than ever vulnerable to Nazi attacks. For a variety of reasons his government was hopelessly lax against the Nazis. Time and time again it threatened to hang a Nazi terrorist; it never did. Reasons: (1) Dollfuss feared retaliation; (2) he was sabotaged by his own civil service; (3) he wanted, tragic blindness, to leave the way open for negotiations with Germany; (4) he didn't want to make martyrs of Nazi criminals; (5) he hoped to show his moral superiority to Hitler by a policy of mercy. Then, by extraordinary bad luck, a Socialist was caught red-handed shooting a policeman; the government finally had a chance to make good its threats of the death penalty by hanging a Socialist and at the same time avoiding the danger of Nazi revenge; the boy, Josef Gerl, was hanged on July 24. It is unknown whether this execution actually precipitated the Nazi revolt. Probably not. But within twenty hours Dollfuss himself was dead. He hanged a Socialist and the Nazis killed him.

Certainly one thing is sure—the manner of his death was heroic. When the message reached the Cabinet that some trouble was afoot, Dollfuss instantly, with rare presence of mind, dismissed the meeting and told his ministers, except Fey and Karwinsky, to scatter and establish themselves in their separate offices. This saved Austria. A very few minutes later the insurgents burst into the Chancellery. Had not Dr. Schuschnigg, the new Prime Minister, escaped from the building in time he could not have organized the rump government which beat down the Putschists. Dollfuss's last words, except for his appeal for peace and his whispered request that Fey look after his family, were, "Where is Schuschnigg?" The intimation contained in this query, that he wanted Schuschnigg as his successor, was decisive in Schuschnigg's subsequent appointment. Dollfuss died thinking that the mutiny was genuine and that the Nazi Putsch had succeeded, but he never yielded an inch to the terrorists.

How is it that the rebellion failed? For four hours Austria was without a government; Vienna was terrified and bewildered; the Chancellery was occupied by the rebels; their radio signal had been heard all over the country; their plans were complete; Austria, the supreme gift to Hitler, lay in their hands. Yet they surrendered without firing a shot in Vienna except the two that killed Dollfuss, and the fighting in Styria and Carinthia was quickly quelled. It is an interesting question and there seem to be several answers:

1. The population as a whole did not rise. We had been led by Nazi propaganda to believe that 60 per cent, 70 per cent, 80 per cent of the country was Nazi. I was fooled like everybody else, the Nazis themselves most of all. The Tyrol and Vorarlberg were supposed to be the most thoroughly Nazi of all the provinces; yet in these two provinces there was no fighting whatever. The people heard the radio signal; they went to the coffee-houses and laughed about it; otherwise, except in Styria and Carinthia, they never stirred. Great tribute to the decency, the moderation, the civilized pacifism of Austrians, swamped as they had been for months with the most inflaming Nazi appeals to violence. Apparently the whole of the Nazi terrorist campaign this last year has been the work of a few hundred professional agitators and unemployed youths, nothing more.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

2. The Nazis had arms only in Styria and Carinthia. In Vienna I saw young men, easily recognizable as Nazis, wandering around the Ring, waiting—for the police and army to give them weapons! Nazis desperately appealed to Socialists to provide them with old Schutzbund arms; the Socialists, be it said to their honor, refused. In Styria and Carinthia the rising, though brief, was severe, because the Nazis had the arms of the Styrian Heimatschutz, which, under the influence of Dr. Rintelen, had turned Nazi the year before.

3. The police and army remained loyal, despite the complicity of isolated police officers in Vienna.

4. The Nazis were either betrayed by their own leaders or blundered terribly. The gang of 144 who took the Bundeskanzleramt went there expecting Rintelen to be already in office as Chancellor. They had no instructions whatever except to murder Dollfuss and await orders. The orders never came, even though Rintelen was not at once arrested. The conspirators waited hour after hour. A tragi-comic and characteristically Viennese touch is that the chief of the rebels, Holzweber, frankly told the prisoner Major Fey that he didn't know what to do, and then, as a desperate effort at solution, opened the telephone switchboard to ring up a coffee-house because a man named Kunze, supposed to be there, might tell him what further action to take. This is a pleasant reductio ad absurdum of the "Leader" principle.

5. Hitler, as soon as he saw the plot had failed, washed his hands of it, betraying the Austrian émigrés whom he had morally supported. He further discredited the Putschists still fighting in Styria by his transparent effort to evade responsibility in naming Von Papen as minister to Austria. This obtuse gesture failed, because the Austrian government sensibly delayed giving its consent to Papen's appointment. Hitler, incredible as it may seem, apparently believed that Austria would welcome Papen with open arms while blood was still flowing, even though he had violated all diplomatic procedure by publicly announcing the appointment without informing the Austrian government beforehand.

6. Above all, Mussolini's 100,000 men were at the border, and everyone knew before Dollfuss had been dead a day that they meant business.

The moral responsibility of Hitlerite Germany for the rebellion and the atrocious killing of Dollfuss cannot possibly be denied. There are dozens of illustrative details. The rebels were armed with German weapons. Their Munich leaders, Habicht and Frauenfeld, were ready to fly to Vienna. The German news agency celebrated the rising as "a successful nation-wide revolt" before it had fairly begun. Photographs of Rintelen, printed in Germany, were ready under the caption "Our New Chancellor." An Austrian official, prisoner in the Chancellery, was told by the rebels, "You'll hear all about this tonight on the Munich radio." The two chief culprits shouted "Heil Hitler" on the scaffold. Above all, the rebels, besieged in the Chancellery, telephoned the German minister, Dr. Rieth, to come and act as intermediary.

Nazi propaganda is violently active now trying to counterbalance these details. Hitler has deposed Habicht and the whereabouts of Frauenfeld are unknown. The murder of Dollfuss is called an "accident." In every way, since the Putsch failed, the Germans are trying to get out from under. Rieth was fired and the Nazis say that the fact that they have discharged him for complicity proves that he had nothing to do with it at all. Another masterpiece of Nazi logic is that Hitler stayed in Bayreuth during the crisis, unlike other Chancellors who burned the midnight oil at their desks, and therefore was not concerned in it.

The new Austrian government, headed by Dr. Schuschnigg, is half Heimwehr, half Dollfuss. No one could call it a permanently stable combination. Yet so deeply can it count on the support provided by affectionate memory of the murdered Chancellor that it may last a considerable time. Liberals and radicals in this part of the world almost always make the mistake of underestimating their opponents. They made this error with Dollfuss, and they make it now with Schuschnigg and Starhemberg. I have no special liking for Starhemberg, but it is simply silly to dismiss him as an incompetent hothead. He behaved very well through this crisis, and he has poise and brains.

Dr. Schuschnigg is a Tyrolese, stiff, dry, able, cold, and shy. He looks like an upper-class civil servant, and acts like one. He and Starhemberg are, in a sense, rivals, but for a time at least homage to Dollfuss will hold them together. Schuschnigg, an ardent Catholic and an avowed monarchist, is the organizer of the Ostmärkische Sturmscharen, another of those troublesome new Central European names that people will have to learn to remember. This organization of 40,000 well-trained and well-equipped young men was used by Dollfuss as an offset to the Heimwehr, when, before February, the Heimwehr (Starhemberg's fascist organization) threatened to bolt the government. The Sturmscharen were the SS (Black Shirts) of Austria, the Heimwehr the SA. Now they are loosely amalgamated in one organization, with headquarters in the same building, and members of both groups do patrol together, but eventual rivalry and friction between them is by no means impossible.

The Schuschnigg Government, obviously, will stand or fall on the problem of the Socialists. Let no one forget that the Socialists, in the last election Austria has had, were the largest single party in the country with 42 per cent of the electorate. It is equally impossible to ignore them, suppress them, or take them into the government, which makes a dilemma indeed. Schuschnigg has promised, in a press interview he gave only today, to undertake some measures for determining numerically the wishes of the electorate, without holding an election or plebiscite. This seems to mean exactly nothing. The reason the government cannot risk an election is, of course, that an election would give the Nazis enough votes—no one knows how many—to claim participation in the Cabinet. Schuschnigg personally deplored the February massacres, I believe, though God knows he is no radical.

The chief lesson of July 25 is of course that a Nazi Putsch in Austria means war. We have been saying this for a long time here, and I suppose now, watching those 100,000 men of Mussolini's perched on the border, people will believe us. If Italy invades the Tyrol to "protect" Austria from Germany, then Jugoslavia invades Carinthia to "protect" Austria from Italy. This would bring the Czechs in, though no one can quite figure out on which side. The conclusion to be derived from this premise is that, even if toes of your friends get stepped on, it is best in the circumstances to hope that Schuschnigg and his tatterdemalion Cabinet can hang on until the Powers as a whole show some sense, step in, and settle the Austrian problem.

The Relief Business Is Booming

By JAMES RORTY

Washington, August 7

IF one considers the government apparatus under the New Deal as a business organization, it is apparent that certain branches of the business are in the doldrums and that others are picking up. The code-making business is shutting down this week and the heart has gone out of it, especially out of the Labor Advisory Board and the Consumers' Advisory Board. The bright young men who represent the respective interests of labor and of the consumer are just as bright and just as right as they ever were, but far less hopeful. They still write energetic memoranda for the record. Off the record they tell anecdotes of the "he sez to me and I sez to him" variety; valor in a vacuum, in other words, although they do their best and can comfort themselves with occasional small victories. Meanwhile, in a less rarefied atmosphere, General Johnson accumulates new laurels as strike-breaker, and the triumphant and unregenerate hosts of the publishers and advertisers mobilize their forces and whet their knives lest anything real in the way of consumer legislation come up in the next Congress.

The state of the AAA is not much better. It has suffered not merely from the drought but from a general public revulsion against the official program of scarcity-promotion. When business refuses to move the wheels of industry or employ workers except at a profit, that is just "economics," or at least "good business." But when government plows under the cotton and slaughters the pregnant sows it is hard to make people think it is good government. The distinction is a bit tenuous, like that of the Catholic church between "natural" (safe period) birth control and the use of contraceptives, but it seems to have political importance at least.

So business is not so good in the Agriculture and Commerce buildings. One has to travel across the city to the ancient office building that houses the FERA in order to recapture the feeling of bustling conquest that characterized the earlier phase of the New Deal. The relief business is booming. Indeed, it might well be alleged that the NRA, by facilitating monopolistic trade-association controls and by raising prices more than it has raised wages or stimulated employment, has helped to make business for the FERA, whose customers, 20,000,000 strong, stand in line across the continent.

The directors of the FERA and of the FSRC (Federal Surplus Relief Corporation) see the job in the simplest possible terms and attack it with gusto. With an estimated relief load of at least 4,500,000 families who are receiving an average monthly dole of $12, the FERA sees an endless vista of consumers for the surpluses. And by an Act of God—the drought—some 2,100,000 head of cattle have been tossed into the government's lap, so to speak. Twelve dollars a month is about one-tenth of the minimum subsistence income for a family, as computed by various government bureaus. It follows, as night the day, that these people must be hungry. Secure in this conviction, which not even the most rabid tory politician is likely to challenge, the FERA is all for grabbing everything it can lay its hands on in the way of surplus commodities and passing them out as supplementary relief to these 20,000,000 customers.

So far, so good. But the logic of the FSRC business cuts sharply across the logic of private business, which runs to the effect that an empty stomach is no customer unless the owner of the stomach can pay for what he eats, and pay enough to include profits all down the line from producer to retail dispenser. These millions of customers can't pay. They are what the sage Professor Walter Pitkin calls "extra-economic" men, women, and children. However, their hunger and their raggedness do establish pressures. These extra-economic masses are not yet disenfranchised, despite the eloquent pleas of eminent tories like Attorney General Wickersham.

Hence the FSRC and the FERA operate in an atmosphere of continuous protest and conflict. Practically everything they do or try to do is violently denounced by the vested interests of private business, which see these government agencies moving steadily, and in response to overwhelming pressures, toward the taking over of whole sectors of the process of production and distribution which have hitherto been the province of profit-motivated business-as-usual. The encroachment has thus far, of course, been fragmentary and relatively insignificant. But it has been sufficient to expose again and again the breakdown of the capitalist economy in this period of potential abundance.

Take the matter of the drought cattle. Without government intervention hundreds of thousands of cattle would have died and rotted in the stricken pastures of the drought belt. The packers, it is true, would have bought some of them for a song and the price of meat would have dropped, but not enough to permit $12-a-month relief families to eat much meat. And the ruin of the farmers would have been complete. Up to July 30 the AAA and the FERA through the FSRC had purchased from 129,000 farmers a total of 1,872,000 cattle. On these farms there was a total of 6,208,000 cattle; the government has bought about 19 out of each 62 head, the poorest of the 62. About 260,000 head have been condemned and slaughtered on the farms. The remainder have been turned over to the FSRC for ultimate processing into meat products for relief distribution. Several hundred thousand head of cattle will be held on pasturage in the Southeastern States until slaughtering and processing facilities are available.

The government prices for drought cattle, averaging 500 pounds on the hoof (a good beef steer weighs about 1,500 pounds) range from $1 to $14. This of course means a loss to the farmer, but the farmers get relief; by and large the government takes the loss. It is now generally conceded that before the purchase program comes to an end some time next year, the government will have purchased between 8,000,000 and 10,000,000 head of cattle.

So much for cattle. But what about sheep and goats? There is little demand for sheep meat and goat meat. Some foreigners eat sheep meat and Indians eat goats. It has been proposed to kill these suffering, unwanted animals, dig big pits with steam shovels, and bury them. But the current revulsion against waste will work against this. Maybe the Indians will eat some of this meat. By the time the Act of God has accomplished the ultimate of its dubious beneficence, the unemployed are going to get a lot of meat. They will be conditioned to meat-eating. They will not willingly go back to beans and flour.

The dislocation of prices and markets consequent upon this slaughtering program has already made itself felt. In many of the government contracts the slaughterer gets the hides, bones, and offal, and some of the edible portions. The result has been that the bottom has dropped out of the hide market; there is also the threat of a glut in the liver and kidney market.

One more contradiction: government has had to go into the meat-canning business in competition with the packers. In July the tempo of cattle processing had reached 140,000 cattle a week. Commercial packers processed 110,000 of these; the remaining 30,000 were processed by relief labor in rented or built plants established by State Emergency Relief administrations in thirty States. The relative costs of government versus commercial processing are indicated by the experience last winter in Texas, where in one month 9,439 persons were employed in processing surplus cattle. It cost the FERA 12.87 cents a pound to process cattle, not counting the relief labor. The packers, who charged 17 cents a pound, did have to count their labor costs, but on the other hand they paid the farmers about half as much for the cattle as did the FERA. In extending its program of establishing relief-labor processing plants, the FERA points not only to lower costs but to the improved morale of workers who are employed not in "raking leaves around the stump" but in producing the food they will later eat.

It is the habit of meat-eating animals—and the unemployed seem fated to enter that category temporarily—to gorge themselves and then to sleep. Where? On what? Relief agencies testify that next to food the families on relief ask for mattresses. At present, especially in the South and Southwest, they sleep on old quilts, on boards, on the floor. So, with the commercial naivete which characterizes these innocent bureaucrats, the FERA has taken over 250,000 bales of surplus cotton and gone into mattress making. Workers on relief are now engaged in making these mattresses in 559 workrooms set up in 40 States. When they are made, relief families will sleep on them—they will be distributed as supplementary relief along with the surplus meat.

As might be expected, the commercial mattress makers are up in arms. So, in general, are all the commercial interests affected by the various production projects which State Emergency Relief administrations have undertaken under the stimulus of the FERA. These include the canning of surplus garden products, the manufacture of furniture by unemployed furniture makers, and the encouragement of local self-help cooperatives which make everything from shoes to soap.

These developments are embryonic, as yet affecting only a negligible fraction of total production and distribution. They are perhaps abortive, depending upon the degree, extent, and pace of business recovery. But they have gone far enough to challenge the failure of private business to operate the machinery of production, to employ workers, and to feed, clothe, and house the population.

Huey Long's "Revolution"

By ALEXANDER KENDRICK

New Orleans, August 13

THE "revolution" Huey Long seems always to be talking about is in the making in his own city—but not from the expected direction. And it is perhaps only poetic justice that it should have its origin in the eternal squabbling which the loquacious Kingfish carries on with anyone who is seeking argument.

The people of New Orleans are famous for their love of pleasure. They have enjoyed the antics of the Senator from Louisiana, and they have egged on the clowning. The Kingfish's latest escapade, his own private little "war," has provided as much fun as any of his previous ones, and there are very few other topics of conversation in the streets and public squares of the city. The situation is a particularly ludicrous one. National guardsmen have created a state of martial law on the first and third floors of the Soule building, which houses the city registration offices. The second and fourth floors are still under civil rule, and presumably functioning normally. Youthful khaki-clad soldiers, armed with tear gas, machine-guns, and shotguns, man every window on the two floors under their protection, "guarding" the registration offices. Across the street, in the City Hall proper, are several hundred uniformed and special police, similarly armed.

It is a good-natured war, with chaffing on both sides and an amused citizenry making piquant Southern remarks from the sidewalk. But there can be no mistaking the certainty that, if given the order, both sides would go into action prepared to do or die for either Huey Long or Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley. One observer in Lafayette Square remarked that "this thing's been going on for a long time and nobody's shot yet." But if shooting begins—and it may have begun by the time this is read—the odds against anyone being shot would not be long. Despite all the levity with which the New Orleans war is being greeted by the populace, there is an undertone of seriousness which has hitherto been absent in similar situations. Many factors are responsible for a change which has come over the "cheap and contented labor" of the South.

On the day that Mayor Walmsley lent a new note of buffoonery to the comic-opera war by calling out several hundred armed policemen to "protect" city property—the same Soule building that was being held by the troops—and incidentally to "guard" the guardsmen who were "guarding" the voting records, a mass-meeting was held across the street from the besieged area. It was called by a united front of liberal, radical, labor, and allied organizations, and it provides the key to the real conflict, which has been lost sight of in the thousands and thousands of words pouring out of the city about its small-time, cracker-box political differences. The line-up is not of Huey Long against Walmsley, or of State against city, or of troops against civil authorities; it is of all these interests and a few other important ones, like the shipping interests and the Association of Commerce, against a united front of workers—white and black, white-collar and blue-overall—who have been too long exploited. The fact that Huey Long is in danger of losing his supremacy—the opera bouffe here originated in his attempt to reelect two henchmen to Congress and his consequent seizure of the registration records to insure this—is of small moment compared with the fact that working-class elements have found common cause and may win for themselves, through what they call "revolution" down here, rights and privileges hitherto denied.

One of the first things a traveler in the South notices is the cheapness of food and clothing. To a Northern pocketbook this is very comforting, but Southern wages are scaled down in the same proportion, and, as has been seen in the making of the NRA codes, a wage differential has been established. But that is not the only thing the NRA has done for Southern labor. It has also forced an additional wage cut, as mill and factory owners, faced with minimum-wage provisions, have changed hourly wages to piece-work wages and inaugurated the speed-up system, a strange anomaly in the once lazy South.

This accounts for such wage scales as those in effect at the Lane cotton mills on the outskirts of New Orleans. These are the largest mills in the State and among the largest in the country. They employ 1,500 persons where once they employed 4,000. Before the NRA the wage rate for apprentices was 6 cents an hour and the work week was fifty-six hours. From this weekly pay of $3.36, $2 was deducted as rent for the company houses in which the mill's employees are forced to live. After the NRA a new wage scale of from 20 to 30 cents an hour was inaugurated, but the work week was cut to eighteen hours, and the weekly rent was raised to $3. Furthermore, after the apprenticeship has been served, instead of automatically receiving higher pay the workers are frequently discharged, to make way for new apprentices.

The conditions of virtual peonage existing in this and other mills brought about a strike two years ago, led by an American Federation of Labor union. It was unsuccessful, and after the defeat the union withdrew from the field and gave up its organizing attempts—"because we couldn't pay the dues," one of the workers remarked. This left the way clear for the Communists, who have entered this and several other mills and succeeded in reintroducing a semblance of united protest, which may soon have resounding repercussions.

Another situation which holds dynamite in it for Long, and Walmsley, and the Association of Commerce, and the backers of all three, the shipping men, is the three-months-old longshoremen's strike. This seems as far from settlement as ever, and the 3,000 strikers have about exhausted their patience. Their temper is such that despite the restraining influence of the conservative International Longshoremen's Association they may resort to drastic means to close the port, as was done in San Francisco, Seattle, and Portland. The entire Gulf of Mexico is concerned in this strike, and while it has not affected shipping appreciably owing to the weakness of the marine unions and the plentiful supply of strike-breaking labor, it is important because it may result in appreciable gains for the workers—and in bloody fighting such as took place on the Pacific Coast.

The strike was called by the I. L. A. in May and is still in progress, with daily rioting on the waterfront, picketing, and other strike activities, which, seemingly, the newspapers have no space to report. According to Charles Stein, vice-president of the I. L. A. local, company unionism lies at the bottom of the present strife. When the NRA gave the union its ostensible backing in organizing efforts, the shipping men of the city got together and formed something called the Independent Longshoremen's Association, membership in which they made a requirement of employment. The union walked out and was joined by the Communist-led Marine Workers' Industrial Union, which also has a fairly large membership. A few weeks later, with no progress made along the strike front and with picketing activities considerably lessened by order of Huey Long's courts, the Communists withdrew from the "united front," charging the familiar "sell-out." There was an element of truth in the charge, for the I. L. A. local blacklisted the most militant of the strikers.

For several weeks now the controversy has been in the hands of the National Labor Relations Board. What its course of action will be is doubtful, although useful precedents of dilly-dallying and half-hearted compromise, with no actual bona fide settlement, have been set in other cases. At any rate, the striking longshoremen in this and other Gulf towns, like Gulfport, Shreveport, Mobile, and Houston, are frankly impatient, and will not be kept in check long.

Another disturbing element in Huey Long's political charivari has more of a federal tinge to it. Among the curious thousands who filled Lafayette Square and the pavement outside City Hall during the past week were several small politicians from Orleans and adjacent parishes. They revealed that for almost a year Louisiana, and New Orleans in particular, has had no federal patronage to speak of, and they attribute this oversight to the Kingfish's declamatory propensities. It is a fact that while new post offices have blossomed all over Kentucky, Mississippi, and Tennessee, this reporter has seen none in Louisiana.

But more important than any of these issues, and loaded with more dynamite, is the relief situation here, with all that that term implies. Real poverty has always existed in the South, but in these days it is starker and more terrible than ever. There is little need for labor when corn and cotton growers are being paid by the AAA to cut their crops. Factories and mills are running on very limited schedules. And worst of all, relief facilities are at their very nadir. Relief allotments of from $4 to $6 a month are the average in the Southern States. In Louisiana the sum is nearer the lower of these two figures, and since August 1, 15,000 persons in the State have been staring starvation in the face. On that day relief orders were halted for these 15,000 by the local head of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, Harry J. Early, with the explanation that they were not merely unemployed but those untouchables, the "unemployable."

Where that term originated, and who issued the order cutting off the blind, the ill, and the aged from the relief lists when they are the persons who need help most, is a mystery which Early has not helped to clear up. He shrugs his shoulders and says, "The orders come from Washington." The Louisiana Legislature adjourned recently after passing a bill providing $10,000 for relief to these stepchildren of the FERA. The bill was never signed by Governor O. K. Allen, Huey Long's alter ego, and it is presumed that if Long had wanted the measure approved, he would have ordered it approved.

This, taken in conjunction with the Kingfish's verbal sallies in favor of the "forgotten man" and his espousal of higher income taxes for the rich, was the last straw for New Orleans workers and jobless. A united front was formed, including the locals of the Socialist Party, the Communist Party, the Marine Workers' Industrial Union, the Unemployed Councils, the Unemployed League, and the League for Industrial Democracy (this student organization is extremely active at Tulane University). A mass-meeting was called for Lafayette Square, the center of the "war" area, and Mayor Walmsley issued a permit, the first of its kind. He was persuaded, it is generally believed, by hints that the speakers would turn their verbal guns upon the Kingfish, and also, it later developed, by the possibility of getting pictures of his police "guarding" Long's national guardsmen. He got some excellent pictures, and they were duly printed in all the newspapers, which by a coincidence happen to be anti-Kingfish.

The united front has already suggested that the funds used by both city and State to equip their blue-clad and khaki-clad defenders with various instruments of warfare could reasonably be diverted to relief purposes. The suggestion has also been made that the Senator from Louisiana has here a good test case for his taxing of the rich. Let the "war" funds come by taxation from those having incomes of over $5,000, say the protesters, and see how quickly an armistice is called. To give point to the tasks laid out for itself by the united front, on the same day that President Roosevelt from Glacier National Park again reassured the nation that "nobody is starving"—gave one of his "Uncle Wiggly bedtime stories," as one radical leader put it—a woman died in Charity Hospital, and the cause of death was officially noted as starvation. Many cases of malnutrition have also come to the attention of health authorities, and they make no bones about the seriousness of a situation in which 15,000 persons have been cut off utterly from any hope of food, clothing, or shelter except from organized private charities, of which there are very few in the South, or by soliciting alms, which is a field already sadly overcrowded.

Meanwhile, the Association of Commerce and the department stores, one of which owns a radio station, are doing their best to convince the world that peace and quiet reign here in New Orleans, and that business—and pleasure—are going on as usual. Daily broadcasts from the "war area" point out that "everything is quiet."

New Orleans is perhaps the largest city in the United States which has failed to provide a single penny for relief. The federal order against "unemployables" threw the onus of their care upon the parishes, and thus upon the State. Thus far nothing has been forthcoming, and from all indications nothing ever will. But if there is no money for relief, there is still plenty to advertise that New Orleans is one of the Edens of the world. The Association of Commerce recently inveigled $10,000 from the city council with which to tell manufacturers in other parts of the country that this is the "home of cheap and docile labor." It may have been so in the past. At present labor is still cheap, but it is no longer docile.

Was Europe a Success?

II. The Question Considered

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE more naive optimists would no doubt begin by insisting that the vices of "Europe" were merely excrescences permitted to tarnish its resplendent virtues, and that what we ought to get rid of can be easily separated from what we ought, by all means, to keep. It does not, however, require any very prolonged consideration to demonstrate that the relationship between the two is not quite so simple and that, in certain specific cases at least, the one actually depends upon the other.

We hate, for example, imperialism, military pride, and the national spirit. They are things which probably must be got rid of if Europe is to continue at all, and which certainly stand in the way of its achieving a success more complete than that which it achieved in the past. But these, so a thoroughgoing conservative might insist, are essential parts of civilization as Europe has known it for a good 3,000 years, and they are essential, not merely because they have existed, but because they furnished the soil out of which its spiritual life grew. Without them it is impossible to imagine the glory that was Greece, the grandeur that was Rome, or the right little, tight little island which is still called England. They were responsible for the material conditions under which civilization developed, but that is not all. They were also very important facts in generating its intellectual and emotional atmosphere. Shakespeare would not have been Shakespeare if he had not believed "this happy breed of men" to be peculiarly the favorite of nature and hence privileged in a very special way in its relations with lesser peoples. Racine would not have been Racine if he had not accepted as God-ordained the absolutism of Louis XIV. Military aggression and class privilege—conceived of as honor and divine right—were, to put the case more concretely, part of both the material and the spiritual basis upon which the entity called Europe rested.

In other words, this thing called civilization grew up under certain conditions and flourished as a result of them. It was associated with the very tendencies which progressives as well as radicals deplore, and is now, so the conservative might insist, threatened quite as definitely by "liberals" and "reformers" as it is by radicals—the only difference between the two being that the one is slowly undermining the foundations without knowing what he is about while the other is deliberately blowing them up. The threat did not originate with the founder of the communist doctrine. It originated with the first reformer who undertook to criticize the proud confidence of that European spirit which was born in Athens, rationalized in Rome, and taken over by the Catholic church; with the first upstart who dared question in the interests of inferior civilizations or the interests of the inferior part of the European population those traditions which had justified themselves by the production of an art, a philosophy, and a science not to be compared with any other.

Moreover—so this ultra-conservative would continue—these essentially un-European criticisms could take effect only because Europe's geographical boundaries were expanded more rapidly than the Europeanization of newly admitted peoples could proceed. Formerly this had not been so. What was once only Athens became Greece, then the Mediterranean basin, then all the western part of the Continent. But as successive additions were made to the spiritual entity called Europe, the inhabitants of each were genuinely Europeanized, while those areas not so disciplined were successfully excluded from the spiritual community. All parts of the latter, paying allegiance to certain artists and certain thinkers, developed the same sensibilities and accepted the same standards of value—a fact at least as important as the further fact that the political institutions of each owed something to that Roman law out of which each had grown. Hence, though the nations might differ among themselves, they could never differ so utterly as they differed with non-European races, because they had thought about the same things and pursued the same aims too long not, at bottom, to understand one another in some workable fashion.

Unfortunately, however, America and Russia—the last two nations to be admitted to the European community—were never really assimilated, though it was, for a time, wrongly supposed that they were about to be. The latter, which had turned its eyes toward Paris for a good two centuries, was supposed to be slowly losing its Oriental character. The former, which could look only to Europe if it looked anywhere at all, was supposed to be merely in the process of taming the wilderness on a thoroughly European plan. But these orderly processes were somehow interrupted, and Europe found itself suddenly threatened by what it had regarded as docile if backward pupils. America discovered the machine and Russia discovered communism—a method and an attitude both of which Europe felt to be foreign to the European pattern and capable of disrupting it far more completely than it would have been disrupted if Mohammedism had gained a foothold during the Middle Ages and the "East" had played a role in shaping the civilization of England and France.

Superficial thinkers—our ultra-conservative is still speaking—may see Americanism and communism as opposed one to the other, but fundamentally they differ only in that one is more consciously thoroughgoing than the other. Both are fundamentally enemies of Europe because both are attacking the foundations upon which the European achievement rests. America is innocent, hopeful, and naive. It believes in amelioration and in "progress," but all its humanitarian and reformist ideas rest ultimately upon a dissatisfaction with what Europe regards as a sufficient success. It hopes to save what it calls—without very well understanding it—the European achievement; but it is not willing to pay the price which Europe paid and it is too tender-minded to admit that no lesser one will buy what Europe bought.

Some such conviction as this is implicit in the attitude of at least the more intelligent representatives of the royalist, neo-Catholic, and fascist groups. It might be deduced from the writings of T. S. Eliot or Maurras, just as it could, of course, be discovered in violent, unrationalized form in the utterances of Mussolini or Hitler. Nor is it wise merely to reject the contention without some analysis. Quite obviously certain specific aspects of the cultural life of Europe did depend upon beliefs and traditions which none except the most ultra-conservative would wish to see preserved. Many, at least, of the most exalted movements now preserved in literature and art would hardly have been possible had it not been for the presence of an arrogant sense of national or class superiority, and there can be no question of the fact that even ordinary, nineteenth-century enlightenment and humanitarianism destroy the very foundations of much that seemed, to an earlier time, part of the heroic tradition of Europe.

Certainly, in other words, one cannot buy exactly what Europe bought at any price except the one it paid. You could not, for example, have Dante without his bigotry, just as you could not—then, at least—have had Plato without the slaves who supported his society. An ameliorized Europe, a Europe of which it could not be said that its failures were as ghastly as its triumphs were impressive, would be a Europe much changed, one from which, in all probability, certain great exaltations based upon pride and a sense of self-righteousness had departed forever. But the question is not, after all, whether Europe can or ought to be changed. The question is rather a question of what is absolutely essential and what is not. To what extent could it be changed without being destroyed? What must be left to the European man in order that he may still remain recognizably himself? What characteristics of his psychology and what aspects of his sensibility are so absolutely essential that his champions would be justified in saying to any revolutionist or reformer: "These you must leave him because, once they were taken away, he would no longer be recognizable as the European man"?

The striking fact is that certain of these characteristics, each one of which appears to be a sine qua non, stand high in the list of those which the most radical of radicals have promised to "liquidate" and which, indeed—though perhaps somewhat prematurely—they declare to be already disappearing from the Russian character. One of them is a sense of the reality, the worth, and the sacredness of the individual, who is thought of as having in himself a value for which there is no equivalent, not merely because he seems unique to himself but because—since every man differs somewhat from every other—he contributes something unique and possibly of value to society itself. Another one is a similar sense of the importance of something which has been variously defined but always called "freedom" for this same individual.

Still others might be added. There is, for instance, the tendency to regard differentiation and variety as desirable in themselves, and a consequent tendency to stress the importance of something called "personality." There is also a disposition—very different from the collectivist stress upon the importance of the common denominator—to assume that all excellences are arranged in a hierarchy, the uppermost levels of which are not only inaccessible to most but barely if at all even visible to the best and the most excellent of men. The European man, in other words, has always thought of progress and achievement as a movement away from the usual, the average, the norm, the universally accessible; the new man, as described by his champion, makes, on the other hand, an opposite assumption. The highest excellence is that which is most generally accessible; progress consists in a movement toward the center, in an increasingly successful regularization and standardization of thoughts, opinions, tastes, desires, and aims about a norm supplied by the common denominator of humanity in the mass.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

It must of course be admitted freely and quickly that European man neither consistently pursued the ends which these characteristics imply nor achieved them by any means completely when they were pursued. At times they were obscured by opposite tendencies, and certain of them—notably those which relate to individual freedom and the high valuation put upon what is called personality—hardly manifested themselves very strongly before the Renaissance. At other—perhaps at all—times his tendency was to assume that they applied only to the consideration of a small class which could exist only if supported upon the backs of a mass, the members of which were left to achieve for themselves whatever small degree of freedom, personality—and comfort—they could.

Nevertheless, the fact remains that each of the conceptions enumerated played a large part in the thoughts and aspirations of cultivated humanity. The fact also remains that—with what success may be disputed—the tendency was to profess a desire to see the privileges of freedom and individuality extended to a larger and larger portion of the community. In other words, democracy pretended, at least, to aim at a society which should be more equitable than any previous one by virtue of the fact that these goods upon which is set such high value would be shared by the majority. Collectivism, on the other hand, proposes that—for the present at least—the equalization shall be achieved by denying them to all alike.

Collectivism, indeed—perhaps merely to strengthen its position in debate—tends to maintain that these goods are, as a matter of fact, purely illusory—that freedom and individuality never existed for anyone, that they are merely superstitions which happen to be convenient because privilege can be defended under the pretense that not privilege itself but a sacred mystery is being attacked. The question, then, is not simply whether democracy has really succeeded in achieving a wider and wider distribution of certain goods; neither is it simply the question whether or not these goods are so precious that they must be preserved for a class if they cannot be given to all. It is, before everything else, whether or not these goods ever were real, whether freedom and the unique individual ever existed at all.

[This is the second of a series of three articles by Mr. Krutch. The third, Some Doubts Arrived At, will appear next week.]

NEXT WEEK

Class War in California

BY LEW LEVENSON

An Authentic Casualty List of the Victims of the Red Hunt.

In the Driftway

THE present drought has turned upon that phenomenal creature, the dry farmer, more government attention than he has had since the Homestead Act was passed in 1862, although he has suffered from drought at least six years out of every seven ever since that time. At one period in his life the Drifter learned to know the dry farmer rather well in one of his most typical habitats, a valley in southern Idaho. Two streams run through this valley, which is wide and flat, and gray with sagebrush, but they were long ago preempted by a few early settlers whose descendants have ever since jealously guarded the rights to a supply of water which in any case was sufficient only for a limited number of animal and human stock. Around the rim of the valley as it rises toward encircling hills lie the desolate windswept acres known as dry farms. There is an old quip about the Homestead Act that by its provisions the government bets the unwary settler from 160 to 640 acres of land that he can't live on it for three years without starving to death. To make the test a real one the government deprives the victim of what little cash he has by requiring that the acres be fenced and that the pioneer live on the land for a certain period each year—which means that he must build a house. He must plant a crop each year of course. (Fortunately, or perhaps unfortunately, he is not required to reap a harvest.) He surrounds his vast estate with two strands of barbed wire strung between cedar posts, builds a tarpaper-covered shack, lays in a supply of canned goods (he is fifteen miles from a store), plants his wheat and his garden. He has, if he is lucky, a cow, a couple of horses, a plow, and a wagon. He has also two barrels in which he hauls water from some distant source. Digging wells in this region has been found to be an expensive if not a futile gesture.

* * * * *

SPRING in the valley, especially among the foothills, is full of hope. Water rushes down the gullies. In a moist blue sky rain clouds often gather and the sun is tempered by a cool breeze. The new-plowed land is black with moisture, and yellow crocuses bloom. Soon afterward the sharp green blades of wheat push up and grass grows among the sagebrush. In June the delicate colors begin to fade as the moisture runs out of them. The sun grows hotter, whitening the sky and the alkali in which the sagebrush grows. The wind is hot and dry and covers the sharp green wheat with dust. Toward the end of June the prickly pear, a variety of cactus, puts forth its blossoms of heavy yellow and red, and the desert comes into its own. If rain does fall after that it is likely to come in cloudbursts that do as much harm as good. The dry farmer may get a crop. In any event he takes up his plow again in due season, sure that this will be the wet year he dreams about, a year which does come, to be sure, just often enough to keep him from giving over to the wind and dust all of his savings. Meanwhile, the only fertility that dry farmers can count upon fills the tarpaper shack to overflowing with children, who swarm out like bees from a hive when any vehicle straggles past along the dirt road.

THE Drifter does not know whether his Idaho dry farmers are even officially counted among the drought sufferers to whom government relief is being given. He hopes they are. The rumor has been denied that farmers are to be moved from submarginal land. Before it was denied, however, the submarginal farmers themselves had entered violent protests. The reports did not say which farmers protested but the Drifter suspects that the dry farmer, if he were scientifically analyzed, might show a marked differentiation from other human animals as a result of having had to adapt himself over a long period of years to living without water. It is just possible that the dry farmer, like the prickly pear, would not survive in the Land of Promise.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Women Who Work"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Sylvia Kopald Selekman in her review of "Women Who Work," by Grace Hutchins, in your issue of July 18, raises questions of fact which must be answered.

1. On the suspension of the night-work law in Massachusetts cotton mills, of course the very word "suspend" means to "cause to cease for a time from operation or effect." It is mere quibbling to criticize the omission of the period of suspension.

2. Mrs. Selekman writes that not only Governor Ely and textile mill-owners, but also the State Federation of Labor and "our socially responsible Commissioner of Labor and Industries" urged suspension. The New York Times of July 16, 1933, stated: "Edwin S. Smith, Commissioner of Labor and Industries in Massachusetts, expressed regret that the six o'clock law might be suspended but agreed that such action must be taken if Massachusetts mills were to compete with mills in other sections." He was not, then, as Mrs. Selekman implies, urging suspension of the law for the benefit of the workers. Nor were the "labor leaders" or Mr. Henry Kendall acting in the interests of the workers by urging suspension of the law.

I might add that Dr. Alice Hamilton of the Harvard Medical School vigorously attacked the proposed suspension of the law in January, 1933. (Federated Press, January 10, 1933.)

3. The source cited by Grace Hutchins on low wages in Massachusetts in 1933 was the American Federation of Labor's Weekly News Service for April 1, 1933, quoting Commissioner Smith's official statement. This referred not merely to a few mills in Fall River and New Bedford in 1932, as Mrs. Selekman claims, but also to factories in Lawrence and other cities in the spring of 1933. I can here quote only one sentence: "He told of factories where employers paid all of their employees less than $10 a week."

Mrs. Selekman in her review would seem to defend the suspension of an important piece of social legislation that had been won only by the efforts of organized workers through years of struggle.

New York, August 1 HY KRAVIF

Colorado Relief Standards

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In a recent issue of The Nation I noticed both an editorial and a letter on the standard of relief in Colorado. Since I served for a number of months as the Western field representative for the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, I am interested sufficiently to point out that the statements concerning the relief standards in Colorado are not accurate. I have before me a statement indicating the average monthly relief budget as of June 1, 1934, based on the actual expenditures as reported from sixty counties in the State. This report shows that the average relief received by a family of five amounted to $30.53; in the city of Denver a family of five averaged $60.43. This is based on the April 1 report.

In December, 1933, Colorado's average for the State as a whole was $16.23 per family, but the average for the principal cities of the State was $23.62. The statistics for January are very misleading, because in that month the FERA refused to grant any funds to the State until the legislature made necessary appropriations for unemployment relief, which it did during the last week of January.

To state that Colorado's relief average is between $5 and $10 a month is certainly inaccurate. Beginning with February there was a great improvement in relief standards in Colorado.

Milwaukee, Wis., August 3 BENJAMIN GLASSBERG

Just the Opposite

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I wish Mr. Rorty had seen my film "The World in Revolt" before describing it as "ultra-reactionary," as I am sure he would have agreed with the reviewers that it is just the opposite of what he says.

Astoria, N. Y., July 31 EMIL LENGYEL

RACIAL ARTS OF LOVE

PRIVATELY PRINTED

MATURE READERS
AND COLLECTORS OF AMATORY
CURIOSA
OF ALL RACES
SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE
OF BOOKS ON
SCIENTIFIC SEXUALIA
ANTHROPOLOGICAL
ESOTERICA
UNEXPURGATED CLASSICS
EXOTICALLY ILLUSTRATED
MAGICA SEXUALIS

LIMITED EDITIONS

All FALSTAFF scientific and anthropological Books on the Love Relations of Mankind are enthralling and highly informative documents by authorities of international repute. That is why the FALSTAFF list of permanent subscribers reads like a "Who's Who" of America's Sophisticated Intellectual Aristocracy.

FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. 13-NA, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Please send me free illustrated catalogs of Amatory Curiosa.

Name.................................. Age
Address ....
City.......................... State...........

Labor and Industry

New York's Relief Crisis

By ISIDOR FEINSTEIN

WITHIN the greatest anthill of the Western Hemisphere the machinery has slowed down. One out of six New Yorkers depends on the dole. One out of three in the city's working population is without a job. Three hundred thousand New York families must be fed, housed, and clothed by government, and government is desperate and blundering at the task. The metropolis exhibits, in the large, all the defects of a system that leaves far too much of the relief burden on local government. Washington still declines to use its sovereign powers for a major attack on unemployment and relief. The city, as a mere municipal corporation, has only limited means at its disposal. Ordinary financial resources, despite reduction in social services and city pay rolls, are nearing exhaustion. Powerful social and political forces, planning even now to turn relief needs into profit, prevent the use of unusual methods and taxes to feed the hungry. City officials, caught between the pull of those who hold the purse-strings and the mounting strength of the organized unemployed, lose their fair-weather liberalism, grow arbitrary and brutal. And an irresponsible army officer, a Tammany protege gone Fusion, swallows reports of red plotting and uses his powers as Police Commissioner to organize a rifle and machine-gun regiment to shoot down strikers and jobless demonstrators.

In 1930 relief in New York City cost about a million dollars a month. This year combined federal, State, and local expenditures for New York's unemployed average between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000 a month—almost $200,000,000 a year, or roughly one-third of the city budget. State and city provide one-fourth of the funds, Washington one-half. The inflationary boomlet that marked the first year of the Roosevelt Administration made no permanent dent in the relief rolls. The number of those on home relief rose from 31,333 in June, 1932, to 116,949 in June, 1933; fell to 93,203 in October of that year, but rose again to 167,498 by June, 1934. During that month there were 354,153 families on work- and home-relief rolls, 77,000 more than in June, 1933. Monthly relief costs rose during that period from $9,943,267 to $15,318,196. Relief applications have risen from 900 a day last September to 1,500 a day. The estimate of the Health Commissioner that there are 150,000 additional New York families which need relief but are not getting it adds to the nightmare.

The PWA, slow in getting started, will provide few jobs even when fully under way. The $42,000,000 triborough bridge and the $37,500,000 midtown tunnel were begun last year, but the first project was giving work to only 440 men and the second to 599 men at the beginning of August. At the same time there were 717 men working on three smaller projects involving expenditures of $11,000,000. The city has applied for $175,000,000 additional in loans and grants. Some $40,000,000 has been made available, but the funds are still idle. The rest is expected to be approved. It is officially estimated that if all these projects are launched, the PWA at its peak will give employment to five or six thousand men in New York. The estimate seems generous.

New York's greatest relief crisis coincides, as in so many other cities, with a period of banker control. An attempt by the last Tammany administration to impose $25,000,000 in special taxes on the financial community led to threats of "secession." The Stock Exchange prepared, or pretended to prepare, for removal to Jersey City to escape stock-transfer taxes. The battle, more or less a sham, ended last October with the drawing up of a four-year agreement between the city and the bankers. The proposed taxes were abandoned. In return the bankers loaned the city $70,000,000 for relief, $32,000,000 of which was to repay the bankers for relief loans already made. A revolving fund was set up at what has since become an extortionately high rate of interest to provide for the city's recurring short-term needs. The city on its part agreed to limit real-estate taxes, the chief source of city revenue, and in four years to set aside a reserve of $175,000,000 against delinquent taxes. The signing of the agreement left the city neatly trussed up financially. Wall Street, which five years before had obviously preferred the Socialist Norman Thomas to the "wild radical" Fiorello H. LaGuardia, supported LaGuardia for Mayor, making sure that he would be considerably less radical than his speeches at banquets of lady garment workers.

Caught between the bankers' agreement and the rising complaints of relief organizations that allowances were inadequate, the administration has tended to move steadily to the right. In William Hodson, executive director of the Welfare Council of New York, Mayor LaGuardia picked a nationally known social worker to be his Welfare Commissioner. When Hodson was sworn in he told his aides that in dealing with a jobless client they should "listen to the story of his problems with patience and kindly understanding. If he shows irritation or impatience, remember that it is hard to be sweet-tempered when you are starving or about to be deprived of the roof over your head. . . . When you cannot do what is asked . . . give a full explanation in simple terms and with all courtesy and friendliness." That attitude was quite in accord with LaGuardia's own background, but within a few months jobless groups were calling for Hodson's resignation, the Mayor was assailing leaders of the unemployed as "yellow dogs" and "fakers," the Police Commissioner's strong-arm orders had brought about the clubbing of relief demonstrators, and Hodson was absolving the police and blaming reds for the disorders. To stave off criticism from the press, the Mayor summoned the city editors of the metropolitan press to a secret "emergency" conference. He confided to them his fears that red agitators were bent upon starting trouble, and asked them to refrain from criticism of the police. "Agitators" were dropped from relief rolls to check the organization of the unemployed. The climax was a brutal attack on demonstrators by police outside welfare headquarters on May 26.

When the Mayor cooled off, a conciliatory gesture was made with the announcement of a panel of 500 citizens to hear relief complaints. None, so far as could be learned, were ever notified. Six refused to serve. Corliss Lamont and Robert W. Dunn, two of those named, publicly declined with the statement that they regarded "the proposed panel as essentially a device of the LaGuardia administration to distract attention from the present campaign of persecution and terror against unemployed workers and organized relief workers."

The replacement of the CWA by the FERA, accompanied as it was with sharp wage cuts, intensified organization of the unemployed. Further declines in average relief allowances since have added to the discontent. In May the average monthly dole for families on home relief was $44.68. It was $44.09 in June. For those on work relief the May average, $53.93, fell in June to $51.61. Rent allowances range from $2 to $4 a week. Of 30,000 dropped when the CWA was transformed into the FERA, only about 10,000 have been restored. Work relief is now being cut down again. So is home relief. With jobs and pay rolls declining, there were 8,500 fewer on home relief in June than in May. In June less than $7,000,000 was being spent on work relief as compared with the $12,000,000 disbursed by the CWA in March. Work relief was cut a million dollars from May to June but home relief rose by only a quarter-million. As part of the "economy" drive a campaign was begun, with much tub-thumping, against "chiselers," that is, persons on both home-relief and work-relief rolls. These "chiselers," some 5 per cent of the cases investigated, actually drew the princely sum of about $80 a month.

New York, like other cities, has untried means at its disposal to alleviate distress among the jobless, but the difficulty in using them is enormous. Municipal distribution of food and milk purchased directly from the impoverished farmer is always a possibility—but not a probability in the face of hostile courts and the political suicide risked by the Mayor who tries them. Less radical methods are almost as hopeless. New York could, by the threat of special taxes on the financial community, rid itself altogether of the onerous reserve called for by the bankers' agreement, but the Mayor, after being hostile at first, then lukewarm, finally permitted negotiations that cut the reserve to $25,000,000 instead of $50,000,000 a year during the next three years. Income taxes, taxes on servants, luxury taxes, could be made to yield a good return. So could taxes on stock transfers. Relief funds could be raised in the world's richest financial district, but the Mayor is too beholden to and fearful of Wall Street to take the step. With his $38,000,000 relief fund exhausted, the Mayor called a conference of sixty-six prominent citizens to discuss steps to raise $40,000,000 for relief between September 1 and March 31. By the latter date he expects comprehensive federal machinery will have been set up to take over the whole problem. Wall Street could release this year's $24,000,000 reserve fund and bring the problem near to solution, but it hopes to use the city's distress to put over a transit tax of two cents as an entering wedge to getting rid of the hated five-cent fare. This would mean millions to the transit interests and their bankers, and they hope to succeed under the guise of humanity. The Mayor, fearful of political repercussions, still hesitates. And while he hesitates, New York continues to grapple desperately with its relief problem, reaching more and more for the club when it cannot supply the bread.

Coddling the Bums

By JAMES P. MITCHELL

WHEN the depression came, there was in operation only one major technique for relieving poverty and destitution—the case-work method as practiced by social workers. A combination of factors precipitated, first into the private charitable agencies and later into public agencies built on the model of the former, the responsibility of keeping alive the thousands of working people that our crazy economics had left penniless. Social agencies were thoroughly unprepared for the magnitude of the responsibility, for the immense number of human beings that were poured into their rather complex mechanism, but they did what they could. For no problem were there less preparation and fewer resources than for that of the transient. Public agencies were bound by the heritage of the Elizabethan poor law, which had so influenced American treatment of relief that public agencies in general would help no one who had not lived for a year in the county, or in some cases as small a unit as the township. In California three years were required, in Maine five, in Vermont seven. Other States had their peculiar requirements. On the other hand, the whole weight of American tradition was on the side of moving to the frontier. The frontier had ceased to exist, but the tradition was hearty. Single men, the most mobile element in the population, were the most numerous group among the transients, just as they were when Daniel Boone moved into Kentucky, and single men have been notoriously discriminated against, although Jesus of Nazareth was an unemployed, single, homeless carpenter, and many other valuable men, including Leonardo, Spinoza, Shakespeare, and Aristotle, would have been classified as "unattached men" by an American social agency if they had had the misfortune to apply for help, and would have been sent to a congregate shelter of a type whose standards at this date do not need description.

Many factors, of course, had their part in dislocating people from their "legal residence" (the degree of correlation between homelessness and broken homes seems very high), but the remarkable thing was that once a man was separated from that "legal residence" he could hardly return, and once "legal residence" was lost he could never hope for help. By this ingenious method hundreds of thousands of persons were removed from the rolls and the consciences of supervisors of the poor, and the country managed to build up a transient army whose size has been estimated as approaching three million. These could usually get overnight care wherever they went—communities were afraid to do less—but in the morning they must go on. Cumulatively, the possibilities of this method of giving relief by refusing to consider the need are enormous; theoretically, it would be only a question of time before everyone would be displaced from his "legal residence" and no further relief would be necessary. The coincident appearance of the Russian film "The Road to Life" with the remarkable study of homeless boys by Professor A. Wayne McMillen of the University of Chicago focused attention so effectively on the problem that a special appropriation was made to be administered through the FERA for the relief of people who needed help at a place not their legal residence. The money to be spent was entirely federal, relieving the individual communities of a burden which they were both unwilling and unable to assume. The few regulations and restrictions laid down were very sensible and valuable in the main: there was to be no time limitation on relief to transients; work relief was to be provided for everybody able to work; professional case workers were to be an important part of the program; standards were to be high enough so that no one need consider life in the box cars an improvement on federal relief.

The money was to be allocated to the States which submitted satisfactory plans. A great majority submitted plans and most have some sort of transient program now operating. The situation was so bad that any change would have been an improvement, and improvement there has been. The submitted plans bear a remarkable resemblance to the first plan, that of Professor McMillen for Alabama. In their working out there have been wide disparities. The program was necessarily experimental; to deal fairly with transients was a new concept for communities which had no intention of dealing fairly with residents; consequently much freedom was allowed. As usual everything began with the premise that since there are no legitimate jobs available it is necessary to invent illegitimate jobs.

The program has now been in operation for a year. According to William J. Plunkert, Director of Transient Activities of the FERA, there were on May 1, 1934, 259 transient treatment centers and 92 camps. During the month of March 325,000 different individuals received some assistance from the centers. The number receiving assistance at any one time is approximately 166,500; nearly 40 per cent of these, surprisingly enough, are individuals in families. Of the unattached individuals newly registered in March, 127,720 were males and 2,326 were women. More than 10,000 of these were Negroes. The number of Mexicans, Indians, and Orientals has been almost negligible. Over 17 per cent were minors. During March 138,243 cases were closed, of which about 4,500 were given transportation to their homes or to some other destination where they presumably would be well taken care of; 102,000 cases were closed because the transient was unwilling or unable to accept any plan which the service could offer. This extremely high number must represent a confessed failure on the part of an agency whose express purpose was to stabilize transients. Up to the end of May approximately $14,700,000 had been granted to the States by the FERA for the relief of transients.

There can be little question that the recognition of and provision for the needs of transient persons constituted a considerable advance in social policy. But the transient program itself is as yet far from being adequately developed. One of the most serious obstacles it has had to face is the actual hostility of many communities to relief for transients. It is hard at first thought to understand why any community should not welcome the program, but the distrust, dislike, and downright hatred of transients in the minds of many business men have delayed the program in many regions and crippled its effectiveness in others. Transients are regarded as immoral, as "labor agitators," as worthless individuals who have no contribution to make to the community. "It's their own fault," is a frequent attitude, and the conclusion is drawn that nothing should be done about them, or that they should be given overnight care and hustled away, thus removing them from the sight and consciences of more stable folk. This formula for relieving distress by ignoring it is a favorite evasion in many places. There is likewise in many communities the attitude that the transient program is too good for transients, that it is coddling the bums and thus encouraging transiency. The notion that adequate relief, with a chance to work for what is given and to earn from 50 to 90 cents a week, is too good for Americans might be funny if it did not have disastrous consequences. But it is true that the fairly decent standards imposed by federal regulations are considerably higher than the standards of relief of many local relief organizations, and not a few starving but stable families who have maintained a legal residence and many unattached men who have accepted the chilly comfort of a municipal flop-house might improve their lot considerably by taking to the road. The conclusion which sensible people might be expected to draw from this is that local relief agencies must raise their standards.

By no means all the difficulties in effective transient work have been caused by this hostility, however; most State programs have weaknesses and some are weak all the way through. The State directors and subordinate officials in many instances are not trained social workers; often they lack any real social conscience or understanding of the program. They have made some egregious blunders and established some fatal policies. One of the worst of the latter is the return to legal residence of most individuals and families for whom legal residence is verified. This is to overlook the fact that if their legal residence were a place where a reasonable adjustment could be made, the transients would never have become transients. It is true that many, especially young boys, once they have a chance to sit down in a minimum of peace and comfort without the urgency of departure facing them for the next morning, realize that their place is at home, and with skilful assistance they can be brought to face their problems and handle them. Sometimes the assistance of the home agency can be enlisted in solving the conflicts which led to transiency, and sometimes a program can be developed for the transient on his return home which will fill the gaps which made home life seem bleak and an existence in the box cars preferable by comparison. But in too many State programs this is not attempted; a simple telegram, a reply proving residence for the past year—and transportation is furnished. This provides a certain amount of revenue for the railroads, but it is difficult to see what else of value it accomplishes. If the legal residence presents the same apparently insurmountable obstacles to adjustment which it presented before transiency, those obstacles can be escaped merely by running away from them again. It would be interesting to determine how many families and individuals have been provided with transportation to their homes only to take once more to the road when home looked as bad as ever.

In States which have turned the transient program into a transportation program the standards of case work—though not necessarily of physical care—are usually very low; the workers may be competent, but they are very few, with great loads, and are stuck off in a corner of the program to collect verifications of residence and do little else. The adjustment of transients to their situation, assistance to them in gaining insight into their predicament, is hardly thought of. Frequently, in fact, any variation from the most inconspicuous behavior is treated as a good reason for denying further service, and the "undesirable" transient is pushed out on the road again, to go through the same difficulties at the next center. It is certainly clear that many transients take to the road as a way of escaping from problems which seem insurmountable, and that this is a neurotic approach to life. Many transients do have serious psychic conflicts. So far even the best-organized State programs have provided little psychiatric service, and some have not even recognized that the more difficult an individual's problems are, the more he needs skilled help. It is too easy to dismiss a transient who causes—because he contains—problems.

Dismissal is also the easy way of dealing with the radicals in the ranks of the transients. Why there are not more of these is a great mystery; perhaps the transients are too individualistic to impose on themselves the radical discipline. But the fear in the minds of many transient officials of anyone who can be labeled radical or Communist or Socialist is really remarkable, and a simple effort of a few young boys to get three rather than two blankets, or stoves to heat the bunkhouse in a camp, has been interpreted as revealing the most sinister machinations of Moscow, justifying, and even requiring, that the offenders be ejected promptly and loaded into the nearest box cars. On one occasion men suspected on the vaguest of evidence of being "labor agitators" were transferred from one camp to another under guard of machine-guns and tear-gas bombs.

Too much dependence has been placed so far on camps as the main or even the only resource for the relief of transient men. Even the best of camps is no place for a man whose standards of privacy and living have been kept high, or for the psycho-neurotic, for example. And even for the rest it is hard to see how it is possible to prepare people for normal living by adjusting them to the abnormal regimented life in a congregate camp or shelter. It is hard to see, too, why there has so far been so little interest in the development of plans by which transients might be paid for their relief work in cash in full, maintaining themselves in quarters they themselves choose. There seems to be nothing in the federal regulations to prevent this development.

Many social workers have felt that the transient program offered the most interesting field in the country for adventurous and imaginative social work. This may still be true, but so far little more than the possibilities are visible. It is impossible to stabilize the transient except by offering him something better than life on the road. We are not yet ready to face the fact that something better can only mean ultimately a social order in which he can live and work and feel the value of his work for himself and the world.

Flop-House

By DAVID SCHEYER

I'VE been working for the Civil Works Education Service, a small segment of the moribund CWA which still clings to the lush fringes of the federal pay roll. My job was to hold classes in Chicago's flop-houses—the shelters where unemployed single men are, after a fashion, housed and fed. I was to provide food for the spirit.

"Go to 758," they told me when I started to work; 758 was office slang for the Reclassification Shelter in an abandoned school building at Halsted and Harrison on the West Side. I didn't do much teaching there. But I talked to people—supervisors, drunks, case workers, bouncers, perverts, and plain unemployed men—and I began to learn something of those unknown ash heaps where Chicago throws its unemployed. At 758 I saw the picture at its blackest. Yet when later I went to other flop-houses I found that 758 was no more than a caricature of the fundamental conditions in all of them. This was a flop-house for hopeless cases or men under observation. Here the drunks were drunker and absorbed cheaper "de-rail," the homosexuals were more overt, the psychopaths a little crazier, the watchman slugged a bit harder, the hopelessness was more hopeless. But there was nothing unique about it.

Looking for potential students my first evening, I went to the "bull-pen" where most of the 1,200 "guests"—the term is officially sanctioned—spend their days and years, sitting looking at newspapers, sitting playing pinochle, just sitting. The bull-pen is a long, low room in the basement. Two bulbs furnish light for the four or five hundred men sprawled on backless benches. Along one side runs a trough used as a washstand and a urinal.

The men all looked gray. Most of them were old. Some were talking, some singing alcoholically, some sitting quietly. But they were all gray and slouched and tired. It looked, I thought, like a literal hell—a place where emptiness goes on into eternity. It was hard to talk to these people. They were tired and suspicious. Too many curious college boys and case workers had interviewed them condescendingly. But I tried. I had, after all, my duty to the CWES.

"Have a cigarette? I'm supposed to have a class here," I volunteered, not too brightly, to an intelligent-looking but pretty tight guest. "What do you think would be a good thing to discuss in classes?"

"What the hell do I want wid a class?" he said, grabbing the cigarette. "We'd all of us here be a goddam lot better off if we was dead."

I talked to other people that evening. I talked to hundreds of guests in the succeeding months. I followed that phrase—"We'd be a lot better off dead"—trying to find how general the attitude was, what conditions lay behind it, what path had brought these men to the flop-houses, whether there was any path, short of death, leading out.

Meals in flop-houses are spaced to assume an importance far beyond their intrinsic worth. Getting up at six, the guest is greeted by thin oatmeal, bread, and coffee, varied with powdered eggs or, very, very rarely, a slice of bacon. Hymns of hate could be written on flop-house coffee. Its fundamentals are a little chicory, a great deal of water, and a heavy shot of saltpeter. There is no midday meal. Supper is served at five. Normally it is beans or hash with potatoes, occasionally cheap meat—and flop-house coffee. The dieticians of the relief commission have said that two meals a day are enough for men not working. Meals, apparently, are meals to an official dietician regardless of caliber or quantity. These meals are, frankly, a starvation diet. As a starvation diet they fulfil important functions. First, they keep life in a flop-house from becoming so roseate that the unemployed prefer it to work, an imaginary danger conditioning most shelter supervision and supervisors. Secondly, they keep the guests in a dull, bewildered mood, inactive and unprotesting. Lastly, they are very cheap. Flop-house meals cost about two and one-half cents apiece.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The guests at 758 were a dying crew. Starvation and alcohol were cutting deep into already gaunt faces; few there could walk at more than a totter. At other flop-houses with more energetic guests the meals were supplemented in one way or another. Some found work here and there for a day at a time and managed to buy lunches. Others panhandled. Still others worked on the shelter staff and were rewarded by a noon meal and a dollar a week. These last, the "staff men"—cleaners, watchmen, doormen, waiters, dish-washers, straw bosses—formed the bureaucracy of the flop-houses. Singled out as rugged individuals, better fed, better clothed, they naturally were aligned on the side of the angels. The shelter supervisors tolerated in them vicious brutalities; all the watchmen, for example, were supplied with blackjacks and used them freely on recalcitrants. "We have to handle tough people," a shelter manager told me. "We've got to use tough methods to handle them." This is true. As flop-houses exist in Chicago today it would be impossible to operate without fascist technique and the stool-pigeon class of "staff men."

Sleeping in 758 was done on army cots with a blanket apiece. Some of the other flop-houses have progressed to the point of adding sheets. But all have the barracks system of cots packed in almost solidly with the men sleeping end to end, so that every face has two pair of feet less than a yard away. Needless to say, in the flop-houses feet are feet.

The curfew rings the knell of parting day at ten o'clock. Any guest out later is banned for the night and may only be readmitted with the consent of the case worker. The outcast can sleep in the park in the summer, but in winter, if he has a dime, he will go to a "cake house." Here his dime buys a cot and a cakes-and-coffee breakfast. The cake houses are privately operated flop-houses, lining West Madison Street and Halsted Street, about nine degrees worse than the official relief shelters. They have, added to all the other disabilities, a terrific assortment of international bugs—tropical lice from Mexico and California, northern bugs from Canadian lumber camps, Oriental bugs from the harbors of New York and San Francisco, and the déclassé but plentiful domestic bedbug.

In the official flop-houses the bug problem is handled by fumigations every two weeks. This is effective, but hard on clothes. After three or four trips through the fumigator pants fall apart at the seams and shirts tatter in ribbons. Clothes replacements are handled through Red Cross donations. The guest sits in a long line of incredibly ragged fellow-guests for from three to ten hours waiting to requisition new clothes. Then, after a further wait of two or three weeks, God and the Red Cross willing, his socks or denim shirt or cotton pants appear at last.

This is the objective picture of 758 and, largely, of all other shelters. It is a dark scene, and most case workers and shelter supervisors would admit it. But they would cite the magnitude of the job, the shortage of funds, the indifference of the public, and a dozen other alibis, all of them true. Most of these people are doing the best they can. But they carry around their necks the albatross of the case worker's tradition that what they are granting is pauper relief to destitute incompetents. Like all relief the flop-house system of today is a gradual accretion. It has grown from the old municipal lodging-house, which before 1929 handled eight hundred or a thousand men, to its present proportions without any fundamental change in directives. The underlying assumption is that flop-house men are bums.

Most of the men in 758 are bums, mentally and physically decayed, almost completely unemployable. At other flop-houses a smaller though still appallingly large percentage of the guests are in the same state. But there is a long story behind each case. My first friend in 758, for example, had been a telegrapher. He lost his job in 1927 at the age of fifty-one. For a few years he worked at odd jobs—as bill peddler, receiving clerk, canvasser. For two years he has had no employment at all. He has spent eighteen months of those two years in flop-houses—the last four in 758, classified as a hopeless alcoholic. Now he is drinking "de-rail"—shots of denatured alcohol, bought for seven or eight cents a pint—and belongs to the lowest caste of flop-house bums, a grade below those who seek Lethe in moonshine at fifteen cents a pint. Undoubtedy he will die in a flop-house and quite soon. But this man is old.

At other times and in other places I talked to younger men. They had been painters, carpenters, automobile mechanics, migratory farm hands, miners, shopkeepers, clerks, tool-makers, butchers, longshoremen, railroaders. There were Lithuanians from the coalfields of southern Illinois and Indiana, bewildered Mexicans drawn north to the stockyards, Negroes, and a large proportion of 100 per cent native white Americans. Many were ex-soldiers. Now underneath young and even cheerful faces you can see foreshadowed the seamed gray lines and bleared eyes of the men in 758. Up to a month in the flop-houses the line is, "Oh, I'm just here staying out a run of tough luck. I'm getting me a job next week." The two-months men begin to look a little uncertain, begin to complain of indigestion, begin to prefer sitting on the curb to walking the streets for jobs. In three months they sit on the curb longer, take a shot of gin in the morning to clear up last night's hangover. And the months mount up and the job doesn't come and when six months have passed they are flop-house bums, stuck here, save for a minor miracle, permanently.

There are fifteen thousand men in Chicago's shelters today. Half of them can never do serious work again. And even among the other half—the younger men, the stronger men, the men who stave off "de-rail"—another year will see three or four thousand more drifting into the 758 category.

The flop-house system does not suffer from the business cycle. It creates its own customers.

Mental stimulus was certainly needed, but I became increasingly doubtful of the physical foundation for an academic life in the shelters. I talked to groups sitting in dank bull-pens or on slum curbs; talked about unemployment insurance and relief, about the business cycle and surplus value, about politics and strikes and war. Sometimes they were interested. But it was always a flagging interest; it died as I left and would not stir again for weeks perhaps. They were too tired to be excited. Even the Communists lacked stamina. (Later I discovered that whenever a really competent organizer began to make headway the authorities promoted him to a work-relief job and got rid of him.) The reds I met were only discursively vocal without any staying power for a genuine protest movement in the flop-houses. The food, the blackjacks, and the bull-pen had bitten them too.

In South Chicago a bunch of sailors did shake off the shackles of the shelters. Twenty-five lake men, on the beach at Calumet Harbor, decided they didn't like the flop-house. They protested to the shelter manager, who threatened to call the police. They took their protest to the relief commission and sat down in the commission office, promising to stay there. Lake sailors are big, brawny lads, recruited from the farms of Illinois and Michigan and Wisconsin and Minnesota, and the relief commission needed its chairs. Now the seamen have their own shelter in South Chicago, run by themselves, financed by the FERA. Any case worker who goes near it must be prepared to answer rather than ask questions.

This is part of a solution to the flop-house problem but an isolated part and likely to remain so. Men who have spent a year, two years, in the bull-pen will never discover it. Men who have eaten the lotus of flop-house food for months, men who find the way out in "de-rail," cannot emulate it. The guests in 758, the seven or eight thousand who have been submerged during these past years, the thousands who will join them in the months and years to come—they'd be a "goddam lot better off if they was dead."

Labor Notes

Section 7-a Looks Up

TWO highly encouraging decisions have been handed down by the new National Labor Relations Board in interpretation of Section 7-a. In the Tamaqua Underwear case, previously noted in The Nation, the board has ordered the reinstatement of sixty-one employees, members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, who were refused employment because of a closed-shop contract between the management and a company union. The board found that the Tamaqua Employees' Association was in fact a company union; accordingly, any closed-shop contract it might have signed with the management was invalid. Incidentally, the board remarked that a "collective-bargaining agreement such as this, which provides merely for the closed shop, is an oddity in the annals of labor relations." Significantly, the board took pains to mention that its decision did not bear on the "validity of a closed-shop agreement with a bona fide labor union." In a second decision the board ruled on the grievances of the Lighting Equipment Workers' Local Union No. 19427 against Edward F. Caldwell and Company of New York City, manufacturers of ornamental fixtures. The management flatly refused to sign a collective contract with the union. Instead, it brought pressure to bear so that 100 out of a total of 150 employees were constrained to sign individual contracts with respect to wages, hours, and working conditions. The board held that under the circumstances the individual contracts were inconsistent with Section 7-a: "An employer who, having already been informed by the representatives of his employees that they desire to bargain collectively, deliberately sets out to bargain with them individually interferes with the rights guaranteed his employees by the law. . . . These contracts, which covered wages and hours, the prime subjects of collective negotiation, would, if valid, empty the employees' right of collective bargaining of all significance and purpose." In both cases the board has no doubt acted upon sound principles. Its next program will be to prevail upon anti-union employers to comply with these principles. This was the rock on which the old board was wrecked.

Railway Workers and the New Deal

I

THE railroads, 137 strong, have asked an injunction to prevent the Railroad Retirement Board from collecting assessments from the carriers and their employees under the provisions of the Railroad Pension Act which was passed by the last Congress. The carriers, as was expected, invoke the "due process" clause as well as the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. The Railroad Pension bill, which has just gone into effect, is the Administration's only tangible accomplishment to date in the matter of economic-security legislation. Almost all the carriers intend to continue their "charity" pension plans until forced to discontinue them by judicial edict. Some of them, like the Pennsylvania, will immediately begin making the payroll deductions required by the law, but will segregate the funds pending the outcome of the suit. Holding fast to the capitalistic ethic, the railroad executives believe that retirement pensions should be a reward bestowed out of the overflowing goodwill of the employer. They cannot as yet accept the idea that the employer owes it as a legal duty to his workers to provide for their old age. More concretely, the charges imposed by the bill on the railroads represent a substantial stepping-up over the contributions which the railroads have seen fit to make under existing voluntary retirement plans.

II

DESPITE the last-minute efforts of the expiring shop-crafts company unions to organize themselves on a national basis, the National Railway Adjustment Board has been set up with solid trade-union representation on the labor side. Each of the eighteen employee representatives chosen is a member, either of one of the brotherhoods or of one of the A. F. of L. unions affiliated with the Railway Employees Department. Meanwhile, the railroad workers continue to repudiate the company union. On the Erie Railroad, the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees recently defeated the company union, 2,573 to 973, in an election of representatives for collective bargaining. Again, the firemen, oilers, and the shop crafts on the Chicago Junction Railroad have chosen by a vote of better than two to one to affiliate with the Railway Employees Department rather than remain bound to a company union. All indications point to a victory for the A. F. of L. in a like referendum, scheduled for the near future, among the shop craftsmen of the Illinois Central. After long years of subjection to the Union Pacific's company union, the workers have once more organized themselves into a divisional federation of the Railway Employees Department. Similar divisional federations have been established in the New Jersey Central and Norfolk and Western systems. The 1934 amendments to the Railway Labor Act are bearing genuine fruit.

III

ONE of the most essential of these amendments—aimed against the compulsory "check-off"—is now being tested before the United States District Court at Topeka, Kansas. It prohibits the carriers from deducting, collecting, or assisting to collect out of the wages of employees "dues, fees, assessments, or other contributions" payable to a labor organization. On June 21 the trustees of the bankrupt Rock Island Railroad dissolved a "check-off" contract previously in force between the management and the Association of Rock Island Mechanical and Power Plant Employees—a company union. Forthwith officers of the union brought suit to restrain the trustees from voiding the contract and to enjoin the enforcement of the Railway Labor Act as "unconstitutional." The court granted a temporary restraining order and set July 28 as a hearing date. In the bill of complaint the company-union officers argue that they "will be unable to make collection of dues . . . the association will be destroyed, or its effectiveness materially reduced." This amounts to an open confession that the company union will fall to pieces unless the employer helps it to raid the pay envelopes of the workers. The Supreme Court decision of 1930 in the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks' case indicated that the court has no sympathy with the company union, so far at least as it afflicts railway workers. The outcome of the present suit will be of vital importance to the future of organized labor.

Rank-and-File Revolt

PROGRESSIVE groups in Local 306 of the Motion Picture Operators, the union which Sam Kaplan, convicted labor racketeer, once headed, are house-cleaning again. Harry Sherman, former hireling of Paramount-Publix, has been removed from his $20,000-a-year job as president, and the rank and file has demanded the recall of several other officers. The progressives found Sherman's methods in office hardly less high-handed than those of his predecessor, Kaplan. A laudable program calling for a closed ballot, reduced assessments, lower salaries for union officers, strict accounting of expenditure of union funds, and elimination of racketeering has been presented by the reform group. If the International union which has taken control of Local 306 abandons its former obstructionist tactics and gives its whole-hearted support to the reform program, Local 306 will be able to make real progress. The labor czars have discredited and weakened the whole American labor movement. Rank-and-file elements in other unions would do well to emulate the example of their fellow-workers in Local 306.

Bootleg Mining

THE vigilantes of the NRA have discovered "rebellion and civil war, which only the calling out of the National Guard can suppress," in the anthracite coalfields of Pennsylvania. This is the description and solution of "bootleg" mining troubles offered by Ira C. Cochran, chairman of the Federal Coal Code Authority. Recent reports of union strife in the coalfields have served to minimize the fact that grim economic war has been and is still going on between the miners, of all unions, and the operators. King Coal's illness has resulted in the closing and flooding of many shafts, available work is given to non-union men, and the union miners, jobless and poverty-stricken, have taken to digging their own pits on company property and selling the coal thus mined for a meager livelihood. This is bootleg mining, and it is no exaggeration to say that the operators regard it as one of their most important problems, for they fear that desperate miners may also seize working shafts, drive off the scabs, and do pitched battle for possession. State police were sent in to the Pottsville area recently to smash bootleg mining, and this has further heightened the temper of the miners. Cochran's plea for the National Guard has been soft-pedaled somewhat by Governor Pinchot, who has undertaken an investigation of the situation. But meanwhile NRA enforcement agencies are upholding the sacred rights of property and are planning a vigorous drive on the unauthorized coal traffic. Hasty action on their part may precipitate bloody warfare such as has seldom been equaled. These miners will be fighting not merely for jobs but for their very lives. The situation is a serious one; it demands an understanding that NRA officials have thus far failed to show.

Contributors to This Issue

JOHN GUNTHER is the Vienna correspondent of the Chicago Daily News.

JAMES RORTY is the author of "Our Master's Voice: Advertising."

ISIDOR FEINSTEIN is the chief editorial writer of the New York Post.

JAMES P. MITCHELL is a teacher, writer, and social worker.

DAVID SCHEYER has been a member of the Workers' Committee on Unemployment of Chicago.

R. P. BLACKMUR has contributed verse and criticism to Poetry, Hound and Horn, and other magazines.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS, professor of industrial relations at the University of Chicago, is the author of "The Theory of Wages."

LINCOLN REIS is engaged in research in medieval logic.

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the department of philosophy of the University of Wisconsin.

LUDWIG LORE was formerly the editor of the New York Volkszeitung. He now conducts a daily column, Behind the Cables, in the New York Post.

THE EINSTEIN BUBBLE
"Einstein is neither an original nor a profound thinker. The theory he has elaborated is in its essence false and barren." This startling charge is presented with force and cogency by Arthur Lynch, English philosopher and scientist, who inveighs against the superstitious and idolatrous awe that the name of Einstein invokes in language that is readily understandable by the average intelligent person.

The Modern Thinker
Edited by Dagobert D. Runes, Ph.D.
OTHER ARTICLES IN CURRENT ISSUES:
The Philosophy of a Pessimist........Clarence Darrow
The Plight of Liberalism........Oswald Garrison Villard
The Mind of the Bonehead........A. A. Roback
Literature and Hitler........Thomas Mann
The Soul of Modern Man........Carl G. Jung
What Woman Really Needs........A. M. Ludovici
Enclose $1 (bill, check, money order) for special five-month subscription. Address
THE MODERN THINKER
310 Riverside Drive New York

Clinical Note

By VINCENT McHUGH

Sickness makes a fool of the mind:
All day in his box he crawled and whined
And licked at the sweated wall of bone,
And had no wit to call his own.
In the night, in the dark, he opened his throat
To a single soundless quavering note
That came out of him like a twanged arrow,
Out of his bowels, out of his marrow.
No one heard him. No one crept
To tap at the wall. The dead slept.

Poem

By CLINCH CALKINS

(To an Infant Born in Times of Great Change)

The white sun will grow and coarsen into flame in the west.
Stay at my breast. Stay small and beautiful.
The unabstaining moon, too, will age and fatten.
Do not restrain her. But the satin bud
Let it not disclose its heart, nor the new leaf
Show its veins and hasten into fall.
Stay at my breast,
Stay beautiful and small.

A Morality of Pointlessness

Appointment in Samarra. By John O'Hara. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MR. O'HARA'S first book is highly readable and grossly entertaining; and it has the advantage of belonging to the most popular of present schools of the novel, the school which includes Hemingway more or less complete and such recent books as "The Postman Always Rings Twice" and "Brain Guy"; it is the school which gives provisionally permanent expression to the attitude which produces a weekly New Yorker and a monthly Esquire. Thus the dedication is to F. P. A., and the title—which means an appointment with inescapable and sudden death—is explained in an epigraph drawn from an unpublished play of Somerset Maugham's.

Because the school, not only in the content of its productions but also in its public relations, is, so to speak, becoming tough and domineering in terms of its positive but limited virtues, Mr. O'Hara's book deserves examination at a certain length. It is a segmentary novel, occupying Christmas Eve, Christmas, and the day after Christmas, 1930, in the city of Gibbsville, Pennsylvania, with various cut-backs and two postscripts. It contains a telescopic history of Gibbsville and exhibits a segmentary view, as a segmentary novel should, of many of its citizens, most often in a sexual or alcoholic but always evidently normal posture: all these in terms of the characterization above.

The protagonist is Julian English, aged thirty, of the aristocracy, who loves his wife but drinks too much. On Christmas Eve he throws a highball in the face of Harry Reilly, who is self-made, Irish Catholic, and a bore, and to whom Julian owes $20,000. This occurs at the Lantenengo Country Club. On Christmas night he gets drunk, and because his wife refuses to keep a date with him in their parked car, he takes the mistress of Gibbsville's leading bootlegger out of a roadhouse into somebody else's parked car. This occurs in front of his wife, some of his friends, and one of his employees. The day after Christmas is a bad day for Julian, with his servants, his wife, and at his office. So he beats up a one-armed friend and a Polack lawyer or two at the Gibbsville Club. This happens in front of the club steward. Then he drives round the country to cool off, back to town, and finds his wife coming out of her mother's house. When he tells her the latest she tells him she is through and calls off the big party they were to have given that night. Julian goes home, sets to work on the liquor for the party and on the female society reporter who calls for the guest list. Then, at the safety point of alcoholic stupor, he kills himself in his garage by carbon-monoxide poisoning.

The book also contains the life histories of Julian, his wife Caroline, his father the doctor, Al Grecco the bootlegger's runner; short sketches of Harry Reilly, Monsignor Creedon, Ed Charney the big shot, Luther Fliegler the normal American salesman; and thumbnail sketches or characteristic anecdotes of a score of others. Luther Fliegler, the normal man, opens and closes the book and is the only chorus for its climax. He is, I think, the author's only ironic representation, but he has no integral part in the action. Al Grecco, whose history is given at the next greatest length to that of Julian, has no integral part either; although, like Fliegler, he is apparently to suffer because of Julian's actions. Fliegler and Grecco are not so much subordinate as parallel characters. The quality of agency so far as the main story goes is reserved to Julian alone. The other characters are interesting as lookers-on and innocent bystanders, affected or injured by Julian's private and inexplicable explosion.

It is characteristic of this school of writing that its crucial gesture is inexplicable. The man kills himself without having once, before that day, thought of death as a solution, and without ever having felt death's lag or its magnetism. We are told only, early in the book, that his grandfather killed himself after having embezzled considerably. Julian is in debt, but not, with his family resources, inextricably. He kills himself, apparently, because his wife does not immediately forgive his drunken stupidity. He kills himself, so far as I can see, either pointlessly or out of back-handed good-will, out of gruff, tough, sentimental loyalty to a code itself pointless.

Part of this pointlessness is due to the segmentary character of the novel. The different groups of characters in the book, their motives and objects, are segments fitted one after another. They do not grow together, nor, I think, are they meant to. They achieve a kind of specious unity by being printed in sequence and by interrupting each other, and they further comprise a patchwork background. It is true that both Fliegler and Al Grecco act in some part as mirrors or reflectors in which we get images of Julian as a real guy, but they are not otherwise even apparently made to work into the main action. However interesting they may be in themselves, and they are interesting, as agents of this novel they are incredibly wasteful and meretricious. In short, although the book is dramatic in the sense that it is exciting, is vivid and written at high speed, is accurate and often penetrating, it is not a well-designed drama, in the sense that its parts do not supplement, bind, and enforce each other. Much of it might exactly as well be in some other novel.

But the book would no doubt repeat that it meant to be pointless and fragmentary. That is the way things are thought to happen ever since Hergesheimer became Hemingway: they are poignantly pointless to the point of sentimentality. Only, to make a book, they have to be tough and exciting about liquor and women. With these stipulations, we have the kind of craft which makes a good detective story good reading: a craft of particulars, and surfaces, and anecdotes, covering a highly artificial convention of reality: an exciting craft to appreciate while the story lasts.

In other words, however immediate and however great the claim to reality, to authority, such a book makes, we are actually reading a romance, which can have as its best merit that it entertains and thrills. The romance I mean is that defined by Henry James as experience liberated, cut loose from our sense of the way things ordinarily happen. The only fault with this sort of writing is that it pretends not to cut loose where it cuts the sharpest: where it makes a morality of pointlessness, and an action out of intoxication.

It may be, of course, that Mr. O'Hara is right. Certainly his first novel has the vigor of conception, the ear for speech, and the eye for effect that make good writing; and he has, more valuable, the facility for the immediate aspects of character. The fault of romanticism I find may be merely a failure to combine his merits with the persuasive force of style. The pointlessness may be right, at least in the legitimate field of sex and liquor. But it is certainly not a new vocation.

R. P. BLACKMUR

Assurance Through Social Insurance

The Quest for Security. By I. M. Rubinow. Henry Holt and Company. $3.50.

THIS sound and brilliantly written book appeared, by a striking coincidence, on the very day on which President Roosevelt announced to Congress and to the country that he intended at the coming session of Congress to push for a comprehensive program of social insurance. It is therefore in the truest sense an extraordinarily timely work, and one which without any sacrifice of real scholarship reads as fascinatingly as a swift-moving novel.

It shows how one of the great driving forces of Americans, as of other people, has always been the quest for security. Formerly we sought it by carving out homesteads and building up small businesses. Today those forms of security do not avail for the vast majority, who are confined as wage and salaried workers within an industrial system. The wages which they receive are, in a very large percentage of cases, insufficient to meet even current needs, to say nothing of providing a nest egg for possible future contingencies. Even the skilled do not have much of a surplus which they can lay aside. And when the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse—accidents, sickness, old age, and unemployment—ride down upon their victims, they find them with grossly insufficient reserves to meet the heavy economic losses which they must suffer. The result is that millions of families are swept into poverty and suffering for lack of protection.

But while these losses are too great to be borne by the unfortunate minority of individuals upon whom at any one time they fall, they are not too great to be borne by society as a whole. The most effective and adequate way of doing so is through the system of insurance. Most men are, after all, generally employed, and most people are relatively healthy, just as most houses do not burn down and only a comparatively few people die in any one year. Insurance has indicated the way in which these losses may be distributed. The many make small contributions in order to protect themselves against great losses, should they be the unlucky ones. It is better for a thousand householders to pay ten dollars each a year as fire insurance, and with this to indemnify the one man whose house does burn down, than for the latter to suffer the full ten-thousand-dollar loss. And they will all sleep better at night for knowing that if their particular house should burn down, they would be protected.

Americans have seen the solid sense of this in the case of fire, marine, and life insurance. They have been very slow to see it in the case of the great industrial risks, and it has really taken the depression to reveal how frail is the protection afforded by individual savings. For our wage and low-salaried workers the quest for security must, therefore, fundamentally take the form of the pooled protection of social insurance. In order to get an adequate coverage and to protect those who need it most, this insurance will have to be made mandatory. In fact, this is one of the characteristics which distinguish social from ordinary insurance, namely, that society regards such protection as so important to the community as a whole that it feels it must encourage or require its adoption. A second difference is that while private insurance cannot, in the nature of the case, distinguish between recipients on the basis of need, this is not only possible but probably desirable from the social point of view. If this were clearly realized, then the objections to providing extra allowances for dependents, and to permitting some groups to draw out more than they put in, would fall to the ground.

It is a merit of Rubinow's book that he considers, with a wealth of illustration, how accidents, sickness, unemployment, and old age should be provided for in the light of these principles. Another of its many virtues is the fair and dispassionate way in which it deals with the question whether under unemployment insurance we should follow the Wisconsin plan of separate company reserves or the Ohio plan of pooled reserves. His ultimate answer is that since the burden of unemployment is very different in the various industries, the Wisconsin plan would result in a great inequality of benefits among the unemployed, and hence be impracticable, and that the preventive features of the Wisconsin act have been greatly exaggerated. This is pointed out with a full recognition of the splendid pioneering efforts of John R. Commons and Harold Groves, which lifts the whole discussion to the high level on which it belongs.

The objectors to unemployment insurance at the present time, particularly the private insurance companies, are insisting that we should not adopt it because, since we cannot foresee how much unemployment there will be, the risk is uninsurable. Mr. Rubinow does not devote much space in his book to discussing this objection, although he has considered it in full elsewhere. The answer, however, is clear. In the first place, the funds collected will provide a far greater assurance of protection to those thrown out of work than is now the case. This is the real end sought, and I am inclined to believe that the French term assurance is more accurate than the word insurance, and that it would arouse less opposition if it were employed. The second answer is that we already have much more information on the past volume of unemployment than obscurantists are willing to admit, and that an allowance of an average of 10 per cent, plus a reserve for catastrophes, should, barring a complete collapse of capitalism, provide for by far the major portion of unemployment in the future. From this the average premiums can be computed according to the scale of benefits, the length of the waiting period, the duration of benefits, and so forth. It is my own judgment that a 4 per cent assessment on the pay roll can provide, on the average, 45 per cent benefits up to twenty weeks in a year, with a three weeks' waiting period, if a major business cycle is taken as the unit. Furthermore, the rates may be revised if they prove inadequate. In fact, the only way to get the complete statistical material upon which more accurate rates can be based is through the medium of unemployment insurance. It is this which makes the opposition of many of the insurance companies appear disingenuous in the light of the fact that they undertook marine and fire insurance without any very adequate statistical basis.

Social insurance, because of the President's message, promises to be one of the great political and social issues of the next few years. The citizen who wants to inform himself, and have a good time doing it, cannot do better than to read Rubinow's book. Although Rubinow is a distinguished actuary, there is not a statistical table in the book. It is brimful of shrewd and salty common sense and penetrating analysis, and it shows a thorough mastery over details. Incidentally, the Administration could not do better than to put Rubinow in charge of the formulation of its social-insurance program, which will need the careful work of experts. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

Honest Bewilderment

The Architecture of the Universe. By W. F. G. Swann. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

"THE Architecture of the Universe" is intended to present the less vulgar with the latest conclusions of physics, though to this unlearned reviewer many of the conclusions, as they are presented in this book at least, appear somewhat dubious. Dr. Swann, we discover, has a certain contempt for the ordinary judgments of mankind with respect to the primary concepts of his subject. "Old Euclid," he informs us, defined a straight line as the shortest distance between two points. Euclid, as Dr. Swann would discover if he troubled to acquaint himself with Euclid, did not define the straight line in this way. The error might be considered trifling. It is not, for it is one example out of many of his ignorance of the analyses and the doctrines of the ancients. This too might be of little importance, but the ordinary judgments of the common man to which Dr. Swann condescends are the products of those very analyses and doctrines: to endeavor to understand them without regard to the contexts and the systems in which they first occur is to understand them incorrectly. It is to fail to understand them at all.

Dr. Swann ignores a simpler question. In the beginning we are all alike innocent of knowledge; but the step from a state of complete ignorance to the perception or understanding of something is not identical with the change from a simple or incomplete understanding to an understanding more complete. In the one case there is a complete discontinuity, in the other there is not. Dr. Swann ignores the distinction. From him we shall not learn whether the ordinary judgments of mankind are proper to the state of innocence or the state of simplicity. The question is important, since in the one instance there is a mutual ground and the ground not that of contradiction between the scientist and the ordinary man, and in the othere there is none.

Dr. Swann, then, dispenses with the ancient, the ordinary judgments of the matter. In their place he discovers for us novel conclusions. He gives us no real knowledge as to the reason or the nature of their origin; but deficient in this reason and nature, they can do little more than amuse or astound. We apply mathematics to things; in consequence of this action we discover certain other things. From the facts alone, however, we cannot find what the significance of the application itself is; but with this significance absent the facts can be little more than the curiosities of the moment. That Dr. Swann intends more than our amusement or information may be inferred from the contents of the final chapter, since there he gives us a kind of theology. A theology, moreover, which is imposed on its subject from without, and so, apart from its intrinsic ineptness, of no value.

In content "The Architecture of the Universe" extends from a consideration of atomic theories to relativity; but any attempt of the reader to discover an internal ordering and reason must end in disappointment. It must be confessed that we are somewhat unfair to Dr. Swann. In terms of his endeavor his work succeeds better than many a like work on the subject. It is possible that the defect is not in him, but in the nature of the popular exposition itself. LINCOLN REIS

Baruch or Benedictus

The Philosophy of Spinoza. Unfolding the Latent Process of His Reasoning. By Harry Austryn Wolfson. The Macmillan Company. Two Volumes. $7.50.

Spinoza and Buddha. Visions of a Dead God. By S. M. Melamed. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

DR. WOLFSON'S interpretation of Spinoza is that of a student of medieval Jewish philosophy. According to him Spinoza did not contribute anything essentially new to the intellectual heritage of the West. Behind the explicit Benedictus, "who reasons according to the rigid method of the geometer," lurks the real man, Baruch, "whose thought turns along the beaten logical paths of medieval reasoning." Benedictus found his problems already clearly formulated for him by the thinkers who preceded him. And the solutions which he proposed involved no more than the courage required to draw logical conclusions where his predecessors had avoided them at all costs. These solutions Dr. Wolfson formulates as "four acts of daring," consisting in the thorough acceptance of the major implications of the principle of the unity of nature. To establish his thesis Dr. Wolfson calls to his aid an enormous erudition, which in the manner in which it is displayed amounts almost to a history of the problems of medieval philosophy. The critical apparatus is impressive, but it seems all too often unnecessarily in evidence. Quotations from medieval philosophy are overmultiplied, and the main thread of the exegesis is interrupted for the sake of discussions which, while never uninteresting, are not always specially apposite. But this is a superficial criticism not meant to detract from the solidity of Dr. Wolfson's work, from its meticulous scholarship and from the light with which it frequently floods dark passages of the "Ethics."

The resulting account of Spinoza's system, however, is extremely one-sided. Dr. Wolfson's erudition makes it highly plausible, but one wonders whether Spinoza was only one of the last of the medieval rabbis. What of Benedictus's relations to the intellectual currents of his day? These are denied by implication, and yet the modern Spinoza was not only characterized by his geometrical manner of reasoning. The only one of his contemporaries to whom frequent reference is made is Descartes. Now Spinoza may have been at heart a medieval. He kept, it is true, a studied detachment from his day. But this detachment was very specious. And there is certainly more to him than intellectual intrepidity. At least his intrepidity needs to be accounted for. Or else the traditional interpretation which makes of him the heir of Hobbes, Galileo, Bruno, and Copernicus, as well as of Maimonides and Aristotle, needs to be disposed of. Leaving out of his account Spinoza's essential modernity Dr. Wolfson also leaves out of account another very important aspect of his philosophy. The "Ethics" is not the work of a professor, nor has its appeal been to professors only. Interested as Spinoza was in technical philosophy and in its traditional "problems," and important as is this aspect of his thought, his work in this respect is more than a logical exercise because Spinoza was interested in vision as well as in technique; and this interest is written large and luminously not only on the little we know of his life and character but also on everything he wrote.

Unlike Dr. Wolfson's book, Mr. Melamed's is an impres-

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

CAMP MILFORD
KENT · CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests. Delicious meals.

Weekly Rates— August
$27.50 PER WEEK

Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N.H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates Today

1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PEnnsylvania 6 – 7842

AUGUST --- A GREAT MONTH OF PROGRAMS AT
UNITY HOUSE
FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA
J. HALPERN, Manager M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager
N. Y. Office: 3 West 16th Street. CHelsea 3-2148

The finest talent we hae ever offered for your entertainment:
COMPINSKY TRIO, PHILHARMONIC QUARTET, TOSCHA SEIDEL, ALLA NAZIMOVA, MOLLY PICON, SIGMUND SPAETH, ISA KREMER, HALL JOHNSON CHOIR.
Special attraction Aug. 19—"In Abram's Bosom" with Frank Wilson and Rose McClendon

Do not miss weekly dramatic presentation by
THE PINE GROVE PLAYERS

Many new facilities this year for sport and play. $25.50 per week—August. Reducton to Union members. Owned by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.

Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service

55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

Intimate, colorful, alive! The most complete adult camp in the Adirondacks. Chamber music by the Compinsky Trio and the Perole String Quartet.
Dance Recitals by Pauline Koner and a complete summer stock and try-out theatre in the best Westport tradition.
Private golf course, lake and tennis courts.

Booklet on request.

GREEN MANSIONS
157 WEST 57th STREET
CO. 5-6346
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N·Y·

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
8th SUCCESSFUL SEASON

"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.
- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

AUGUST RATE $25 for 1 week
$48 for 2 weeks
Rate per day, $4.00
Management—Diana and Abe Berman
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

Other Resort Advertising will be found on page iii

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
●
Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
Penn. 6-7663

August Rate $29.50
Superior Cuisine
Round Trip Fare $8.50 by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

MOON HILL on SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS

For A Perfect Adirondack Vacation
HOTEL COMFORTS
Country Club Atmosphere
Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. Dietary laws.)
Families accommodated.
Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42. PEnn. 6-1720

SCAROON MANOR
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
9 Tennis Courts 6 Handball Courts
High Holiday Services
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
Open till October First
Special Low September Rates
Golf Free After Labor Day
ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
JCS FRIEBER
MGR. DIR.

● AUGUST ATTRACTIONS ●
Unexcelled tennis courts. Swimming and water spirts. Handball, horse and other diversions. Chamber music Trio. Dancing, lectures, entertainment. Prize Tournaments.
Aug. 17-19 Outdoor Movies, Gala Concert.

LABOR DAY WEEK-END $17.50 ● ENTIRE WEEK $27.50

Week-end round trip fares to Harmon, Grand Central—$1.50; 125th St.—$1.30. Taxi meets all trains at Harmon station.

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE
Peekskill, N. Y.
Phone Peek. 1403

WUNNISHAUNTA
Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE
QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES
All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $22.50 - $25.00 - and $27.50
Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

BREEZEMONT

A resort of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.

Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

sionistic, eccentric, and even on the surface quite prejudiced essay. The reader is left extremely baffled by it. A documented criticism of it would be impossible in a short space; to examine its thesis, to disentangle the knotted skein of its thought, would require several columns at least. All one can do is merely to state one's reaction to it. In his preface the author claims to have "demonstrated" that Buddha is the "spiritual ancestor" of Spinoza. The phrase is ambiguous. Nor does it become clear in the text whether it means that Buddha influenced Spinoza either directly or through the mediation of other thinkers, or whether it means that Buddha and Spinoza are both expressions of one of the two spiritual "forces" which, according to Mr. Melamed, have shaped the history of our civilization. The latter seems to be meant in a number of passages while the former seems to be meant in numerous other passages. Of course, the two types of relationship are not necessarily incompatible, but the thesis, as presented by the author, is an extremely confused and confusing affair. One wonders, besides, in what sense Mr. Melamed uses the term "demonstration," since the nearest thing to evidence adduced by him of a connection between Buddha and Spinoza is the dubious assertion of Indian influence on Europe through Asia Minor before Christ. And, the reviewer believes, specialists consider the question an open one, for the evidence on which it is founded is extremely thin. In either case, and even granting the mystic philosophy of history on which the whole argument seems to be based, those similarities between Spinoza and Buddha to which Mr. Melamed points are chiefly of his own making, consisting as they do mainly of a distortion of Spinoza's system.

It was not, however, the novelty of Mr. Melamed's thesis or the heterodoxy of the logic through which he seeks to defend it but the intention of the book that baffled the reviewer most. Mr. Melamed's attitude toward Spinoza is too obviously personal to give the book a scientific ranking. Were Spinoza alive it would be difficult to believe that Mr. Melamed's disagreement with him was only a philosophical one. But this of course cannot be the case. Nor can the book be explained as propaganda. For if propaganda, what cause has it been meant to serve? How, then, is one to interpret it? The reviewer has no positive answer. One thing is quite clear—this essay is the vigorous reaction of a strong personality against the thought of a man who, for two and a half centuries, has either compelled the reverence or elicited the hate of all those who have approached him.

ELISEO VIVAS

Hitler and the Church

Judaism, Christianity, and Germany. By Cardinal Faulhaber. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

AFTER a momentary truce the murder of Dr. Klausener, leader of the German Catholic Action, on June 30 has caused the fight between the Catholic church and the Hitler Government to flare up with greater intensity than before. The National Socialist state insists on unconditional surrender, not only in worldly but in spiritual affairs. Besides the question of control of the Catholic youth, the rock on which the Concordat with the Holy See has come to grief, there is the important issue of Dr. Rosenberg's "Myth of the Twentieth Century," the spiritual credo of the Third Reich whose emphasis on racial instead of human and spiritual values has placed it on the Index of the Catholic church. Among those in the forefront of this fight against the political teachings and spiritual conceptions of the German regime, Cardinal Faulhaber of Munich is the undisputed leader. In five sermons delivered at St. Michael's Church in Munich during the Advent season of 1933 this outstanding figure in German Catholicism presented a believing churchman's analysis of the perversions of the Nazi state. Questions thrown into the forefront of discussion by its leaders—the Jewish heritage of Christ, the relation of Christianity to Teutonism, the uncritical deification of Germany's mythical ancestors—find vigorous answer. "Of any civilization properly so-called among the Germans of the pre-Christian era there can be no question, according to Tacitus," says this renowned cleric. "It is a mortifying fact that the pictorial representations of the ancient Germans which we possess do not come from the hands of their compatriots but from Roman sculptors who on Trajan's column in Rome depicted German prisoners of war . . ."

Specifically the book is a defense of the Old Testament and its "religious, moral, and social values," but the aggressive tone in which it is written makes it a call to arms to all men against the oppressive regime. For this prince of the Catholic church chooses his intellectual weapons from the arsenal of history rather than of religion, and deals blow for blow with a courage which even those who do not share his religious convictions must appreciate. The book has been published in Germany and has not been forbidden. But woe unto the bookseller who dares offer it for sale.

LUDWIG LORE

Henry George's Books
Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men—sent free.
None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.
ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
[illegible] Park Place, New York City
SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

FREE
Add a New Word to Your Vocabulary Every Day!
The Winston Word-a-Day
This new device increases your vocabulary, strengthens your ability to [illegible] words more effectively, persuasively!
Each day the Winston "WORD-A-DAY" selects and presents one forceful, useful word so ingeniously (with definition, pronunciation, etc.) that it automatically becomes—during that same day—an unforgettable part of your vocabulary!
Write for your FREE copy! With it will come interesting facts about The Winston Simplified Dictionary. Address THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO., 249 Winston Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

SUMMER HOMES

BUNGALOWS ready made—very attractive lots surrounded by Lake Mohegan—opened for your inspection, or constructed to your order on short notice. Financed for 3 years. One hour from N. Y. Next to Sonaqua Club. MOHEGAN MANOR CORP., Lake Mohegan, Peekskill, N. Y.

AN ACRE — AT ONE VACATION'S COST in Westchester hills, one hour from New York. NON-PROFIT project; cultured persons. Highest character, piped water, etc., privacy. Write C. Rich, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y.
A Solution for Depreciating Currency

APARTMENTS TO SHARE

GREENWICH VILLAGE—Bleecker Gardens, [illegible] rooms, 2 fireplaces, electrolux, modern plumbing, supervised play yard for children. Occupancy any time. Write Dorothy Brunham-Rose, 319 Washington St., Gloucester, Mass.

CHILDREN—BOARD

INTELLIGENT care, girl age 6½. Room for mother, employed. Cultured home. Vicinity Waldon School, Box 469, c/o The Nation.

PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

J. G. EDMONDS, LITERARY AGENT. First novels, stories wanted. No advance charges. 108 West 85th St., N. Y.

AUTHORS! All books published . . . new plan . . . write for details. . . . Private Press Publishers, Dept. N., 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

PERSONAL

YOU TOO CAN BE HAPPY! CONTACTS connects you with people everywhere who reject society's sadistic-masochistic philosophy. Send 3c stamp for Prospectus 14A. Unusual books loaned free. CONTACTS, Box 91, Station D, New York City.

CULTURED Jewish people to join Bridge Club. Enclose two references. Write Miss Freda Coin, 121 East 92nd Street, N. Y. C.

MUSIC

BRAHMS, Bach, Beethoven and all great composers, the masterful symphonies immortalized on 100,000 new, large records (value $2), for 50c and 75c. Catalogue.
THE GRAMAPHONE SHOP, INC.
18 E. 48th St., N. Y. Tel WIckersham 2-1876

POSITIONS WANTED

NURSE, mature, Jewess, intelligent, tra invalid lady. California preferred. Expe enced. Box 470, c/o The Nation.

TEACHER, 33, private school, D. C., will act as governess or companion to young person. Will go abroad. Box 609, D. C.

MATURE Jewish woman, appealing to Jewish organization anywhere for new deal. Seeking resident managing position, experienced public health, social, institutional management, highly dependable, capable, active, intelligent worker. Box 471, c/o The Nation.

NRA U.S. CODE

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 29, 1934 No. 3608

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 225

EDITORIALS:

Who Owns the San Francisco Police? 228
Czarist Debts and Soviet Trade 230
Social Insurance: Act I 231
Mary Austin 231
ISSUES AND MEN. ERNEST GRUENING'S APPOINTMENT. By Oswald Garrison Villard 232
ALABAMA GOES ON STRIKE. By Alexander Kendrick . . . 233
PARI-MUTUEL. By Vincent McHugh 234
WAS EUROPE A SUCCESS? III. SOME DOUBTS ARRIVED AT. By Joseph Wood Krutch 237
A STRANGE STRIKE IN JUGOSLAVIA. By Louis Adamic . . 239
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 240
CORRESPONDENCE 241
FINANCE: "LACK OF CONFIDENCE." By Peter Helmoop Noyes 241

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:

California Casualty List. By Lew Levenson 243

BOOKS:

The Sage of Potato Hill. By Ernest Boyd 247
Class War and Violence. By Lewis Corey 248
Signature of Spring. By Eda Lou Walton 248
Mr. Priestley Discovers England. By H. B. Parkes 249
Small Town. By Edna Kenton 249
China's "Renaissance." By Agnes Smedley 250
Shorter Notices 250
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 252

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

ADOLF HITLER has little reason to congratulate himself on the results of the special plebiscite indorsing his assumption of absolute power in the Reich. While on the surface the vote of nine to one in support of Hitler would appear to be a complete vindication of his extraordinary actions during the past two months, the fact that more than four and a quarter million voters were courageous enough to risk certain retaliation by registering their opposition is, under the circumstances, sufficient to give pause even to a dictator. This is particularly true in view of the character of the campaign. No opposition candidates were permitted: the issue as it was presented to the German people was Hitler or chaos. Every trick of publicity, every form of pressure were unscrupulously exploited in an effort to secure an overwhelming victory. The master stroke of the campaign—suspiciously comparable in timeliness to the Reichstag-fire incident in 1933—was the "discovery," four days before the election, of Hindenburg's will, which by good fortune contained a paragraph in praise of the unifying effect of the Nazi movement. Whether Hindenburg himself wrote this section or whether it was the product of the skilful hand of Goebbels is, of course, unknown, but its effect as a political document can scarcely be questioned. Moreover, since the poll was conducted under Nazi supervision, with the votes counted and reported by Nazi officials, it is impossible even to estimate the extent of real opposition to Hitler's policies. The doubling of the number of "no" votes since last November suggests, however, that it is far greater than anyone would have thought possible six months ago. Already we can see the first effects of Hitler's desperate coup at the end of June.

ONE OF THE FINEST THINGS that Mr. Roosevelt has done since his return to Washington was to appoint Ernest Gruening to the post of director of the new Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the Department of the Interior. This selection is one of those acts of grace by means of which the present Administration so often redeems its political errors and disarms its critics. Liberals and anti-imperialists everywhere will be moved to overlook a dozen Farley appointments in their delighted approval of the choice of so sturdy an opponent of the ruthless policy that has characterized every preceding Administration in its treatment of our smaller neighbors and of the islands under our rule. Ernest Gruening's long fight for justice to the peoples of the Caribbean was waged for many years through the columns of The Nation, which he served as an editor at two different periods. It was largely through his investigations and unceasing demand for action that the first steps were taken that led eventually to the withdrawal of American forces from Haiti—a process finally accomplished only one day before Dr. Gruening's appointment was announced. The editors of The Nation, therefore, have particular reason to feel both pleasure and pride in their former colleague's new post and to wish him the fullest measure of satisfaction and success.

THE DEPARTURE of the last American marines and naval forces from Haiti ended nineteen years of continuous occupation. While it is too late to make amends for the wanton destruction of the lives of thousands of men and women who were the innocent victims of the juggernaut of American imperialism, the removal of the armed forces of the United States is bound to lessen tension throughout the Caribbean. But lest our satisfaction with this step make us unduly complacent, it should be remembered that Haiti is not wholly free as long as the United States retains control over the customs and finance as a security for loans advanced by the National City Bank. Under the new treaty the Bank of Haiti, which is to be acquired by the Haitian government from the National City Bank, will take charge of the service on the country's debt, and until the balance is paid, representatives of the bond-holders and of the present financial control will constitute a majority of the board of directors. In these days the power to repudiate or scale down burdensome debts is one of the most coveted attributes of national sovereignty. We can, however, find cause for honest satisfaction in the knowledge that this rather oppressive business arrangement is not backed by the threat of physical force, and that Haiti can, presumably, buy its way out to complete independence within a reasonable time.

DRIVEN by the desperation of the rank and file, especially the Southern delegates, the New York convention of the United Textile Workers of America authorized their executive committee to call a general strike of 300,000 cotton-textile workers on or before September 1, and empowered the committee to call out an additional 525,000 workers from the silk, rayon, and worsted mills. If the strike is actually called, which is doubtful, there is every reason to expect that violence will flame higher, especially in northern Alabama, than in San Francisco's general strike, with its red-baiting aftermath. Very little of what happens in the Southern textile region gets into the news dispatches. For example, New York papers recounted the abduction of John Dean, organizer of the present strike involving 23,000 workers in Florence, Huntsville, and other northern Alabama mill villages. But the dispatches have yet to mention that Dean, Gowins, and other organizers now go about their business escorted by bodyguards of from fifty to three hundred workers armed with shotguns and repeating rifles, and that without such guards their lives would not be safe. Working conditions, as attested by delegates to the convention and as described by Alexander Kendrick on another page of this issue, are worse even than the meager provisions of the code require. Practically nowhere is the $12 minimum wage observed; the stretch-out and speed-up have maintained production at the pre-code level; by a variety of devices, including unprecedented rent charges and the successive hiring and firing of unpaid "apprentice workers," the mill-owners have carried the exploitation of labor under the New Deal as far as if not farther than it was carried in any previous period.

WHEN AFFIDAVITS citing these facts are presented to the State Compliance Board, it happens by a curious coincidence that the workers signing them are shortly without jobs. Attempts have been made, in some cases successfully, to use the relief administration as a strike-breaking agency. The Huntsville Chamber of Commerce has threatened to remove any welfare worker found giving food to the striking mill workers. Lacking either jobs or the fantastically meager dole which Alabama allows its unemployed, these freeborn Americans find their ultimate refuge in the dirty hovels made of packing cases which have grown up on the outskirts of the mill villages. Women and children haunt the garbage dumps. The Southern textile region has yielded thus far what can only be described as a condition of economic and social anarchy. Like the Sabine men, the A. F. of L. leaders have walked into this battle "one step forward, two steps backward." They fear defeat and with some reason. The United Textile Workers have a total strike reserve fund of only a million dollars, whereas the estimated expense of running a strike of 825,000 workers would reach at least a million dollars a week. For many months the McMahon-Gorman leadership has been trying to establish its right to a place in the inner circle of the NRA. One stronghold has been stormed: United Textile representatives have been named to both the cotton-textile and the silk-wool boards. The next point of attack is union representation on the Code Authority. If the union succeeds, the strike will probably not be called; at least not by the international officers of their own volition, although there is no telling how violent the upsurge from below—from the desperate rank and file—may prove to be.

MASS PICKETING BY STRIKERS will hereafter be permitted, wholesale arrests are barred, strike-breakers will receive no special police protection, and police on duty must observe strict neutrality in labor controversies, according to new and admirable instructions to the New York City police which apparently emanated from Mayor La Guardia. They were sent out shortly after the Mayor had investigated charges of police brutality against strikers and decided that they were true. The new policy is probably not unconnected with public criticism of his police commissioner, John F. O'Ryan, who avowedly believes in strong-arm methods in dealing with mass demonstrations. Testimony in the Mayor's investigation lighted up for a moment at least that mysterious occurrence commonly known as a "strike riot" or sometimes as a "pitched battle," in which, strangely enough, only unarmed workers get hurt. One striker testified that when he asked a policeman why some of his fellow-workers had been arrested, he was struck by two policemen and a sergeant and then put under arrest. The sixteen-year-old son of a striker was struck and arrested when he asked a policeman if he might speak to his father, who was among the pickets. The investigation also served to bring out the obviously provocative and partisan custom, which now prevails throughout the country, of escorting strike-breakers under official guard to and from other men's jobs. The New York police, it is said, are worried over the latitude given to strikers under the Mayor's order. It is admittedly difficult for a man with a club to be neutral. But since the police are forbidden to use their clubs they might use their heads. They might reflect, for instance, that they are workers, too.

MOST DEVELOPMENTS during the past year in the field of industrial relations have centered around Section 7-a of the National Recovery Act. Section 7-b has been lost from sight in the heat of this controversy. And yet Section 7-b is of critical importance, for it authorizes the President to encourage the making of collective agreements between employers and trade unions, these agreements when approved to have the force of a code. Until recently Section 7-b had been applied only once—in the Appalachian agreement of September, 1933, between the United Mine Workers of America and the formerly anti-union operators of the region. Now it has been applied for the second time. The NRA has ratified an agreement between various bricklayers' unions in metropolitan New York, on the one hand, and a number of mason builders' and contractors' associations, on the other. The terms of the agreement, specifying a minimum wage of $1.50 per hour, double rates for overtime, and eight hours of pay for six hours of work on the second and third shifts, now become binding upon all building-trades employers of the region, regardless of individual failure to assent. The agreement, it should be noted, is supplemental to the general construction code, which expressly authorizes the formulation of regional contracts of this kind to cover the various skilled trades. At the moment, sixty such regional agreements are pending before the NRA, and 200 more are said to be in process of formation. A brief analysis of these agreements reveals them to be simplified forms of the ordinary type of trade-union contract. The wage rates which they specify, needless to say, are far above the minima set forth in the usual run of NRA codes. Part of the reason for this, no doubt, is the skilled character of the employment. An equally important factor, however, is that the agreements are the outcome of genuine collective bargaining by bona fide trade unions. If the government had at the beginning of the NRA taken a firm stand behind Section 7-b, the labor provisions of most of the codes would be less shameful to contemplate.

AS OUT OF PLACE as public remarks can be was the uncalled-for attack upon State liquor-store systems made by Joseph H. Choate, Jr., director of the Federal Alcohol Control Administration, at the recent Governor's Conference at Mackinac Island, Michigan. Mr. Choate took it upon himself to discredit the control, management, and operation methods in successful use in ten or twelve States, and blamed purchase "restrictions" for the continued survival of the bootlegger. It is perhaps merely a coincidence that this attack should come at a time when retail liquor interests are using all their resources to combat the State stores in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, but Mr. Choate is, for one in his position, not very accurate in his facts or premises. State stores buy their liquor in quantities prohibitive to the retail merchant and as a consequence undersell the retailer and effectively scotch the bootlegger. What Mr. Choate means by "restrictions" is not clear; there are no restrictions in this bulk sale of liquor except, perhaps, that some stores close at 9 p. m. Moreover, State stores provide much-needed revenue to their respective commonwealths, the Michigan system having cleared $3,000,000 between repeal and June 1, and the Pennsylvania system having proved a bulwark of emergency relief funds. That control of the commercial liquor traffic is a legitimate function of the State cannot be gainsaid. In the old days the powerful liquor lobby would have been blamed for such statements by a high public official. What lies behind Mr. Choate's attitude can only be conjectured.

A STRIKING PARALLEL between economic conditions in the United States and those of the rest of the world is suggested in a report recently published by the Foreign Policy Association. World industrial production has increased approximately 40 per cent above its low level of 1932, business profits have risen to an even larger extent, while unemployment has been appreciably reduced. But the revival has been almost entirely the result of domestic forces within each country. Little progress has been made toward a revival of international trade, without which, the report asserts, "recovery must be confined to narrow limits." Moreover, the improvement in business conditions appears in every case to be at the expense of the working class. Employment is shown nowhere to have kept pace with the gains in industrial activity. Real wages and the standards of living of labor have undergone a further decline in the majority of the leading nations, while agriculture has also suffered a loss in purchasing power. These findings appear to correspond very closely with recent statistics in this country. As indicated elsewhere in this issue of The Nation, industrial profits for the first six months of 1934 were more than double those of a year ago, while employment has increased at the most about 25 per cent, and is now only 10 per cent over last year's level. Pay rolls show up a little better at 20 per cent above 1933, but with the dollar volume of department-store sales in New York and other large cities running at about the same level as a year ago despite greatly increased prices, it is evident that standards of living have undergone a substantial decline.

THE MISSISSIPPI DELTA, our geography used to tell us, is so rich that anything will grow there. It has. The dictatorship of Huey Long, which bloomed in three days complete with storm troops and full control over the courts, under the very eyes of a Democratic legislature, is surely the most amazing growth this country, including California, can boast. Hitler had to burn the Reichstag to get what he wanted. Huey merely filled the legislative halls with armed men. Newspapermen were barred from the sessions; photographers were knocked down. Huey himself strode up and down the aisles gathering in the "Yes's" for twenty-seven bills which make him absolute dictator of Louisiana; through his tool, Governor Allen, he may, among other things, expand the State Bureau of Criminal Identification into a State police force, extend the governor's power of reprieve to comprise all cases, including contempt of court, and provide a penalty for any judge or other official who does not recognize the reprieve, which has the effect of a pardon revocable at will. He may even reduce a white man he does not like to the status of a Negro by taking away his right to vote. Meanwhile other growths are thriving in the rich soil of the Delta. At present 21 per cent of the population of Louisiana is on relief. Poverty is a weed that will bear watching. It may even outgrow and smother Huey.

SEVEN YEARS AGO the State of Massachusetts executed two obscure Italian anarchists. They had been convicted of robbery and murder on evidence so flimsy that for months and years a swelling roar of world protest had beaten vainly upon the deaf ears of a senile judge and a reactionary governor. Their real crime was that they were rebels and labor organizers; they had dared to challenge the exploitation for profit of the workers in the mills and factories of the Bay State. Sacco and Vanzetti endured seven years of judicial torture, during which they grew steadily in moral and spiritual stature. This, in the eyes of the Massachusetts Brahmans and Babbitts who had doomed them in advance, was an even greater crime. As a society Massachusetts has never confessed or expiated the crime against civilization which was committed the night Sacco and Vanzetti went to the electric chair. Indeed, it was only a few months ago that the police of Boston assaulted with the utmost brutality a gathering of students assembled to protest against Boston's welcome to the Karlsruhe, the propaganda ship of Adolf Hitler. Yet there were men and women of Boston and Massachusetts, some of them descended from the old Puritan stock, who were not blind to the truth and beauty that blazed in the acts and words of these proletarian martyrs, and who fought to save them. For them and for thousands of people all over the world, the Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti is an annual sacrament. They will read again that magnificent speech of Vanzetti and feel its truth:

> If it had not been for these thing, I might have live out my life talking at street corners to scorning men. I might have die, unmarked, unknown, a failure. Now we are not a failure. This is our career and our triumph. Never in our full life could we hope to do such work for tolerance, for joostice, for man's understanding of man as now we do by accident. Our words—our lives—our pains—nothing! The taking of our lives—lives of a good shoemaker and a poor fish-peddler—all! That last moment belongs to us—that agony is our triumph!

Who Owns the San Francisco Police?

THE NATION presents, on the page following this, photostatic reproductions of sections of two documents which contain circumstantial evidence that the San Francisco Industrial Association, bitter opponent of organized labor, was actively involved in the raids on radical halls which helped to break the general strike and which have continued ever since. The documents in question are in the form of eight typed carbon sheets comprising two reports headed "Strike Violence Memo" and addressed to Boynton, managing director of the Industrial Association. The carbon sheets were picked up from the floor of a crowded San Francisco courtroom. Photostat copies were transmitted to The Nation by persons in California known to us and thoroughly trustworthy. The documents have every appearance of authenticity.

Austin Lewis and Chester S. Williams, representing the American Civil Liberties Union in San Francisco, are prepared to produce the documents for the inspection of a properly qualified investigating committee. A check of the 172 names of persons arrested which are given on these eight sheets shows that the lists correspond to police-blotter records with 95 per cent of accuracy. The names of the regular police officers, Lieutenant Malloy and Captain Hoertkorn, and the dates and places of the raids are also accurate. P. Carr, whose typed signature is appended to the document, is not a regular police officer, but is well and unfavorably known by San Francisco labor organizations as an "operative" used by reactionary employers. A thorough investigation by a properly qualified committee is indicated, and The Nation strongly urges that such an investigation be made.

In the light of their records we can scarcely expect Mayor Rossi or Governor Merriam to order or conduct an impartial investigation. But the breakdown of government here indicated concerns not merely San Francisco and the State of California but the national government. President Roosevelt would be entirely justified in ordering a federal investigation on the ground that this document, if it proves to be authentic, shows that the Industrial Association actively intervened to break a strike which federal mediators were trying to settle, and that the citizens of California were deprived of their civil rights by the illegal and violent acts of officers of the law.

So far as we know this is the first time that a great and proud American city has permitted its police force to collaborate openly with labor-hating industrialists, bankers, and publishers. How else can this document be interpreted? Does not the sequence of events, falsified and distorted though they were by the San Francisco newspapers, lead directly to this conclusion? There was the radio speech of Governor Merriam, delivered the day before the raids mentioned in this document, in which he denounced "Communists" and "professional agitators," outlined the measures he intended to take, and called on "all good citizens" to aid him. "From the inception of the strike," declared Governor Merriam, "the fact has been evident that . . . destructive and subversive influences have been working against an agreement on any basis whatsoever." This was true. The "subversive influences," in our opinion, were the San Francisco Industrial Association and the Publishers' Council, and their ace card was the ineffable General Johnson, who on July 17, the day of the first raid, told the student body of the University of California that "this subversive element must be wiped out. They must be run out like rats." It was on this day, too, according to the Associated Press, that Charles Wheeler, vice-president of the McCormick Steamship line, in a speech before the Rotary Club, 'said that the raids would start soon. He intimated government consent had been obtained for the raids."

The San Francisco Examiner and Chronicle that same morning carried full-page editorials stating that radicals had seized control by intimidation and that the general strike was a revolution against constituted authority, and urging that trade unionists repudiate the "aliens" and "strangers." And Governor Merriam gave the clue to what was scheduled to happen when he said: "A more active and intensified drive to rid this State and nation of alien radical agitators should be undertaken by the workers themselves if they are to enjoy the confidence of the people." The next day the Chronicle was screaming: "Unionists Smash Radical Hangouts in Purging Move," and "Police Nab 300 in Dredging Caldrons of Discontent."

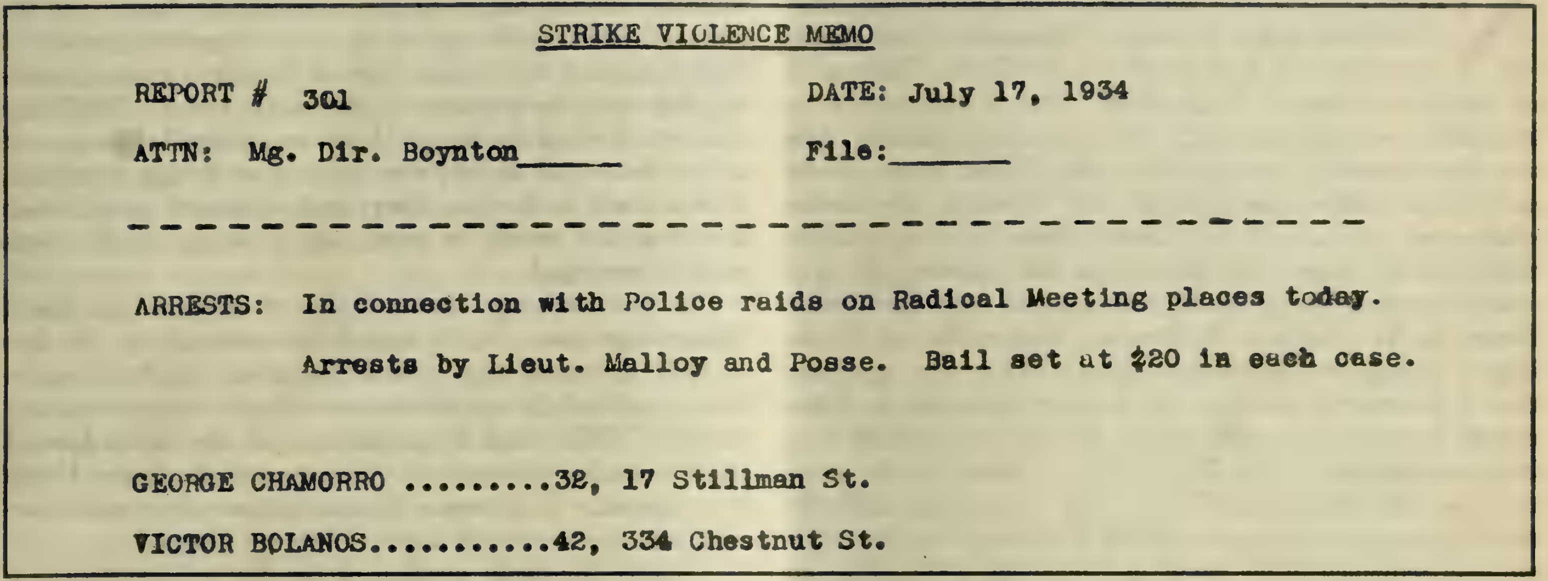
The documents do not mention "unionists." They have to do with Lieutenant Malloy or Captain Hoertkorn, "and posse," and the reports are addressed to the director of the Industrial Association. In the New York Post of July 18 William M. Hines, formerly publisher of the San Francisco Bulletin, described the Industrial Association as a super-chamber of commerce which "has organized for its anti-labor fight on a five-year plan. Funds have been solicited from members, all of whom are assured that their subscription cards will be discounted immediately by the banks and that pledges need not be paid in full until 1939."

In San Francisco, and indeed throughout California, the raiding of radical centers and the persecution of radical sympathizers continue. The casualty list which appears on another page of this issue is only a partial record of the wanton destruction of life and property, the illegal arrests, the beating and gassing and shooting that have systematically occurred in every area of industrial conflict. It is surely one of the most harrowing records of brutality to be found outside of Hitler's Third Reich.

The tide is bound to turn. The thousands of trade unionists who showed their power in the general strike will not be duped and cowed indefinitely. They will rally and begin to ask: "Who are the real rats of San Francisco?" Meanwhile all citizens who still believe in justice and orderly processes of government should join in a demand that the situation revealed by these documents be investigated promptly. We suggest that Mr. Albert Boynton be called as the first witness.

Two Records of Official Lawlessness

Photostat reproductions of reports of police raids made to Albert Boynton, Managing Director of the San Francisco Industrial Association



STRIKE VIOLENCE MEMO

REPORT # 301 DATE: July 17, 1934

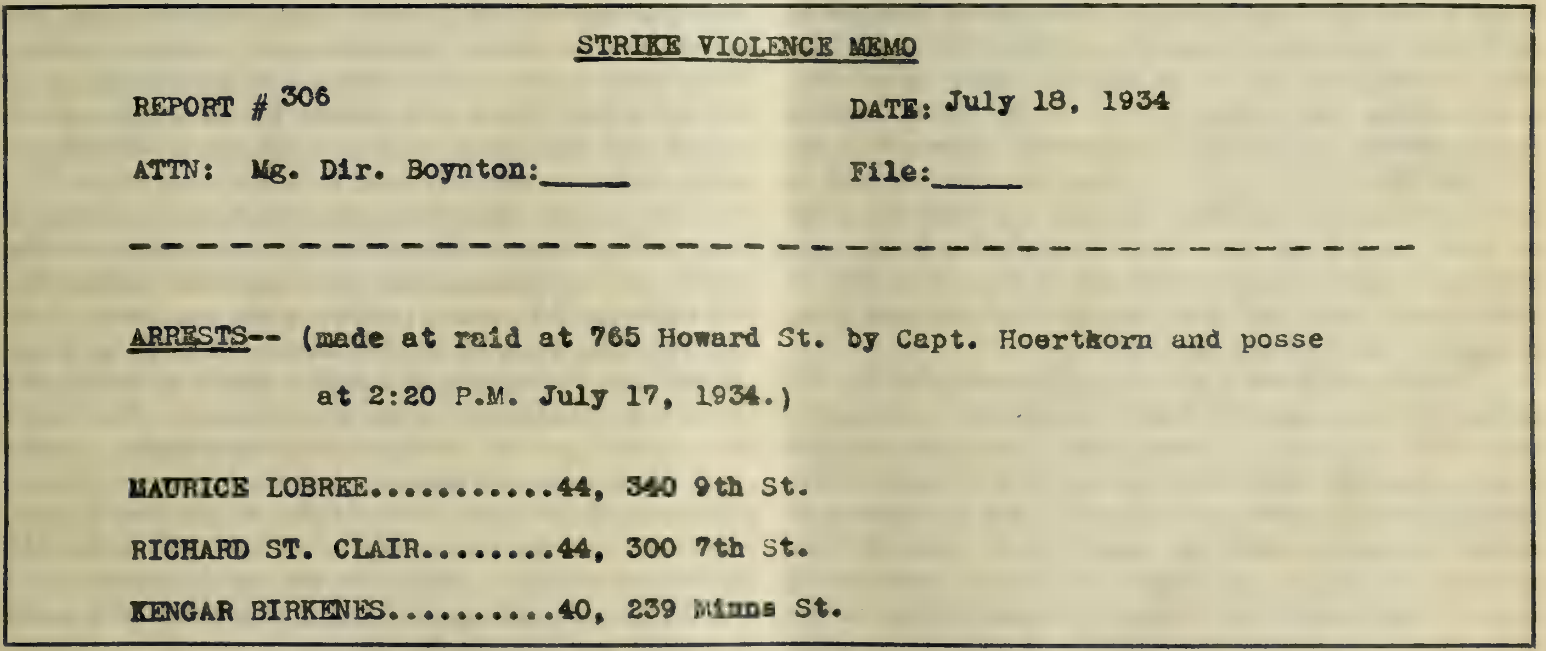
ATTN: Mg. Dir. Boynton_____ File:______

ARRESTS: In connection with Police raids on Radical Meeting places today. Arrests by Lieut. Malloy and Posse. Bail set at $20 in each case.

GEORGE CHAMORRO ....32, 17 Stillman St.

VICTOR BOLANOS...........42, 334 Chestnut St.

Facsimile of the top of the first manuscript page. There follow 94 names and addresses.



STRIKE VIOLENCE MEMO

REPORT # 306 DATE: July 18, 1934

ATTN: Mg. Dir. Boynton:_____ File:_____

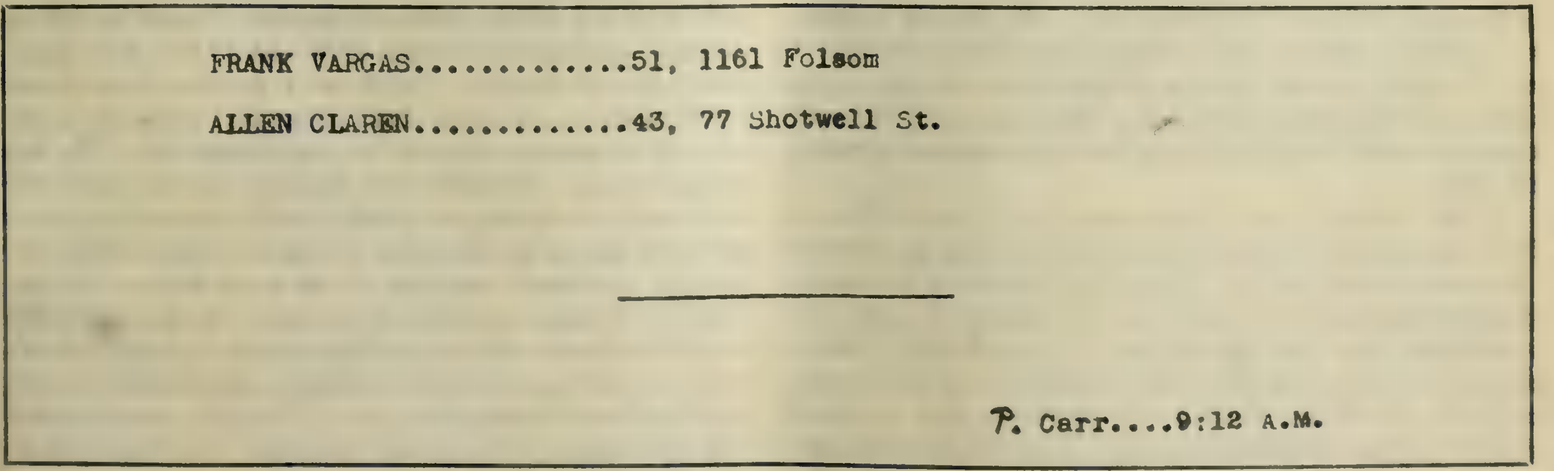
ARRESTS-- (made at raid at 765 Howard St. by Capt. Hoertkorn and posse at 2:20 P.M. July 17, 1934.)

MAURICE LOBREE...........44, 340 9th St.

RICHARD ST. CLAIR........44, 300 7th St.

KENGAR BIRKENES..........40, 239 Minna St.

Facsimile of the beginning of the second report. There follow 78 names and addresses.



FRANK VARGAS.............51, 1161 Folsom

ALLEN CLAREN.............43, 77 Shotwell St.

P. Carr....9:12 A.M.

End of the second report showing typed signature of the detective making the report.

Czarist Debts and Soviet Trade

NEGOTIATIONS with the Soviet Government over the troublesome Czarist and Kerensky debts appear once more to have reached a deadlock. Differences of opinion are said to hinge chiefly around the question of recognition of the legitimacy of the pre-revolutionary debt and the amount of credits which the United States should extend in a quid pro quo arrangement. Moscow very frankly challenges the basis of the United States' claims. Before their rise to power the Bolsheviks had opposed the war loans, including the $187,000,000 obtained from the United States by M. Bakhmeteff, Russian Ambassador at Washington during the Kerensky regime. They also maintain that a substantial share of the amount advanced to Bakhmeteff was never transferred to Russia, and should have been sequestered by the United States following the overthrow of the Provisional Government. According to Bakhmeteff's own records, approximately $56,000,000 of the original sum remained in his hands in November, 1917, while an additional $29,000,000 was obtained later through the sale of Russian property in the United States and the charter of Russian ships. And on the basis of these records there can be little doubt that a large proportion of this $85,000,000 was used, as charged by the Soviet press, in equipping or otherwise assisting the various White armies which invaded Soviet territory in 1920-21. A substantial proportion of the $441,000,000 claimed by private American interests is of an even more dubious character. During the weeks just prior to Soviet recognition, speculators maintained a heavy over-the-counter market for Czarist bonds at 4 or 5 per cent of their normal value, and these, among others, are now being brought forward for full payment.

The United States is not the only country that has had difficulty in persuading the Soviet Government to assume responsibility for pre-revolutionary debts. At regular intervals France, England, and other nations have pressed similar claims against Moscow without avail. But this country is unique in denying itself the benefits to be obtained from normal trade relations pending the settlement of outstanding issues. This anomalous situation is primarily due to the Johnson Act, prohibiting the extension of credit to countries in default on their war debt to the United States, and the complementary resolution of the Export-Import Bank suspending the advance of government credit pending a settlement of the debts. Despite recognition, Soviet purchases in the United States in the first six months of this year were only about five and a half million dollars, as compared with more than ten times that amount in the corresponding period of 1931.

The real danger of the situation as far as the United States is concerned is that the series of new trade pacts which Moscow is concluding in Europe will lead to a permanent diversion of trade from this country. Within the past year agreements have been reached with Great Britain, France, and Italy which have given those countries the lion's share of Soviet purchases. British sales to Russia have increased several fold in the past year, and are now five times as large as those of the United States. This is not the result of a voluntary discrimination against American products. On the contrary, Soviet trade organizations have repeatedly indicated their preference for certain types of American goods, providing they could be obtained on reasonable terms. While the time is past when the Soviet Union was compelled because of lack of industrial development to rely on foreign purchases, there is much, both of machinery and consumers' goods, which is needed and would be purchased if normal credit terms could be arranged.

A few years ago the extension of credit to the Soviet Government was a highly speculative undertaking. As late as 1931 observers who prided themselves on their realism freely predicted the repudiation of all Soviet commercial obligations. While small in comparison with the indebtedness of other countries, the external obligations of the Soviet Union were especially burdensome because of their short-term character and the exorbitant rates of interest charged.

Today the credit position of the Soviet Government is practically unassailable. Not only has it paid every cent of its obligations—including the recent repayment in full of the three-million-dollar RFC cotton loan—but it has been able to reduce its outstanding indebtedness with amazing rapidity. Three years ago the total of external obligations was nearly one and a half billion gold rubles. By the opening of the present year this amount had been reduced to 450,000,000 rubles, and at present is believed to be little more than 300,000,000. Among the most important factors contributing to this startling change in Moscow's credit position have been the shift to a favorable balance of trade—amounting to 150,000,000 rubles in 1933—made possible by the completion of the first Five-Year Plan, the marked increase in Soviet gold production, and the tapping of domestic hoards of untold size through the development of the Torgsin stores. The rise in the output of gold has been particularly spectacular. As the result of extensive mechanization and administrative reforms, production of this metal increased over 40 per cent in 1933, reaching a record-breaking total of 100,000,000 rubles. In the first six months of 1934 there has been a further rise of over 50 per cent, making the Soviet Union second only to the Transvaal in the output of gold.

Soviet pronouncements have made it clear, moreover, that the Kremlin is too wary to allow its improved credit position to trap it into an over-expansion of imports, such as Germany experienced between 1924 and 1930. It is recognized that in the long run Russia's purchases can be no greater than its sales, and that credits are a snare and a delusion if no provision is made for their repayment. The lesson is obvious. If the United States is ever to regain the share in the Soviet market which it held three or four years ago, with exports of upward of a hundred million dollars annually, it must make provision for the entry of a much larger volume of Russian goods into this country. It also must make possible adequate credits of sufficient length to make it worth while for the various Soviet economic organizations to shift their long-term buying program. To do so would be not only good business but sound economics, beneficial to both countries alike.

Social Insurance: Act I

A MOMENTOUS precedent was set when Judge James M. Proctor denied the petition of 150 railroads for an order to prevent the Railroad Retirement Board from putting into effect the recently enacted Railway Pensions law. The act against which the carriers brought suit requires the payment of annuities to all employees who reach the age of sixty-five or complete thirty years of service in the industry. The largest possible annuity—on $300 monthly pay for thirty years' service—would come to $120 a month. The current average salary of something less than $1,700 a year would produce a maximum annuity of about $70 a month. To provide the pensions, reserves are accumulated to which each employee is required to contribute 2 per cent of his pay and each employer 4 per cent of his total pay roll. The funds are deposited with the United States Treasury, and the plan is administered by a Railroad Retirement Board.

Retirement pensions as such are no novelty for the railroads. The first pension scheme ever established by an American employer was that of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in 1884. At the last count, retirement plans were in force on 90 per cent of the country's railroad mileage. Typically these plans provide for retirement at seventy years on pensions which yield substantially smaller sums than the annuities required by the new law. Thus the carriers' objections have a pecuniary basis; the law threatens their pocketbooks. But there are still more cogent reasons—partly legal, partly psychic—which explain the carriers' resistance. Under existing plans the pension is bestowed as a gratuity, out of the employer's loving kindness, and as a reward for good and faithful service. Contractual obligation being absent, the worker cannot demand the payment of the pension as a matter of legal right. The employer pays the piper and he calls the tune, a fact which, naturally enough, inhibits the individual worker, as he acquires the discretion of years, from speaking out of turn.

The new law rejects the concept of benevolent paternalism. It postulates the obligation of the industry as a whole to safeguard the retirement of aged workers. The worker possesses statutory property rights in the retirement reserve. Thanks to actuarial computations and funding operations, annuity payments are assured regardless of the whims of business cycles and the progress of technological change.

The significance of the carriers' suit—which ought to reach the Supreme Court this winter—far transcends the welfare of the million wage-earners entitled to the law's benefits. The carriers were right in their facts—even if their social premises were faulty—when they complained that the law was "experimentation" at their expense. Unfortunately, this is true: the Railway Pensions law is the one and only gesture of the New Deal Congress toward assured security for wage-earners. In the theory of social insurance old-age pensions are a mere beginning. In American practice old-age pensions—restricted so far to railroad workers—are the sum total of accomplishment. But the President has promised that a change will be wrought. Even now the Committee on Economic and Social Security is laying the foundations for a national social-insurance program. No matter how modest the actual proposals may prove to be, they will be resisted at every turn by employer groups. If pressure politics fail, the employers will swarm into the courts crying "confiscation of property" and "irreparable injury," as the carriers are in fact pleading in their suit. Thus the Supreme Court decision will provide a fundamental precedent in determining the Administration's entire program of welfare legislation in the United States.

Mary Austin

MARY AUSTIN was only sixty-five years old when she died in Santa Fé on August 13. Into these years she packed a quantity and quality of achievement that entitle her to be ranked not merely as one of the significant writers of her generation but as one of the few great women that America has produced.

In her autobiography, "Earth Horizon," and elsewhere in her writings Mrs. Austin revealed herself with exceptional fulness and honesty. The sickly, unwanted child of a Civil War captain turned farmer and a feminist mother, she suffered bitterly from the deprivation of normal family affection; wanting love, she sought, instead, justice for herself and others. The history of her formative years and of her marriage was almost unmitigated tragedy; from it there emerged, however, one of the most formidable personalities of our time. To many who did not know this history Mrs. Austin's personality and her austere rule as a kind of uncrowned empress of her adopted region sometimes seemed harsh and eccentric. But she had achieved almost incredible conquests of the will and the spirit, and inevitably she bore the scars of battle.

These scars were evident in her work as in her life. But so authentic was her genius that they marred but slightly such permanent additions to our literature as "The Land of Little Rain" and the best of her poetry and plays. She spent sixteen years in the California desert, working like an Indian woman, studying Indian lore and the nature and properties of the desert. The fruits of this study appear also in "Lands of the Sun," with its amazingly rich content of precise botanical knowledge and observation and its intuitive integration of man with his natural environment.

A passionate woman with a balked maternal instinct, Mrs. Austin made herself successively a distinguished naturalist and anthropologist, a disciplined and prolific writer, and in the end a mystic. In this last role as in her others Mrs. Austin is entitled to respect. When she turned inward it was never in retreat, but always in the spirit of discovery and conquest. One might doubt the reality of some of her discoveries, but never the integrity of the mind that reported them. It was a good mind, powerful, not sentimental and not ungenerous.

She cared deeply and selflessly about art, as about life and about people. "Woman Alone," she called herself in an unsigned autobiographical contribution to a symposium in The Nation some years ago, and in a sense this loneliness was real and tragic. But she filled her life with honest work; she gave love and had it in return from the Indians for whom she fought all her days. Few lives can show a comparable record of uncompromising struggle and victory over obstacles.

Issues and Men

Ernest Gruening's Appointment

NOT in all the years that I have been writing for the press can I recall an appointment which has given me more satisfaction than that of Dr. Ernest Gruening as head of the new Division of Territories and Island Possessions, which was created on July 28 by an executive order as a part of the Department of the Interior. In this position Dr. Gruening will have supervision over Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, and it is to be hoped in the future over Guam and the other outposts now controlled by the War or Navy Department. It seems really too good to be true that this important position has been given to one who is ideally fitted for it—and in saying this I do not think I am biased by my years of editorial association with him on The Nation, and our personal friendship. In the first place, he is an excellent linguist, speaking French, German, and Spanish. Next, his whole career would seem to have led right up to this post, since he has been specializing in the Latin American relations of the United States ever since he first joined the staff of The Nation in 1920. It was his study of the Haitian situation which made possible The Nation's revelations of the horrifying conditions in that island during our occupation, when, according to the Commandant of the United States Marine Corps, our marines killed more than 3,000 people, in many cases, General Barnett admitted, without any justification. No one else brought to the study of the Caribbean situation such persistence and fidelity, such determination to bring about a reversal of American policy toward Central and South America, as Ernest Gruening. Sometimes he was accused of riding his hobby too vigorously. Never has a man been more justified, and few reformers in any field have lived to see such a complete accomplishment of their aims as have he and his associates on The Nation. The day before Ernest Gruening was sworn in, the marines finally left Haiti.

And now it has come to him to supervise the future of three of our own possessions. What he accomplishes there will have the profoundest effect upon our relations with the other American republics. Few people realize how closely our conduct toward our own possessions, as well as toward Mexico, Cuba, Nicaragua, and Haiti, is followed and reported in the Spanish American and Portuguese American press. Alaska is a new field for him, but the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and to a lesser extent Hawaii have long engaged his thoughts and studies—I must not forget to refer to his book on Mexico, "Mexico and Its Heritage," which alone would have sufficed to make his name known throughout Latin America. But after all the point is that in this case the office has sought the man, and has been extraordinarily fortunate in finding one who could not be better equipped for the position, and in addition has, thank heaven, exactly the opposite point of view with respect to our attitude toward our insular possessions and our Southern neighbors to that which has ruled the State Department these many, many years, under both Democratic and Republican Presidents. So often it seems as if the men who are given the official opportunity to safeguard the welfare and advance the fortunes of our wards and our proteges were all of them lacking in two things—sympathy and a heart. Ernest Gruening has both and, in addition, understanding and knowledge, good-will and tact. Of course, he will be subject to the deteriorating effects of public office. No doubt there will be plenty of occasions when efforts will be made to bring political influence to bear on him. If he does not stand up straight, I shall never expect it of anyone. Twice to my knowledge he has resigned the managing editorship of important daily newspapers because his high sense of honor made it impossible for him to work on in those shops.

When I think of all the abuse he and I and others were subjected to when we protested against the initial wrongdoing in Haiti, in which Franklin Roosevelt played such an unhappy part, and against the outrages and murders committed in Nicaragua, Santo Domingo, Haiti, and Mexico, it seems really beyond belief that one of us has received such public recognition. Beyond that, I must take this opportunity to express again the gratitude that all Americans ought to feel toward Mr. Roosevelt and some of his Cabinet for the fine type of men they are bringing to Washington. It is hard to listen to the stupid Republican and business men's abuse of the Brain Trust, so-called. If all their criticism of its membership were true I should still be profoundly grateful for an Administration which, instead of appointing only political hacks, or pets of politicians, or young men of great wealth to positions in the government, has picked so many fine men of high ideals who ask nothing but the opportunity to serve the country. I could instance many; one of the best I am barred from praising because of kinship. The best thing about the Administration of Theodore Roosevelt was that he brought a similar type of young men into the public service. I thoroughly disliked their principles and points of view, but I recognized then as now that it was a fine thing for the country to have in its service college men of high quality, of the type that in England naturally gravitates to the public service.

Of course I am not blind to the many bad appointments made by Mr. Farley and Mr. Roosevelt. They have played the political game far too often, and it is discouraging to read that people who want positions under the New Deal must put in their applications through the Democratic National Committee. Perhaps it is one of my faults that in such matters I am grateful for a third of a loaf, but that I am. And when that third of a loaf includes an appointment as fine as that of Ernest Gruening, I cannot help voicing an enthusiasm which I suppose to many will seem less warranted than it does to me. If Ernest Gruening rises to his opportunities, these doubters will yet come to my point of view.

Oswald Garrison Villard

Alabama Goes on Strike

By ALEXANDER KENDRICK

Birmingham, August 13

"BIRMINGHAM, the Magic City," proclaim electric lights at the entrance to the city, but Birmingham's black magic of industry and labor has turned upon it, and the stars that fell on Alabama have died in mid-air.

The Pittsburgh of the South—it loathes the name and prefers to be known as a city of parks—is like a paralyzed giant. The steel mills which sprawl out to the south of it are closed or limp along on greatly curtailed schedules. Only one blast furnace lights up the night, where there were formerly a dozen. Of the city's 800 industrial plants not more than half can be working. The coal and iron shafts which form a natural circular boundary for this rich mining area stand deserted.

Jobless men walk the streets of Birmingham and fill the parks in greater numbers than in any other city of the South, speaking comparatively. Many of them have come from the cotton and the corn fields, where there is no work for them. The federal home for transients is filled to overflowing. In other words, Birmingham is like any industrial city of the North except that there is an unwonted grim tensity in the air—and there are strikes to heighten the grimness. The Republic Steel workers are out, following the company's defiance of union rights of recognition. The textile workers are out, most of them locked out after 5,000 had struck in Huntsville, and their patience is exhausted by such strikebreaking tactics as the kidnapping of their leader, and by the extreme unwillingness with which State Federation of Labor officials lent their support. Many smaller manufacturing plants—stove works and foundries—are also in the throes of strike fever. Birmingham is facing a major crisis.

In Alabama, one newspaperman declared, the three topics of greatest interest and news value were formerly politics, religion, and "literature," the latter including the important question of whether residents of the State were Alabamians or Alabamans. Now the list reads labor, the TVA (Tennessee Valley Authority), and bootleg beer. There can be no doubt that the South has ceased taking labor for granted, despite the stand-pat attitude of the steel and textile barons. Relief activities are at a low ebb, and it is apparent that if the many strikes are not adjusted, and quickly, trouble lies ahead. Added to labor troubles are the problems presented by the steady growth in prestige and power of the TVA, with the consequent waning of the influence of utility-controlled legislators and officials. There are also the important questions of wage differentials and the "Pittsburgh plus" scheme of basing steel prices.

The textile strike is not a general strike, as had been planned.* About 23,000 workers are out in twenty-eight mills—two in Birmingham, six in Huntsville, three in Florence, and the others at Anniston, Gadsden, Jasper, Piedmont, Guntersville, Albertville, Ordo, and Winfield. All these mill towns are in the area from Birmingham northward. In central and southern Alabama, where the textile industry is nearly 100 per cent unorganized, the mills are still operating, in most cases at a wage scale below the $12 minimum set in the textile code. This minimum was one of the demands made by the union. The $12 figure, because of the fight for a wage differential put up by Southern mill-owners, is $1 below the Northern minimum, but it is a rare worker in an Alabama mill who earns $12 a week. With the stretch-out system in universal use, the best he can do is about $9.50. Conversion of the $12 minimum into an actuality, abolition of the stretch-out and restoration of the jobs which it eliminated, reinstatement of workers discharged for union activity, recognition of the United Textile Workers of America, and establishment of a thirty-hour week were the demands of the union.

The strike went into effect on July 16 in a haze of uncertainty. The backing of the State Federation of Labor was doubtful, and although it was finally officially granted, the situation was not aided by the declaration of W. O. Hare, its secretary, that "the American Federation of Labor was and is against the general textile strike." Hare, speaking at Anniston, urged workers to "stay on your jobs unless conditions are extremely bad." Conditions were evidently bad, for the next day these same workers joined the strike.

Nor is the position of Thomas W. McMahon, head of the U. T. W. A., who attempted to stave off the strike, finding much favor among the rank and file of the workers. At labor headquarters in Birmingham, McMahon's advice to workers in other States not to join the walkout until the national convention of the union had passed on it was not received with very loyal support. "He killed the other strike," one worker remarked; "we're not going to let him kill this one." He was referring to the strike threat made by the U. T. W. in June, which was withdrawn following an "amicable settlement."

Picketing at the struck mills was orderly and well-disciplined, despite the provocative tactics of police and special deputies, until the blow-off came with the kidnapping of John Dean, organizer of the strike. Dean was in his room in a Huntsville hotel (Huntsville, the largest mill center of the State, is about 140 miles north of Birmingham), with other members of the strike committee, on Sunday evening, August 5, when four men appeared at the door and asked to speak privately with him. The labor leader stepped into the hall, was seized by the men, dragged downstairs, and driven to Fayetteville, Tennessee, thirty-two miles away, where he was registered by his captors at a hotel. He made his way back to strike headquarters safely the next day. One of the four abductors was recognized by those in the room as James Connor, former State commander of the American Legion. "I've known him fifteen years and couldn't be mistaken," one worker at Birmingham headquarters said. A John Doe warrant was issued in connection with the kidnapping but never served, and there the case apparently rests. The Department of Justice, informed of the abduction, reported that since this was a case of ordinary kidnapping and not kidnapping for ransom, it could do nothing about it!

---

* On August 16 the United Textile Workers of America, in convention in New York, authorized their executive committee to call a general strike in the cotton-textile industry for September 1; on August 17 they empowered the committee to extend the strike to the silk, rayon, and woolen industries.—EDITORS THE NATION.

Fearing that the abduction might precipitate hasty action on the part of the strikers, the mill-owners patrolled the streets of Huntsville with armed guards, and for several days weapons of all types bristled in the mill villages. By that time spurious petitions, supposedly signed by the strikers and asking that the mills be reopened, had made their appearance, and with this sign that the mills were not averse to arbitration mediation began. Behind the scenes, however, there is a general feeling of expectancy, as the day for the national U. T. W. convention in New York draws near. Workers are hopeful that the union may take a definite stand against the general violations of the textile code's provisions all through the South.

At Haleyville, meanwhile, in the western end of the State, when a truckload of union workers and organizers from Huntsville arrived to seek support from workers of the Alabama Mills Company, they were met by a force of armed guards, who halted them with pointed weapons at the railroad tracks and would not let them enter the town. Haleyville mill workers who crossed the tracks to listen to speakers were threatened by the guards and warned against joining the union.

Although the chief activity of the strike is removed from Birmingham, all its repercussions are felt here first, and the general chaotic situation has brought into being a movement for the recall of the city commissioners and against Governor B. M. Miller—described by a newspaper editor, with a shrug of the shoulders, as "just an Alabama Power Company governor"—for what seems to be supreme indifference to what is going on.

As in other Southern States there is a breakdown of relief in Alabama. Federal aid is the backbone of the relief setup, and it makes possible a weekly relief order of 97 cents to $3 per family. Private organizations raised $600,000 in a Birmingham community drive last year—"Labor was assessed practically the whole amount," a union leader said—but this has long since vanished, and there will probably be no campaign at all this year. Here the advantage of being a city of parks becomes apparent. The parks are well occupied nightly. Another relief evil in vogue here, although not so extensively as in North Carolina, is the practice of arranging credit at company stores for jobless workers instead of providing relief orders, and of demanding chattel mortgages on the debt, thus establishing virtual peonage.

But if the Chamber of Commerce is perturbed by the labor situation and the general let-down of industry, it is no less troubled by the recently renewed agitation over the "Pittsburgh plus" plan. For several decades the steel industry has used the basing-point price system, which fixes the price of steel in any part of the country by taking the Pittsburgh price and adding the freight charges to Pittsburgh from that point. Birmingham was exempt from the freight-charge scale, and the price here was the Pittsburgh price plus an arbitrary $5 per ton. This despite the fact—or because of it—that through natural advantages, with coal to the south, iron to the north, and limestone in between, Birmingham could produce steel more cheaply than any other place in the country.

The freight-charge system has now been dropped for the country as a whole, and has been replaced by a fixed differential which is added to the Pittsburgh price. This is $3 at Birmingham as against only $1 at Chicago. It might naturally be supposed that the Birmingham steel men, with their lower labor and manufacturing costs, would appreciate this added profit, and no doubt they do, since they are all connected with plants in the Pittsburgh area, but the small manufacturer, the Southern business man, and the consumer are protesting, pointing out that the extra price simply reduces volume and is an unfair discrimination against the South. That they are not consistent was readily admitted by several merchants, "speaking unofficially." They not only want the benefit of lower prices and greater volume by the abolishment of Pittsburgh plus, but they will fight to the last ditch to keep the wage differential, by which they gain at the other end of the scale by reducing costs. That the Pittsburgh plus plan does deprive the South of trade and industry it would otherwise have there can be small doubt; that it is a potent factor in the general unrest prevalent here is no less certain.

Another factor contributing to the general restiveness is the real threat of the TVA to private interests. In Alabama—as in so many other States—the utilities are firmly intrenched and extremely powerful, particularly the Alabama Power Company. They make no bones about their opposition to this nationalized power project. The coal and iron mine operators also are girding for "a fight for life," as a broadside by the National Coal Association puts it. There is genuine interest throughout the South in the TVA, and columns upon columns of newspaper material have appeared, but to a large extent the social implications are lost sight of in the prospect of "local benefits." Newspapers which are opposed to the TVA "in principle" favor it because of what it will mean in the way of increased business and higher living standards.

These are the elements which make the Magic City's legerdemain a trifle unsteady. But labor is awakening, and may prod the lethargic South into consciousness. If it does, that will be a greater feat of necromancy than any that has gone before.

Pari-Mutuel

By VINCENT McHUGH

Comrades, gentlemen or sirs,
I give you death. The stakes are run
Before the dwindling of the sun.
Meet in the paddock, walk, converse
Of points and trials. We take space
To mark the end of time. Now lay
Your bets on roan or black or gray,
Filly or stallion. Win or place,

Each man must wager, each man must
Put up his life and see it break
From the post in a lash of bodies, make
The stretch a maddening slow dust
Of time. You will not question then,
Whatever horse comes home. Your mind
Will open like the lips of the blind.
I give you death, gentlemen.

A New England Trotting Meet

By HAROLD E. STEARNS

Rockingham, New Hampshire, August 11

THIS is the final day of the ten-day trotting meet, which began eleven days ago—and when this appears, the trotters, the crowds, and the whole entourage will have shifted to Goshen, New York, where the famous Hambletonian Stake is the big feature. Eleven days, I carefully said, and a ten-day meet; for New England is still God-fearing enough to frown on Sabbath sports—at least some of them. Professional baseball has won its right to a place in the Sunday sun, but horse-racing is still forbidden. However, New Hampshire, like Rhode Island, has turned sufficiently away from the strict, moral Puritan path to permit open, shameless, and State-controlled gambling on these races—and this through the most convenient medium, the "Tote," or "mutual" betting, or the pari-mutuel, to employ the term that describes it in the country from which it came, France. Furthermore, with prohibition now but historic memory, one can have real beer as well as the ancient county-fair, holiday soda pop.

These things are facts. As to probabilities—well, just as Sunday baseball at last won its fight for a legal and respectable position in the community, so it is not unlikely that Sunday racing will, in a short time, do precisely the same thing. And then, pray, what will distinguish a rural New Hampshire Sabbath from a Continental one except geography? Horse-racing, liquor, legal gambling! The stern and rock-faced founders must be turning restlessly and fuming in their graves—if, possibly, they are not smiling. Because it has always been the transplanted New Englanders—the descendants of the restless, Westward-trekking individualists to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—who have, oddly enough, backed "moral" campaigns of all kinds, from emancipating the slaves to prohibition and anti-tobacco legislation; whereas the stay-at-homes of New England have become more and more tolerant, even "loose as ashes," to employ a Yankee expression.

Now the Rockingham trotting park—to be used in September for the "runners," or thoroughbreds, too, for the track has a firm subsoil, is scrupulously looked after, and can serve both trotters and runners almost equally well—this trotting park is situated just over the New Hampshire border, Lawrence to the south being the big town where the owners and trainers foregather (owners and trainers who may be, and often are, the actual drivers as well—something inconceivable with the thoroughbreds, where a jockey must be a freak or a specialist in undernourishment, as Ring Lardner once put it). They foregather, I hasten to explain, when they are not at the track itself, which is only about five miles out of town. Almost everybody has a car of some sort; for those few who haven't there is a bus line from Lawrence. Also a special race train from Boston pulls in just before two o'clock, every day of the meet, at the track itself; it leaves again a few minutes after the last race has been run. In spite of the competition of the "runners" at Narraganset in Rhode Island (special trains from Boston making this trip, too), where the "regular" meet was in progress at the same time as the trotting meet at Rockingham, fair-sized crowds came to see the trotters—on the "good" days as many as 15,000. Trotting enthusiasts, whether rich or poor, are loyal to their own sport, and at Rockingham any day I could have introduced you to a dozen people who had not seen a "flat," or "running" meet, for years and would have evinced very little desire to see one.

Nor did I choose the adjective "rich" lightly—even though by tradition and farmer custom to own a fast trotter is the privilege of a man in modest circumstances—for the Hanover Shoe Farm is famous for its stable, and the W. N. Reynolds stable of Winston-Salem, North Carolina (the same family which makes the cigarettes you would walk a mile to get, as the old advertisements used to say), has had its equine representatives on our trotting tracks for years; Dick Reynolds was the name of one of its colts this season, and a very good colt he proved himself to be, too. It is curious, this linking of certain forms of wealth or of manufacture with the possession of a trotting stable—curious, I say, for on the "regular" track anybody with enough money can have a stable. And I suppose one could have a trotting stable, too, if one had plenty of cash. But it doesn't in fact work out that way—in France, for instance, champagne growers traditionally keep up trotting stables (the Olry-Roederer stable has a representative in five out of six events at Vincennes very often); in our own country it is shoe manufacturers and tobacco merchants who keep up the big stables. Don't ask me why, either; I don't know. It is just another example of what Thorstein Veblen had the habit of calling "use and wont."

There is another aspect to trotting races about which it is easy to become sentimental (anybody who saw Will Rogers in the movie of "David Harum" will recall readily enough how in the "big" scene the horse was the hero), though I shall try to avoid that. The more easily, I think, by pointing out one or two facts too often forgotten, the principal one being, perhaps, the fact that trotters are "standard bred," not thoroughbred. (In France they call them, rather graphically, demi-sangs.) Now you can make out of this next generalization what you please, but certainly with horses, as I suspect with other animals, the more highly and carefully bred they are—the more aristocratic, so to speak—the more nervous, finicky, high-strung, and temperamental they also are. And they have the traits that go with their temperament: they are subject to disease, demand perfect diet and the purest water and careful exercise if they are not to become ill almost overnight; and they are not very affectionate, as we say of a dog. A thoroughbred is often hard to handle; trainers speak quite naturally of such-and-such a colt having a "mean" or "nasty" temper; and grooms are sometimes actually afraid of certain horses. But a standard-bred trotter has neither the physical conformation nor the high-strung temperament of a thoroughbred. He is certainly more intelligent, and he even shows definite signs of real affection toward his groom, his "handler," and his driver. Dogs will sometimes get into the stables, and the trotter will let them sleep or play peacefully—I once saw an ill-visaged little mut curled blissfully around the front left hoof of a trotter, who stood patiently in his stall without moving, so that he would not disturb or accidentally hurt his uninvited, but apparently not unwelcome, guest. The chances are that the ordinary thoroughbred would have "gone after" that mut the instant he became tired of, or bored with, his company. And always near the trotting stables I have seen cats walking in and out of the stalls without the slightest trace of fear of the horses —and had there been any occasion for fear you could bet ten to one that the cats would have been absent, for no cat in the world will run any unnecessary risk about anything.

On the gambling aspect of the meet, about $75,000 was the "handle" of the "Tote" each day—roughly, a $15 average for every bettor, of which there were, say, some 5,000, or one-third the number of people at the track. If you ask, "How many bet?" the answer is not easy, for with eight or nine races during the afternoon the same individual may make that number of bets. If a man wins, he is likely to go on betting, hoping to increase his winnings; if he loses, he will try to make up what he lost on his first plunges and at least leave the track even—though, of course, he may leave it "broke" instead. The State takes a small percentage of the total turnover as a tax, but nobody notices this or cares; and for the very good reason that if you win, you don't mind, and if you lose, your money is gone anyway and it is a matter of indifference to you whether it goes to another individual or to the State. I think the tax is 4 per cent (in France it is 11 per cent); multiply this by nine, the number of races, and it is easy to see that what goes into the betting booths on a single average race is the amount on which the State takes a neat profit of 36 per cent. I don't know what the older moralists would think of this partnership of the government in what they are pleased to call a "vice," but certainly at Rockingham everybody accepted it as quite natural and fair and honest. Satisfaction in the way the "Tote" worked was general, and despite the "wise birds," who solemnly told everybody that the "Tote" would ruin "long"—that is, outsiders'—prices, some winners returned their backers as much as $34 and $46 for every $2 invested. (I had only one of those "long" prices, I am sorry to say; I was always backing horses I thought would be outsiders, but which, after the betting was over, turned out usually to be even-money or odds-on favorites.) Occasionally, too, there were betting "freaks"—I mean, when a horse would pay more to "place" or come in second than to win, simply because everybody was backing him to win and not bothering to put any money on him to do less, that is, either to "place" or to "show." In "Tote" betting, in a word, prices are determined solely by the money put up—never by logic, or reason, or sentiment.

The human side of the picture, too, would probably horrify any early "founding father"—the whole mood was gay and festival-like. Every afternoon there was a band, which played whenever—and it was most of the time—the horses were not actually racing, and on the big days there were two bands. Women enthusiasts certainly matched the men in numbers as they did in gambling propensities, too. The bar served good lunches and beer, and only once did I see an intoxicated gentleman in the grandstand—outstanding by contrast, so to speak—though in the old prohibition days drinking was often quite heavy. Everybody seemed to have a good time, whether they won or lost or didn't bet at all but just watched the races. Before each event there would be a good crowd out at the paddock to see the trotters harnessed up and the riders get into their sulkies—riders who, as I have said, are the antithesis of the run-of-the-mill jockeys on a "regular" track. When a race was finished, the winner would parade before the judges' stand, and the loud speaker would bellow forth, "Introducing Mr. Harry Brusie and Una Direct, winner of the last race—give the old man a big hand, boys." If Mr. Brusie won the next race, he and his horse were introduced all over again—and got an even bigger hand. And of course it is part of tradition that you must applaud the winner, even though you lost your proverbial shirt on some other horse.

The men who "follow" these trotting races professionally—the grooms, the riders, the stable boys, and the rest—constitute a welcome and colorful group in our sometimes too drab civilization. They lead a nomadic life: Rockingham this week, Goshen next week, Cleveland next month; then Sturbridge, Massachusetts, and in the winter down at the training and breeding towns in Kentucky or Florida—though sometimes they "stable up North" during the winter. They live close to reality, to animals of flesh and blood that have to be cared for and watched over and trained, to the small town and the small community, to the farmer and the breeder. Modern industrialism passes them by almost completely—and they don't seem to miss it a bit. They are shrewd and kindly and quick-witted. They eat well; they live in the open air; and their only "occupational" disease is a possible accident in a race, when sulkies brush together and the driver is thrown out or dragged or even stepped on, though horses, even in a panicky mood, try to avoid this, as every steeplechase jockey knows. There are "scandals" and gossip, of course, within this little world, but it is not malicious and it has none of that terrible ingrown venom of the small town—the small town, I mean, from which you cannot escape. Like all men always on the move they are tolerant toward human weaknesses—they are always lending the camp follower a little money, always trying to "help so-and-so out" because he has had a bad break, always "looking the other way" when anybody indiscreetly brings up sexual gossip or tale-bearing. They don't criticize and they don't complain. They enjoy life; they like their horses and their racing; and when they become successful they don't put on any airs, even with the humblest stable lad.

It always makes me feel better and cleaner and a little prouder of my origins when I go up for a few days to the trotting races in New England. I learn all over again that there is nothing the matter with these people—they are sound and decent and intelligent. They will never "let us down," as the phrase has it, and in any national emergency we can count on them to be on the right side. But industrial New England is a far different story—a different story of immigrant blood and exploitation. At first, up in Lawrence this trip, I was shocked to see all the mills closed down. But I can't honestly say that I was wholly displeased. I wish the worst features of modern industrialism would die out in New England—forever. I should like to see it a small garden and country section of the nation; the kind of New England I see when I go to the trotting races, the kind of New England I dream of and now, in my middle age, want to go back to and live in.

Was Europe a Success?
III. Some Doubts Arrived At

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE answer to the question posed in the previous article—whether freedom and the unique individual ever existed—like the answer to most others, depends largely upon the way in which it is defined. Certainly freedom, for example, never existed in any absolute sense for any man whatsoever. But it is perfectly obvious that if freedom is unreal as such, freedoms, in the sense of liberties to do or refrain from doing certain specific things, are real enough, and it is obvious still further that these specific freedoms are the only ones of any real importance. Few people ever cared very much about freedom of the will in the theological or the metaphysical sense. That—as Schopenhauer said—we can do what we will but cannot will what we will will, never troubled anyone greatly. What we have set a value on is merely a certain field of possible activity within which we may do what we will without hindrance from some power outside ourselves. This field is small enough at best, and undoubtedly we are often compelled to narrow it on one side in order to enlarge it upon another. But one of the characteristics of the European man seems to have been a tendency to stress increasingly the importance of certain parts of this field—on the one hand that part which includes the specific liberty to express opinions, on the other that which includes the liberty to indulge daily and often apparently trivial habits. As a result of this, he is almost equally restive under regulations which forbid him to utter publicly his opinion on important topics and those which tell him what time he shall go to bed or, to take a slightly more important example, under what conditions he can travel or cross the borders of his native land.

Perhaps most collectivists know all this. Sometimes, at least, they are probably disingenuous in beclouding the issue with metaphysical arguments concerning the nature of freedom. What their opponents resist is not the destruction of freedom but the tendency to encroach upon just those specific freedoms to which they have been in the habit of attaching great importance and which, for the reason about to be mentioned, actually are important to the existence of that special creature now under discussion, European man. Ultimately, then, the question is neither a question of the metaphysical reality of freedom nor of the extent to which the freedoms actually exercised are either trivial or illusory. It is, on the contrary, a question of the large part played by the idea of freedom and the sensation of being free in the mental and emotional life of the European man, whom, indeed, we can hardly imagine without them. To give up both the very ideal of and the very aspiration toward these freedoms would inevitably be to evolve a new psychology and to make the experience of living a quite different thing.

It has been suggested by Mr. Gerald Heard in his interesting volume of speculation, "The Ascent of Humanity," that man's development takes place neither in an ever-rising curve nor in a mere circle, but in a kind of spiral which carries him upward while, at the same time, it repeatedly carries him back through stages similar to those through which he had formerly passed. According to this theory the fact that anthropologists have, during recent years, begun for the first time to understand something of the difference between the communal consciousness of the primitive man and the individual consciousness of the modern is actually a symptom of the fact that modern man himself is about to enter that portion of his spiral which corresponds to the redevelopment in a higher form of this communal consciousness which is, in primitive man, some sort of substitute for the European's vivid sense of his own individual existence. Many radicals appear to look forward to something of the sort, and it may very well be argued in the abstract that the development is desirable. But neither they nor Mr. Heard can deny that their newly emerging man would be essentially different from the old, and comprehensible to us only in the dim fashion that a primitive man is comprehensible. The beginning of his story would certainly be the end of ours. Thus the attempt to understand the meaning of what has been called freedom soon involves the attempt to understand also the meaning of individuality—of our peculiar sense of the uniqueness and value of the simple separate person.

On purely tactical grounds one might well question the wisdom of those champions of the proletariat who love to disparage the value set upon this sense. It is a notorious fact that society's concern for the lowly developed pari passu with the growth of the tendency to regard the individual as having value and possessing certain rights merely by virtue of the fact that he is an individual. It is commonly believed, at least, that slavery became impossible as a social institution because of it, and that the Roman, for example, saw nothing shocking in slavery because he had come to assert the value of the individual only in connection with the members of a class or those who demonstrated some particular virtue, instead, like us, of thinking of it as inhering in the simple condition of being a man. To discard this conception in a collectivized state might seem to remove the only protection against the tendency of that state to oppress great masses of individuals in its own interests, just as former states oppressed them in the interests of a capitalist state. Unless, in other words, some sense of the worth of the individual as such is retained, a soviet republic might often find nothing repulsive in the idea of sending thousands to die upon the battlefield or thousands more to endless toil in mines or factories if, by so doing, it seemed to be benefiting in some way the community as a whole.

Our first consideration is not, however, collectivist tactics but the meaning of the idea of the individual to the integrity of European man, and here again the situation is much the same as it was in regard to the idea of freedom. This man has tended increasingly to have his being in a world of thought and feeling largely conditioned by his belief in the importance and the reality, not only of the individual, but also of something which exists in endless, fascinating variety, and which he calls "personality." Perhaps, indeed, nothing else is quite so central to the character of his consciousness as his sense of the vivid separateness of the "I" and of the existence outside it of innumerable "you's," each different from him in important respects and each, like him, the center of a separate consciousness and a separate history. This "I" is his ultimate refuge and as such much more important, even, than his freedom, because even when he is deprived of the latter he still rules, or seems to rule, over his own separate consciousness. Stone walls do not a prison make. But if they do not it is only because this "I" has still either its freedom or the illusion of it.

Revolutionists are often exasperated by what seems to them the stubborn gullibility of those whom they would convert. Just as the pauper exhibits a ludicrous but maddening tendency to stand up for the sacred rights of property, so the wage slave who seems, in nearly every moment of his life, bound hand and foot by the economic necessities of his position is ready to kindle to the idea of freedom and, if need be, to go forth to die on the battlefield in defense of "his liberties." Perhaps the reason is that even he senses dimly the psychological importance of certain ideas to the kind of creature he is or would like to be; that even he feels obscurely that to give up hope of realizing them in some measure and of living with them in the fastnesses of his individual consciousness even if nowhere else, would make him cease to be a man as man is conceived of in that European civilization in which he has little more of a place than that which consists in being dimly aware that the civilization exists. In any event, this fear of losing everything by losing the only kind of conscious life he knows anything about most certainly has a good deal to do with the reluctance felt by many privileged intellectuals when invited to join revolutionary movements. Their stake in the complex called European civilization is more precious to them than their stake in any material wealth, and they are unwilling to jeopardize it.

Such an intellectual has, moreover, something else not quite identical with either freedom or individuality which he is loath to lose and which may perhaps best be suggested by saying that the whole intellectual atmosphere of revolutionary movements is saturated with its antithesis. It is, one may add, something upon which he came to set a very high value during his experience with the World War, when he saw it so generally flouted and destroyed. At that time he was told he must willingly sacrifice it—temporarily—in order that democracy might be preserved; now he is told that he must sacrifice it again—temporarily—in order that something better than democracy may be created. But he neither relished sacrificing it before nor, even if he surrendered it then, is he convinced that by so doing he helped accomplish anything worth accomplishing. This something is, of course, the privilege of making free intellectual judgments, of discriminating between the true and the false, the just and the unjust, or the right and the wrong, upon some basis other than a purely partisan one. It is, in other words, the right to the fair-mindedness or detachment which has been properly described as a luxury and which, undoubtedly, does become more and more difficult to maintain as any struggle approaches its climax.

Certain revolutionists, to be sure, appear to deny that it ever existed in any degree. To them all judgments—except, perhaps, those made by the collective mind of a triumphant proletariat speaking through the mouth of its dialectically appointed dictator—are the result of rationalized self-interest, and "detachment" is merely self-deception when it is not pure hypocrisy. Such arguments are, however, themselves obvious examples of the kind of principle which is invented to accomplish a purpose, since the arguments merely lead the way to the proclamation: "Whoever is not with us is against us." One may, moreover, answer them very much as one answered the argument against the reality of freedom—one may, that is to say, appeal either to personal experience or to history and, forgetting for the moment purely logical arguments, ask if there is not some kind of reality behind the difference between the intellectual habits of various persons; whether, to take a concrete example, the judgments passed upon Germany and its citizens by various writers during the war did not differ significantly according to the extent to which those who uttered them did or did not possess to a greater or less degree that quality which is conventionally described as fair-mindedness and detachment. Do not, to take other examples, individual radicals and individual conservatives differ among themselves in the degree to which they possess it; is there not some difference between an argument conducted as the present one is, and an oration against the menace of the reds as S. Stanwood Menken used to deliver it? If the differences exist, then they may conveniently be attributed to differences in the degree to which detachment and intellectual honesty are practiced, and there is no occasion to discuss metaphysically the nature of either of these qualities.

Liberalism usually defends the value which it sets upon detachment by assigning it a pragmatic value, by saying that, in the long run, even the partisan best serves his own cause by retaining the capacity to "see the other side." This may possibly be true, and it is not certain that the most intransigently "loyal" of present-day radicals are radicalism's most valuable champions. Yet the fact remains that detachment is, as Bernard Shaw once said, primarily a spectator's virtue and that the battle may sometimes go to those who find in bigotry the strength of ten. In any event, detachment is not being here defended as a tool having pragmatic value but as one of those civilized luxuries the pursuit of and indulgence in which constitute essential elements in that complex which we have been calling Europe. To threaten it, to ask that we abandon, temporarily or permanently, both the struggle to attain it and the very belief in its existence, is obviously to threaten once more something vital to the continued existence of the intellectual life of man as we have known him. Nor are we, for the moment at least, concerned with the contention that detachment, like other intellectual luxuries, is doomed already, and that the only choice we have left is the choice between blind partisanship on one side and blind partisanship on the other. We are concerned only with the fact that to abandon it, by choice or by necessity, would imply the abandonment of a whole complex way of living and thinking. A European man who had lost all belief in the reality of "freedom," in the importance of "personality," and in the possibility of "detachment" would simply have ceased to be a European man at all.

[Owing to exigencies of space, Mr. Krutch's third article has been divided into two parts. The concluding section will be published next week.]

A Strange Strike in Jugoslavia

By LOUIS ADAMIC

MY native Carniola or Slovenia, as I have had occasion to say in another place, is one of the loveliest parts—to me, the loveliest part—of Jugoslavia. The tiny, garden-like province is largely agricultural. Only here and there one finds a town with an important industrial enterprise. This almost invariably, like many industrial enterprises elsewhere in Jugoslavia, is directly or indirectly under the domination of foreign—notably French, English, Swiss, and Belgian—finance capital, supported and protected by the terroristic rule of King Alexander's dictatorial government in Belgrade; and such industrial centers, as one visits them, tend to spoil considerably the impression that Carniola is a paradise inhabited by a people, the Slovenians, who by and large are worthy of it.

Economically the richest and socially the most horrible place in Carniola unquestionably is the so-called Terbovlyé coal-mining region, which includes the towns of Terbovylé, Zagoryé, and Hrastnik. I visited it two years ago when I was in Jugoslavia, and found there conditions beside which the worst conditions in West Virginia and Alabama coal towns stand in favorable comparison. The seven or eight thousand miners and other workers and their families have lived in extreme poverty not merely for years but for decades. Even under the Austrian regime, when the capital invested in the mines was largely controlled from Vienna, the Terbovlyé proletariat was probably among the worst-exploited in the world. This exploitation was especially severe during the war.

Soon after Jugoslavia was created at the conclusion of the war, and the Slovenian people were liberated from the Hapsburgs, the rich Terbovlyé properties came into the hands of native Slovenian and other Jugoslav capitalist-racketeers and French money-imperialists, who, not long after the establishment of King Alexander's dictatorship in 1929, became the dominant element in the enterprise, as they did, along with English and Swiss money-imperialists, in many other industrial enterprises in Jugoslavia. This was brought about by a simple process: blocks of shares in the various companies were distributed among the ruling politicians and generals—I call them protection gangsters—in Belgrade.

The exploitation of workers in Terbovlyé which began under Austria was systematically continued under the new Jugoslav government. And consequently, in 1932, I found there thousands of people who were mere skeletons physically and full of all sorts of agonies mentally and spiritually. Since the beginning of the world-wide depression in 1930 the miners' wages, never high, had been reduced three or four times; I visited families of five and six who lived on less than the equivalent of a dollar a week, and I was told that there were hundreds of others in the same circumstances.

There was, of course, some degeneration of character and personality, and a good deal of disease, especially tuberculosis and various miners' occupational illnesses, and I saw children whose thinness gave the weird impression that they were transparent; but, amazingly, most of the workers, especially the young men, were intensely, fiercely, intelligently class-conscious, proletarian in the strictest, fullest Marxian sense of the word. Although practically starving, almost every one of them had books and pamphlets in his house. Ten or a dozen workers pooled their resources to subscribe to one of the mildly Marxian magazines allowed to be published in Lublyana, the capital of Carniola. Most of their unions and societies had been outlawed by the Belgrade government, but they maintained underground organizations. Gatherings were largely forbidden, but I heard that workers were meeting secretly in spite of the large detachments of gendarmes stationed in the towns. Their leaders were in prison; some of them had been tortured and killed by the sadists in Belgrade; but under the circumstances the workers needed no leaders. Strikes, which required open leadership, were not allowed; neither were demonstrations. All the miners and their families could do was to keep up their spirit—"and we can do that," one of them said to me, "without listening to speeches, for the resentment against these conditions you see here roars in our souls and in the souls of our women and children, and can never be quieted until we and the workers throughout the world succeed in bringing about a new social system." Now they could only wait and, off and on, secretly chalk up signs on the walls of public buildings: "Long live the Soviet Union!"

This, as I say, was the situation, roughly, in 1932. It was typical of several other industrial centers in Jugoslavia and, I am sure, of many more in Rumania, Bulgaria, Austria, Hungary, Slovakia, and Poland. It continued through 1933 and into 1934. In the last year and a half two more wage cuts were put into effect, although the mines were producing almost regularly and the company was paying dividends; for most of the coal used on Jugoslav railroads comes from Terbovlyé and a good deal of the Terbovlyé coal is also exported to Italy and other countries.

Then, on July 1 of this year, the Terbovlyé Coal Company, whose head offices are in Lublyana, announced another cut. A friend of mine who is a young Slovenian mine worker in Terbovlyé told me of what followed in a letter dated July 10. Here is the story in his words:

> The announcement almost stunned us all for a day. We had heard a rumor of a possible further reduction, but some of us thought the company wouldn't dare. Some of the families were actually starving, slowly but surely. There was much whispered, half-panicky talk, especially among the family men. . . . The second day everything was quiet. Those of the men who were employed went into the pits. At the end of their shifts they peacefully returned from the pits. Everything seemed normal.
>
> In the evening, suddenly, word got around: "Tomorrow everybody into the pits, employed and unemployed—everybody! Hunger strike! Don't talk about it! It is better we die of quick than of slow starvation!" Nobody knew where the order originated, but everybody agreed to obey it.
>
> Early on the morning of July 3 hundreds of miners who were not working at all and thousands of them on the regular morning and afternoon shifts went into the pits. The night shift didn't come out. The guards at the shaft entrances didn't realize what was going on till it was too late and around five thousand men were in the various pits—all on strike—hunger strike! "Don't touch a tool!" was the command, which, again, came none of us knew whence, but which we all obeyed. It was as though the command came from the agonized soul of all of us; we were both those who commanded and those who obeyed. "Don't touch a crumb of bread!"

It was awful and wonderful. We sat around, five, six, seven hundred meters below the surface of the earth: five thousand workers stretched in the endless holes we and our fathers had dug out. Women and children were practically alone above ground. Most of them knew that we were on a hunger strike. Signs had been nailed over the shaft entrance: "We, workers in these mines, decline all food until the latest wage reduction is rescinded. We prefer quick to slow starvation. Our families will not be much worse off without us." Over some of the shaft entrances black flags had been hung. These signs and flags were presently removed by the guards and the gendarmes.

We sat on piles of lumber, on damp rocks, in small groups, some in complete darkness. We talked very little. Most of us were fairly sure the company would rescind the reduction order, but who could tell? It was certain, however, that in case it was not rescinded, most of us, perhaps all of us, were ready and willing to die, and would die. The gendarmes could not forcibly remove us from the pits. There were too many of us. Five thousand. Besides, most of the gendarmes would be afraid to come down. The pits were our domain; we could hide. "If they don't rescind it, the world is going to hear of this." Such were some of the remarks.

In the afternoon some newspaper reporters came down. They obviously were on our side, even those on pro-regime journals. They asked us questions. We answered, "Better to starve to death quickly than slowly." One reporter asked a worker within my hearing, "Do you think this is the only way to fight?" The worker answered, "Fight? Whom can we fight? Where would we get in an open, regular strike if we struck alone? This is 1934. Would other workers strike with us? How could they? Their unions, like ours, have been made ineffectual. How can we agree among ourselves when to strike? Whom should we fight? The superintendents? They're only employees like ourselves. The directors in Lublyana? How can we get near them and what shall we do to them? The gendarmes? They have the guns and are but poor devils like ourselves. The King? How can we get to him? They say he has a bodyguard of 40,000 soldiers. The share-owners? They're scattered all over the world. . . . Fight? We are fighting by quietly sitting here in the pits, not touching a crumb of bread, not touching a tool, ready to die—and maybe we will die just as those men, our comrades, died in Vienna last winter, only not by bullets, unless they send soldiers down here to shoot us—but they probably won't."

Some of the men slept. A few prayed to themselves. There was less and less talk. It was a little cold below. A friend of mine scratched a sign on a board, "Long live the Soviet Union!" On another board he wrote, "Long live Dimitrov!"

On the morning of July 4 the reporters came down again. They were all very sympathetic. They told us that entire Slovenia, entire Jugoslavia, knew about what was going on in Terbovlyé and the people were generally sympathetic to us. In Lublyana nobody talked of anything but our hunger strike. The reporters thought the company would rescind the order for the cut. The government would force it, for the big people in Belgrade wanted the hunger strike to end at once. It was too dramatic. It might get into the papers in foreign countries. The government in Belgrade didn't want such publicity in the big world. It might frighten the foreign investors, make them uneasy, for the Belgrade government is supposed to have the social-political situation well in hand.

In the afternoon word came and rapidly spread through the pits that the company had rescinded the reduction order. We won, but most of us, as we came out, were too weak to feel triumphant, to celebrate. In another few days we might have begun to die. . . .

The letter concludes:

Otherwise everything is more or less the same in Jugoslavia as when you were here; economically, perhaps, a little worse. Peasants here and there are probably much worse off than a year ago. Even in Serbia there is acute discontent. Our underground literature reported that in the middle of June more than two thousand Serbian peasants invaded the King's ancestral estate in Topola and destroyed the gardens. The few gendarmes on duty there did not dare shoot. Have you heard of this in America? It is absolutely true. . . . There have been wholesale arrests lately in Montenegro. . . . You know, of course, about the student riots in Belgrade and Zagreb last May. . . . Bulgaria is said to be on the verge of a Communistic revolution. The question is: How long can the new regime keep it down? . . . Economic and social conditions are reported to be much worse in Austria than even in Jugoslavia. Industrial workers are said to be actually hunting for cats and dogs in the various cities. Do you hear of this in America? . . . We talk a lot about what is going on in Hitler's Reich. Weren't you delighted with Hitler's "blood purge"? . . . Mussolini's Italy is slipping economically and terror is reported to be increasing there, too. . . . There is, as always, much war talk. . . . Things are developing rapidly as we Marxists expect and want them to develop; still not rapidly enough. It is hard to be patient when there is poverty and agony all about you and you feel—every once in a while—as if you were in a trap, although the sun shines and the mountains are green and the river Sava quietly flows on.

In the Driftway

THE DRIFTER, as you may have suspected, is a person of irreproachable ancestry. Some of his forebears are alleged to have taken passage on that incredibly over-populated vessel, the Mayflower. Others fought, after a fashion, in the American Revolution. So that occasionally a kind of atavistic homing instinct leads the Drifter back to Boston. On one such occasion the Drifter, by a set of curious chances, found himself walking along Beacon Street between a brace of burly plain-clothes men—South Boston Irishmen—who insisted that he visit the local jail, the reason being the objection of the authorities to the Drifter's admiration and sympathy for a couple of unfortunate anarchists, one of whom reminded him strongly of Thoreau.

* * * * *

IT was years before the Drifter could bring himself to repeat the visit. But last week he found himself standing before the Old North Church and attempting, by an effort of the imagination, to recapture some sense of his origins, of his identity as an American; to reconstruct some idea of the conviction and purpose that had animated the founding of the American colonies. Lost in such meditations, the Drifter was for some time unaware that he was being addressed. But the drone of a small voice continued, and finally the persistent twitching of a small hand at his coat sleeve caused him to look down. A very dirty and very determined Italian urchin was reciting, with gestures:

> One, if by land, and two, if by sea
> And I on the opposite shore will be > Ready to ride and spread the alarm
> Through every Middlesex village and farm,
> For the country folk to be up and to arm.

Another urchin joined him and then three more. They recited in chorus. A fifth, who had memorized the patter from some Chamber of Commerce guidebook, set up a competing recitation, but was driven off with primitive childish violence. The Drifter emptied his pockets of pennies and departed in search of other shrines. Somewhere in the maze of narrow streets and alleys of the Italian quarter, buried beneath foul and lightless tenements, is the home of Paul Revere. The Drifter found it and again his meditations were interrupted. This time at least a score of ragged boys and girls collected in no time. They chanted, singly, and in an eerie, dissonant chorus. They refused to accept the Drifter's plea of pennilessness. In desperation he gave them a large bag of California grapes, a pocket knife, and two pencils.

* * * * *

WELL, the Drifter reflected, America has achieved a culture. Boston has slums almost as foul as those of Naples and child beggars almost as persistent. But that, surely, was not the Idea. Was it an Idea that settled Boston, or was it just an accident? Or was it, perhaps, an idea that centuries later turned out to be a Big Mistake? What would have happened if Paul Revere's horse had broken a leg? Would it have been better, worse, or much the same? The Drifter is not a serious person, but he has one serious worry about recounting the episode. It is that Boston, as a matter of civic pride, might feel obliged to Do Something About It, and that the something might be to set a policeman to chasing these children. That, he feels, would also not be the Idea.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Congress Against War and Fascism

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Cynically, methodically, the world drifts toward another war. Statesmen have abandoned their glib talk of disarmament and permanent peace, remembering the lessons of 1914. They are absorbed by the grim business of armament races, military alliances, and the other accoutrements of the years immediately preceding the last conflict. Any historical analysis should demonstrate that we are on the verge of catastrophe. Any realistic estimate of the world scene should draw the penetrating, if disconcerting parallel. Men and women, students and teachers, should be keenly aware that it is time they began to fight for their lives. Unfortunately, there is a tendency to fight only when the forces of death are arrayed in insuperable lines. The anti-war movement learned that in 1917. It is attempting to capitalize upon that experience today, to organize before war breaks out.

The Youth Section of the American League Against War and Fascism has called a nation-wide Congress to be held in Chicago on September 28, 29, and 30. It is, I feel, imperative that this congress should draw a genuine cross-section of America—from schools, factories, shops, and farms, from every area where the victims of the next war are today at work. It is natural that a militant organization such as the American League should be branded "red" by its enemies; that is the oldest weapon of finance and reaction. I am convinced that the American League offers a firm basis for a "united front" of resolute, effective action. I am convinced that the Communists in it are sincere, energetic, and fearless opponents of war. I am certain that they are ready and have already demonstrated their ability to work side by side with conservative elements—so long as these remain sincere and courageous.

To prevent war, to smash its ally—fascism—in its incipient stages, demands immediate, widespread action. It means mobilization along non-political lines. It is time that the young men and women of America took up the challenge to their lives. It is time they decided to make a serious fight for their own welfare. It is time they realized that they have to look out for themselves. The League of Nations won't look out for them.

New York, August 13 JAMES A. WECHSLER,
Editor Columbia Daily Spectator

Unionism at Stake

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Minneapolis truck drivers have been striking for over four weeks, during which period two workers have been murdered and fifty wounded. The Central Labor Union recognizes that in this strike, in which the workers face the united opposition of the employers and the forces of the State, the fate of all Minneapolis unionism is at stake. Financial help is badly needed. Send contributions to the Strike Committee of One Hundred, 225 South Third Street, Minneapolis.

Minneapolis, August 18 HERBERT SOLOW

Finance

"Lack of Confidence"

THE mounting hysteria of big business, euphemistically described by its spokesmen as a "lack of confidence," has reached proportions within the past few weeks that offer a suggestive commentary on the difficulty of imposing an effective check on profits as long as the sources of economic power remain intact. This hysteria has also emphasized again how thin is the line which separates the superficial conservatism of American business leaders from the tactics of outright fascism. "Lack of confidence" is generally ascribed to the fear of owners of capital for the continued sanctity of the profit margin. It is contended that increases in wage rates, taxes, and other costs have so imperiled the profitableness of business as to destroy the incentive for new investment and for the new undertakings essential to a real recovery in business activity.

At first glance, those who are untouched by the psychology of big business would have difficulty in finding evidence to corroborate these fears. For example, in a composite group of fifty-six representative corporations, the largest cross-section of American industry for which the necessary statistics are now complete, the reports for the first six months of the year show that, instead of a curtailed profit margin, the earnings of these concerns increased 175 per cent over the corresponding period of 1933 to a grand total of $128,000,000, while their volume of business increased only 53 per cent to $1,700,000,000. In a country which still numbers its unemployed at at least ten million such a showing not only would appear to be sufficiently consoling for the most nervous business man, but would seem an ironic commentary upon the success of the New Deal effort to expand mass purchasing power faster than prices and profits.

But any such interpretation of these facts is, of course, unacceptable to big business. Instead, it is pointed out that in the second quarter of this year, profits, as shown by the available complete reports, increased only 24 per cent over the same period in 1933, while the volume of business increased 50 per cent. Nor is the alarm with which such a trend is greeted modified by recognition of the fact that the comparable quarter of 1933 was affected by the inflationary business boom, and that profits were increased by the deflated scale of wages and other costs attained through the ruthless industrial retrenchment of the preceding three years.

However tenuous the justification for the fears of capital may appear, the existence of those fears is undeniable. There is no greater mental torture for the capitalist than to watch his volume of business increase at a faster rate than his profits. The reality of the "lack of confidence" has been reflected in the recent doldrums of the stock market. Its repercussions have been felt in Washington, where even Dr. Tugwell was recently impelled to deliver a lukewarm indorsement of the profit principle as the "reward" for "services and for investment of time, effort, and foresight." And Joseph P. Kennedy, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, more forthrightly assured his friends in Wall Street that "there is not the slightest thought of eliminating or restricting proper profits."

But these assurances have been offset in the minds of business men by President Roosevelt's refusal to lift restrictions against business and thus commit the political error of repudiating his professed allegiance to the common welfare as opposed to the interests of monopoly capitalism. In the absence of such a saving stroke, the alternative solutions suggested by business leaders cover a wide range. As an example of naivete, E. F. Hutton, head of a large Wall Street brokerage house and chairman of the General Foods Corporation, recently proposed that the "enthusiasm for business to proceed" be restored by the creation of a consulting board of business leaders which would be officially designated to advise the President and Congress on all legislation having a bearing on business, and which, in effect, would constitute a gigantic business lobby under official sanction. The opposite extreme of pragmatic action is illustrated by Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president of General Motors, who recently declared that the impaired "profit margin of industry" should not be accepted as a permanent condition but "should be looked upon as a challenge and an incentive to regain what has been lost, to establish even higher standards of operating efficiency." In other words, what meager gains workers have extracted from the aggregate of industrial revenues must be recouped by the speed-up, by the stretch-out, and by intensified displacement of labor through technological improvements.

The divergence of these panaceas gives no clear indication of the course which capital would follow if further concessions to labor should actually endanger its profits to an important degree. A clue may be found, however, in the excited reaction of capital to recent labor disturbances, particularly to the radical strikes in San Francisco and Minneapolis. The increased frequency of the old demand that the Communists be run out of the country can be attested to by all who have frequent contact with business representatives. And this tendency, together with the eager efforts of big-business spokesmen to couple communism with the regime in Washington, confirms the suspicion that the professed distaste of American capitalism for the methods of fascism arise from its confidence in its continued control of democratic politics rather than from an inviolable regard for constitutional liberties per se. Even so staid a Republican as Silas H. Strawn recently converted a radio address on constitutionalism into a plea to the American people to "awake to a realization of the danger of permitting the experimentalists in Washington to bring about socialism or communism in our country." But the premier performance in hysterical red-baiting and confusion of issues was reserved for Colonel Robert R. McCormick, editor of the Chicago Tribune. In a recent radio address under the sponsorship of the Crusaders, the Colonel charged the Roosevelt Brain Trust with an alliance with the Communist Party and called on "Crusaders and Legionnaires" for direct opposition to radicalism before the "torch of civilization" has been "finally extinguished."

PETER HELMOOP NOYES

R H
COMING SEPTEMBER 17
The Poetry of
AUDEN AND SPENDER
in beautiful RANDOM HOUSE editions.
Readers of this weekly are familiar with the work of these brilliant young Oxford poets...a sensation on two continents. Each volume is complete.
● POEMS OF STEPHEN SPENDER, $1.50
● POEMS OF W. H. AUDEN, $2.50
RANDOM HOUSE, 20 EAST 57th STREET, N. Y.

THE SPIRIT OF THE U.S.S.R. IS CONCENTRATED IN MOSCOW
NOVEMBER 7
Perhaps no one symbol of the U.S.S.R. is more forceful than the tremendous parade through Moscow's Red Square which marks each anniversary of the Soviet Union. It is an immense and inspiring review of achievements. Moscow and the U.S.S.R. at all times offer scenes of unusual vitality to men and women who must see for themselves . . . but Moscow on November 7 presents an intense concentration. You may visit Moscow and Leningrad for as little as $5 a day special class and $8 a day tourist class, meals, hotels, sightseeing and transportation on tour in the U.S.S.R. included. The Soviet Union is one country where the travel dollar is practically at par. Round trip steamship fares from New York to Leningrad are as low as $176. Consult your local travel agent or write for Folder NA-8, to
INTOURIST, INC.
U. S. Representatives of the Travel Co. of the U.S.S.R., 545 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Labor and Industry

California Casualty List

By LEW LEVENSON

A CASUALTY list in the grim class war in California must necessarily be as incomplete as if it were a record of dead and wounded in a major military campaign. Both sides conceal their true losses. The police record only such casualties as are inflicted upon themselves and their allies, the strike-breakers, vigilantes, private shock-troop squads. Many workers conceal their broken flesh and bones in fear. Literally thousands, including many noncombatants, have been gassed, had their skulls cracked, been trampled upon, and shot. Countless homes have been entered. Private property has been ruthlessly destroyed. The following list is limited, too, by the destruction of records during the general strike. Thus San Francisco casualties before July 1 can only be estimated.

The class-conscious workers of California are living in terror today. Except in Los Angeles their movement has been driven underground. They are listed, photographed, studied, harassed, and constantly attacked by their enemies. They have no protectors, no newspaper in which to appeal to public opinion. When they attempt to win better working conditions, they are met with special clubs four feet long, gas bombs, iron pipe, billies, and bullets.

In the Imperial Valley, during the strikes this year, police, private armies, and vigilantes committed every crime in the calendar upon their victims, who comprised the migratory workers and their allies, labor organizers, lawyers of the Civil Liberties Union and the International Labor Defense. Hundreds were arrested; gas, water, and fire were used to terrorize the unfortunates, some of whom were working for thirty-five cents a day. No one knows who the injured were in the Imperial Valley engagement. Stockades held prisoners of war; chain gangs were improvised to punish them; all roads were blockaded against either food or moral aid for the victims.

In Los Angeles the unbelievably sadistic Red Squad goes ahead merrily cracking skulls. It is aided by many squads of private shock troops, who use everything from whips to pick handles upon their victims. Concerts, lectures, plays, even a track meet for children have been broken up.

In northern California the red-hunt was hardly a hunt. It was a war. Minor skirmishes took place for weeks between small groups of strikers and strike-breakers. The city police entered the fray and shot innumerable workers in the back. Encouraged by statements of Governor Merriam, Mayor Rossi, Chief of Police Quinn, and minor mayors in the Bay cities, vigilantes under many names—"safety committees," Minute Men, White Guards, Silver Shirts, Ku Klux Klanners—roamed the highways at will, acting in much the same manner as their German prototypes, the Brown Shirts. The list here given does not include those arrested in the huge drive which netted 600 prisoners of war. Whether these latter were beaten and to what extent is not yet known. Many of them are still in jail, lacking bail, which was set at $1,000. Their leaders and their lawyers are hampered in every way by arrests, beatings, and the antagonism of courts.

Every name in this list is taken from a duly accredited report, usually that of the police blotter, hospital admission card, daily newspaper report, or direct statement of the victim, either personal, by affidavit, or from his accredited representative. The list is only a partial enumeration of those who received medical attention and of course includes the names of no policemen, strike-breakers, or shock troopers.

ALAMEDA

July 2. W. Dacey, 126 Maitland Avenue, beaten by mob, back injured.

BERKELEY

July 19. Mrs. B. F. Sandow, 1730 Francisco Street, cut by glass when brick, with anti-red warning attached, was hurled through window of home. Numerous minor injuries sustained by workers during raids on Comrades Hall, also known as Finnish Workers' Hall, 1819 Tenth Street and on Communist headquarters, 2600 San Pedro Avenue.

July 20. Philosophers Club in the First Congregational Church raided during lecture. Several injured. Furnishings damaged.

BRAWLEY

January 10, 11, 12. Meetings in Azteca Hall raided by police, deputies, American legionnaires, and vigilantes, with tear gas and clubs. Hall demolished, typewriters and furniture smashed, building flooded by Fire Department, 150 arrests, 350 injured. Prisons filled and stockades erected to hold those who could not be jailed. No individual list of casualties available.

July 30. Tony Solorzano, laborer, released from road camp for radical prisoners on Superstition Mountain on July 23, beaten by eight vigilantes, rendered unconscious, and thrown across bed where his three terrified children lay. In sworn affidavit declares he recognized W. F. Aycock, nephew of A. J. Jack, head of the growers' association, as leader of the vigilantes.

COMPTON

June 20. Mrs. Nellie Bongye, of Southgate, hit in the head during riot at schoolhouse when police attacked meeting with clubs.

DECOTO

July 8. Benny Santiago, Henry Rodriguez, Anthony Cunha, all of Hayward, arrested, beaten in jail, given ten-day sentences.

EL CENTRO

January 23. A. L. Wirin, Civil Liberties Union lawyer, kidnapped, beaten, robbed, clothes torn, automobile driven over embankment. Grover Jones, International Labor Defense lawyer, assaulted at courthouse. Many other unrecorded beatings of radicals.

HAYWARD

July 7. Elwood James, Communist candidate for supervisor, attacked by vigilantes. Laceration on head and shoulders. George Chase, 623 Poplar Avenue, attacked by vigilantes, hit on head with monkey wrench. Frank James, Cannery and Agricultural Workers' Union organizer, pulled from car by vigilantes and beaten.

July 15. Communist headquarters raided, furniture demolished, desks dragged into streets and set on fire. Several minor injuries. Scaffold erected in front of City Hall with legend, "Reds, Beware!"

LOS ANGELES

(Not including the waterfront)

Radical and vigilante raids in Los Angeles, including all surrounding cities except San Pedro, have been too numerous to mention. The police constantly break up radical meetings. Vigilante groups are well organized and carry clubs, whips, and so forth.

June 1. Riot at relief headquarters where six radicals attempted to present petition. They were attacked by police and aides. Arthur H. Milton, fractured skull, broken arm, broken left leg, internal injuries, still in hospital. James McShann, head beaten in street riot; at police station, arms twisted, testicles badly smashed. Earl Tennery, beaten. James Toth, beaten. W. T. Sessoms, beaten. Harold Hendricks, beaten. John Saunders, beaten. All of the above arrested for resisting officers, inciting to riot.

July 12. Police escorted strike-breakers to Mission Knit Hosiery Mills. When strikers picketed in front of gate, police attacked. John Sborski, strike chairman, 205 East Sixty-sixth Street, head cuts. Martin Hodsall, 318 West Thirty-eighth Street, beaten on head and shoulders, concussion of brain. Gus Kusiske, 245 West Eighty-second Street, slugged on head. Roy Couser, 215 West Forty-first Street, beaten. Francis Anderson, 5857 Grand Avenue, beaten.

MERCED

July 23. Gus Sartoris, beaten. Home raided by vigilantes, who had police arrest him for urging men to go out and organize unions.

MODESTO

July 18. Raid on street meeting by 150 Minute Men armed with clubs. No record of injuries, but many persons beaten.

July 22. Raid on radical headquarters by vigilantes. Every piece of furniture in place smashed. G. C. Nutter, beaten with club while asleep. A. R. Perry, beaten with club while asleep.

NILAND

Ernest Besig, attorney for Civil Liberties Union, attacked and beaten. General Glassford ordered warrants sworn out for assailants, who were well-known vigilantes.

OAKLAND

July 12. John Carolo, 1712 Fifth Street, beaten by police. Marion Kayser, of Oklahoma, basal fracture of skull. Douglas Duncan, striker, stabbed in abdomen by deputy. John Gofess, thirty-five, 660 Rhode Island Street, fractured skull, attacked by vigilantes; refused admission to emergency hospital, taken to distant hospital instead.

July 17. Raid on 645 Twenty-second Street. Two women, nine men arrested and beaten, names withheld. Furniture smashed. Raid at 1020 Broadway. Police smashed furniture and office equipment. No record of injuries. Seventeen arrests.

RICHMOND

July 17. Photograph studio of W. J. Prater entered by vigilantes, furniture and equipment smashed, Prater warned not to associate with radicals.

July 22. Series of vigilante raids. Mrs. Violet Orr, 440 Santa Fe Avenue, not at home, furniture smashed. Andrew Bartolovich, 2512 Main Street, home entered, beaten, later arrested. William Selles, 1734 Chancellor Avenue, raided, beaten, arrested. George Selles, his son, arrested. C. T. Moore, 1325 Twenty-fourth Street, home raided, partially wrecked, beaten. Accused of appearing at City Council meetings and demanding relief. E. H. Crooks, 303 Ohio Street, home raided, automobile overturned and fired.

July 23. W. E. Anglin, 2205 Spaulding Street, beaten, left in dying condition. Second raid on home of E. H. Crooks, 303 Ohio Street. J. O. Jones caught, beaten, and arrested.

SACRAMENTO

July 19. Vigilante raids resulted in the mistreatment, beating, and arrest of nineteen persons.

July 20. Joe Ferraria, of Oakland, died from injuries received in raid. Vigilantes moved "with the precision of the lynchers of Walter Hart's kidnappers" in raids on radical headquarters. Pat Chambers and Caroline Decker, union organizers in cannery and agricultural industries, jailed.

SAN DIEGO

May 14. Chester Williams, executive head of International Labor Defense, warned to leave town following address before the Hammer Club.

June 27. Lee Moore, John Fillette, Edwin Miller, arrested while driving in car, shots fired at them, then beaten.

July 2. Louis Simonov and Walter Hein arrested for showing revolutionary motion picture. Tear gas thrown at crowd which attended their hearing in court.

July 16. Ray Walters, organizer International Students' League, and Paul Shapiro, his assistant, arrested and clubbed in raid on meeting on lawn of East San Diego Library.

July 20. Cornelius Killeher, Frank Bosket, George Harpon, Frank Jackman fired at by police on Broadway. Shots missed but police arrested men, clubbing them.

July 25. Raid on Communist headquarters. Angus Dryesdale, librarian, beaten and arrested.

SAN FRANCISCO

Violence in San Francisco was constant from the beginning of the strike. No attempt is made here to give any complete list of casualties, the following being those reported by the police only from July 1 to the end of the strike:

July 2. Harry Zacchi, 174A Hanford Street, lacerated lip.

July 3. Eugene Dunbar, clubbed. Walter Kroft, clubbed. Frank Webb, strike leader, clubbed. Caesar Clementi, clubbed. John Peterssen, gassed and clubbed. Harold Odion, clubbed. Five unidentified strikers, scalp wounds. Argonne Riley, of Los Angeles, seaman, clubbed, skull fractured, died in Harbor Emergency Hospital. George Roberts, Seabord Hotel, broken nose. John Suggmich, 1316 Stockton Street, broken nose. Van Stanton, 130 Steuart Street, scalp lacerations. Peter Macrides, head injuries. George Carlson, 115 Steuart Street, lacerations of scalp. Sam Carl, lacerations of chest caused by stabbing. These were only a few of the many injured in this battle in which the police attacked pickets. Many others ran away in order to avoid further beatings at the hands of the police.

July 5. A general battle between police and strikers resulted in approximately 500 injured and three dead. The police reports are the only ones available. Howard Sperry, died from bullet wounds in back. George Coundourakis, died from bullet wounds in back. Richard Pisnach, shot in arm. Eydind Norman, longshoreman, shot in thigh. Leslie Haskell, machinist, Oakland, shot in arm. Ivan Peterson, 68 Burlinghame Street, trampled by mob. Albert Ludborg, both legs broken. Robert Chambers, baker, back injuries. Steve Hancock, clubbed, head wounds. Albert Simmons, fractured skull from clubbing. Joe Cammarato, head cut open by gas bomb. Steven Kirele, gassed. Nils Larsen, head wounds from clubbing. John Krice, shot in neck. John Williams, seaman, shot in left knee. Paul McDonahue, seaman, gassed. Joe Silva, seaman, deep scalp wounds. George Williams, seaman, lungs affected by gas, cut by glass. John Plikoss, lacerated scalp. Thomas Henderson, seaman, shot in arm. William Warren, seaman, shot in chest and arm. Ernest Hay, striker, shot in leg. Richard Pressack, shot in left arm. Al Anderson, shot in back and arm. Phillip Palmeros, seaman, clubbed on head. David Del Fosse, 69 Langdon Street, beaten by gang, skull fractured, died. George Colvin, shot in arm. James Engle, seaman, skull fractured by gas bomb. Gene Olsen, striker, shot in head and back. Edward Hodges, unemployed, shot in stomach and right hand. Jim Morales, stevedore, shot in back and abdomen. Nick Nocholas, striker, skull fractured by gas bomb. Clayton Minor, striker, shot, critically wounded, assailant released. Jerry Hart, 909 Guerrero Street, shot in leg. William Wilson Cook, 920 Montgomery Street, shot in hip. James O'Reilly, 755 Varemes Place, shot in back. Leslie Steinhardt, 582 Grove Street, shot in head. John Sullivan, shot in ankle. Joe Beovich, 343 California Avenue, shot in neck. Vassih Zahkaroff, 1377 Ellis Street, knocked unconscious by police. Steve Hamrock, 82 Market Street, head battered, arrested. Baccaro Beals, cook, head gashed by police.

July 8. Milton Weber, striker, 1200 Treat Avenue, cut when bricks were hurled into windows by vigilantes.

July 9. Cressel Cole, 2756 Vallejo Street, shot by guardsman. John Manacelli, striker, 359 Fred Street, routed out of bed by armed vigilantes, taken to Golden Gate park, beaten with clubs and brass knuckles, ribs broken, head bruised. John McGuire, 820 McAllister Street, home raided by vigilantes, kidnapped, taken to Thirty-third Avenue and Fulton Street, beaten, tossed out of machine, numerous bruises, cuts, etc.

July 16. Raid at hall, Eddy and Fillmore Streets. Many injured by police and vigilante clubs. Report says at least one man was known to have injured shoulder. No names on police report. James Detour, beaten. Emil Blix, beaten. Carl Kelstrun, beaten. Dick Sanchez, beaten. Robert George, 1278 Webber Street, beaten in front of Embarcadero. Harry Smith, newsboy, 735 Howard Street, beaten. Frank Erwin, 1160 Pine Street, beaten. George Mason, seaman, beaten, fractured skull. Alfred Jewell, beaten. Ernest Campbell, beaten. Edgar Meldowney, beaten. Frank Mitchell, beaten.

July 17. General vigilante raids on the Western Worker, Grove and Larkin Streets; Ex-Service Men's League, 765 Howard Street; Workers' School of Industrial Defense Branch, 1223 Fillmore Street; hall at 637 Linden Avenue; Mission Workers' Neighborhood House, 741 Palmero Street. Four hundred arrests made. No records of injuries received in raids, which extended to hotels, private dwellings, etc.

July 18. Raids of police, vigilantes, and National Guard continued. In raid on Marine Workers' Industrial Union and the International Seamen and Harbor Workers' Union, Howard Conway, seaman, Raymond Peters, seaman, and Ponciaro R. Yeban, seaman, were arrested on suspicion of criminal syndicalism, beaten, and released. In vigilante raid on Workers' School, twenty-five men seized and kidnapped Jack Bishop, caretaker.

July 19. Harry Jackson, organizer Marine Workers' Industrial Union, home raided, beaten, arrested on charge of vagrancy, although at home. Others caught in raid: James Wilson, district secretary, I. L. D.; Elaine Black, local secretary, I. L. D.; John Roger, sailor; Harry Provost. John Rohe, 37 Clay Street, beaten, severe lacerations of head and scalp. John Metseranda, beaten and arrested in raid on Communist hall, Sixteenth and Castro Streets.

July 20. Clinton L. Scott, student, 447 Eddy Street, beaten, lacerated scalp. Frank Salet, 391 Thirtieth Street, basal fracture of skull. Lyle Pedlar, beaten. Craig Joy, beaten. Louis Fonseca, contusions, chest injuries. Arthur Duart, bruises. Porfirio de Diaz, beaten. Charles Lyman, 32 Sacramento Street, beaten. Paul Timma, knife wounds. Allen Hicks, knife wounds.

San Jose

July 20. Vigilantes, acting with expedition, raided numerous homes in a search for John O'Rourke, Communist candidate for supervisor. O'Rourke was not found. Thirteen persons, including one woman, were kidnapped, beaten, and expelled from the city. For several days they were moved from county to county in a trek south toward Mexico. Confined in jails overnight, they finally stopped at Santa Barbara. All were injured. The more seriously abused were: Anton Meckler, teeth knocked out, choked, clothing torn, struck with fists and pickhandles. Fred Bovee, Spanish war veteran, beaten. Aaron Koteck, junk peddler, beaten. Sam Presco, Jr., dragged from home, beaten. Sam Presco, Sr., beaten. Jess Tanner, farm hand, beaten. Josephine Tanner, cannery worker, beaten. Others in party were beaten but have failed to give names publicly for fear of reprisal.

San Pedro

May 14. Los Angeles police, led by the Red Squad, aided by 600 special policemen and innumerable private strike-breaking guards, attempted to drive strikers away from the pier. Many casualties resulted. Dick Parker, 329 O'Farrell Street, shot through chest by guard, died instantly. His assailant was arrested, arraigned, and released. John Knudsen, no address, shot through heart, died immediately. Clifford S. Pugh, 264 Third Street, shot in right foot. Leo Weber, 1517 Island Avenue, shot in left leg. Ronald Pidgeon, 420 Sixth Avenue, shot in left leg. Robert Miller, 213 Seaside Ave., Terminal Island, head injuries. Jack Dempster, 5628½ Santa Monica Boulevard, Los Angeles, head and body injuries. A. F. Vello, 721½ East First Street, Los Angeles, head and body injuries. L. F. Foster, 2516 108th Street, Los Angeles, badly beaten. E. F. Morris, 1817B Bellevue Street, beaten. Orville Gilbert, 654 Tenth Street, beaten and bruised. Glenn Rex, 2401 East First Street, fractured skull.

May 22. R. Dyer, beaten. R. McElroy, beaten. Art Grogan, beaten. Joe Filari, beaten. Louis Sheffield, beaten. William Fraser, arrested by police in raid on United Seamen's Union hall, beaten in police station, then released. John Chapman, arrested for selling Daily Worker in front of hall, beaten, released.

June 1. A. Jolly, arrested by Red Squad for disturbing peace, taken for ride in police car, beaten, released.

June 9. Raid on United Front Committee for Seamen. Duncan McDougal, rib broken at point of spine. Arthur Jenkins, of Wilmington, arrested, beaten in police car, taken to police station in Wilmington, beaten, taken to San Pedro police station, beaten, kicked in face, released.

June 11. Raid on radical meeting. James Ryan, left arm broken, arrested. Harry Ashmore, 727 Sepulveda Street, beaten, arrested. Harold S. Hamilton, 208 West Fourth Street, beaten, club wounds on head and face, arrested. Charles Silvany, 407¼ South Beacon Street, beaten, arrested. Archie Crawford, 521½ Harbor Boulevard, beaten, was refused medical attention, arrested. Arthur Ayres, 101 Harbor Boulevard, beaten, arrested. Many others were injured in this raid but names are not available. In a subsequent battle the following were beaten and arrested: Hans Johannsen, 257 West Seventh Street. Charles Sanbul, 25626 Narbonne Avenue, Lomita. Henry J. Hunt, 25611 Narbonne Avenue, Lomita. Many others were injured in this battle but names are not available.

June 13. Melvin Doughty was waiting for a street car when four men in a car picked him up, saying they were going to the union hall. He was beaten. Later he was arrested on suspicion of kidnapping the four men. He is still in jail.

June 16. H. Lyons, arrested, beaten, given thirty-day sentence for battery. Dick Crawford, arrested for disturbing peace, beaten so badly he was sent to hospital.

June 19. Jess Shapiro, San Pedro, taken for ride by police, hit in face, taken to jail, beaten, struck on ear with club; later, five men entered room, slugged him, then he was taken to another room, beaten for ten minutes. His left ear is deaf from beating. No charge was made against him and he was released. Ray Dyer, picked up by police at Fifth and Beacon, hit in stomach with club in police car; later, at jail, hit in stomach with club and beaten about head. John Fraser, striking seaman, asked to become police stool pigeon, refused, beaten. Han Johannsen, asked to become stool pigeon, hands and back twisted, testicles squeezed, beaten about body. E. Kornberg, taken for ride, beaten by police. I. Wooden, arrested for distributing leaflets, beaten, released.

June 26. Rodrigo Ramos, arrested, beaten three times. J. Abbey, arrested for disturbing peace, beaten three times, released. George Green, kidnapped, beaten. Alec Bernard, arrested, beaten, released. J. Sheffield, arrested, beaten, released. John Lavelle, arrested, beaten, released. K. Augustina, arrested, beaten, released. William Brooks, arrested, beaten, released. Tony Tagomeri, arrested, beaten, released.

A miscellaneous group of strikers, arrested and beaten during the month of June, is as follows: R. McElroy, arrested on suspicion of unlawful assembly, beaten with club on toes. James Ryan, beaten, removed to hospital. K. Karlson, arrested and severely beaten. H. Darby, arrested, charge of concealing dangerous weapon, beaten, released. Joe Fraser, arrested, beaten, released. Lloyd Wheelander, arrested, knocked down, kicked in face. Manuel Flores, arrested, beaten, released. James Lacey, arrested, beaten, released. Lacey is correspondent for the Western Worker.

July 10. John D. Popovich, 710 Santa Cruz Avenue, arrested, beaten. Frank Connolly, 257 West Seventh Street, arrested, beaten. Mel Welander, arrested, beaten. James Ramy, arrested, beaten. Fred Czarnetsky, arrested, beaten. Conrad Johannsen, arrested, beaten. Herman Poslgin, arrested, beaten.

July 11. Frederick North, 779 West Twentieth Street, beaten. Arthur Jenkins, badly beaten.

July 16. Raid on street meeting. B. Donohue, beaten, arrested, released. John Pritchett, arrested, beaten, released. Raid on Union Hall, Benito Garcia, beaten, held in jail five days, released. Britt Webster, leg sprained in beating received in jail, held. J. Figueroa, ankle twisted in beating received in jail, held. Raymond Peters, arrested, beaten, released. Thomas Sharp, arrested, beaten in police car, knocked down in jail elevator, beaten on leg with club until his shin bone received compound fracture, subsequently beaten until shoulder bone was broken. In hospital for two weeks, released and sent to jail bull-pen with casts on shoulder and leg, still in jail. James Gallop, cuts on face and head. Approximately 500 arrests were made in San Pedro. In addition to above cases, many other people were manhandled. This list does not include beatings, too numerous to mention, administered by vigilantes.

Walnut Creek

Dewey Mosher, arrested on complaint of neighbors for preaching communism. Beaten, then given sixty-day sentence.

Watsonville

July 22. Six Communists, names not available, attacked by vigilantes, beaten, and driven out of the town.

PU[illegible] LIBRARY

JOHN T. FLYNN'S

Security Speculation

ITS ECONOMIC EFFECTS

By the author of INVESTMENT TRUSTS GONE WRONG and GOD'S GOLD: JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER AND HIS TIMES

This is the first comprehensive analysis made in this country of the mixed results which flow from security speculation to our whole economic society — to business, to industry, to banks, to workers, to credit, to money, and to the hundred million people in the country who never speculate.

Mr. Flynn examines the history of numerous stocks and bonds and the corporations which issue them; uses numerous facts recently brought to light that reveal the inner workings of the speculation system; concludes that speculation is a destructive force in our economic society; that, while a market for legitimate stock and bond issues must be maintained, the machinery of security speculation must be dismantled in the interest of a stable society.

Essentially a fundamental book, the volume also has an extraordinary timely interest, because Mr. Flynn, who aided the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, analyzes the results of the investigation and the Securities Act of 1934.

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue New York

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PART I.
THE MARKET PLACE

- Security Speculation — What Is It?
- Implements of Speculation
- How Speculation Is Carried On

PART II.
ECONOMIC FUNCTIONS OF SPECULATION

- The Capital Market
- Financing Corporations
  - Financing early railroads, financing industries—the steel industry, the automobile industry.
- Speculation and Enterprise
- The Debt-Making Machine
- Making a Market
- Manipulation
- Short Selling
- Specialist and Floor Traders
- The Evil of Margins

PART III.
REMEDIES

- Experiments in Regulation
- The Securities and Exchange Act of 1934

•

$3.00

Books

The Sage of Potato Hill

THERE are doubtless plenty of small-town Philistines undisturbed even today in their complacent provincialism, but they do not succeed in attracting the favorable attention of the very people to whom their ideas should be anathema. An exceptional phenomenon is E. W. Howe, of Potato Hill Farm, Atchison, Kansas, whose "Story of a Country Town" was praised by Howells in the eighties, and who owned and edited the Atchison Globe from 1877 to 1911, when he retired. Then his fame with the unorthodox intellectuals began, with the publication of E. W. Howe's Monthly, a four-page newspaper consisting of comments on all and sundry, written entirely by himself. H. L. Mencken was so fired with admiration for him that twenty years ago he presented me with a subscription to this sheet, and in 1919 he edited an anthology of Mr. Howe's philosophy under the title "Ventures in Common Sense."

In the light of the past five years some quotations which I shall make from Mr. Howe's works take on an added idiocy, but their fundamental falsity has been obvious to every thinking person since the beginning of the Industrial Revolution, at least. They have been chosen because they are characteristic and may be found repeated ad nauseam in the files of the Monthly, in "Success Easier than Failure," and in "The Blessing of Business." Since many of them and others like them are included in the semi-official anthology, "Ventures in Common Sense," they do not maliciously misrepresent him:

> Of living creatures, business men are nearest sane; their philosophy is as accurate as their multiplication table.
>
> All should have ideals they cannot quite reach; all should be a little high-minded, and accomplish some of the greater good; but it is business men who know these things may easily be made professional and mischievous.
>
> In thousands of years there has been no advance in public morals, in philosophy, in religion, or in politics, but the advance in business has been the greatest miracle the world has ever known.
>
> I believe the most useful man who has ever lived is John D. Rockefeller.
>
> The earnings of no statesman are as fairly gained as the 5 per cent of the packing houses or the railroads.
>
> The surest way to make money is to be industrious, polite, temperate, and honorable.
>
> There is exactly the same reason for believing in religion that there is for believing in socialism: both doctrines are appeals to big chiefs for favors.
>
> Most men who want to do good, want it done at the expense of others.
>
> The most useful men the world has ever known have been well-to-do, with very few exceptions.
>
> Many geniuses have been idlers and drunkards, and become famous over night, but no idler or drunkard ever succeeded in business.
>
> A writing man is something of a black sheep, like the village fiddler.
>
> There may have been a time when employers were overbearing, but they are not now; they have been punished so much.
>
> There is trickery in every human transaction.
>
> I know nothing in which the majority is habitually wrong.
>
> Every great thing in the world's history has resulted from men working for profit.
>
> Investigate the men in the bread line, and you will find this is the trouble: short hours of work and long hours of dissipation.

As one copies out these choice specimens of "common sense," one has the uneasy feeling that perhaps they are too common, in every sense of that adjective, to merit serious discussion. Yet the Sage of Potato Hill Farm has had—and for all I know may still have—the indorsement of many who would revolt at such piffle if uttered by a Congressman, a popular preacher, or a public-relations counsel.

When he is not denying the existence of almost every fine character in history by asserting that profiteering is the only motive for human action, when he is not sneering at altruism and idealism as forms of lying trickery, when he is not defying the palpable evidence of history by denying moral and intellectual progress, his statements take on a particularly ludicrous form of ignorant egomania. He will dismiss Goethe on the ground that he, E. W. Howe, never heard of him until lately and has not read him. This is a typical remark: "One of the noted men of the world is George Brandes. I only know he is noted; I have never read a line he has written." This is apparently an attempt to suggest that fame is a fleeting and relative matter. Samuel Johnson, however, appears to be more famous because, though Mr. Howe does not like him and has never read him, he remembers that Johnson was once invited for breakfast and stayed twenty years. Such is fame at Potato Hill Farm. "Did Shakespeare," he asks, "or Goethe, or Whitman, or Buddha, or Tolstoy, or Confucius, or Rousseau ever teach you as important lessons as you learned from your parents, from your worthy and intelligent neighbors, from the leading men of practical affairs in your own country and age? They did not, and you know it."

Whether E. W. Howe is a Republican or a Democrat, I cannot remember, but his hatred of professors reads today as if it had been written by any one of our anti-Brain Trust fanatics. "It is proper for the professors to tell the facts they encounter in their studies, but they should permit the people to draw their own conclusions." In a word, the capacity for interpreting facts does not require any education, and professors have no right to hold opinions. "Anything too big for the people to understand doesn't make any difference. I do not understand Greek; very well, I have no use for it." That pretty well disposes of the whole of classical literature and all science!

When Anatole France said that the law in its impartiality condemned the rich man and the poor man alike if they were found sleeping underneath a bridge, he expressed with humorous truth what E. W. Howe says with misleading humorlessness when he writes: "There is not now, and has never been among us, a general disposition to impose on the poor; there are no laws in the United States discriminating against them." The measure of a fine mind and a mediocre one lies in the contrast between these two statements of the same fact. One of the quotations above, with its reference to being "a little high-minded"—only a little, mind you!—gives the clue to the entire personality of E. W. Howe. What one of those languages he has no use for called "the golden mean" becomes in his mind a mean of more sordid metal. Never do anything heterodox, conform to every convention, always get the best of a bargain, and indulge only in the safest and sanest gestures of idealism, those that pay and make a good impression, without too much risk. Suspect everyone who is disinterested, and sneer at every achievement of man inspired by any other than the profit motive.

It would seem, on reflection, that we have met E. W. Howe before, in line rather than in print. He is Caspar Milquetoast, propped up by a country newspaper until he has acquired in print the courage of a mouton enragé.

Ernest Boyd

Class War and Violence

Dynamite: The Story of Class Violence in America. By Louis Adamic. The Viking Press. Revised Edition. $2.

THE American class war has always been and still is more violent than that of any other industrial country—excluding revolutionary struggles. In addition to the violence of the state, employers have used and still use private police and gangsters of their own to crush the workers. Wholly in the American tradition is the fact that during the first seven months of 1934 the class war resulted in the killing of 26 strikers and the injury of more than 700 other strikers.

Louis Adamic's study of class violence throws considerable light upon the subject. Much of it represents patient original research; many crannies in the history of the labor movement are illuminated. Particularly well done is the story of the McNamaras, one of whom is still in prison. All the major episodes of violence are covered. The causes are sketched, although not fully analyzed: the American tradition of violence, the brutality of the employers, the weakness of unions in their struggle against massed capital. Yet the picture as a whole is distorted.

Many aspects of the labor movement are more significant than its resort to violence. True enough, as Adamic says, his book is not a history of the labor movement; but the more important aspects should have been woven at least into the background, in order to indicate clearly the relative significance of violence.

The resort of labor to violence, moreover, is exaggerated. (Most of the violence was used by the employers and the state, but this is not sufficiently emphasized and there is no full story of the employers' technique of violence.) According to Adamic: "Dynamite—'the real stuff'—became a definite part of the policy and tactics of the American labor movement, including, indeed especially, the A. F. of L." Again and again he uses the phrase "Dynamite . . . that's the stuff." But as a matter of fact dynamite was little used by workers. The anarchists of the 1880's talked hysterically about dynamite but did not use it; the Haymarket bomb was an act of provocation. Some unions, notably the metal miners and the building trades, used dynamite, but they were in the minority. Dynamite was not used by most of the A. F. of L. unions, nor by the railroad brotherhoods, nor by the I. W. W., despite its philosophy of violence: the greatest I. W. W. strike, the Lawrence strike of 1912, was a marvel of peaceful struggle and solidarity.

Still more important, Adamic makes no evaluation of violence. A militant labor movement neither accepts nor rejects violence "in principle." It may reject dynamiting but use other forms of violence—precisely as the Russian Bolsheviks rejected assassination but used mass violence to wage the revolutionary struggle. There is violence and violence; and, in addition, varying conditions and objectives. Yet Adamic lumps all violence together—dynamiting, resistance to attacks by police and soldiers, coercion of scabs, the violence of labor racketeering. By this process the militant mass action of the workers in the great strikes of 1877—which Adamic styles the "great riots"—becomes indistinguishable from the violence of gangsters in "labor wars." Thus the working class is deprived of some of its finest traditions.

This confusion reaches its climax in the discussion of racketeering. With the organization of the A. F. of L. in the 1880's, according to Adamic, "the labor movement became a racket." This is obviously false. Racketeering in the labor unions arose after the World War; it must be fought, but it is limited to a small minority of unions. The A. F. of L. was conservative, it limited itself to promoting the craft interests of its members, often at the expense of other workers, its leaders were aptly characterized as labor lieutenants of the capitalist class; but to designate it as a racket is to distort its character and significance. Yet Adamic goes farther, as appears from the following:

> In the Molly Maguires we have the first beginnings of "racketeering" in America, especially labor racketeering. . . . The Haymarket bomb is the Adam of the "pineapples" that go off nowadays . . . in the cause of all sorts of rackets, as well as the cause of organized labor. . . . Gangsterism was a vital early factor in the American class struggle, first on the capitalist side, and then on the side of labor; and its history is inextricably bound up with the history of organized labor.

This is bad history and worse sociology.

What purpose does it serve, moreover? It may sound terribly revolutionary, but it is not. It does not help in the struggle against the conservatism of the unions and the corruption and betrayals of their leaders.

"Dynamite," first published in 1931, reflected to a large degree the pre-1929 cynical and muckraking attitude toward a labor movement in decline. Adamic has changed considerably since then, with the result that he has made a few, but not enough, revisions. His new attitude appears most clearly in the new chapter at the end dealing with developments during the depression; it is positive, radical, suggestive. The whole tone of the chapter clashes with the tone of the earlier chapters—an indication of the extent to which Adamic has changed. But the fundamental defects of approach and analysis remain.

Lewis Corey

Signature of Spring

American Song: A Book of Poems. By Paul Engle. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.75.

THIS young poet, taking a good deal from Whitman, something from the platonic Shelley, a bit from Rupert Brooke, sets out to contradict the whole Waste Land school of poetic thought and to reaffirm the values of the heart. His is the poetry of sheer physical exuberance couched almost entirely in literary language. Whether or not he has felt the identification with nature which he expresses, he tends always to state this identification, not in images springing from personal experience, but in images reminiscent of other poets. His is the bravery of youth, of the strong body. True American men have always been brave, he argues, and thereupon turns to pioneer history for confirmation. Without any real examination into the causes of the defeat so often stated by the Waste Land school of writers, he dubs them all cowards. Apparently this young poet has been carefully protected from economic and social problems. He remains the vaunting individualist sure that men may claim their place in the sun, asserting the biological desire for life.

All this is very well. But the fact remains that we are not, in America, any longer pioneers. Man cannot very easily move westward and rule his own domain. The heart as the instrument of experience, the expression of purely personal emotion, is not enough for modern poetry. Paul Engle has not gone, in thought or in poetic imagination, one step beyond the romantics. Whitman's America is not the America of today. And Whitman presented the same series of ideas much more logically than does the young modern. Whitman's prophetic vision had, at least, some roots in reality. Paul Engle's command that America return to its adolescent faith in individual bravery and conquest is just a little absurd. What good will rehearsing the history of our forefathers do us now? How can we become so pure in heart, so uncritical, as to see the life-force flowering freely if only people will deny the mind and believe in adolescent delight?

But a poet may say what he pleases if he says it well. Paul Engle, however, has much to learn in technique. His blank verse is often very blank. Many of his lyrics are completely undistinguished by beauty of phrase or image. There is altogether too much of him. He is wordy, literary in the use of adjectives. He has not learned restraint, the use of the right word and only the right word, the perfect simplicity which might very correctly express his ideas. He steals phrases and rhythms even from the very Waste Land poets he attacks, especially from MacLeish. He has, of course, a certain power. He is completely free of the disease which affected all the minor Waste Landers, the desire to be precious, cerebral in use of image, complex and intellectual in thought. He writes with abandon and exultation. Moreover, it is always a good sign when a young poet needs paring down. So many of them lack something to say, lack words with which to say anything at all. Paul Engle has a thesis, whether it be true or not. He has such a flow of language as comes from much remembered reading plus a good deal of young experience—travel, spontaneous awareness. If he is not overpraised, if he learns his art and its instruments, if he grows intellectually as well as emotionally, he may come through as a good poet. This particular volume is an efflorescence of romantic delight in living, very young, very uncritical, not very distinguished.

EDA LOU WALTON

Mr. Priestley Discovers England

English Journey. By J. B. Priestley. Harper and Brothers. $3.

MR. PRIESTLEY'S novels are pale imitations of Dickens, filled with a Dickensian sentimentality but lacking the zest for the absurdities of human nature and the indignation against the cruelties of English civilization which made Dickens a great novelist. "English Journey" begins in the same vein. During his explorations of southern England Mr. Priestley meets characters whom he considers to be odd and whom he describes at inordinate length, and he travels from town to town in a condition of bovine good humor. The last two-thirds of the book are more interesting. Mr. Priestley goes north and visits in turn the woolen mills of Yorkshire, the potteries, and the areas dedicated to the three shattered industries of cotton, coal, and shipbuilding. Not even Mr. Priestley's good humor is proof against the blatant ugliness of the industrial towns and the misery of their inhabitants. He drops his pose of whimsicality; he is honestly, and naively, surprised and appalled by the discovery that he lives in a country which, after allowing its working classes to grow up in surroundings not fit for human habitation and after becoming rich and powerful as a result of their labor, is now wasting their lives and breaking their spirits with the stinginess and humiliation of the dole. He denounces the whole system with a vigor, a sincerity, and an eloquence which make this book far superior to anything which he has ever written before.

When his emotions are aroused, Mr. Priestley is a superb reporter. Even when he describes the details of a complicated industrial process, he can still hold the interest of his reader. "English Journey" should be a useful irritant to the English conscience, particularly to that of the complacent and comfortable professional classes which enjoy Mr. Priestley's novels. It will remind Londoners, who govern, and think for, the whole nation, that the prosperity which they see under their noses is merely a local phenomenon. Yet unless this book results in a little serious mental exertion, it is likely to do more harm than good. Mr. Priestley professes himself to be incapable of understanding economics. He is content merely to record what he sees; he does not attempt to discover what are the underlying causes of that condition or how it may be remedied. He realizes that there are symptoms of disease and he wants to destroy them, but he has no conception of how to set about a scientific diagnosis. Unfortunately, to arouse a mood of incoherent indignation is only too liable to play into the hands of any quack who promises a safe and speedy cure—in this instance, of Sir Oswald Mosley. More necessary even than indignation is a radical and ruthless investigation of the causes for England's economic plight. Unless they abandon their belief in the efficacy of "muddling through" and learn to use their own intelligences instead of relying on those of their distant ancestors, Mr. Priestley's fellow-countrymen must expect either a steady decline to poverty and impotence or catastrophic destruction in another world war.

H. B. PARKES

Small Town

The Second House from the Corner. By Max Miller. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

"HE came around while my house was being built. He is ninety-three, and he was my first visitor. He walks where he goes, and he is always going. He lives about four miles from here in a converted chicken-house."

Even the careless reader might be caught by these first sentences in Max Miller's new book, "The Second House from the Corner," even if by no more than the fact that he has been reading an almost uninterrupted succession of one-syllable words. If he notices that, he is likely to notice something else—that the simple words have made a picture as single blocks build a house, and that in some queer way his imagination is stimulated, his curiosity aroused, by something seemingly as artless as breath itself. I am inclined to think that Max Miller's writing is artless writing—really natural writing, the free-flowing expression in pictorial words of objects or people or events that have left their impression. Which means that it is at once a gift and a danger. The gift is that it flows free as a river; the danger is that it may become lost in the sea; has not, like the sea, its boundary and frame.

In this new autobiographical book the author builds his first house and becomes a small-town citizen and married man. The very old man who is his first visitor has built five, seen them go, and is living now in his last one—a chicken-house. The sketch—like all the sketches here—is of the slightest and homeliest, yet it takes in the fullest span of human life. "At the far end of the street he waved his cane. . . . The gesture either was one of goodby or one of greeting. But I rather believe the gesture was one of greeting, a fraternity gesture, signifying that I by now was on the same road with him."

From this beginning the other sketches—there are thirty-four of them and most of them of the briefest—depict the various small aspects of small-town life: the town gossip, the mailman, the church janitor, the distinguished visiting tourist, the summer people, the Woman Who Knows, the night the town saved the boat, Mrs. Anderson's dinner, the hospital. And every now and then there drops into this book, under the light guise of sketches, small patches of selected dialogue before which we open our eyes, since, generally speaking, the dialogue in American fiction is a national disgrace. This book, to be sure, is not fiction, but neither is it literal autobiography; and the author's sense of selection in some of his dialogue argues better, to my mind, for his future than his facile ease in sketching the trivial and giving a certain universal significance to it.

EDNA KENTON

China's "Renaissance"

The Chinese Renaissance. By Hu Shih. University of Chicago Press. $1.50.

THE students of the University of Chicago who listened to Dr. Hu Shih deliver the six lectures embodied in this small volume were most woefully cheated. For not even one-tenth of the facts connected with the struggle of the Chinese people for a new life are here related. The lectures reveal nothing but aspects of value and of interest to Dr. Hu and the small class of which he is part.

The first lecture on Types of Cultural Response is filled with nothing but words and more words. These are at times interesting, at other times they shield facts. For instance, Dr. Hu, apologist for capitalism in China, never once mentions the capitalism or imperialism that has subjected China; he refers only to the "new Western civilization" which he considers so desirable. He speaks of the masses as "the ignorant populace," and tells us that "the masses follow the upper classes just as the grass bows to the wind." Dr. Hu is badly out of date if he does not know of the masses who fought through the Russian Revolution, who are fighting in the Chinese revolutionary movement today, or the mass struggle throughout the world. In fact, he does not even mention the existence of the Chinese Soviet Republic, where the Chinese masses have created a new, progressive culture and are defending it with their lives.

There is one lecture on the history of religion in China—a subject of no interest to anyone interested in the new life of China. Dr. Hu is merely rehashing one of his older books and making an impression on unknowing Americans. One chapter tells of new developments, such as the break-up of Chinese families and the new divorce laws of the Nanking Government. We learn that Chinese women may own and control their own property. But for the millions of toiling Chinese people divorce is not the most important problem; and the number of women who own more than the rag on their backs is confined to the small class from which Dr. Hu comes.

If one were to believe this book, it would seem that China today is in the midst of a most glowing renaissance. The facts are just the opposite. Under the reactionary Nanking Government all that is new and progressive and creative in China has been crushed or driven underground. Hundreds of schools and colleges have been closed and the money used for new wars or to build up the private bank accounts of the Nanking officials. All new theaters, the new literature and art have been smashed and their creators imprisoned, tortured and killed, or forced into hiding. Dr. Hu gives us not one breath of these facts. He speaks of his "friend, Professor Chen Tu-hsiu," one of the 1918-20 leaders (with Dr. Hu) of the intellectual awakening. He speaks also of Dr. Yang Chien, organizer of the National Research Council of China, as a renaissance leader, but he carefully avoids mentioning that Professor Chen has been sentenced to eleven years' imprisonment in Nanking, and that Dr. Yang was murdered in Shanghai on June 18, 1933, by the Kuomintang because he fought the fearful reaction in China.

In China Dr. Hu does not enjoy the same reputation as in America. He is associated with some of the most reactionary leaders of the country, including Dr. V. K. Ting, former Mayor of Shanghai under the old militarist Sun Chuan-fang. He was adviser to General Chang Hsueh-liang, militarist dictator, drug addict, despoiler of girls in Peking, and traitor to China. He can walk freely in and out of the prisons of Nanking, visiting his friends. Perhaps his friends, like Thoreau, ask him: "You ask me why I am in jail. I ask you why you are not."

AGNES SMEDLEY

Shorter Notices

Sweet Land. By Lewis Gannett. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

Amiably, casually, the feel of American country, American talk and food and habit, slips into Lewis Gannett's brief record of an automobile trip: New York, Niagara, Chicago (World's Fair), and west to California and the Navajo country. It is an unpretentious book, useful as a guide, pleasant reading as a travel record, more like a friend talking about his trip—what clothes he wore, what the food was like, the queer or charming people he ran into, and the things that annoyed him—than like anything intended for print between formal covers. Gannett talks with affection of the kind of homely discoveries that can be made by people in an automobile in not too much of a hurry, and not determined to stick to the smoothest, fastest main roads. It is to him an exploring trip, romantic especially in the West, among the things and peoples of ancient America. Gannett is a good reporter, and he sees and tells more than most of the many thousands riding American roads might; so it is a pity that he puts down only a few running notes, but in a way that makes you think you'd like to take that trip yourself sometime. The book ends as most vacation discovery trips do—"Didn't see enough, want to go back and stay longer." And there is enough in "Sweet Land" to make a second and longer trip, and a second and much fuller book, worth Gannett's doing.

Labor Fact Book II. Prepared by the Labor Research Association. International Publishers. $2.

Like its predecessor, this is a handbook intended to be of service to the Communist expounder, propagandist, and organizer. As the authors explain, it "attempts to provide a ready arsenal of facts for use in the current struggles." In terms of this objective—persuasion rather than illumination—the authors succeed. They bring together a mass of carefully culled statistics and historical materials, all woven into the orthodox fabric of Third International concepts. The reader already converted to the Communist Weltanschauung will thus discover ready-made and skilfully contrived proofs of his favorite theorems. The disinterested reader, however, will be perplexed by logical doubts: what is a fact? He will be asked to take as "facts" quantitative data selected from chaste official sources: Federal Reserve Board, Department of Commerce, Bureau of Labor Statistics. He will also be constrained to regard as "facts" assurances that the New Deal is a snare and a delusion, which deliberately lowers the workers' living standards and prepares the way for fascism and imperialist war. Finally, the Marxian diagnosis of capitalism's organic diseases—the ripening of in-

☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐ RESORTS ☐

CAMP MILFORD
KENT . CONN.
"MICKEY" MICHAELS DIR.

A Modern Adult Camp in the heart of the Connecticut Hills; on beautiful lake. Every outdoor activity. Splendid entertainment. Congenial fellow guests. Delicious meals.

LABOR DAY WEEK END
3 FULL DAYS $17.50
Camp will remain open until Sept. 12th
Special for Jewish Holidays
4 Day Week End $15—Daily Rate $4
Special Railroad Rates N.Y., N.H. & H.
Write for Illustrated Booklet and Rates
1440 BROADWAY, N.Y.C.
PEnnsylvania 6-7842

Intimate, colorful, alive! The most complete adult camp in the Adirondacks. Chamber music by the Compinsky Trio and the Perole String Quartet. Dance Recitals by Pauline Koner and a complete summer stock and try-out theatre in the best Westport tradition. Private golf course, lake and tennis courts.

Booklet on request
GREEN MANSIONS
157 WEST 57th STREET
CO. 5-6346
Lena Barish : Sam Garlen
Directors

GREEN MANSIONS
WARRENSBURG N·Y·

UNCAS LODGE
UNCASVILLE, CONN.
8th SUCCESSFUL SEASON

A charming, unpretentious, modern adult camp and 165-acre old New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes.
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts.
- Saddle Horses and Golf nearby.
- Unexcelled Cuisine.
- Socials, Theatricals, Camaraderie.

"Send for Booklet"

AUGUST RATE $25 for 1 week
$48 for 2 weeks
Rate per day, $4.00
Management—Diana and Abe Berman
Camp Phone: Norwich 1858 Ring 5
New York Phone: NEvins 8-2384—Evenings
DELIGHTFULLY DIFFERENT

Other Resort Advertising will be found on page iii

AUGUST — A GREAT MONTH OF PROGRAMS AT
UNITY HOUSE
FOREST PARK, PENNSYLVANIA
J. HALPERN, Manager M. S. NOVIK, Associate Manager
N. Y. Office: 3 West 16th Street. CHelsea 3-2148

The finest talent we have ever offered for your entertainment:
COMPINSKY TRIO, PHILHARMONIC QUARTET, TOSCHA SEIDEL, ALLA NAZIMOVA, MOLLY PICON, SIGMUND SPAETH, ISA KREMER, HALL JOHNSON CHOIR.
Do not miss weekly dramatic presentation by
THE PINE GROVE PLAYERS
Many new facilities this year for sport and play. $25.50 per week—August. Reducton to Union members. Owned by I.L.G.W.U. on non-profit basis.

Forest and Stream Club
An Ideal Adult Camp
IN THE GREEN MOUNTAINS,
WILMINGTON, VT.
Four and one-half hours from Grand Central
Sporty 9 hole golf course right on premises.
Complete social and athletic activities.
SEASON RATES $27.50 PER WEEK & UP
Twelve years of highly satisfactory service
55 W. 42nd STREET, N. Y. C. LAckawanna 4-9247

TIMBERLAND
A Modern Camp for Adults
Booklet on Request
33 W. 42nd St.
Penn. 6-7663

The Rare Charm Of An Intimate Congenial Group
August Rate $29.50
Superior Cuisine
Round Trip Fare $8.50 by De Luxe Packards

TIMBERLAND In The Adirondacks
Pottersville, N. Y., Warren County
Esther R. Kessler — Israel H. Kessler

SCAROON MANOR
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
9 Tennis Courts
6 Handball Courts
High Holiday Services
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES
Open till October First
Special
Low September Rates
Golf Free After Labor Day
ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
JOS. FRIEBERG MAN. DIR.

15th Season
WESTERN VIEW FARM
An Inn unique in its hospitality
On a mountain top only 2½ hours from New York. Rates: $8.00 a day by the day; $7.00 a day by the week; $6.00 a day by the month; $5.50 a day by the season.
Service a la mode Continentale
Address: Edward G. Ohmer, New Milford, Conn.—Telephone, New Milford 440.
From all over the world comes this Farm's clientele

MOON HILL on SCHROON LAKE ADIRONDACKS
OPEN FOR THE HIGH HOLY DAYS
HOTEL COMFORTS
COUNTRY CLUB ATMOSPHERE
Golf, Tennis, Riding, Swimming, Etc. Complete Social Staff. Famous Cuisine. Dietary laws. Families accommodated.
Write for Booklet "N."
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 11 W. 42 PEnn. 6-1720

● AUGUST ATTRACTIONS ●
Unexcelled tennis courts. Swimming and water sports. Handball, horses and other diversions. Chamber music Trio. Dancing, lectures, entertainment. Prize Tournaments. Aug. 24-26. Outdoor movies. Bungalow Contest.
LABOR DAY WEEK-END $17.50 • ENTIRE WEEK $27.50
Week-end round trip fares to Harmon, Grand Central—$1.50; 125th St.—$1.30. Taxi meets all trains at Harmon station.
BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE
Peekskill, N. Y.
Phone Peek. 1403

BREEZEMONT
A manor of unusual charm set on a huge estate in the Westchester hills—private swimming lake—tennis—all sports. An ideal summer residence for people of good taste. One hour to your office.

Excellent cuisine. Breezemont is managed by Ray Davidson of the old "Russian Inn."

Armonk, N. Y. Armonk Village 555

ternal contradictions and the imminence of revolutionary crisis—will also be put before him as "facts." But only the confirmed victim of the bourgeois illusion of objectivity would be foolish enough to approach "Labor Fact Book II" with such doubts in mind.

The Woman Who Had Imagination. By H. E. Bates. The Macmillan Company. $2.

H. E. Bates is one of the best of the English short-story writers. A perfect technique, taste, subtlety in the registering of atmosphere, great beauty of detail, and a tendency to make each sketch symbolic are his chief merits. His stories are not tales of action but character studies. And old Uncle Silas, very old but very vigorous and healthily vulgar, is the best character in this book. We see him in his old cottage, at the marriage of his son, where he is more truly the bridegroom than is the feebler young man, and we see him die. He dies in character even as he lives, still very much his earthy self. For him the lily whom he addresses as "she" is symbolic of beauty and youth. The title story is a story of adolescent awakening to beauty. The woman who had imagination stirs the dull boy from a rebellious lethargy. But she herself is imprisoned in an impossible marriage. Margery Latimer would have handled such material more expertly. One remembers, after reading this book, not action—there is very little—but ironically interesting people in unforgettable settings.

Blood and Tears. By Balder Olden. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.

Any fictional portrayal of Nazi Germany must follow a formula and awaken certain fundamental reactions. Yet Herr Olden's book, which reads like a cruel fairy tale, as do all books on the same subject, has a difference that is important. His protagonist is the National Socialist Party, and interest centers about Hans Rumelin, an ex-lieutenant of the Reichswehr, and Schnierwind, a fictional Goebbels, Minister of Propaganda and a cynic who believes neither in his Leader nor in anything other than the stupidity of the masses and their desire to be deceived. The story opens with a young girl waiting at a prison's gates for her fiance to be released. The reader is interested in these two healthy young people whose love for one another and alive faith in their party and their country have not been affected by separation or political chaos. But then the reader discovers that the year is 1932 and that Hans and Gerda believe passionately in Hitler, whose star at the time is low. The story of their disillusionment when the party comes into power, particularly that of Hans, is moving and convincing because it is told dispassionately, cynically, and yet with fervent undertones. The victims and their situations are credibly drawn, as are the Nazi chiefs, Fehme murderers, storm troopers, and hangers-on; and because the accent is so definitely on the latter group, which seems to be presented fairly, this book is a valuable addition to the many that have been written about Hitler's Germany.

Holy Deadlock. By A. P. Herbert. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

A. P. Herbert's new novel is a pleasant, easy-going satire on England's antiquated divorce laws. John Adam and Mary Eve are a married couple who find themselves unsuited to each other and wish to part amicably. John has discovered a schoolmistress who fits his quiet, retiring temperament better than his wife, who is, in public life, Mary Moon, the noted actress. Mary is in love with a radio announcer, a more dashing man than her husband. When the two set out to obtain a divorce they find themselves in a thicket of legal difficulties. One or the other must commit adultery in order to prove to an English judge that they are no longer fitted to live together. The announcer's position with the B. B. C. will not allow him to risk notoriety as a correspondent, and the school teacher's occupation puts her in the same case. Consequently, John Adam must take a stenographer to Brighton and spend a good deal of money while pretending to commit adultery with her. The adultery, however, does not "take," and John tries again, this time with a comfortable governess of advanced views. Since the judge believes that John has successfully committed adultery, the divorce goes forward. But it happens that Mary had once been guilty of an indiscretion with her love before the nisi decree was given, and the English law is such that if both parties have committed adultery, they are condemned to continue in the married state. Mary's slip is brought to the attention of the King's Proctor, she is shadowed by detectives, and in the end the judge refuses to grant the divorce. "Holy Deadlock" has not the inventiveness of Mr. Herbert's earlier novel, "The Water Gipsies." A great deal of the satire here is routine stuff. Still it is interesting and competently done.

The Great Doctors. By Henry E. Sigerist. Translated from the German by Eden and Cedar Paul. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.

The author of this book has recently come from Leipzig to assume the post of professor of the history of medicine at Johns Hopkins University. His writings have always been characterized by a breadth of understanding that allows him to correlate his special subject with the political and social history of the different periods that he discusses. In this volume he writes the history of medicine from a unique angle, by presenting brief biographies of representative doctors from different ages. The history so presented takes on a fascinating, personal significance. The book is scholarly and reserved without the obvious efforts at sensationalism that characterize so many popular histories, but it does not on these accounts lose in interest.

Contributors to This Issue

ALEXANDER KENDRICK, a Philadelphia newspaperman, has been making a tour of the South studying industrial and labor conditions.

HAROLD E. STEARNS is the author of "Rediscovering America."

LOUIS ADAMIC revisited his native Carniola two years ago after nineteen years in America. He has described his visit in "The Native's Return."

LEW LEVENSON, formerly a feature writer for the New York World, Herald Tribune, and Times, is now writing for the motion pictures in California. He will publish a novel, "Butterfly Man," this month.

ERNEST BOYD is an editor of the American Spectator.

LEWIS COREY has just published a new book, "The Decline of American Capitalism."

EDA LOU WALTON is the author of "Jane Matthew and Other Poems."

H. B. PARKES is an English critic now living in the United States.

AGNES SMEDLEY has lived many years in China. Her new book, "China's Red Army Marches," will be published shortly.

Starting Saturday, Aug. 25th—For One Week Only

THE PROBLEM of FATIGUE

An illustrated study of fatigue in industry and nature-revealing the nature and prevention. Produced in the USSR under the supervision of the Russian Academy of Science. Musical accompaniment "Szostakowcz" No. 1, Opus 10, by Leopold Stokowski and the Philharmonic Orchestra (English Titles).

ACME THEATRE || 14th St. & Union Sq. Phone: ALg. 4-9620 || The Rendezvous of the Intelligentsia

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1934 No. 3609

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 253

EDITORIALS:

Saving the Good in the NRA 256
All for Liberty 257
The Menace of "Education" 257
A Denial from California 258
ISSUES AND MEN. THE PRESIDENT'S GREATEST OPPORTUNITY. By Oswald Garrison Villard 259
CARTOON: "MY LADY, THE CARRIAGE WAITS." By LOW 260
THE HITLER TERROR MOUNTS. By Evelyn Lawrence . . . 261
THE SHIPPING CONSPIRACY. By William Adams 262
A MESSAGE TO UNCLE TOM. By Suzanne La Follette . . . 265
WAS EUROPE A SUCCESS? IV. SOME DOUBTS ARRIVED AT (CONT.) By Joseph Wood Krutch 267
UTOPIA INCORPORATED. By Miriam Allen de Ford 268
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 269
CORRESPONDENCE 270

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:

The Case of Thomas Sharpe. By Lew Levenson 272
The Textile Strike. By J. W. 273
Utopia Incorporated 273
Labor Notes 274
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 275

BOOKS:

Spanish Literature and the Republic. By Anita Brenner . . . 276
The Myths of Wall Street. By Collis Stocking 277
Carlyle's Last Years. By Emery Neff 278
China in Transition. By Maxwell S. Stewart 278
Success Stories. By Margaret Larkin 279
Shorter Notices 279

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Associate Editors
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
Contributing Editor

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE STATISTICS presented by Donald Richberg purporting to show huge economic gains under the New Deal bear the earmarks of careful selection. It is obviously unfair, for example, to take March, 1933, when all the banks of the country were closed, as a basis upon which to chart business advance. Eliminating such comparisons, what do we have? Mr. Richberg reports an increase of 2,000,000 in employment between June, 1933, and June, 1934, and a 37½ per cent increase in weekly pay rolls. Adjusting for changes in employment, this indicates an increase in per capita wages of 8 per cent, which is somewhat less than the reputed increase in living costs. This is not so serious, but had Mr. Richberg chosen July instead of June as a basis for calculation he would have found that the indices of industrial production are running about 20 per cent below those of a year ago, and that employment is already nearly 5 per cent lower than in mid-spring. If we should take the period from Labor Day to Labor Day, there would most certainly be no gain in production or employment, and there would be a substantial decline in living standards. Other aspects of Mr. Richberg's interesting report will be examined in some detail in an early issue of The Nation.

WE REGRET that we cannot join unreservedly in the popular acclaim of the new Cuban reciprocity pact. While usually we accept tariff reductions with no questions asked, this particular agreement strikes us as somewhat inequitable. The United States has agreed to reduce its duty on Cuban sugar by six-tenths of a cent a pound, and to make substantial concessions in the duty on leaf tobacco—the two most important Cuban exports. But in both cases import quotas are to be imposed restricting Cuban sales to a specified amount. Under the circumstances it is an open question whether the Cuban producers will be in a position—by organization or otherwise—to profit by the tariff reduction, or whether it will result in lower prices. The only indisputable concessions obtained by Cuba are a lowering of the duty on rum and a seasonal tariff on vegetables. In exchange for these somewhat dubious advantages Cuba has agreed to cut the tariff on American products to an amazing extent. The duty on lard is to be reduced from $9.18 to $2.73 a hundred pounds; that on vegetable oils from $4.36 to 88 cents per hundredweight. Increased preferences are to be granted to the United States on cotton manufactures and textile goods, and important concessions made on a long range of other articles. These reductions should benefit the Cuban consumer as well as the American producer, but they do little toward restoring the necessary balance in American foreign trade. The failure to make provision for a substantial increase in purchases from Cuba must of necessity mean that the market for American exports will continue to be much more limited than it would otherwise be. The pact indicates, in other words, that equality of bargaining power is a myth, and that despite the warning of economists the United States remains export- rather than import-minded. But whatever its merits or demerits, the agreement is scarcely a fair test of the Administration's new tariff policy. The United States has maintained special reciprocal relations with Cuba since 1902, and the concessions granted are therefore not to be extended to other countries under the most-favored-nation clause. We must await agreements of a more general character before passing judgment.

IN WASHINGTON the discussion of the Russian debt has reached a point which leaves fairly clear what the compromise must be if negotiations are not to fail altogether. The most important Soviet thesis has long been conceded by the State Department. The debt is to be repaid, not in capital, but by adding about 2 per cent to the normal interest charge of new credits to Russia to be granted in America. Now the issue is whether these shall be long-term credits or short. When this has been threshed out, the further question remains of how large shall be the actual capital figure which settles American claims in full. The Soviet Union wants twenty-year loans but probably would take some of the credits for ten and fifteen years. The State Department, accurately gauging American prejudice against loans to foreign governments, is not willing to sanction loans for more than five years. The Soviet Union does not feel it can wisely increase its short-term indebtedness. A debt settlement on the American basis sets a precedent for like settlements with Britain and France, whose claims are larger than ours. Russia has outstanding short-term credits in both countries, and both might require payment of supplementary interest for the benefit of their own holders of Russian bonds. Germany, too, has advanced short-term credits without asking a debt settlement, but under the Rapallo treaty, in which she renounced debt claims, is entitled to reconsideration if more favorable arrangements are made with other countries. If Britain, France, and Germany start collecting debts in this way America's share in the limited purchases to be made by Russia abroad would be cut down.

THE SOVIET POLICY in any case is to reduce short-term indebtedness. Most of it was contracted under the emergency of the Five-Year Plan, and at a time of expanding world trade. Now Russia is able to build most of its own industrial plant, and world trade is at its lowest ebb. Soviet economists consider it folly to plan an increase of exports to support an expansion of short-term credits. If the State Department looks upon these debt negotiations as an ordinary commercial transaction, the Soviet arguments can be ignored, long-term credits can be refused, and the settlement can go by the boards. But a settlement of this kind is political, and compromise is in order. Moreover, the Soviet Union is waiting to make substantial purchases as soon as credits can be opened. The amount naturally depends on the final figure fixed for the debt to be repaid. But around $50,000,000 in oil machinery, spare machinery parts, railway equipment, and copper would be spent almost at once, with more to follow. This consideration will weigh heavily with the State Department. As to the final debt figure, various sums have been mentioned ranging from $50,000,000 to $200,000,000. Here the Soviet government labors under the handicap that any recognition of a large amount of the American loans to Kerensky will be hard to justify to Soviet workers, since much of the money was employed to finance the Kolchak counter-revolution.

BY RAISING THE BOGY of national defense, President Roosevelt has dispelled any hope that the Administration might support Secretary Wallace in his forthright attack on ship subsidies. Pointing to the undeniable fact that foreign countries can only pay for American products in goods or services, Mr. Wallace suggested that it would be to our economic advantage to concentrate on the development of our natural resources, leaving the carrying trade largely to foreigners. Instead of aiding the farmer, as the shippers have always claimed, he indicated that a subsidized American merchant marine is in reality a hindrance to the restoration of agricultural exports. Needless to say, Mr. Wallace's suggestion threw the shipping interests into a veritable panic. Senator Fletcher charged the Secretary with holding the "idealistic" theory that imports and exports should balance, and thereupon proceeded to adduce a series of somewhat threadbare arguments as to the folly of turning over our trade to foreign ships. The extent to which shipowners and their paid propagandists have been able to deceive the public regarding the fundamentals of the shipping controversy is brought out in two provocative articles by William Adams appearing in The Nation this week and the week following. Stripped of verbiage, it is evident that the shipping game has been little more than a gigantic racket in which a few powerful individuals have mulcted the American people of tens of millions of dollars. A thorough investigation is called for, and it is to be hoped that the President's statement does not indicate a closed mind on this important issue.

THE COLLAPSE OF THE WHEAT PACT illustrates once again the inherent difficulty of international planning. Frightened into docility by the specter of a huge world carry-over, the wheat-growing nations agreed a year ago to restrict the export of wheat in accordance with specified quotas. Unfortunately, however, little allowance was made for the vagaries of nature. During the past year Argentina had a bumper crop, while in Australia, Europe, and North America drought greatly curtailed production. As a result the Argentine exceeded its export quota by 34,000,000 bushels, while many of the other countries fell considerably short of their allotments. With prices up and world stocks considerably reduced, the Argentine representative on the wheat advisory committee at its recent meeting in London stoutly refused to consider further restrictions which would apply to his country or to make any adjustment in next year's quota to compensate for having exceeded the amount set for 1933. Unable to reconcile the differences between Canada and Argentina, the committee adjourned without establishing quotas for the coming year, thus leaving the agreement practically inoperative. This setback does not necessarily mean that world planning is impracticable. Despite Argentina's intransigence, it must be admitted that the pact has served its purpose during the past year. With greater flexibility, provision of means of storing surpluses, and the creation of machinery for representing consumer interests, it would be possible to eliminate most of the difficulties which have been encountered in these early experiments. Failure to meet this challenge will inevitably lead to a return to conditions such as the world faced prior to 1933.

CONTRASTING "eating under capitalism with starvation in Russia," the New York Times, in an editorial published July 15, quoted with approval a statement recently made by John W. Davis to the effect that one of the achievements of capitalism is that it has "fed and housed and warmed and clothed" the population of the Western world. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, was said to have "failed no less than three times in the elementary duty of providing the people with bread—even at half rations." Five days later a dispatch from Walter Duranty declared that in total volume this year's harvest in the Soviet Union will be no less than the record-breaking one of 1933, although the wheat and rye crops may be somewhat less. And then, on August 23, there came a further dispatch telling of an increase of 36 per cent in the volume of retail trade during the first six months of 1934. Production as a whole was 20 per cent higher than in the corresponding months of 1933, as compared with an increase of only 9 per cent in the previous year. The output of heavy industry was up 29 per cent, that of light industry slightly more than 10 per cent, and there was a considerable increase in production of handicraft articles on the collective farms. We are not cruel enough to propose that these figures be compared with corresponding ones in this country; we merely suggest that the Times work out a better system of coordination between its news and editorial departments.

IN ORDERING THE REINSTATEMENT of John Donovan the National Labor Relations Board sharpened justice with courage and tempered the law with wisdom. Had the board wished to temporize, it would have been easy to find some technical pretext upon which to justify General Johnson's discharge of the president of the NRA Employees' Union. But the board held fast to the simple question: Was Donovan dismissed because of his activities as president of the union? To this question it gave a straightforward answer: ". . . we are satisfied that the controlling reason for Donovan's discharge was his conduct as the head of a delegation of union employees which met on June 18 in the anteroom of General Johnson's office, pursuant to a noon appointment with the General." According to the strict letter of the law, the NRA itself is not subject to the obligations established by Section 7-a. Nevertheless, in appraising Donovan's conduct, the board applied the standards of that section, explaining that "when the NRA is engaged in compelling employers to observe strictly the provisions of Section 7-a, it should, in dealing with its employees, carry out the purpose of that section with even more scrupulous care than might be expected of ordinary employers." Despite its sovereignty, the state is not above the law; when the government sets forth to clean the stables of private industry, it should first take care to preserve the decencies in its own domain. The board's decision does more than safeguard the right of collective bargaining among public employees. It demonstrates that the National Labor Relations Board is a fit instrument to carry out the labor mandate of the Recovery Act.

NEWSPAPERMEN, none too comfortable in their new role, are on the picket line again. A month ago their right to organize was challenged by E. I. Newhouse, publisher of the Long Island Daily Press, who discharged nine of his editorial employees for joining the Newspaper Guild. The vigorous picketing and boycott campaign conducted by the guild forced Newhouse to capitulate and the discharged men were restored to their jobs. Defeated in the Battle of Long Island, Newhouse established secondary positions in Staten Island, where he owns the only local newspaper, the Advance. The first shot was fired when that paper discharged its news editor for joining the guild. The reasons assigned were "incompetence and incompatibility," but A. L. Crosby, the discharged editor, had been with the Advance for five years and prior to joining the guild had received a substantial raise in salary. The guild promptly responded by establishing headquarters in Staten Island to wage there a campaign similar to that which had gained victory for them in Jamaica. Pickets were stationed at the Advance plant and at the entrance to the Staten Island ferry, and the borough was deluged with leaflets urging the residents to support the guild's stand. As a result civic leaders and organizations have publicly given approval to the men. The guild asserts and the Advance denies that its circulation and advertising are declining. The issue involved is an important one, for the very existence of the guild is at stake. Newspapermen see behind Newhouse the threatening shadow of the Publishers' Association, which has been fighting the guild in typically underhand fashion. Pressure of the association is also blamed for the peculiar position taken by Roy K. Howard toward the guild unit of the New York World-Telegram. Howard permits his employees to join but will not negotiate with guild officers in the matter of collective bargaining. Company unionism is the issue, clearly recognized by both sides, with Roy Howard, who has publicly opposed the company union in the past, now insisting upon it in his own plant.

BY JOINING the International Labor Organization, the United States has aligned itself with fifty-eight other nations in the common task of improving working conditions throughout the world. Under a competitive economic system it is difficult for any one county to initiate a fundamental program of social reform without the risk of having its products undercut by the output of nations possessing a less enlightened labor policy. The I. L. O. was founded specifically to deal with this problem, and in the fifteen years of its existence it has worked out, in a restricted sphere, a technique of action which might well constitute the basis for a far more extensive form of international cooperation. While no startling reforms have been carried through, the International Labor Conference has adopted some forty conventions dealing with such subjects as social insurance, the regulation of child labor, limitation of the hours of work, and the establishment of labor exchanges. Half of these conventions have been ratified by from twenty to thirty governments, and the remainder—including many of restricted application—by a smaller number of countries. With the prospect that Soviet Russia will join the I. L. O. as well as the League in September, but one important country will remain outside the fold—Hitler's Third Reich.

THE EXPULSION of Dorothy Thompson from Germany can best be explained as the self-defeating act of a ruler whose vanity is insufficiently tempered by discretion. Miss Thompson's chief sin appears to have been her assertion in an article published in Cosmopolitan two years ago, which later appeared in her book "I Saw Hitler," that it required less than fifty seconds "to measure the startling insignificance of this man who has set the world agog." The order requiring her to leave mentioned "innumerable anti-German articles in the foreign press," but Miss Thompson's inability to be impressed by der schöne Adolf was clearly the main count in the indictment. Her insensitiveness in this respect appears to be shared by most of the foreign correspondents in Berlin, including the correspondents of the New York Times and the Herald Tribune. Students returning from Germany report that their copies of the Times and the Manchester Guardian are continually being borrowed by their German colleagues, who are avid for news about Germany but are unable to get it from the censored German press. On arriving in Paris, Miss Thompson declared that she believed her expulsion was "evidently the beginning of a campaign of terrorism against foreign correspondents." Such a campaign would only intensify the isolation of Germany and furnish new ammunition to the enemies of the Nazi regime. The fact that Hitler is incapable of understanding this tends to support Miss Thompson's impression of him as a man and a statesman.

Saving the Good in the NRA

THE important aspect of the reorganization of the NRA, now under way in Washington, is not the administrative form finally chosen, but the simple decision as to what part of the Recovery Administration is worth salvaging and what part is to be dropped altogether. The choice will not be illumined much by mere administrative changes. Whether there is to be a full-time board, or a new body coordinating the work of the NRA and the AAA, or a new division of responsibilities along army lines, is not what the public cares to learn. To the public the NRA is not an administrative scheme but a strange mixture of good and bad social intentions which ought not to be made permanent until the contradictory thinking within it has been reconciled.

Before defining the good and the bad, it is well to refresh our memories of the origin of the NRA. It is not a concoction of the Brain Trust; it is not a regimentation of business forced upon industry by the President. What regimentation there is was conceded to business in response to its own clamor. Indeed, the worst features of the NRA, price-fixing and the evasion of the anti-trust laws, came in this act as the fulfilment of a dream long-cherished by big business. Those who believe that the NRA was a device for regimenting the country forced on it by the President would do well to read John T. Flynn in the current Harper's Magazine on Whose Child Is the NRA? He supplies an invaluable notebook for historians on the actual drafting of the national-recovery legislation.

The good in the NRA, as we see it, is the protection it promises labor. It contains both a recognition of the right of collective bargaining and the implication that no industry is entitled to survive which cannot support certain minimum standards of wages and hours. The minimum-wage and hours provisions, in particular the abolition—in theory if not in fact—of child labor, are now on the way to becoming a part of the changed American system.

Industry accepted the new protection of labor in return for the right to fix prices and escape the anti-trust laws. The concession not only is too expensive, but is one of the elemental obstacles to recovery itself. If the continuation of the NRA means the perpetuation of this bargain, we should advocate scrapping it altogether. We do not believe there can be a recovery under the capitalist system without a more normal working of a price economy, and we do not see that the consumer can possibly be safeguarded against exploitation by the price agreements which the NRA sanctions. Scrapping the NRA would not mean that the codes would have to go. They could be administered by the Federal Trade Commission with enlarged powers. And the Department of Labor could resume its sole supervision of the conduct of industrial disputes.

But we are not convinced that the disappearance of the NRA is called for so much as a clarification of thought. Indeed, there was a gain in having the protection of labor assigned to a fresh agency which embodied the energy and spirit of the times and commanded fresh prestige in the country. But unless the NRA can serve, as was originally conceived, as a fair arena for orderly conflicts between capital and labor, it can enjoy no fresh prestige. On the contrary, this summer has been a story of repeated stultification.

If the NRA is to be continued, it must be without price-fixing and the grant of monopoly privileges, and it must be accompanied by a clarification of the right of collective bargaining. When we come to this theme we reach one of the most obscure passages in the records of the Administration. One must assume that the President considered it essential that labor should be fortified in protecting itself. But he has remained aloof while General Johnson has played fast and loose with the principle of collective bargaining, and has let the nation be thrown into the jitters by the spread of strikes which have been not ordinary industrial conflicts but strikes for the recognition of the rights which the NRA bestowed.

The Johnson era has now reached its climax in the censure of the General by the ruling of the National Labor Relations Board in the Donovan case. The reinstatement of Donovan and the integrity of an organ of the NRA in overruling the czar of the Recovery Administration give one hope that the muddle in Washington is not past redemption. What is amazing is that the General did not immediately offer his resignation. The Donovan case in itself is a secondary affair, and Donovan may not make an ideal martyr, but the trial was not of an individual but of a principle. And the verdict was that General Johnson, who is responsible for having the principle accepted by industry throughout the country, failed to apply it in his relations with his own subordinates. That the General should go is the kind of truism which would be obvious to a five-year-old child but which can be lost sight of in the mist of a political capital.

We do not minimize the difficulties of the Administration in getting the right to collective bargaining recognized. The very idea is repugnant to many industrialists who do not know that the nineteenth century has closed. And the difficulties have not been lessened by the fact that the American Federation of Labor is not yet organized to wear comfortably the mantle of representation for all labor. There is bound to be confusion and delay before collective bargaining can emerge on a sound footing. But what is incontestable is that the President has added to his natural difficulties by his open indulgence of General Johnson, and by maintaining a delphic silence in moments when a few emphatic sentences would have cleared away the mist.

Whatever the reorganization of the NRA, the President will be judged, perhaps more than he realizes, by the faith he shows in fulfilling this particular pledge of collective bargaining. It is not enough to rely on the luck of finding suitable administrative agents and agencies. Some of the bad luck of General Johnson has been offset by the services of Lloyd Garrison as chairman of the Labor Relations Board. But if the General goes, and if the country is to rely not on personalities but on principles, the first task of reorganization is to make clear the principles according to which the Recovery Act is to be administered.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

All for Liberty

WE are glad to welcome the new non-partisan American Liberty League headed by Jouett Shouse, anti-Roosevelt ex-chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and such eminent advocates of liberty as John W. Davis, Irenee du Pont, Alfred E. Smith, Nathan L. Miller, and James W. Wadsworth. We do so not only on the ground on which President Roosevelt is said to have given his blessing—the necessity of criticism. Our hope is that the league will wax sufficiently strong to be the instrument of that division between conservatives and liberals, or radicals, for which The Nation has been hoping for so many years. Times without number we have pointed out that there was, at least until Franklin Roosevelt's arrival in Washington, no essential difference between the Republican and Democratic parties; that there were conservatives and progressives in both, and that there was no cleavage between them on a single issue; that for years past every important bill voted in Congress has been supported by Republican and Democratic votes and opposed by Republicans and Democrats. If the Liberty League means that the hour for a genuine showdown is at hand, we are ready for it. Sooner or later the division is bound to come. Even if this new league means the beginning of an organized fascist movement, we shall not be frightened. That challenge was certain, given conditions as they are.

We are, of course, under no illusion as to what these eminent men have in mind when they use the word "liberty." Their language is clear. They promise in their preliminary statement, first, to uphold the Constitution of the United States. Second, they will teach the necessity of respect for the rights of persons and property, "as fundamental to any successful form of government" (Russian newspapers please copy). Third, they will teach the duty of government to encourage and protect individual and group initiative and enterprise, to foster the right to work, earn, save, and acquire property, and to preserve the ownership and lawful use of property when acquired. There we have it quite plain. Despite the passing slight reference to the "rights of persons," this is an organization to secure to capitalism the power to live and do business as heretofore. Its conception of liberty is the right to maintain the old, discredited order, the liberty to continue an inequitable division of the products of labor, the liberty of some men through special privilege and government favoritism, or by the absence of government control, to build up large fortunes while millions of others—even during our boom years—approach nearer and nearer the starvation line.

When our jails are full of men arrested and often beaten for striking for their economic rights—rights guaranteed in many cases by the NIRA itself—this new Liberty League has nothing to say except that there is a "necessity to respect the rights of persons." When personal liberty is abridged by men in office and authority as never before, the Liberty League fails to cite a single one of the literally thousands of cases of official lawlessness, of official siding with the employers as against the employees, to make people believe that it places human rights above property rights. And of course it does not. What persons are violating the Constitution of this country oftenest? None other than officials solemnly sworn to uphold that Constitution and our every law. Who are defying the government of the United States in its efforts to uphold the right of collective bargaining but the United States Steel Corporation and the aluminum trust and other corporate clients of John W. Davis and ex-Governor Miller? Who wants liberty for the great corporations to dominate absolutely and autocratically the lives of the workers? Why, none other than the group represented by most of the men who are the founders of this league. Not liberty for all—that is not what this group wishes, but liberty to block that reorganization of our social and economic life without which we shall continue to go from one crash to another, from one "cycle" into the next.

Well, as we have said, we are glad, and Mr. Roosevelt should be glad, that this non-partisan group has raised the banner of property rights first. Perhaps Al Smith and Mr. Davis, both once Democratic Presidential candidates, will now furnish the leadership the Republican Party craves and so sadly lacks. Mr. Wadsworth is being groomed for the Presidency; his joining the league shows that he expects, and so do we, that it will grow as rapidly as the association against prohibition. As men in political life join it, we shall all know precisely where they stand. It will help us to re-form ranks, to choose our flag and be known by the company we keep.

The Menace of "Education"

AMONG the numerous skeptics who have arisen to challenge the methods and accomplishments of American universities and colleges, there has been none quite so rash as to suggest that the whole vast business, involving the expenditure of innumerable thousands of dollars every year by hundreds of thousands of college students, is a failure. Yet some such conclusion emerges from the six-year study financed by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, which is described by John R. Tunis in the current issue of Scribner's Magazine. The study was directed by Dr. William S. Learned, with the cooperation of the Association of College Presidents of the State of Pennsylvania and of the State Department of Public Instruction, and covered forty-nine colleges and sixteen public-school systems. As in most such studies the conclusiveness of the findings rests on the validity of the intelligence tests and other tests employed. In this case, the questionnaires were so skilfully prepared and the scale of the study so large as probably to cancel most of the factors of error.

The most impressive table is that showing the relative scores of freshmen, sophomores, juniors, and seniors in six colleges. As a result of four years of college instruction, the seniors improved their score on the intelligence test from 56 to 58, but apparently lost ground in spelling, grammar, vocabulary, English literature, history, and social studies. The average senior in six colleges recognized only 61 out of 100 words "in familiar use by educated people." One-fourth of the college population, seniors about to graduate, achieved scores lower than those of 30 per cent of the high-school seniors four years younger. The high-school seniors in Reading, Altoona, Elkins Park, and Wayne were ahead of the average for all the college sophomores in the State.

The findings with respect to different types of students were no less remarkable. In general the students preparing for the teaching profession ranked lower than the others, and the students of "business administration" were among those making the lowest average gain as a result of their college instruction. The student who topped the entire list of 2,800 proved to be a boy who, except for a high mark in history, had failed or received D's in the rest of his courses for three years and had been demoted from the junior to the sophomore class; whereas in another college a young woman about to receive a magna cum laude failed miserably in the tests, standing fifth from the bottom in a class of forty-eight and in the lowest 10 per cent for the State.

Mr. Tunis interprets these disheartening findings to mean that there is something wrong with the methods of college instruction—particularly the credit system. Undoubtedly this is so, and it is probable that the "honors," or divisional, idea which is now being tried out in Princeton, Harvard, Chicago, and elsewhere, represents a considerable improvement over the traditional method of instruction, which frustrates the individual interest of students and puts a premium on "credit hunting."

But this is not the whole story, nor did this study, in our opinion, go far enough. We should have liked to see the teachers subjected to similar tests so that we might learn whether teachers are more or less bright after two, four, and ten years of immersion in the academic routine. We are inclined to suspect that the present version of the "higher learning" is dis-educational for the teachers as well as for the students. In addition it would be interesting to follow these students into the business and professional jobs which they take, if any are available, after graduation. Is the experience of business and professional practice educative or otherwise? Is a first-year Rotarian brighter or stupider than a veteran juggler of pink balloons, chocolate eclairs, and paper hats?

There are other and even more basic considerations. It would seem from Mr. Tunis's summary that Dr. Learned and his associates examined the educational apparatus as a thing in itself, to determine whether or not it is functioning. But college training is merely one element, and a rather minor element at that, of a total cultural process which either functions or doesn't, which is creative or stultifying, educative or dis-educative. Ideally, the processes of a functioning culture are educative in and of themselves. In primitive societies education takes the form of apprenticeship: of children to parents, of youths to their elders. The phenomenon of formal education in our complex modern societies is to a considerable extent an inflated and adventitious excrescence upon a culture which has lost its organic, self-functioning quality. This has become particularly apparent during the depression when we send children to college and keep them in college and in graduate work because society cannot find serious tasks for them to do.

But it is unlikely that the Carnegie Foundation will enter into such untrodden fields of inquiry and speculation. They are reserved for those irresponsible laymen who by hook or by crook—frequently by cutting classes like the Brightest Boy of Pennsylvania already referred to—managed to escape being "educated."

A Denial from California

WE have received from Albert E. Boynton, managing director of the Industrial Association of San Francisco, a telegram characterizing as "grossly untruthful and libelous" the article and documents published in The Nation last week on the connection of the Industrial Association with the police raids in and around San Francisco. Mr. Boynton denies that anyone in his association "had any previous knowledge or connection with any of the arrests in the strikes or in either the police or unauthorized raids on Communist quarters." The article under question appeared in The Nation for August 29; this issue was on sale in New York on August 23 but had not reached the Coast by August 24 when Mr. Boynton dispatched his message. The protest of the managing director of the Industrial Association was therefore based upon a press release announcing the article and not upon the article itself. Mr. Boynton assumes that "some irresponsible propagandists" forwarded one of "our strike-violence news reports which we furnished daily" to the newspapers of San Francisco. These reports were, he says, based on police records of arrests in Communist raids and all other arrests in connection with the longshoremen's and general strikes from July 3 to the end. He demands that The Nation "retract its conclusions and implications in regard to the Industrial Association of San Francisco and Albert E. Boynton, its managing director, manifest in this article" and offers for the inspection of "any authorized agent" the "full files of these reports." The Nation has accepted this offer while recognizing its insufficiency for the purposes of a full inquiry; it has asked the A. C. L. U. to act as its agent and will publish its findings.

It is unfortunate that Mr. Boynton had only a press release upon which to base his denials. The reproductions in The Nation of parts of the "Strike Violence Memos" do not suggest news reports either in appearance or substance. The "irresponsible propagandists" so cavalierly dismissed by Mr. Boynton are officers of the American Civil Liberties Union who checked the documents' authenticity for The Nation.

The Nation suggested in its editorial that the activities of the Industrial Association, as revealed in the documents published, together with the whole record of official terrorism in California, be made the subject of a federal investigation. We reiterate our belief that this should be done. The breakdown of orderly government in California, the lawless acts of officers of the law, the violence of irresponsible bodies of citizens, all demand the intervention of the federal authorities. Meanwhile, we are glad to support the proposal of the American Civil Liberties Union, made in a telegram to Mr. Boynton, that the Industrial Association open its "complete files dealing with the general strike to examination by an impartial national inquiry commission of outstanding citizens." The Nation believes that such an inquiry into the whole question of private and official lawlessness would be an invaluable preliminary to a federal investigation later on. If the Industrial Association will extend its offer to open its files to the body suggested in the Civil Liberties Union's proposal, The Nation will gladly accept and publish the findings that result from such an examination and will publicly modify or maintain its position in the light of the full data.

Issues and Men

The President's Greatest Opportunity

I SUPPOSE that everybody thinks that he knows just what are the greatest opportunity and duty before the President. Well, I too feel very strongly that there is one duty above all others which he ought to perform. It won't bring us any economic relief or bring prosperity any nearer, but I believe it will do more for the soul of America and the preservation of our institutions than anything else the President can do. I refer to the necessity of his lifting his voice against the ever-growing official lawlessness in this country, the readiness of men in office everywhere to consider themselves above and beyond the law, with the right to decide which citizens shall and which shall not obey any given statute. I have particularly in mind also the way the local law-enforcing authorities, whose duty it is to be absolutely neutral, continually side with the employing class. The depth of my feeling on this subject comes from the fact that my long years of experience have made me realize that the failure of our officials themselves to respect and obey the law has more to do with our general lawlessness than any other of the many reasons for it.

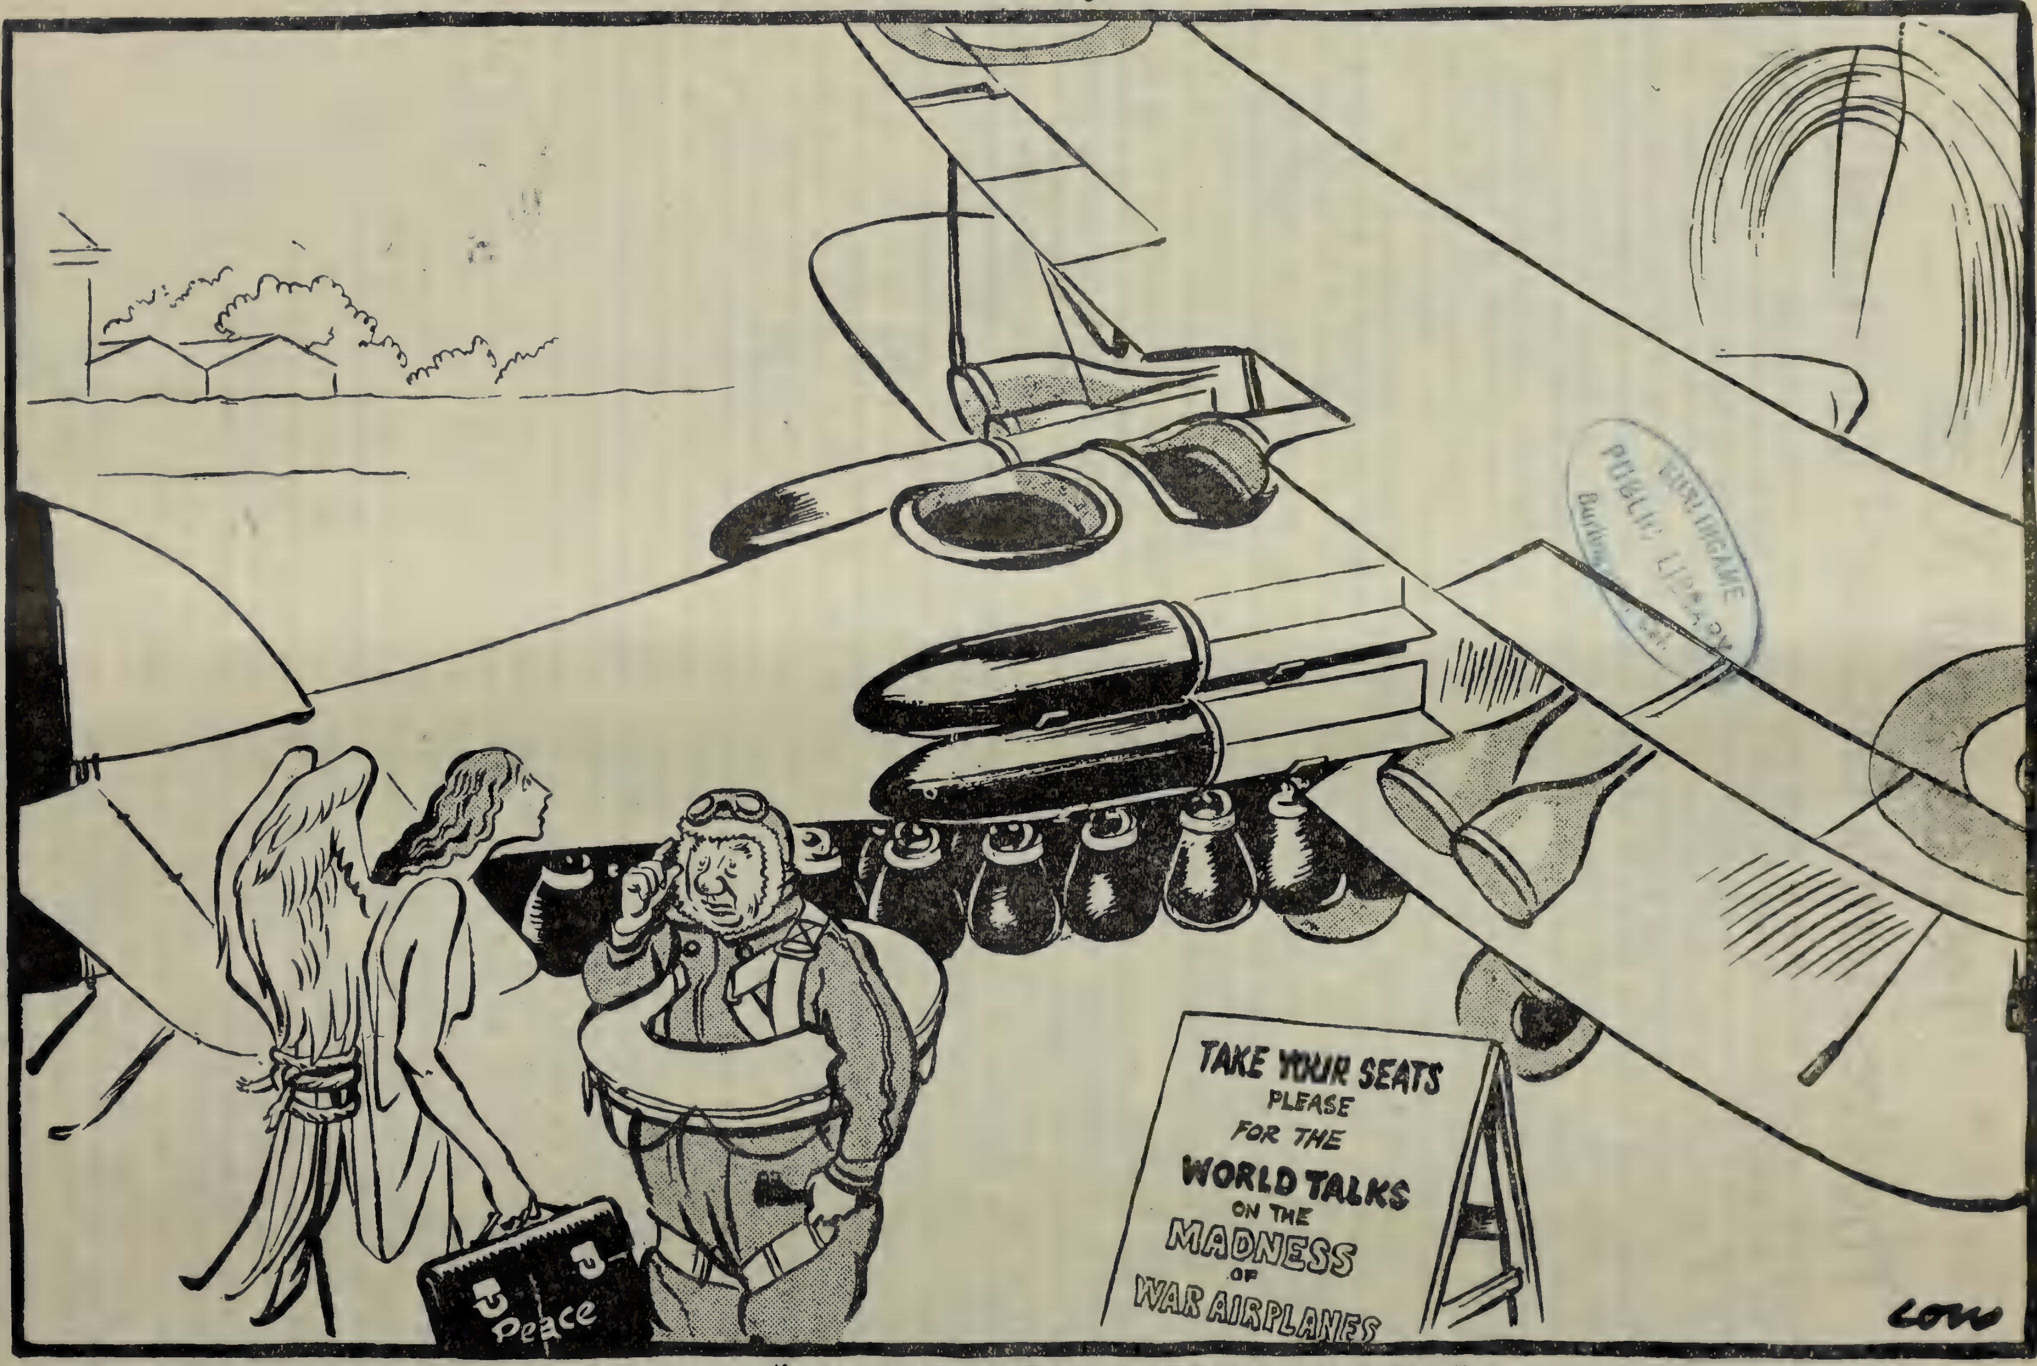
The most important happening along this line has been, of course, General Johnson's conduct in San Francisco, where, after denouncing the shipowners because they had failed to give the right of collective bargaining to the striking longshoremen, he proceeded to say that those who were engineering the general strike constituted "a threat to the community," "a menace to government," "civil war," "bloody insurrection," "a blow at the flag of our common country." He then said: "If the federal government did not act, the people would act, and it would act to wipe out this subversive element as you clean off a chalk mark on a blackboard with a wet sponge." This was all that the vigilantes needed. That day they began their raids, which have since turned out to be really police raids, undertaken probably at the instigation of the big-business interests of San Francisco. The casualty list published in The Nation last week provided only a partial record of the brutalities inflicted during those illegal raids. Yet the victims and the men against whom General Johnson fulminated were well within their rights, were doing nothing illegal, and had jeopardized the success of their undertaking by opening the road for food supplies and other necessities to reach the population. No one can measure the effect which such incitement to lawlessness has upon the country.

Nor can anyone measure the effect upon the plain people of the United States of seeing police lawlessness and brutality at close range. They behold the police entering homes without warrant, subjecting innocent people, as well as the guilty, to the illegal third degree, and beating up unarmed prisoners whenever it suits their convenience. They know that in strike after strike the police side with the employers; it is rare, indeed, that they sympathize with the strikers, as was the case in Toledo. What happened in Hardin County, Ohio, a few weeks ago is characteristic. Peaceful picketing is lawful in the United States by the decision of the highest courts, but when Jerry Raymond, an organizer for the Socialist Party, headed a picket line in the town of McGuffey, a truckload of deputy sheriffs ordered the pickets to disperse. Being clearly within their rights, they refused. The deputies attacked them with clubs and knocked Raymond unconscious. When he recovered, Raymond was tried twice on the charge that he had been guilty of "assault with intent to kill." The lawyers for the onion growers, against whom the workers were striking, twice prosecuted Raymond, who was sentenced to ninety days in jail and to pay a fine of $75. It was a blow at the government of the United States itself, this conviction. It was a worse act than any single Communist could possibly have perpetrated.

I could cite literally hundreds, if not thousands, of similar cases which are happening all the time all over the country and are being multiplied as the struggle between capital and labor grows bitterer because of the impulse to unionization given by the NRA, especially by Section 7-a of the NIRA. I cannot understand how President Roosevelt can stay his hand under the circumstances—if he has any realization how the whole legal structure is being undermined, how the masses are losing all faith in laws and our constituted authorities. He must know that the average well-to-do American reads these things and says: "It serves the damned Socialist right. To hell with him." He knows that our patriotic societies are willing to stand behind the authorities in denying all legal and constitutional rights to Socialists and Communists, to labor leaders, even if they are of the most conventional stripe, when they threaten business, as in San Francisco. The President ought to realize that he alone can turn the tide effectively. Thus he might have sent for the policeman who arrested the Reverend A. J. Muste in Belleville, Illinois, and later swore in court that he thought he had the right to overrule the Constitution of the United States and violate Mr. Muste's constitutional privileges whenever he thought there was an emergency, and have lectured him in the White House before the press representatives as to what constitute the duties of a police officer. He should have publicly rebuked General Johnson; the country would have acclaimed him if he had. He could well have voiced his opinion of those police justices of Hardin County, and demanded the release of Jerry Raymond. Above all, he could have made it clear that he himself will never connive at any violation of any United States statute, no matter what the crisis. I repeat that I know of no greater service the President could today render to his country and his countrymen than to continue to pound away upon this line, to uphold the sanctity of the Constitution and of all law, and to rebuke the faithless officials—many of them faithless through their complete ignorance of both our laws and the Constitution.

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



TAKE YOUR SEATS
PLEASE FOR THE WORLD TALKS ON THE MADNESS
OF WAR AIRPLANES
Peace
LOW

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

"MY LADY, THE CARRIAGE WAITS."

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

The Hitler Terror Mounts

By EVELYN LAWRENCE

A YOUNG German told me this story at an underground group meeting in a small cafe in Berlin. Illegal gatherings in the Third Reich are not held in dim cellars, lit by guttering candles. They are conducted in the open, cloaked only by the naturalness of everyday events. I have been to meetings in restaurants, in private homes, and in the open air, where we sat on the bank of the Rhine in bathing suits.

Here five of us sat at the table. We spoke in the whispers that are the voice of Germany today. As the young man told his story, a typical Nazi love-and-unity newspaper lay on the table. A black headline blared across it: "Schlagt die Reaktion, wo ihr sie trifft" (Beat reaction wherever you meet it).

"Three months ago they arrested a man in East Prussia," he said. "They found my address among his papers. The next morning I was in a concentration camp. The SA asked me what I knew. I said that I hadn't participated in revolutionary activity since such activity became illegal. That was an 'unsatisfactory' answer. So they beat me for three hours until I crumpled up on the floor. Then they took me away from the concentration camp to a special station for torturing stubborn prisoners. I was carried into a small room with only a bed in it. The door to the main room was slightly open. I could hear the wails and screams of a man who also was 'stubborn'—he was refusing to betray his comrades. After two hours I heard him break down. He whispered the names of two men, very faintly. The SA brought him in and threw him on the bed, smeared all over with blood.

"Then they took me in. Four men surrounded me and told me to talk if I valued my life. I said I knew nothing. They beat me again. I fell to the floor. I bit my lips and shrieked. I was bleeding all over. I became unconscious time and again. Each time they revived me. And through it all was the constant refrain, 'What do you know?' My answer was, 'Nothing.'

"Late in the evening they carried me into the anteroom and threw me on the bed with the other man. Pain made sleep impossible for both of us. In the morning they took the man who had confessed back to the torture room together with the two men whose names he had given. After three hours of questioning they were all taken back to the concentration camp.

"I was too exhausted to say 'no' any more. I could only shake my head. They were more hopeful and more brutal. The beating went on all that day. It went on until I became completely unconscious and could not be revived. Of the next day I remember only one thing. I was conscious at intervals. I lay on the floor feeling that I couldn't stand another blow, that I must tell. Then I looked up and saw the vicious faces slobbering over me. I would die before I would deliver anyone else to those beasts.

"On the fourth day they varied the monotony. They decided they had been too 'soft.' I was taken into a small room and propped in the corner. Two SA men stood in the other corner with guns. One of them said, 'We shall count three. If you do not talk we shall shoot.' Then came the three counts. I felt the shots hitting the wall right beside me and then I collapsed. The mad torturers gave up. They took me back to the concentration camp. The comrades there knew what four days in the torture rooms meant. They were sure I was dead. When I came back I was a hero."

The German ended his story and sat silent for a minute. "We're still working," he said, "and we'll lick them, too."

This is the hand of the terror in its most naked form. All through Germany I saw it again and again, hearing of men who had been beaten to death or shot, meeting men who had come back from concentration camps deaf or gruesomely mangled from tortures, seeing too the subtler expressions of reaction in the distorted newspapers, in the songs, the interminable parades and flags and uniforms, the scientific seduction of youth to the purposes of the regime.

In one town I visited a family I had known from days before Hitler. They lived in a working-class suburb. They had been revolutionaries. Now they are Nazis. The young husband looked away from me and shrugged. "One must live," he said. "I've been out of work for a year and a half. Now I have a job."

To them Nazism is a cloak of convenience. But when, sitting at their table, I lighted a cigarette, the three-year-old daughter jumped up and down on her chair shrieking, "Deutsche Frauen rauchen nicht" (German women don't smoke). She had absorbed the slogans that are plastered across new Germany even before she could read them. As I left the family I said goodby with the old phrase "Guten Tag." The girl ran after me, beating at me with puny fists and crying, "Heil Hitler, Heil Hitler," shocked at the tragic breach of etiquette.

I went to visit a boy of thirteen. His mother is dead. His father, a refugee, I had met in England. His guardian, appointed by the municipality, is a Nazi. The lad stood before me in a brown uniform, the swastika on his sleeve. He couldn't get an apprentice job until he joined the Hitler youth. He said to me, "Tell my father that little Peter is still a Communist under his brown shirt."

Later, when I spoke to his father, the exile laughed with tears of pride in his eyes. But I didn't share his confidence in little Peter. Talking to the boy I could see the inroads of Nazification—brown ideas creeping into his mental pattern, brown phrases creeping into his speech. In his home, at his work, in his troop, he is permeated by Hitlerism. The regime continually tightens its grasp on youth and organizations with influence. This summer, for example, school teachers in many German towns had no vacation. Instead, they went to a summer training camp to become more effective canals for pouring the new German spirit into their pupils.

The tide of the terror in all its forms is flowing high. Prices are mounting, wages falling; the Reich has neither credits, raw materials, nor markets; a wheat and potato shortage is looming this winter; and the nearing threat of inevitable war is the constant thought of the man on the street.

Hitler's answer to all this is even swifter reaction, a renewed drive on the revolutionaries, more refined tortures in the concentration camps, accompanied by sloppier and sloppier propaganda in the press lauding the new spirit of unity and love, the new Germany of peace and employment, the Führer and his achievements.

Does he get away with it?

In every factory two or three or four or half a dozen radical workers form a cell. Theirs is the task of talking to their fellow-workers, of gauging satisfactions and dissatisfactions, of pointing out the truth behind the smiling propaganda front, of distributing the illegal literature. From the factory cells the reports go to central committees, where they assemble bit by bit into a picture of public opinion in Germany today. They show a growing spirit of resistance, a resistance that is sadly feeble and fearful and inarticulate but a thousand times stronger than it was during the first terror when Hitler had just come to power.

The SA takes up continual collections in the factories. Formerly it was an automatic procedure; no man dared refuse his contribution. But now there are delinquents. In one factory with sixty workers, when a collection list came around no one signed, not even the Meister (foreman). The SA laid down the law to the Meister and he signed. But when the list was circulated again, only five men signed. All the workers in the shop were called to a meeting. It was made clear to them that they were to sign for their own good. Despite this, fifteen out of the sixty failed to sign when the list came around for the third time.

All German workers belong to the Arbeitsfront, which has replaced the suppressed free trade unions. Attendance at meetings is compulsory; it is usually achieved by marching the workers in closed ranks directly from the factory to the meeting hall. At the Zeiss factory many workers broke from the ranks and refused to go to the Arbeitsfront. So an SA detachment was sent to guard the factory gates at closing time and keep the ranks tight on the way. When the workers came out they refused to march. After a stalemate of a few moments one worker broke through the SA ranks. Others streamed through the gap after him. The SA could do little. Attendance at the Arbeitsfront meeting was only about 50 per cent. At another Arbeitsfront the committee was arranging a parade—one of the parades that replace food and freedom in new Germany. But this parade was difficult to arrange. Out of four hundred workers they could not find ten willing to be seen on the streets carrying the swastika-blazoned banners of the organization.

There is one story I like. It is the perfect expression of inchoate German protes ttoday. I was in a train compartment with two Germans. One was an ecstatic Nazi. He talked of the new Germany, of peace, love, brotherhood, of the classless state. The other traveler sat very quietly. He had, I sensed, a neutral-pinkish opposition. At last he spoke.

"None the less," he said, "locomotive drivers in America get more pay than drivers in Germany."

"That is not true," argued the Nazi. "It is a lie of the foreign press. Locomotive drivers in Germany are paid as well as anywhere."

A station later the Nazi got off. The other looked around and then leaned over and whispered to me, "You know, locomotive drivers in America do get more than in Germany. I know. I'm a locomotive driver."

We talked for a few minutes more. He was very excited to find that I had been in Russia. He asked me how conditions were in Russia.

"Well," I replied, "You must understand that even in Russia there are some bad things."

"I can understand that," he said. "You know—even in Germany there are some good things."

The Shipping Conspiracy

By WILLIAM ADAMS

I

THERE is probably no subject of national importance about which the American public knows and cares less than it does about deep-water merchant shipping. There is nothing remarkable in this fact. America is a continental nation most of whose population dwells inland, its internal commerce greatly outweighs its foreign, and in its economy nationally owned, overseas shipping has not had, since the Civil War, any fundamental place. On the other hand—and this is remarkable—no other industry in the United States has been the object of so many favors from the government, including gifts from the national treasury. In fact, no other nation pampers and protects its shipowners to the same extent as the United States.

The purpose of the expensive nation-wide "educational" campaign that has been conducted during the years since the war by the American Steamship Owners' Association and the National Council of Shipbuilders has not been, of course, to provide the American public with any true information about shipping. It has been rather an effort to make the American people "ship-minded" by presenting to them, through lectures, teachers, and writers, all the misinformation about shipping conceivable. One form of this propaganda was exhibited recently in the conduct of the press toward the Senate's inquiry into ocean-mail contracts. Almost simultaneously in newspapers throughout the country there appeared editorials which attempted to minimize the significance of the facts disclosed by the investigation and to fix attention on a side issue. All of them ran somewhat like this: "Evidence of bribery and favoritism in the awarding of mail contracts is deplorable, but most of the men responsible are either dead, out of office, or absent from the country. Evidence that lines have been receiving as much as $75,000 for carrying a pound of mail should disturb no one. The subsidies are given for other—and profounder—reasons than carrying mail. Nothing that the investigation uncovers should be allowed to obscure the vital necessity that exists for subsidizing our shipping. By abolishing the postal subsidies and giving the shipowners an outright subsidy all reform necessary should be accomplished."

At the outset let us clear up the popular misconception that our subsidized shipping constitutes the entire American merchant marine. In reality our privately owned, salt-water shipping is divided into three fleets: coastwise and intercoastal, industrial (that is, ships transporting their owners' products, mainly oil, steel, and fruit), and foreign. The first two are, or at least ought to be, self-supporting; they exist because there is an economic necessity for them. The third, on the ground that it is necessary to the nation but cannot compete with foreign shipping, receives a subsidy. This subsidized overseas shipping constitutes only a fifth of our privately owned, salt-water merchant marine. Of our whole merchant marine, which includes the government's tonnage, laid up and in overseas trade, and the millions of tons of shipping on the Great Lakes, it is a very small part. The fact is that even if the United States did not spend one penny on subsidy, it would still be the second maritime Power in the world.

To understand how our present overseas shipping came into being we must turn back to the beginning of the World War. Subsidy advocates never grow tired of describing for us the pitiful situation in which the nation is supposed to have found itself, first in 1914 and again in 1917, because it had "no merchant marine." From their accounts of these critical years they omit, however, everything significant. In the first place, it is not true to say that in 1914 we had "no merchant marine." Even before the opening of the Panama Canal, which has created our tremendous intercoastal trade, we had as much shipping under our flag as Germany, and more than any other nation except Great Britain. It is true that we had only 750,000 tons of shipping in foreign trade. But let us see what was the reason for this small figure.

Our coastwise trade was protected, that is, restricted to vessels flying the American flag. Our shipbuilders had a monopoly of building for the American flag, and as a consequence American yards were able to charge $70 a ton for a ship that could be purchased in England for $40 a ton. But whoever wished to enter our unrestricted foreign trade had to buy his ships as cheaply as his foreign competitors bought theirs. That meant that he had to buy them abroad and to operate them, therefore, under a foreign flag. This arrangement suited our shipbuilders. They could charge the highest prices in the world and yet have a monopoly of the building in our choicest trade. And it suited the shipowners who were engaged in that trade. They were willing to pay the builders' price because that same price made impossible the creation of American overseas shipping, which, had it existed, would have constituted a threat to their monopoly because it might at any slack season have been diverted into the coastwise trade. Actually at the outbreak of the war there were 2,000,000 tons of American-owned shipping engaged in overseas trade, but it was foreign-built and operated under foreign flags.

When the government proposed in its 1915 shipping bill to build tonnage of its own to stop the rate profiteering of the shipping lines, some shipowners, by engineering the longest filibuster in the history of the Senate, prevented the bill's passage. It was enacted the following year after President Wilson had sent Cabinet members on country-wide tours to awaken the country to the seriousness of the shipping situation. The delay, profitable as it was to the shipowners, sent us into the war without the merchant fleet we should otherwise have had.

The unhappy fact that the nation spent some $3,600,000,000 on a "war-time" shipbuilding program is also used, in season and out, as an argument for subsidies: "Let us never be caught again without a merchant marine. Because we had none at the outbreak of the war we had to spend this great sum to build one." In reality this "war-time" fleet was built not during the war but after the war. Hog Island, where the greatest number of these "war-time" vessels were built, delivered its first ship one month after the Armistice. In 1919, 3,579,826 tons were launched—not delivered. In 1920 there was no slackening in this building mania, and it continued through 1921 and into 1922 until 7,250,000 tons of steel shipping and almost 1,000,000 tons of wood and concrete had been constructed. "War hysteria" is the reason usually given for this building program. It was really caused by a cool-headed combination of politicians, shipbuilders, and steel-makers.

Another current idea is the belief that prior to 1928 our overseas shipping was owned and operated by the government, but that since the passage of the Jones-White Act it has been maintained by private enterprise. This is likewise untrue. The shipping that the government owned before 1928 it did not operate. Nor is our overseas shipping maintained today by private enterprise; the government owns about 60 per cent of every vessel constructed by private enterprise since 1928, and toward the operation of these and other vessels it is now pledged to contribute about $27,500,000 each year.

The Republican administrations of the '20's were in office mainly to uphold the rights of private business. Every statement about shipping made by Coolidge or Hoover harped on the inevitable appearance, under government ownership, of bureaucratic waste, political pressure, dulled private initiative as a result of government competition. This was the government's attitude toward government ownership. But, alas, it owned millions of tons of "war-built" ships that it could neither sell nor operate. How, then, did it solve this dilemma? After scrapping, at the behest of the shipowners and the shipbuilders—who had built them—the greater number of these ships, it simply surrendered the rest to the shipowners. Thenceforward the shipowners dictated the government's shipping policy, controlled the Shipping Board, and had all their schemes supported in Congress by the Republican majority.

First, the lines that the Shipping Board had established were turned over to managers, our present-day shipowners, who, until they were ready to buy them, were to operate them for the government. The lines received a commission on the gross value of cargo carried and in addition a husbanding fee regardless of whether the ships made a profit or loss. Naturally, no profits were reported. It was to the manager's advantage to show as large a deficit as he could; not only so that he might be reimbursed for it, but even more because he knew that when he was ready to purchase the line a subsidy sufficient to offset his probable operating loss would be given to him, and that its size would be figured on the basis of previous deficits. How the managers enlarged their losses by creating subsidiary companies to perform their lines' stevedoring services at exorbitant cost, by padding pay rolls, and by dishonest accounting has been brought to light recently by the Senate investigation. Under this system, government participation in shipping was proved to be extraordinarily expensive, impractical, and corrupt. And this was exactly what both the government and the managers were desirous of proving. It was made plain that the government must get entirely out of shipping, at any price.

The next move was an offer from the government to sell the lines to their managers, in some cases for one-quarter of what the steel in them had cost. This very low price was a subsidy—a tremendous one. A ship's fixed charges, those for depreciation, interest, and insurance, are derived from her original cost and are normally from 25 to 40 per cent of her operating cost. They are the only part of her whole expense, except the minor one of wages, in which she can enjoy a differential over rival ships. Charges for fuel and stores are practically identical for the ships of every nation. With this subsidy offered to them, did the managers take the ships, go out, and show what private enterprise could do? They did not. They wanted the ships, but they wanted something more—mail subsidies. Not until these were offered to them by the Jones-White Act were they ready to purchase the ships.

Needless to say, the shipowners were able to advance numerous arguments to prove that these subsidies were necessary. They have maintained, for example, (1) that the freight money paid by Americans to shipping lines for carrying their commerce should go to American lines, not to foreign; (2) that nationally owned overseas shipping is necessary to our foreign commerce; (3) that merchant shipping is a valuable adjunct of national defense; (4) that Americans should not be denied sea-going careers. Let us take these up in order.

1. "Of what benefit is a balance of trade in our favor if we pay most of it out for freight?" is a typical query used by the propagandists for a subsidy, and the argument is invariably reinforced with the assertion that the nation's annual ocean freight bill is from $200,000,000 to $400,000,000. There is one sure way of reducing this freight bill: that is to reduce the volume of our foreign trade. And this is exactly what we are doing by subsidizing shipping in an effort to have a greater percentage of our foreign commerce carried in American ships. It must by now be apparent to everyone that those abroad who buy our goods must pay for them in goods or services. Before the war foreign nations were able, in great part, to pay us for our goods by carrying our commerce, that is, by carrying those goods. For half a century the volume of our commerce and the size of our favorable trade balance steadily increased, while the percentage of our commerce which was carried in American vessels steadily decreased.

2. Is nationally owned overseas shipping necessary to our foreign trade? In considering the first argument of the subsidists we have already touched on this question. It is claimed that nationally owned shipping protects our industries from onerous freight rates that foreign lines would combine to impose on it. Now of course combinations of shipowners ("conferences") do exist. But the idea that American lines stand outside them offering our shipowners lower rates is absurd. They are all members of the same conferences.

3. As for national defense, the question is bound up with the course of the next war. This much may be hazarded: should we go to war against England and should she gain control of the sea, our merchant shipping would be of no more use to us than was Germany's in the last war. It would be tied up in port, and it would not matter whether we had much or little of it. However, the possibility of our fighting England is one that only insane men entertain. Our next war, we may assume, will find England either neutral or allied with us. We shall then, since we are the second maritime Power, have control of the sea. If we want to increase the amount of our merchant shipping we may do so by chartering vessels from neutral nations, as we did in the World War. And without the expenditure of one penny upon subsidies we should still possess, in the event of war, our industrial, coastwise and intercoastal, West Indies and Caribbean, government-owned, and lake tonnage.

4. The shipowners have based their demand for a subsidy in part on the assertion that they are maintaining American wages and standards of living aboard their ships. In the light of their actual treatment of labor this is the most dishonest and hypocritical of all their assertions. The shipowners got their ships so cheaply that the only disadvantageous operating differential between them and their foreign competitors is one of wages. For years they were busy drawing up tables comparing American and foreign wage scales. The American averages were made up partly from the pay rolls of industrial carriers, such as oil-tankers, which pay comparatively high wages but are not subsidized, and so have no bearing on the question. The foreign figures were computed in American dollars according to the depreciated values of foreign currencies, and gave, of course, no indication of their purchasing power. By these methods some interesting results were arrived at, but after America went off the gold standard, their significance was lost.

If there are any real differences between American and foreign wages, what would they amount to in total operating costs? On a cargo ship wages comprise about 7 per cent, on a passenger ship about 15 per cent, of total operating expense. Therefore a difference in wages as great as 30 per cent would work out as an operating differential of only 2 or 4 per cent. In reality, however, the difference between American and foreign wages is much less than is commonly supposed. Before me is a list made up recently in the office of the United States Shipping Commission in New York showing wages paid aboard twenty-one vessels of as many companies. Ten of these ships are operated by subsidized lines (Munson, United States Lines, South African, Black Diamond, United Fruit, Export, Columbia, Barber, Grace, Moore and McCormack). The average monthly wages of the crews of the ten vessels are: able seaman, $47; ordinary seaman, $34; oiler, $55; fireman, $47.50; wiper, $35.50; mess, $32.50. The wages paid on these same vessels when the Shipping Board owned them—that is, before subsidies to maintain American wage standards were heard of—were: able seaman, $62.50; ordinary seaman, $47.50; oiler, $72.50; fireman, $65; wiper, $57.50; mess, $42. Some lines have even gone so far as to undercut this reduced wage scale.

If any operating differential does exist between our subsidized shipping companies and their foreign competitors it is not the result of the seamen's meager wages. There are other factors to account for it—the exorbitant salaries, bonuses, and "commissions" of the officers of the lines (Dollar Line, $14,690,528 in nine years to four men); the thousands of dollars spent on "entertaining" in Washington; the fees paid to lobbyists and Washington lawyers (I. M. M., $587,000 in five years); and the sums spent for propaganda.

The conduct of the government here has been so stupid and spineless that no indictment of it can be too strong. It presents the shipowners with millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money to make up for their higher operating costs and yet makes no effort to ascertain whether these really exist or in what they consist. For an ostensible 2 per cent or 4 per cent wage differential it gives them a subsidy two or three times greater than the total annual wages, from the masters down, of their entire fleet; yet it makes no attempt to see that the wages they pay are even fair.

[Part II of this article, discussing individual mail subsidies, will appear next week.]

A Message to Uncle Tom

By SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

THE night was fearfully hot, and for a time it looked as if the last session of the Labor Institute which the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters was conducting at the 135th Street Library in Harlem would be poorly attended. That would have been unfortunate, for the full-dress speaker of the occasion was none other than Dr. Gustav Peck, executive director of the National Labor Advisory Board. The general subject under discussion at the four sessions of the institute was "Negro Labor and the National Recovery Program"; and it had got round that the Administration had decided the occasion was auspicious for making Dr. Peck's address its pronouncement to the Negro world, which was known to be restive under the New Deal. As the meeting got under way, the audience began to arrive, and at least half of the late comers were in the rough garb of manual workers. The Administration was speaking to Negro labor, was it? Well, Negro labor would hear what it had to say.

If Dr. Peck had come expecting that "it might be worse" would prove a soothing argument, he was quickly undeceived. He was preceded by Professor Emmett E. Dorsey of Howard University, speaking on "The Future of the Negro and the Recovery Program." And Professor Dorsey keyed up the audience to quite a pitch of skepticism by maintaining that if the recovery program had a future, the Negro, under it, had not—and no more had the white worker. Why had the NRA become steadily more compliant with the demands of employers and more contemptuous of the demands of labor? Because government is necessarily responsive to pressures. The NRA was under constant pressure from the most highly organized, articulate, and powerful groups in the country—the owners and employers. Labor, white and black, was inarticulate and weak. The A. F. of L., which claimed to represent labor, was, because of its reactionary leadership and its antiquated craft unionism, unequal to the task of organizing or leading it.

Understanding how things were done in Washington, said Mr. Dorsey, we could also understand why the NRA had allowed Negro workers to be paid less than white workers under the codes. The differentials had been established by usage, but the Administration had given them the force of law. Why? Because Southern employers were articulate and influential. They went to Washington and argued that the cost of living was lower in the South. What they called a lower cost of living was really a lower standard, forced upon the workers by starvation wages. The employers had also argued that Negro workers were inefficient. Why wouldn't they be? They were persecuted, lynched, kept in ignorance, underpaid. Were they likely to become more efficient so long as the government recognized discrimination and sanctioned it in the codes?

The only hope Mr. Dorsey could see for the Negro was in organization—not Negro organization, but the organization of workers, black and white, to work shoulder to shoulder in defense of their rights. For labor need expect nothing from employers or from government that it was not prepared to fight for.

Warm applause for Mr. Dorsey. The chairman introduced the Administration. Warm applause for the Administration.

The apologist for the New Deal spoke easily. Being himself a union-labor man, he knew better than to patronize his audience or to throw it too many sops of political hokum. Dr. Peck said he hadn't known until he saw the printed program that he was supposed to address the meeting on "The Philosophy Back of the NRA." He had expected to discuss the differentials. However, he would do a little of both.

His definition of the philosophy was significant, not because it was news to anyone present, but because its explicit statement by a spokesman for the Administration was news. There seemed, he said, to be a lot of confusion about the nature of the NIRA. A good many people seemed to be aggrieved because it wasn't socialism or communism. They should remember that this was a Democratic Administration. The NIRA was a "sweeping but capitalist and conservative measure of reform," designed not to change the existing capitalist order but to preserve it. If labor wasn't pleased with it, that was just too bad. The purpose of the minimum wages set in the codes was to increase buying power; providing a living wage for workers was no part of it. If the minimums set under the codes were in some cases insufficient to support the recipients, that was also too bad. The Administration had done the best it could. It was under tremendous pressure from the employers. We might laugh at Mr. Mellon and the other representatives of big business. The NRA officials couldn't; they were too powerful. That, I think, about sums up Mr. Peck's remarks on the philosophy of the NRA. When he spoke of it as "revolution," the audience roared.

Dr. Peck deplored the fact that the large majority of Negro workers were agricultural and therefore not eligible to enjoy the blessings of the NRA, and the further fact that most Negroes in industry were unskilled and therefore able to enjoy those blessings only in moderation. When it came to the differentials, he had opposed them at first, but he was beginning to doubt the wisdom of his stand. Southern employers had advanced convincing arguments—he did not mention that they were "organized, articulate, and powerful." They had said: "We are in a primitive state of industrial development; we aren't as efficient as the North. We haven't the long industrial tradition of the North, and we haven't the skilled immigrant workers to draw on. We must be allowed to pay lower wages." (What about those "fair practices" provisions, Dr. Peck? If they could be used to protect Northern coal companies against competition from the product of low-paid Southern labor, why not use them to protect Southern industrialists in paying the Northern wage?)

Even the Negro community itself, he said, seemed to be divided on this question of differentials. Certain Negro investigators had actually recommended them (murmurs of "lickspittles," "kept Negro economists," from the audience). Without the differentials wouldn't Negro workers be worse off? The Southern employers might close their shops, and where would the workers be then? He thought it likely that even under the present codes the position of Negro workers had improved. And he called attention to the service the Labor Advisory Board had performed in keeping the word "Negro" out of the codes. As they stood they applied to all Southern workers. Certain employers had tried to get authority to pay less than minimum wages to "subnormal" workers, meaning Negroes; but the NRA had nobly refused to stand for it. So things might have been worse. There was a lot of criticism from arm-chair authorities living below Fourteenth Street and writing for the liberal magazines. Let critics at least ascertain the facts; let them go into Southern communities, talk to Negro preachers (laughter so loud and long that it drowned the rest of the sentence).

At last Dr. Peck said he'd like to know how that audience felt about the differentials, and in general about the NRA. He really knew very little about how the Negroes were feeling. He hoped to be enlightened by the discussion.

He was. In the response of that Negro audience there was plenty of light but no sweetness. It happened that George Streeter was pinch-hitting for Frank R. Crosswaith as leader of the discussion; and Mr. Streeter was roiled. He remarked that Dr. Peck had made it quite clear that the NRA expected to save capital at the expense of labor; he pooh-poohed the pretense that the NIRA constituted anything revolutionary or that the New Deal meant anything more than the old deal for labor. He likewise invited the audience to bear in mind that Dr. Peck was a labor man who had put himself in the pay of the Administration and thereby acquired a vested interest in Administration propaganda. Mr. Streeter called to the platform John Davis, head of the Joint Board for National Recovery (not a government organization). Mr. Davis went, and when he stepped down he had brought out some interesting facts: that General Johnson has steadily refused to see representatives of Negro workers; that no statistical bureau of the government has allowed itself to be persuaded to investigate the effects of the NRA on Negro workers; that in his own investigations, which had taken him over some seven thousand miles of territory, he had found innumerable instances of chiseling on the part of employers, with the Administration doing nothing to protect even such rights as Negro labor had under the codes.

But the most telling criticism came from the manual workers in the audience. Here were no arm-chair critics; each worker, as he rose, gave his name, trade, and union affiliation. They were untutored, but they spoke remarkably well, with a fervor derived from their sense of wrong and with the simple directness of speakers unembarrassed by having to make a case. By the time the discussion period was over we had listened to story after story of discrimination against black workers by all the agencies of government having to do with labor. One union official told how he had been snubbed at the New York offices of the NRA until it was found that he was there representing white workers. Another told how the daily minimum in his trade, which used to be five dollars, had been reduced to four. Another brought out the fact that skilled Negro workers were ineligible for PWA jobs because they were black; another how Negroes were discriminated against in the granting of relief. They demolished the argument that Southern industry must be nursed along at the expense of labor by pointing out that Northern industrialists had moved South precisely because Southern labor was cheap. They asked why the government was allowing the burden of price-lifting to be placed squarely on the backs of the workers. They brought out that the differentials in the coal codes were obviously aimed at Negro labor. They hammered the whole labor policy of the NRA. And they repudiated the suggestion that labor support a scheme admittedly designed to benefit the exploiters of labor.

In rebuttal Dr. Peck said he wished he could persuade his hearers to give the NRA a chance. After all, it was only nine months old, and had within it great possibilities of usefulness. Already it had abolished child labor, established the forty-hour week (he didn't mention the 211 exceptions), and taught employers to think of labor as something more than a large item in the cost of production. It had also established the wonderful principle of settling disputes by conference (cries of "What about Toledo, Minneapolis, San Francisco?"). The audience might object to Section 7-a (cries, "We don't object to it; we object because the government hasn't enforced it"), but it was a great charter of rights for labor. And labor was taking advantage of it; vide the tremendous increase of labor-union membership. And if labor didn't like the deal it was getting under the codes, why didn't it take advantage of Section 7-a? Why didn't it organize? He was a labor man himself; he believed labor should organize and insist upon its rights instead of running to the government with complaints. If labor didn't give the NRA a chance it might get something much worse—"for you can't go back, you know" (cries, "We'll go forward, to a workers' society!").

It was very late and warmer than ever, but the audience was too excited to notice either the hour or the heat. Its members were filled with the exhilaration of the chase; they would have kept it up all night if the chairman had not called off the final impromptu speakers and adjourned the meeting. In their faces as they filed out was the glow of satisfaction that comes from work well done. The Administration had spoken to the Negro, and it had been taught that the Negro is not to be safely treated as a dumb and faithful Uncle Tom, devoted to the interests of his white master and conveniently meek about his own.

Burlingame Public Library Burlingame, Cal.

Was Europe a Success?
IV. Some Doubts Arrived At (cont.)

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

EARLIER in this discussion it was remarked that the revolutionist is usually one who began as a reformer and whose first aim was not the destruction of European civilization but the spread to all classes of what he came later to regard as contemptible bourgeois luxuries and absurd bourgeois delusions. Even now, of course, individual revolutionists often disagree among themselves concerning the ultimate desirability of individualism and freedom in the ideal society of the future. Some at least—and this is probably the official doctrine—profess to believe that both will be reestablished at some remote period when the perfect world state, composed exclusively of reconditioned men, has been set up. Yet even these enthusiastically accept the paradoxical doctrine that the only means of attaining this perfect freedom for the future involves for the present the rigid suppression of nearly all specific freedoms. Of the latter they speak with so bitterly unqualified a contempt that it is hard to take very seriously the admiration they sometimes profess for the ideal itself; and certainly Russia, despite frequent announcements that this or that institution is being liberalized, does not actually seem to be hastening very rapidly in the direction of individual freedom.

On the one hand we are assured that it is the most stable government in the world today; on the other we are sometimes assured that the freedom permitted in capitalistic countries is impossible there because the unsettled state of affairs makes stern measures against counter-revolution absolutely necessary. The fair conclusion, therefore, seems to be either that the government is much less popular and stable than we have been assured or—what is more probable—that the habit of prohibition and censorship has taken such a firm hold upon the minds of the rulers that they naturally think of government in terms of both.

Certainly the experience of the past would seem to indicate that the habit is one far more easy to form than to break, and we are permitted to doubt whether a ruling class long accustomed to despotism and a people long accustomed to the minute regulation of its thoughts as well as its deeds actually form a combination likely to preserve the European tradition we have so often referred to. Hence the defenders of the European man—those who hope for a better world but recoil at the idea of a totally different one—naturally suspect even those revolutionists who profess the intention to restore, after having destroyed, the traditions which are the necessary accompaniment of his existence.

They can imagine this man preserving himself defiantly against long-continued tyrannies. They can imagine him surviving for generations in an atmosphere charged with resentment against possibly inevitable periods of oppression. But they cannot imagine him giving up the ideal itself; they cannot imagine him actually embracing, with that joyous enthusiasm which the revolutionists recommend, even a temporarily blind acceptance of official dogma and an even temporary destruction of the individual personality as such; they cannot imagine it without at least perceiving the grave danger that he would destroy himself in the process.

The European man was almost destroyed once before when the civilization of the ancient world went down. It required between 1,000 and 1,500 years for him to begin the reestablishment of himself, and if he were to go down again he would probably go either forever, as the most radical proponents of the new beginning seem to hope, or at least for many generations to come. The new Middle Ages would not be brief, and to the liberal it appears that a new Middle Age is what the most radical of the radicals seem to be proposing. Indeed, it sometimes seems as he reads the writings of revolutionary thinkers that it has already begun; that he can easily detect in them a way of thinking which seems, by its combination of brutally sweeping general principles with bitter theological disputes over fine points of doctrine, more like the thinking of the Middle Ages than anything which has appeared since the Middle Ages closed.

The intellectual who feels this medievalism hopelessly alien, to whom it seems something which he does not and cannot ever expect to understand, may feel himself quite incompetent to discuss the economic forces which—so he is assured—make necessary its development. He may even be convinced that the economic system of the modern world has outlived its day and cannot possibly last much longer. But even granting the possibility that the most radical radicals are right in their main contentions, he feels himself on surer ground in asserting that, however right they may be in their conclusions, both their thinking and their writing certainly lack all those secondary virtues which are commonly implied when we speak of anything or anyone as "civilized." The thinking and the writing are dogmatic, harsh, and intolerant. They are full of an intense and burning hatred for that urbanity, detachment, and sense of fair play which make thinking amiable and which liberals pretend, at least, to admire.

When we have gone this far we may go one step further and wonder if these "secondary virtues" are really secondary; if, in the last analysis, it is possible to be really right without them. One may wonder, and one's wonder may grow as one begins to realize how much the thinking of the radical resembles the thinking of his bitterest enemy, the fascist, in respect to the absence of these secondary virtues. The two parties have arrived at what are usually thought of as diametrically opposed conclusions by mental processes very similar, and it may be suggested as a possibility that the most important, the most fundamental thing is rather the manner or the temper than the conclusions themselves. Is it not possible that, from the intellectual standpoint, the really significant thing is less whether a man is a doctrinaire communist or a doctrinaire fascist than whether or not he has the kind of mind to which the dogmatisms and over-simplifications of either are congenial?

To compare—from this perhaps prejudiced standpoint—the writings of many fascists or of many communists with the writings of the now despised liberals is to be struck with a difference which seems much like the difference one perceives in passing from, say, Plato to Tertullian. The important thing is not whether Plato was right in his conclusions. The important thing is that Plato had what the modern European man calls a civilized mind, while Tertullian had what this same man would call a barbarous one; that, in short, the one lived in a mental world where whatever realities lie behind the conceptions of fair-mindedness and detachment were tremendously important, while the other lived in a world where the only important thing was to make sure that you came out at sound doctrine and gave no comfort to the devil. Our liberal intellectual remembers one peculiarly dark period in world history which is occupied by the doings of the people of Byzantium. These doings are particularly hard to understand because they involve what seems to us a peculiarly absurd combination of passionate concern for theological orthodoxy with extraordinary brutality in daily life. But when he listens to the harangues of certain revolutionists he seems to see, dreadfully foreshadowed, a period strikingly like the Byzantium epoch in certain essential characteristics. What seems to be promised is, on the one hand, the same rule of violence in practical life and, on the other, a tendency to reduce all intellectual life to a state where it is concerned with nothing except essentially theological debates concerning the meaning of dialectical materialism—a subject which appears already to have become as subtle, as well as often about as meaningful, as that which had to do with the Homoosian and Homousian doctrines. In other words, what the liberal intellectual has come to fear is less communism or fascism as forms of society than what he feels justified in calling the Byzantine mind.

The official comment of the radical upon all such fears as this is a simple one. It is merely that to entertain them at all, even to understand what they mean, is thereby to demonstrate oneself a typical, uneducatable product of that rotten bourgeois civilization which is about to pass away forever. It may be so. But if it actually is, then the argument is nearly concluded. The thing about to pass away is not merely a form of society and not merely certain aspects of human nature generally regarded as unlovely, but the European man himself.

Was this European man a success? Probably most persons will agree that his success as a political animal was far less than complete, that physically, at least, the world he made for himself and his fellows was not as satisfactory a one as it is reasonable to hope for. But the success of his philosophy and science and art, the richness of his world of thoughts and feelings, may well command greater admiration. In respect to his achievements in those fields he seems to compare very favorably indeed with any other sort of man we know anything about. And it is on the question of his value that the liberal parts definitely from the radical. To the latter, that man is doomed already. Away with him! The former is not so ready to accept as demonstrably "inevitable" whatever coming events he does not yet know exactly how to prevent. Neither has he any enthusiasm for a method of saving the world which begins by destroying him and his kind. He thinks the world hardly worth saving unless one can save along with it that part of Europe which was a success.

[This is the concluding article of Mr. Krutch's series.]

Utopia Incorporated

By MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD

San Francisco, August 24

WHILE Upton Sinclair has been giving the jitters to all the other California Democratic gubernatorial candidates with his alluring Epic Plan, another movement, born in Los Angeles and spreading like a flu epidemic through the State and eastward, has been making Sinclair's glittering promises look like the benefactions of a miser. Out of Technocracy by Bellamy's "Looking Backward," with a dash of Buchmanism to give it a fillip, the Utopian Society is sweeping the Pacific Coast. Only a few months after its birth in the fertile brains of E. J. Reed, Merritt Kennedy, and W. H. Rousseau, its incorporators, it already claims more than 150,000 members—or "hermits," for every initiated Utopian is a "hermit." It has conquered southern California and now, though coolly received in sophisticated San Francisco, is ravaging the East Bay. Howard Brubaker's characterization of it as "the millennium on the easy-payment plan" is the most apt yet given it.

It is difficult to present in detail the philosophy of the Utopians, though there have been plenty of leaks from among its supposedly secret membership. The plan has taken in features of almost every modern economic scheme, from fascism to communism. In so far as it is consciously directed to a system of production for use instead of for profit, it is essentially socialistic. On the other hand, it has in its make-up a good many reminders of the Nazi prospectus. It is, in other words, all things to all men—especially to all men untrained in economics, and suffering either through unemployment or through loss of income in the present depression.

The Utopian appeal is aimed at the same people who become Elks and Redmen; it is conducted on the lines of a secret society, with all the trimmings of ritual and passwords and mystery. The applicant is blindfolded and conducted into a room where he witnesses a pageant in four "cycles." The first two of these tableaux portray the sufferings of the exploited under capitalism, the next two the beginning of the pilgrimage to the Land of Utopia. The pilgrims make three stops, before a grain merchant, a clothing merchant, and a money lender. Each of these in turn loads the unfortunate pilgrim with chains, shackling his progress. But they themselves become entangled in the chains of this "triple profit," and eventually are forced to join the pilgrimage.

At a later meeting the fifth, sixth, and seventh cycles are given. In these the newly made hermit sees the chains cast off and witnesses the glories of Utopia. There everything is under central control by a governing board. There is no profit, and no competition. All young people go to public schools and colleges until they are twenty-five. From twenty-five to forty-five everybody works, three hours a day. Each worker has a number and receives his pay in paper money with his number on it. It cannot be saved or accumulated and must be spent within a year. Anyone refusing to work is given a medical examination, and if he is found to be in good health physically and mentally he is listed as a slacker and cast out to starve. At forty-five the Utopian ceases to work, and henceforth enjoys an income of $200 a month—which makes Upton Sinclair's old-age pension of $50 a month for all persons who are over sixty look cheap indeed.

All this paradise is, of course, not disclosed at once to the neophyte. Before he witnesses even the first cycle he has been questioned concerning his social and economic views, and has been required to take two oaths—one of secrecy in regard to the society, the other to uphold the Constitution of the United States. He is also requested to pay an initiation fee, which is $3, though as little as $1 is accepted. Further dues are ten cents a month "from those that can afford it." Unemployed hermits are let in free. However, no applicant is considered unless he brings two more with him, and each of these must bring two more to the next meeting, and so on in an endless chain which if fully applied would soon involve the entire population of the nation.

The meetings between the pageants are modeled after the Oxford Group. They are held by preference in the homes of hermits, with no more than twenty present, and consist of lectures on such subjects as "Money and Its Effects," "The Improvement of Society," and "The Machine Versus Man-Power," with later discussions by the group. Also, each new hermit is requested to write a letter to President Roosevelt commending his efforts in the New Deal and asking him to persevere in working toward the redistribution of wealth. These letters are signed, not by names, but by numbers; for each hermit receives a number by which he is henceforth known within the society and which, presumably, will some day be printed on the paper money he will receive for work done after Utopia is reached. Incidentally, these numbers provide fine publicity, for as they mount to higher and higher figures they inform the president and the general public of the increasing growth of the society. The hand of an advertising expert is very clearly shown in the entire conduct of the organization.

One thing that has politicians in California very badly worried is the probability that all these secretly bound hermits, who may number 300,000 by November, are pledged to some one candidate for governor. In southern California they believe that candidate may be Upton Sinclair, but the Utopian scheme conflicts in so many particulars with the Epic Plan that this seems unlikely. Whoever the choice may prove to be, he is going to be handed an enormous vote on a silver platter, and the Utopian ballots may very well make the difference between election and defeat. It is this uncertainty which has prevented any serious overt attack on the society by newspapers and politicians, in spite of its socialistic tinge and its tolerant lukewarmness on the subject of communism in the midst of the frenzied war against the reds now being conducted in California. Some commentators even allege Utopia to be a by-product of the Communist Party, which is, of course, ridiculous; but only the Better America Federation of Los Angeles, which has issued a pamphlet "exposing" the society, and the Argonaut of San Francisco, the voice of similar groups in northern California, have come out boldly and heatedly against it.

Only one thing can check the rapid growth of Utopia in a State so largely made up, especially in the south, of petty bourgeois of all varieties. That thing is dissension within the ranks; and there are indications that it has begun. The three incorporators, who presumably are to be the first trustees, are said already to be quarreling. One of them, it is rumored, wants to end the secrecy feature of the movement and open its meetings, plans, and ritual to the general public, and though the other two are opposed to this, the dissentient is reported to be gaining ground. It is thanks to this controversy that so much information concerning the inner workings of this mysterious movement, at first closely concealed and guarded, is now coming out into the open and even breaking into print.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter, who has heard a great deal about the class struggle recently, feels that it is time somebody said a good word for the Arkansas mules. There, at least, is a class, or a species, which has succeeded, whether by shrewd tactics or mere obstinacy, in maintaining something that approximates the American standard of living. When the FERA came to Arkansas, so the Drifter is informed, there was some difficulty about imposing the minimum FERA wage scale of 30 cents an hour and $2.40 a day upon the local politicians who administered the relief projects. The latter insisted that the local scale of 75 cents a day for Negro laborers was ample; that Negroes receiving this wage were "fat and sassy"; and that their picturesquely large families were both an ornament and an asset to the Southland. They argued further that to pay more would mean that less swamp land would be drained, that less wealth in the form of reclaimed land would be created. The Negroes and their families, it appeared, were not wealth; they were either a means to the creation of wealth or else a liability. Finally, if the 30-cents-an-hour scale were adopted, the economic equilibrium of the region would be upset.

* * * * *

REPLYING to these arguments, the FERA representative pointed out that there seemed to be certain imperfections in the local economic equilibrium; otherwise, why the necessity of federal relief projects? Also, what about the mules? The mules, it appeared, were getting $1.25 a day, plus 50 cents' worth of food, plus a certain amount of personal valeting, plus the attentions of a veterinary when and if needed. The Negroes who worked in that malaria swamp got no personal valeting, no medical attention, and no food beyond what 75 cents a day would buy them. They were free American citizens. They were not property, not wealth. Indeed, the local politicians were rather revolted by the idea of interfering with the right of their black brothers to work for 75 cents a day. But they were equally revolted by the idea of paying less than $1.25 a day, plus food, plus veterinary service, for the mules.

* * * * *

THE mules really were fat and sassy, and any attempt to pay them less than a living wage presumably would have been met by uncompromising revolt, by sabotage, and by the derisive laughter for which that species is famous. The Drifter, who at one period of his career drifted into the army, has known many mules and many Negroes. He learned to like the Negroes greatly and to dislike the mules most heartily. But it would appear that the Negroes have something to learn from the mules in this much-discussed matter of tactics.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Answering Mr. Chase

To the Editors of The Nation:

Stuart Chase's The Age of Distribution (The Nation, July 25) reveals with unusual bareness the basic assumptions common to Chase, Soddy, Technocracy, Utopia, Inc., Douglas, and the "new economics" as a whole.

1. Uniqueness of the present situation. With an ignorance of the history of economic doctrine which is truly astonishing, Chase views as unique the present experiences of the contradiction between the expanding forces of production and private appropriation of the product. As a matter of fact, the nature of crises as crises of plenty was known by the earliest Utopian Socialists; Fourier coined the term crise pléthorique. That the technical potentialities for abundance are here has been a commonplace of the Marxist labor movement since its inception. The theoretical analysis of the conflict between expanding productive forces and the fetters placed upon them by production for profit—the theory of surplus value—is the foundation of Marx's economics. The popular meaning of this has been bred into the blood and bone of both Communists and Socialists.

Where, then, does Chase get the idea that socialism is a "kind of anti-capitalism, developed in opposition to capitalism, in the age of scarcity. . . . Most Socialists appear to assume that the volume of goods is limited . . ."? I challenge Chase to produce any body of popular propaganda of the Socialist or Communist movement which would justify his preposterous remarks. No, the present crisis of capitalism is no different in character from those which Marx analyzed. The forces of production have developed further; there is a larger area of the world covered by developed capitalist industry; and consequently the conflicts have deepened. But the same diagnosis of the disease that Marx made in 1848 holds true for the disease in its present developed stage.

2. Seeking the solution anywhere but at the point of production. Chase shares with most of the "new economists" a gross confusion between the technical and the economic aspect of production. "The problem of production is solved," says Chase, and thenceforth looks elsewhere than at the point of production for a solution of the crisis. The only sense, however, in which the "problem of production" is solved is technically; the economic problem of production for use, instead of capitalist production for profit, is not solved, and it can be solved only where the problem is—at the point of production.

Every attempt to speak of distribution as a separate problem merely conceals the fact that suggested "aids to distribution" are really aids to capitalist production for profit. Stuart Chase says: "Consciously or unconsciously, economic thinking and economic action are now oriented toward distribution. The consumer is creeping to the center of the stage. Ways and means to furnish him with purchasing power form the outstanding problem of current statesmanship," and so on. This merely obfuscates the fact that the basic concern of "statesmanship" is not developing purchasing power indefinitely but "priming the pump" of capitalist production for profit. Doesn't Chase know that the governmental outlay of funds—mainly going, by the way, directly to finance and industry—rests on this principle, and that no "aids to distribution" contrary to this principle will occur?

In the light of this obvious principle, what would be the concrete meaning of Mr. Chase's solution of "distribution?" He says: "Communists . . . would have workers seize the factories. I would have workers, and consumers generally, control the distributive machinery and organize that flow of purchasing power and goods which governments under the pressure of circumstances are already feebly steering in that direction." What does "distributive machinery" mean? With industry and land continuing under capitalist production, the term can have only one meaning—the monetary mechanism. Factories under capitalist control will not turn a wheel without profit. Hence, Chase's plan must be, by taxation, expansion of currency and credit, and capital levy (I throw this in to make it sound as radical as possible), to provide government with funds whereby it can purchase from the capitalists and farmers goods and produce to distribute to the community.

3. The disappearance of capitalists. We have got to the point where it ought to be clear that "aids to distribution" are aids to production for profit and that the only intelligible meaning of Chase's plan would be bigger and bigger aids to production for profit. But side by side with this plan, there appeared in Chase's article the prediction that production for profit, which in Chase's view is going to continue indefinitely, is also, strangely enough, disappearing under our very eyes! Says Mr. Chase: "Technological abundance is breaking the strangle-hold of private ownership on the means of production . . . a distributive economy undermines the strategic importance of the private ownership . . . the capitalists are clearing themselves away—to the extent of a two-hundred-billion-dollar shrinkage in the past four years. And the end is not yet. Mr. Strachey says the capitalists will not permit themselves to be expropriated. It is not a question, as I see it, of permission; it is a question of maintaining expanding markets. If capitalists can expand markets, their holdings will be validated; if they cannot, expropriation takes place by default."

Now, the way I had worked out his meaning, Chase was going to have the government through the monetary mechanism expand distribution indefinitely. With capitalists continuing to control production, expansion of distribution would naturally mean expansion of markets for capitalists. Chase says no. Distribution under private ownership will increase indefinitely and capitalist markets will decrease indefinitely. How strange! But in Chase's idyllic picture of the decline of markets, and the consequent fall of the rate of profit down to zero, he leaves something out. That is: what in the meantime will the capitalists be doing to halt the decline of the rate of profit and to expand their markets?

I agree with Chase that capitalists do not represent "one mind, one heart, one pool for investment, on which one governing intelligence sets the rate." In fact, that is precisely the reason why—with capitalism not being a whole, but a congeries of groupings and individuals—when profits decline, the first necessity of capitalists is to protect the soundness of their individual businesses. For example, I know a capitalist who is thoroughly convinced that the only salvation for business is mass purchasing power. Unfortunately, his own plant is doing very badly, and it is absolutely necessary for him to cut wages. He knows that if he does so and other industries follow, mass purchasing power will be destroyed. But his first duty is to keep the business solvent. I need not labor the point: a declining rate of profit leads in the first instance to an attempt to halt the decline by wage-cutting, with repercussions which only reinforce the general decline—heightening of the struggle between capital and labor and no improvment in business.

For these reasons the capitalist struggle against the decline in the rate of profit tends more and more to concentrate on the expansion of markets. I mean markets outside the country, a phenomenon which Chase apparently found too insignificant even to mention. Why his silence on the most important characteristic of modern capitalism—imperialism? The round of wars—to be prevented by nothing short of world revolution—which capitalist governments will go through long before they permit the rate of profit to go down to, say, 1 per cent is not even hinted at in Chase's description of the disappearance of profit. Only fear of the consequences acts as a temporary brake; the need for new markets drives all the nations toward war.

Who, Mr. Chase, is going to prevent these wars or cut them short, by transforming the social order? Will it be your strange, never-never beast, the "consumer"? By his expansion of the currency, no doubt? Many are the artificial adjustments being made today by the intellectuals who see just enough to be unable to serve whole-heartedly the decaying but malignant order of capitalism. I suppose it is personally more praiseworthy for Mr. Chase to write economic fairy tales than for him to take to drink. Nevertheless, I feel it a great pity. He might be putting his talents to the task which raises breathtaking perspectives, especially in America—the building of a new revolutionary vanguard for the transformation of society.

New York, August 16 FELIX MORROW

Contradicting Mr. Solow

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your new Labor and Industry section is excellent in intention, timely, and urgently needed. Because I am a strong supporter of The Nation, permit me a friendly protest.

Herbert Solow in his article War in Minneapolis, in the issue of August 8, attacked Federal Mediator Father F. J. Haas, saying "he tried to slip things by the strike leaders but met his match" and "he has abandoned his efforts to sell the strikers an unfair compromise dressed up in fancy language." In Milwaukee the American Federation of Hosiery Workers for years past has worked with Father Haas in causes involving issues vital to trade unionism and the labor movement. We have found this priest a real liberal on economic issues and one of the last men in this country who would attempt to trick or deceive a group of labor unionists. Moreover, Father Haas is far too clever and experienced to "put over" things on a group of strikers; he knows such tactics always prove a boomerang.

As a national representative of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers I have been obliged to work closely with Father Haas. During the past year he has served as a member of Senator Wagner's National Labor Board in Washington. We have differed frequently with Father Haas, but we can show conclusively that he is completely trustworthy and usually has a better grasp of practical labor problems than most mediators or arbitrators in labor disputes. I, for one, resent this sort of loosely worded and unsupported attack on one of the few persons in this country who are willing to make real sacrifices of time and effort in the cause of peace in industry.

Minneapolis, August 15 JOHN WALTER EDELMAN,
Research Director, American Federation of Hosiery Workers

Birth Control and Class War

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Without entering into the other questions raised by your editorial The Paradox of Birth Control in the issue of July 11, permit me to express surprise at the uncritical acceptance, by yourself and other liberals, of the dubious economic argument for what you call "the democratic practice of contraception."

It should be, but evidently is not, obvious that Pearl and others are arguing from the standpoint of an "economy of scarcity," and that cutting down the birthrate is one form of cutting down the standard of living. It is restriction of production, perfectly in keeping with the restrictions imposed on production of other kinds by the AAA. But it is also a restriction of consumption, and not only an economic effect but an economic cause. Argue, if you will, for the right of workers and their spouses to elect this rather than other forms of deprivation; but remember how easily a permission becomes a requirement. With sixteen million persons on relief, the pressure from the taxpayer can easily become overwhelming to demand that births in this class be reduced, and reduced. Only the religious objection, I believe, has stood thus long in the way of formulating such a demand. As for the employer—well, I remember clearly how, years ago, Boston Elevated employees on strike asked for a livnig wage based on an average family of five, and how the company, from its records, showed that the average man in its employ did not have a family of five—his children, even then, averaged two and a fraction. Therefore, no raise. He was not entitled to the option of a larger family, any more than to any other luxury that he had shown his ability to do without.

Liberals should think twice before they hail as liberation a liberty which bears close resemblance to those other well-known liberties—the liberty to undercut the market, the liberty to scab, and the liberty to starve.

Buffalo, August 12 C. I. CLAFLIN

CORRECTION

The editors regret that the Public Administration Clearing House was included in an editorial paragraph printed on August 15, commenting on the activities of reactionary organizations of "taxpayers," "investors," and "citizens." The Clearing House serves as an exchange for information concerning problems of government, and while supporting proper measures of governmental efficiency, has in fact been active in attempting to prevent the reckless cost-cutting advocated by such organizations as the New York State Economic Council.

RACIAL ARTS OF LOVE

PRIVATELY PRINTED

MATURE READERS
AND COLLECTORS OF
AMATORY CURIOSA
OF ALL RACES
SEND FOR FREE CATALOGUE
OF BOOKS ON
SCIENTIFIC SEXUALIA
ANTHROPOLOGICAL
ESOTERICA
UNEXPURGATED CLASSICS
EXOTICALLY ILLUSTRATED
MAGICA SEXUALIS

LIMITED EDITIONS

All FALSTAFF scientific and anthropological Books on the Love Relations of Mankind are enthralling and highly informative documents by authorities of international repute. That is why the FALSTAFF list of permanent subscribers reads like a "Who's Who" of America's Sophisticated Intellectual Aristocracy.

FALSTAFF PRESS
Dept. 14-NA, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Please send me free illustrated catalogs of Amatory Curiosa.

Name .... Age

Address ....

City .... State ....

Labor and Industry

The Case of Thomas Sharpe

By LEW LEVENSON

THE name of Thomas Sharpe was included in the California casualty list which I recently prepared for The Nation. I met him through the screen at Lincoln Heights jail, when I went there with a lawyer on the afternoon of August 1. After some delay the jailer produced five prisoners, three of whom had been beaten up by police. They stood behind two nearly opaque screens, so that it was impossible to see their faces. One of them, Thomas Sharpe, was suspended on crutches. In silhouette, against a dimly lighted wall, I could discern his profile.

He spoke in a low vibrant voice. His English was rather good, I thought, for a marine fireman. He had gone on strike from San Pedro because his pay was 50 per cent less than marine firemen received in 1921, the food was bad, and the bunks were uncomfortable and unsanitary. He had a legal right to strike. Two months after the beginning of the strike, when, with the aid of police, special police, deputies, and armed guards, Los Angeles harbor was forced open, Sharpe together with many other strikers went to Terminal Island, where they asserted their legal right to picket. No fight took place there that day; Sharpe was in no physical struggle. His affidavit, which follows, states in his own words what happened to him late in the afternoon of July 16 and subsequently.

Thomas Sharpe is a typical California workman who in defending his rights met the iron hand of the law. Because he was not shot dead as were Dick Parker, Howard Sperry, and many others, he can still speak. Because of the seriousness of his injuries, bail was raised by Los Angeles friends and he is now in the General Hospital, where he can tell his story freely. He is one of thousands in the State of California who are now in jails, hospitals, chain gangs, behind stockades, or recuperating in private homes.

Affidavit of Thomas Sharpe

State of California }
County of Los Angeles } ss.

Thomas Sharpe being first duly sworn deposes and says: that he is a marine fireman by occupation and a member of International Seamen's Union; that he came into San Pedro, California, on March 28, 1934, on the Point Clear; that the strike was called on May 16, 1934; that affiant came back to San Pedro from a trip on July 13, 1934; that affiant registered for picket duty on July 14, 1934; and was on picket duty on July 15 and 16, 1934, from 12 noon to 6 p. m. That affiant came off duty on July 16, 1934, about 6 p. m. Affiant had been picketing on Terminal Island and went from there to Seamen's Hall; had his card stamped at Seaman's Hall.

That affiant then went to the Anchorage, a restaurant, about a half block away, and ate. Affiant was there about thirty minutes. Then affiant went to Chateau across the alley and was there talking and lounging until about 7:30 p. m.

Affiant saw a crowd gathered outside on the opposite side of street. It was dark. I walked across the street and saw a man standing with his back against the wall, dressed as a seaman, with white cap, dark coat, and dungarees. Then saw his riot club held down by his side. I had crossed the street and was on same side as the party above described; then a Buick car pulled up on opposite side of street. The man with white cap took me by arm and across street and put me into the Buick car. I didn't resist. He prodded me along but nothing was said.

He took another prisoner there; he put me into front seat with the uniformed driver. He put the other prisoner, a young fellow, into rear seat.

He drove us to the police station. He walked me in front entrance and past the booking desk. He never booked me at San Pedro. He walked me to a hallway in the rear which was dark. He had my right arm, and he pushed me ahead of him into hall. As he did so he hit me on the right shin with his riot club. The club must have been about thirty to twenty-four inches long and about one and one-half inches in diameter. When he hit me the first blow, I fell and every muscle in my body went limp. He continued hitting me about the legs and on the right shin. He hit me on the leg about nine times. I was on the floor all this time. Then he caught my right foot and twisted it inwardly until the bones cracked. My leg started to bleed. Some uniformed officer peeped in. He didn't say a word. Then he caught my left arm and twisted and wrenched it, often jerking me to my feet, saying, "Get up on your feet, you red." Then he dropped me and I went down again. Then the uniformed man came in and grabbed my right arm and jerked me up. The other man took my left arm. They lifted me up. Then everything went hazy.

The next thing I remember was lying on a stretcher in a police station, upstairs, I believe. They were putting some stuff in my arm and were trying for some time to stop the blood from my right leg. There was an ambulance driver or doctor in a white coat working on me. Then I came to again in an ambulance. Was half asleep with dope.

Next thing I knew they were booking me at the General Hospital, prison ward. This must have been early Tuesday morning. They were taking things out of my pockets. A doctor looked at me about 8 a. m. He looked at it. "I think you'll have a bad leg since you got here too late for surgery." He took an X-ray and said it was compound fracture of the shin bone. They brought me back. He didn't try to set it. They gave me a shot for tetanus. They put leg in open basket. Then they left me lay until about noon on the nineteenth, Thursday.

There was an open wound on the leg. They put a little gauze over it. They said they'd put a gate in it later, but they never did. Left the hospital on Wednesday following about the twenty-fifth. Was taken directly from the hospital to the bull-pen. Was then laying on iron bed with pad from Wednesday noon to Friday, 1:30 a. m. I was then taken to San Pedro on police patrol wagon. Left San Pedro at 3 p. m. for Los Angeles in overloaded wagon with fourteen people and a police officer. It was a very hot day. They left me in the bull-pen (Lincoln Heights) for eight days, until today, August 14, 1934. I was unable to sit up in bunks. I asked to see a doctor. They repeatedly refused. I saw the doctor once eight days after my first court appearance on the twenty-fifth. Haven't been able to see a doctor since. No further X-rays have been made. No part of the cast has ever been removed.

THOMAS SHARPE

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th day of August, 1934.
JAMES M. CARTER,
Notary Public in and for Los Angeles County, State of California

The Textile Strike

By J. W.

THE threatened textile workers' strike is the logical outcome of more than a year of inertia and mismanagement on the part of the NRA. When the cotton-textiles code, the first of the NRA codes, was approved last summer, it aroused great hopes for the improvement of labor conditions in one of the most sweated industries in the country. But the employers have used the code to prolong and reinforce evils long extant in the mills of the industrial South. To all of this, the NRA has manifested a bland indifference. If the workers walk out, they will be striking as much against the government's failure to redeem the promise of the code as against their employers' failure to introduce a new era.

Basic among the grievances of the Southern workers is the "stretch-out"—the system whereby employers increase the machine load per worker in order to offset minimum wage rates which of course augment the former scale. The stretch-out is by no means new in the cotton-textile industry. Under the NRA, however, it has been carried to a point where flesh and blood can no longer tolerate the ever-accelerating pace of the machine process. The Cotton Textile National Industrial Relations Board was created primarily to deal with the stretch-out problem. In practice the board has refused to regard the stretch-out per se as a code violation. On some few occasions it has corrected instances of flagrant "overloading"; but the burden of proof has rested upon the workers. And the board has been deaf to suggestions that employers apply to it for a license before being permitted to increase machine loads.

The handling of labor complaints by both the State and national boards has also exasperated the Southern mill workers. Procedure is cumbersome and slow, adjustments few and far between. Moreover, the essential idea is all wrong. Individual complaints are not investigated and adjusted by the boards themselves. Instead, the complaints go to the national board, which transmits them to the Cotton Textiles Institute, an employers' body pure and simple. In short, employers are brought in to pass final and exclusive judgment on the wrongs committed by their fellows upon wage-earners.

Unlike most of the other industrial-relations boards, the Cotton Textile Board has failed to project a theory of Section 7-a which would advance union recognition and the execution of collective agreements. On the contrary, relying on the literal text of the code, the national and State boards have busied themselves with promoting the establishment of "mill committees." Such committees are supposed to come into being from time to time to mediate specific grievances in individual mills. Inherent in the composition of these committees is the company-union ideal—the employee representatives must be fellow-workers. So far as they constitute machinery for collective bargaining in any sense, the mill committees are spasmodic—created after the event rather than before. Confined in function to averting strikes, they do not bear in the least on the essential element in collective bargaining, the bilateral contract.

Finally, the Southern workers have failed to receive even the modest minimum wages which the code seemingly guarantees to them. First, there has been continuous evasion by employers secure in the knowledge that the machinery of enforcement creaks and is paralyzed. Second, even when code wages have been paid, management has offset this by raising rentals on company houses and prices in company stores. Third, when the cotton-textile industry, some months back, entered upon a program of curtailing production, working hours were reduced but wage rates remained as they were. Thus weekly earnings, already pitifully low, were reduced still further. In sum, the textile workers will be striking, not only to exert pressure on their employers, but also to revive the voice of conscience in the NRA.

Utopia Incorporated

ON another page of this issue appears an article by Miriam Allen de Ford recounting the ambitious aims and considerable progress of the Utopian Society, which caters to the characteristic and widespread dream of something for nothing, specifically of a revolution that is absolutely painless and works while you sleep or your money back. The Utopian Society itself makes much larger claims than Miss de Ford grants. According to its own statement, "members are coming in at the rate of about 50,000 per week here in Los Angeles, while our workers are carrying forward in other cities as rapidly as they can be trained and sent out. . . . Our local membership numbers close to a half million and the movement is spreading with unprecedented rapidity."

We print below excerpts from the leaflet which the society sends out to those seeking information. It not only contains a declaration of the aims of the society but also gives instructions for the benefit of anyone who may wish to organize a local chapter of Utopia.

> (Chairman appoints good reader, man or woman—who reads slowly and dinstinctly.)
>
> (Start reading when you get cue: "You will now hear the Declaration of Aims of this Society.")
>
> DECLARATION OF AIMS OF THIS ORGANIZATION
>
> We, loyal members of the Utopian Society, believing the Constitution of the United States to be a document of high moral purpose, reaffirm our allegiance thereto.
>
> * * * *
>
> We shall faithfully and diligently apply our reason and resources toward the establishment, through intensive education and orderly procedure, of that sound social system which will provide economic security and abundance for all. Thus we aim to secure unto ourselves and future generations the right to Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness, in a society greater and finer than has ever before existed.
>
> The Utopian Society lays stress on the following points:
>
> 1. To guarantee to everyone the right of employment and an income insuring that standard of living to which every American citizen is entitled.
> 2. To so order the channels of distribution that no one need again feel the pangs of poverty.
> 3. To provide a full measure of comfort and security for the sick and aged.
> 4. To provide the economic security of that sacred institution—the American Family—under all conditions.

5. To assure to the young, education in the arts and crafts for which they have natural inclinations.

6. To end forever the disgraceful and immoral institutions now called charitable institutions, by eliminating the cause of them.

7. To eliminate the possibility of monetary reward for crime and racketeering, whether within or without the law.

8. To prevent speculation in the medium of exchange, thus eliminating panics and depressions.

9. To prevent the injurious hoarding of the country's natural wealth, to the benefit of the few and the detriment of the many.

We attest that the machine is man's good friend, since it provides for his many needs with the least amount of expended energy. We recognize the evil results, however, to both producer and consumer of uncoordinated production. We therefore state as one of our fundamental aims the coordination of production, distribution, and consumption to best serve man's interests.

We subscribe to the policy of maintaining adequate defensive forces, but condemn—and will use every weapon in our power to prevent—the slaughter of our American manhood in disastrous wars brought upon us by those whose sole object is to wring profits from the blood and sinews of the sons of America.

These Are Our Aims

(Wait for "cue" from chairman, "Guard, conduct the candidate to the Recorder.")

(Reader reads slowly, as follows: "Cast Fear and Evil from your hearts. No harm will come to you. You are among friends who think and act in terms of Love and the Brotherhood of Man.")

(Instructions: reader retires.)

Labor Notes

Dynamite

ANOTHER McNamara case, with its consequent undermining of the cause of labor, is in the making in connection with the strike at the Girard Point plant of Andrew Mellon's Gulf Refining Company. This strike of 900 workers presented a clear-cut test of Section 7-a, and unlike the Weirton and Greif cases, it seemed to hold the possibility of direct prosecution for the first time, owing to several circumstances. The first was undoubtedly that the complainant was not General Johnson but Secretary Ickes, acting as administrator of the oil and petroleum code, upon recommendation of the Petroleum Labor Policy Board. In the second place, not only refusal of union recognition but also violation of maximum-hour provisions of the code was involved. In its report to Ickes the petroleum board pointed out that the company refused to negotiate with the Independent Oil Workers' Union, made up of former members of the old-line American Federation of Labor union, forced the strike, and then violated the law in its strike-breaking tactics. The issue seemed clear enough, and the Department of Justice at last seemed confident enough of victory to press the case.

Now, however, the prosecution of the Gulf Refining Company seems very remote. Police, doubling as labor spies, found thirty-three sticks of dynamite secreted in a striker's home and arrested three union men for an alleged plot to "blow up the works." The strikers denied contemplating violence, the union shouted "Frame-up," and organized labor and liberal and radical groups sprang into the fray, ready to carry the case to the highest courts. Then, of a sudden, one of the arrested strikers admitted that the dynamite was his and that he had intended, indeed, to turn wrecker—of course without the knowledge of the union. Thus betrayed, the temporary "united front" of the defense collapsed, and public sentiment, which had been with the strikers, turned against them. All in a moment the careful, tedious organizing work of many months was undone and the strike discredited. The company's citation for violation of the NRA has already been lost sight of, and the prosecution which seemed so certain before the dynamite incident seems much less likely.

An Agricultural Strike

EIGHT HUNDRED onion workers, organized in the first agricultural union affiliated with the A. F. of L., have been on strike since June in the Scioto marshes near McGuffey, Ohio. They demand recognition of their union and thirty-five cents an hour instead of the twelve cents and less which the growers have been paying. The strike was on the whole peaceful until recently, when the Mayor's home in McGuffey was bombed. A few hours later, the leader of the strike, Okey Odell, was kidnapped and badly beaten before being released. The violence, significantly enough, occurred within two weeks of the time when the crop must be harvested; the theory that Mayor Ott's home was bombed by strikers does not fit the fact that he is regarded as favorable to the strikers; and the mob armed with clubs which roamed through the town for several hours on August 25 was violently anti-union—at one point they gathered before the house where the injured Odell was lying, guarded by friends, and dared him to come out. A federal mediator has been dispatched to settle the strike. He is not the first. Several weeks ago the workers rejected the proposal of another mediator which provided a wage rate of fifteen cents an hour without recognition. The background and the issues in the Scioto strike will be discussed next week in The Nation's section on Labor and Industry. In that issue special attention will be given to the agricultural worker, who is completely unprotected by either federal or State regulation and who with his children constitutes one of the worst-exploited groups in the United States.

Unionism Wins in Minneapolis

AFTER more than five weeks of struggle, the striking truck drivers in Minneapolis have gone back to work. The settlement negotiated by federal conciliators does not give the union all it wanted, but a minimum wage has been fixed which protects raises given in an effort to stop the May strike, and the right of Local 574 to represent market inside workers, the issue which led to the present strike, is definitely established. Elections which will have been held by the time this report appears give the union a chance to win formal recognition in most of the industry.

Militant leadership and a courageous and united rank and file kept the strike from being smashed by police terror, worn out by the delays of mediation, or defeated by the calling out of the National Guard, which is by its very nature a strike-breaking move. Governor Olson, Farmer-Labor idol, resorted to this measure after the employers had rejected the first proposals of Father Haas and E. H. Dunnigan, federal mediators—which had been accepted by the union and indorsed by the Governor. Under the Governor's permit system, thousands of trucks were allowed to operate; many others violated military "orders," but the National Guard proved efficient at catching no offenders. It is significant that not a single "chiseler," as Governor Olson called those employers who attempted to violate the permit system, landed in the military stockade. Instead, this stockade was filled with strikers. Peaceful picketing became a military offense. Strike meetings in the open were forbidden. Sellers of the Organizer, the strike daily, were arrested. Strike headquarters and the Central Labor Union headquarters were raided and strike leaders arrested. To be sure, the Citizens' Alliance was also raided, but it developed that important files had already been removed.

Meanwhile the federal mediators were working out a new set of proposals which were highly acceptable to the employers. But the strike leaders and the rank-and-file Committee of One Hundred overwhelmingly rejected the terms offered, and the strike continued unbroken.

At the moment when the employers, particularly the little fellows on the verge of bankruptcy, began to demand peace, a third federal mediator, P. A. Donoghue, proposed a new settlement, differing from the first to the disadvantage of the union in only one important respect—a wage level 2½ cents lower. The employers and the Citizens' Alliance in accepting the settlement abandoned two "principles" they had sworn to maintain. They agreed to take back even those workers accused of violence and they gave de facto recognition of the right of workers to choose their own leaders.

Locking the Barn Door

A RECENT policy memorandum from NRA headquarters announced the exclusion from future codes of all provisions averaging maximum hours over periods of weeks and months. Instead, the codes will stipulate a maximum for any given week, modified by a flexible tolerance. As the cost of availing himself of the tolerance, the employer must subject himself to the penalty of overtime rates of pay. Another policy memorandum stipulated that in establishing an accounting basis for sales price, the producer must reckon the value of his inventory by whichever test gives the lesser result—original cost or current market. Both memoranda are admirable in motivation and logic. Their policies should have been applied from the NRA's first days. There is, however, one catch. Code-making has virtually ceased. The memoranda give no assurances that the codes whose provisions conflict with these new policies will be amended. Both memoranda seem mere pious gestures.

Steel and Collective Bargaining

THE overlords of the steel industry are no doubt bluffing when they threaten to scrap their code rather than accept the theory of industrial relations—the election of representatives for collective bargaining, with majority rule—which the National Steel Labor Relations Board seems ready to project in the Apollo Steel and West Virginia Rail cases. Those who profit from that "Magna Charta of monopoly," the steel code, are not likely to cast away its benefits in a fit of pique. More probably they will challenge the authority of the board in the federal courts. It is worth noting on this score that Federal Judge Bowen some months ago refused to grant an order enjoining the Seattle Regional Labor Board from conducting an election of representatives for collective bargaining among the employees of several copper mines in Idaho. The injunction was sought by a group of anti-union employees, and was refused on the grounds that an election is merely a device for gathering evidence, and that a trade union is legally entitled, within the meaning of Section 7-a, to bargain collectively on behalf of employees who designate it for that purpose. In the Weirton Steel case, which is now coming up for a final hearing, the election issue is also involved. Here the government is seeking to compel the employer to submit to a referendum at which the workers will choose between representation by either a trade union—the Amalgamated—or a company union. Judge Nields's earlier decision, when he refused to grant a temporary restraining order, was determined on technical grounds. The final hearing, if it is held, will decide the case on its merits.

Formula for Peace

THE usually turbulent anthracite coalfields of Pennsylvania have been comparatively calm for several months, as rival unions held their enmity in check while an umpire for the National Labor Board heard more than 1,000 grievances and attempted to iron them out by arbitration rather than by dynamite or bloodshed. This umpire recently finished his deliberations and handed down his formula for the restoration of mine peace. He finds that everything will be fine if, among other things, the United Mine Workers of America and the opposition Anthracite Miners of Pennsylvania patch up their differences and perhaps consolidate, if jobless miners are given jobs, and if rates of pay are made uniform. He neglects, however, to tell how these things are to be accomplished. To make peace the U. M. W. would have to reinstate thousands of former members who were expelled when they joined the insurgents, and it has no desire to do this because the "faithful" are hard enough to keep in line when there are no jobs. The Anthracite Miners, on the other hand, would not even think of coming back unless the typical U. M. W. bureaucracy were wiped out, and there is small chance of accomplishing that. There is a similar split over wage scales, the insurgents having many times walked out in protest against the old union's rates. As for the value of providing jobs, that is self-evident. But the Anthracite Conciliation Board does not get at the root of things, where lie such matters as the status of the operators in the coal problem, the inertia of the industry, the ownership of mines by utilities, price-cutting, and the like.

Contributors to This Issue

EVELYN LAWRENCE has just returned from Europe, where she spent six months studying political and economic conditions and working with the underground and revolutionary movements of Germany and Austria.

WILLIAM ADAMS has made a study of merchant shipping and has published articles on the subject in the Forum and other magazines.

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE was formerly the editor of the New Freeman. She is the author of "Art in America."

MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD is a California newspaperwoman.

ANITA BRENNER spent the greater part of last year in Spain. She is the author of a book on Mexico, "Idols Behind Altars."

COLLIS STOCKING, a member of the department of economics of New York University, has contributed articles to various economic and sociological journals.

EMERY NEFF is assistant professor of English at Columbia University and the author of "Carlyle."

MARGARET LARKIN is the compiler and editor of "Singing Cowboy," a book of Western folk songs.

Spanish Literature and the Republic

ARE leisure, prosperity, and national peace of mind essential to a flowering of the arts? And are aloofness and personal serenity basic conditions for great creative work? We are accustomed to say so, smoothly. Yet when we begin to list the great works of the past we are likely to find that their dates signify periods of acute unrest, confusion, and strife, and we are also accustomed to accept "of course" the economic, political, and personal sufferings of most of the artists we put in first rank. So perhaps the conditions we postulate as basic for what we afterwards call a "renaissance" are derived not so much from historical fact as from the quite reasonable feeling that most talents could do much if allowed to work in peace, unharassed by issues not immediately personal. Or it may be that we are disturbed to find the "great" so frequently on the wrong side of the railroad tracks. Also, what we recognize as "great" is so often tragedy that we ourselves may choose to admire products of conflict, strife, doubt, and despair.

In Spain, as probably in most countries of Western European culture, the livest periods of literary and artistic activity seem to coincide with periods of political and social unrest. A kind of renaissance occurs in the years of hot republican, anti-church, and constitutionalist agitation preceding the first constitution (1812)—the Goya period. The artistic-literary barometer drops in the ensuing period of triumphant reaction, in which the Inquisition is reestablished and civil liberties are choked out, and goes up again before and during the First Republic (1871), around which Pérez Galdós wrote some of his most sparkling pages. To this period belong the historian Pi y Margall and the best work of the great essayist Joaquin Costa. The curve slumps again after this peak and rises sharply to the "generation of '98"—Unamuno, Blasco Ibañez, Pio Baroja, Valle Inclan, Ganivet. Why 1898? In that year Spain lost Cuba, and the dream of colonial might upon which Spanish youth had been nurtured for many generations was blotted out. The young men of that date suddenly discovered that Spain was a second-rate Power, off in a historical blind alley. Costa's cry, "Double-lock on the tomb of the Cid!" became the slogan with which the indignant, rebellious intellectuals whipped at monarchical glories. A mood of investigation, inventory, revaluation, "Europeanization," protest, repudiation, and reconstruction possessed them, and driven by it the generación del '98 became a generation of rebels and political trouble-makers. They all experienced jail, exile, or both; they all took an active part in the movement against the monarchy, writing sometimes as republicans, sometimes for the Anarchist press—especially Unamuno and Baroja; and they restored Spain to an honored place in literature and living thought.

From the generación del '98 stems a continuing movement, which diverges in the next generation into several groups. The Ortega y Gasset circle, built around the magazine Revista de Occidente, became a forum for literary, philosophical, and to some extent social-critical essays. It was known throughout the dictatorship and in the last year of the monarchy as a republican center, but is today, without having greatly changed character, well over on the conservative side. Another group formed around Benjamin Jarnés and the magazine Cruz y Raya. They devoted themselves chiefly to aesthetic, literary, and psychological problems, and their intellectual focus gradually moved away from Spain to Paris. Jarnés is the subtlest and most talented member of this group, which today has split—many of the younger members have gone over to the social-political ranks, while the rest have to some extent tended to degenerate into introspective inactivity and hair-splitting over pure technique.

The contemporary generation, like its literary grandparents, concerns itself chiefly with political and social questions. Its members are aged from about twenty to forty, and belong, as did most of the '98 men, to lower-middle-class and peasant families. Politically this agglomeration of intellectuals shades from Jacobinism, as represented by Azaña, to communism, typified by the novelist Ramón J. Sender. Azaña, whose forty-odd years put him in the intermediate generation, became active as a writer later—in the years of the dictatorship. He is an essayist and orator, and is usually ranked as Spain's greatest stylist after Unamuno. He belongs to the Unamuno school of brief, blunt, matter-of-fact statement heated by indignation and edged by wit. In his critical essay on Ganivet, published in Plumas y Palabras, he turns a hard, white, scholarly light on Ganivet's neo-Catholic mystic nationalism (from which Waldo Frank's "Virgin Spain" issues) and achieves a solid masterpiece.

The other political-historical writers of literary stature and weight are chiefly left-wing. Among them three stand foremost: Joaquin Maurin, the richest and most vivid, is leader of the dissident Communist peasants' and workers' bloc; Andrés Nin, the coldly precise, lucid classicist, is leader of the Communist Left ("Trotzkyite") League; and César Falcon, robustly journalistic, is prominent in the Communist Party. Journalists of political tinge, following the '98 tradition of protestant examination of things Spanish, are many and distinguished. Two of the most interesting are Francisco Madrid and Alardo Prats. Madrid, who had made a name for himself as a "smart" playwright, turned his back almost completely on the theater when he dived into politics as a Republican and became part of the famous Rotonde—Unamuno, Ibañez, and others—group of exiles. Prats is known for "Tres Dias con los Endemoniados," a book describing a witches' shrine in Valencia, where bedeviled peasants go to be cured. The book derives its strength from the material itself and from the shocked indignation of the author.

Ramón J. Sender is probably the most widely read among the younger Spanish novelists. His books are often issued in cheap pulp-paper editions, of the sort made popular first by the Anarchists, who have long been writing and publishing pamphlet-stories vaguely political in character and of scant literary merit. Nowadays these editions—to be seen in newsstands, market booths, and workers' hands on holiday—have enlarged to include translations of Remarque, Zweig, Dos Passos, Sinclair, the classic and modern Russians, and popular histories, as well as native novelists and poets. Sender, however, is published also by the higher-priced houses, as is another writer of the same sort but of less permanent consequence, Joaquin Arderius.

Arderius, like Baroja, writes chiefly about peasants, but in a strangely morbid, nightmarish mood which in some books acquires power comparable to Faulkner. Sender's canvas is larger. Also, his books are plainly revolutionary, though a note of defeat runs through them. The most famous, "Iman," is the story of a private in the Annual disaster—when the Moors under Abd-el-Krim drove back the Spaniards and slaughtered some ten thousand; the result, it was later revealed, of sheer irresponsible pretentiousness in the higher commands. A more recent and also widely popular Sender story, "Los Siete Domingo Rojos" ("The Seven Red Sundays") is written around a strike during the republic, and is surréaliste technically. In it symbol and mood as much as action run into, underlie, and help to determine events, and different types are used as screens through which the reader sees newspaper facts in emotional settings.

The "problem of the intellectual" is the theme of a first novel, "Un Hombre de Treinte Años" ("A Man of Thirty"), by Manuel Benavides, recently published by the Socialist press. It is the story of a reporter on a comfortably established weekly who, in spite of himself and of his frightened wife, finds himself gradually involved in labor conflicts and at the end fighting on the barricades. It is not a specifically Spanish story, for it could be paralleled anywhere in the world; but in that fact lies a significant clue to the very wide horizons opening now in Spanish art.

Anita Brenner

The Myths of Wall Street

Security Speculation: Its Economic Effects. By John T. Flynn. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THIS is probably one of the most comprehensive and illuminating analyses yet made of the recently much-discussed question of the economic effects of speculation. Mr. Flynn writes with an intimate understanding of his subject and analyzes his abundant material with temperance and forbearance. In describing the market-place and the economic function of speculation he explodes, one after another, the illusions which have been implanted in the public mind through the use of great sums of money and immense energy.

By adhering to a conventional definition of security speculation as "an operation in which one buys or sells securities with the design to make a profit out of the changes in the market price of such securities" he rather thoroughly deflates the widespread notion that security speculation has played an important role in our great economic development.

In considering the contention that security speculation is necessary in order that industry may obtain the capital it needs, the author presents an analysis of the financial organization of a number of important corporations. He demonstrates convincingly that the obtaining of capital through the issuance of speculative securities is, and always has been, a rare exception rather than the rule. And the twin contention, that people are unwilling to place their funds in securities for which a continuous market is not maintained through highly organized speculation, he effectively disposes of by pointing out that the amount of unlisted industrial securities held by American investors is, in value, worth twice as much as the securities listed on the Exchange.

There can be no doubt, however, that speculation maintains a market for listed securities, if one means by a market an opportunity readily to acquire or dispose of stock regardless of price. As a matter of fact, speculators, operating through the machinery of the Exchange, not only maintain a market; they "make" it in a very literal sense. In this connection, by analyzing some of the evidence compiled by the recent Senate investigation, Mr. Flynn conclusively refutes the popular notion that stocks cannot be manipulated. Moreover, he demonstrates that it is through their unconscionable manipulations of the market that the speculators make their biggest winnings. And lest one be misled by the reputed righteousness of the Exchange to believe that such nefarious practices are carried on by unholy freebooters, it is made perfectly clear that many such practices are permitted by the tolerant rules which the Exchange has established to govern trading. Mr. Flynn's own conclusion as to the defensibility of "making a market"—that is, manipulating prices in order to unload on the unwitting buyers—is as follows:

> The whole false notion grows out of that unsound theory of liquidity of which so much has been said. There is no reason why the holder of a capital investment should be able to find for his investment immediately and without delay or loss another owner. There is no reason why capital investment should be more liquid than consumers' goods, and the effort to import liquidity into capital investments has resulted in a whole train of evils—economic, industrial, financial, and social—not the least of which has been the complete extinction of the function and responsibility of ownership.

In proposing remedies and appraising the recently enacted legislation for government regulation of the security exchanges, Mr. Flynn shows how the originally proposed measure was very substantially emasculated before it was permitted to become law. Many considerations important to effective regulation are vaguely worded or definitely submitted to the discretion of the governing body.

> The law itself, as it stands, forbids and requires so little that we may truthfully say there is no body of laws as yet governing the securities markets until the commission considers, adopts, and promulgates them. We shall have to await that even before forming a judgment of the value of our experiment.

It is probably expecting too much to hope that Mr. Flynn's study will lead any great number of people to assume an intelligent attitude toward the activities and importance of the Stock Exchange. Contrary to the popular notion, most of the business of the Exchange has absolutely no relation—save in an indirect and adverse way—to our industrial processes. The gambling that it furthers is more reprehensible than the European national lotteries which we try so determinedly to exclude from this country. They at least possess the virtue of indiscriminate fairness which many of the dealings on the Exchange lack.

That such an institution has been tolerated and until now allowed, like the medieval Steelyard, to remain outside of domestic law, is due to skilful propaganda and the naivete of the great mass of people. In the light of the material Mr. Flynn presents, one might logically employ a passage which he uses in appraising the activities of the specialists and the floor traders and apply it to the whole field under consideration:

> [In no field does one encounter] so much pretentious rationalization, so many fantastic reasons invented to defend practices which have no excuse for existence save the profits made out of them by a few persons, as in this subject of speculation. There is, indeed, something depressing about it—the sober, solemn arguments made in support of the speculating and gambling activities of specialists, of floor traders, and even of pools and syndicates, by Stock Exchange officials and the kind of hired economic help which is open to any business man with the necessary funds. It all falls with a sickening feeling upon the ears of those who know what is honestly believed about these practices on the Exchange and in Wall Street itself.

Collis Stocking

Carlyle's Last Years

Carlyle in Old Age (1865-1881). By David Alec Wilson and David Wilson MacArthur. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

THE monumental biography of Carlyle interrupted by David Alec Wilson's death is now completed from his notes and collected materials by his nephew, David Wilson MacArthur, in a sixth volume which maintains with admirable harmony the original plan and style. Introducing Carlyle at the age of seventy, with his writing practically over after "Frederick the Great," this final volume is, as Mr. MacArthur observes, "in the main, a slow march on the downhill of life." But it is none the less interesting, for Carlyle the man vigorously survived Carlyle the writer. His personal drama reaches a climax in the triumph of the Rectorship, especially dear to Mrs. Carlyle as the conquest of the snobbish Edinburgh that had once neglected her struggling husband. Immediately follows the stunning blow of her death. With inconsolable grief—not remorse, as Mr. MacArthur amply shows—Carlyle has also to suffer despair as to public affairs, while England, rejecting his passionately reiterated warnings, persists in her path of democracy, laissez faire, and materialistic science. "Shooting Niagara" is a magnificently detached confession of the bankruptcy of his hopes. Yet when his trembling hand can no longer hold a pen, his conversation continues to delight an ever-growing circle of admirers: the faces of Froude, Tyndall, Lecky, and Leslie Stephen appear, as his old friends, Thackeray, Dickens, Mazzini, Forster, and Mill, precede him to the grave. Some of his celebrated phrases, such as "the unspeakable Turk," belong to these years, together with flashes of quizzical humor, as when he asks Darwin whether there is any danger of men turning back into apes. He continues to live the simple life he has preached, astonishing literary London by remaining in the small house in the unfashionable district of Chelsea, which he had originally chosen for cheapness and quiet. His slightly bent figure with the almost youthful stride is a familiar sight on London streets in all weathers. Invited to an audience by Queen Victoria, he shatters precedent by calmly sitting down in her presence, with excuses for his aged back. Ironically, honors, including the offer of a peerage, are showered upon him by a generation that disregards his prophecies. Grimly fighting dyspepsia and a world gone wrong, the heroic old man lives on past eighty-five, his last hours being disturbed by the reiterated knocking of newspaper reporters inquiring after his condition, symbols of the publicity he despises.

Now, when time has brought into question Carlyle's enemies—laissez faire, political democracy, and confidently materialistic science—the Wilson biography appears opportunely to satisfy renewed interest in the Victorian prophet. This final volume contains important new material gathered from the lips as well as from the written memoirs of the last generation that knew Carlyle in the flesh, including Henry W. Nevinson and others now living. The garnering has been done thoroughly, the only important omissions seeming to be a letter from George Meredith to André Raffalovitch, which would strengthen Mr. MacArthur's position as to the marital relations of the Carlyles, and Carlyle's jottings to an amanuensis on promoterism and trade unionism, interesting as the final phase of his economic views.

With the entire biography before us, we must meet the question of whether it will supersede Froude, the only rival on its large scale. The Wilson biography has taken good advantage of the perspective of time, with its accumulation of new information and its freedom from the disturbing influences of party feuds and of personalities, such as the fascination of Mrs. Carlyle, which led Froude astray. The scholar will consequently prefer it as a vast storehouse of conscientiously sifted facts concerning Carlyle, to which he will supply from his own knowledge the historical background and the literary judgment in which D. A. Wilson was not strong. But the less-informed reader desirous of a clear and vivid impression of Carlyle's career and personality will probably turn aside to the admirable plan, the narrative continuity, the graceful style of Froude. That such an arrangement was possible even with the bulkier and more heterogeneous materials of the Wilson collection will be apparent from a glance at M. Elie Halévy's accomplishment of a similar and more difficult feat in his "History of the English People in the Nineteenth Century." The power of literary form is such that Froude's prejudices and errors may still survive.

EMERY NEFF

China in Transition

A Chinese Testament. By Sergei Tretiakov. Simon and Schuster. $3.

ONCE in a long while one finds a book which reads like a page torn from life. Rarely is such a book about a foreign country; still more seldom is it about people whose culture, mental patterns, and ways of thinking are as dissimilar to our own as those of the Chinese. A number of really excellent books on the East have appeared in the last few years, but none has caught and reflected the spirit of the new China, as it emerges from the chrysalis of stagnant tradition, as does the present volume. Tretiakov's success where others have failed may be attributed in part to the fact that as a Russian he was better fitted to grasp the significance of the revolutionary upsurge than the average foreign writer. To a considerable extent, however, it is due to the unusual technique which he has employed.

"A Chinese Testament" is the autobiography of a young revolutionary, Tan Shih-hua, who happened to attend some of Professor Tretiakov's classes at Peking University. In many respects the story is typical of that of educated youth throughout China today. Tan was born in a remote village in Szechuan, the son of a professional revolutionist who was closely associated with Sun Yat-sen. His family were of the literati, eminently respectable but poor. His earliest memories of village life, of family customs and the elaborated ceremonies associated with births, deaths, and marriages, reflect the strangle-hold of the past on every phase of Chinese life. Yet new ideas were beginning to make headway—his father had virtually cast off all family responsibilities in the interest of overthrowing the corrupt Manchu regime. As a consequence young Tan was brought up with very little contact with his father, although his boyhood was colored by the vicissitudes of the revolutionary cause. On one occasion his father was cast into prison and was saved from execution only after the most elaborate campaign of official wire-pulling. Later both father and son had to go into hiding for a protracted period in order to escape the ire of a reactionary governor.

It was natural therefore in 1915, when the students first rose up in protest against the Twenty-one Demands, that Tan, then a student in middle school, should become one of the leaders of the local boycott movement. But although untiring in his demand for a higher civic morality, Tan—like the majority of youth in his day—put up little resistance when his family decreed that he should follow the old Chinese customs with regard to marriage. His sensitive soul was cut to the quick by the barbarity and cruelty of the old marriage practices, but to dishonor his family by refusing to conform called for more courage than he possessed. As fortune would have it, the matchmaker's choice was as bad as it could possibly have been. His wife turned out to be an illiterate moron without even the saving grace of physical attractiveness. Yet it was only when she committed the unforgivable crime of betraying his father that divorce was even considered.

Shortly after his marriage Tan was allowed to go to Peking to continue his education. He arrived just in time to be caught up in the maelstrom of the Chinese renaissance, and a short time later became associated with a little group of radicals under the leadership of Li Ta-chao, known as the father of the Chinese Communist movement. While never becoming an active Communist he, like many of the others, was deeply influenced by Russia, and was later drawn to Moscow to complete his education. The book ends abruptly as Tan leaves the Soviet Union to return to China, presumably to give his life to revolutionary activities.

In all, scarcely a quarter of a century is included within the span of this story. But during this brief period profound changes have occurred in the fundamental structure of Chinese life. The political revolution has thus far been a failure, but irresistible social and economic forces are at work which cannot long be held in check. At the moment, these forces, like Tan himself, are buried somewhere in the interior of China, working underground but relentless in their operation.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Success Stories

Beale Street: Where the Blues Began. By George W. Lee. Robert O. Ballou. $2.50.

"WHERE the Blues Began" is a misleading subtitle for a miscellany of success stories and local legends about the Negro section of Memphis, Tennessee. It is not about music. Two of its twenty chapters deal with Negro bands and orchestras and with the rise to fame of colored entertainers—"Louise Cook, exponent of the snake hips, who dances at Connie's Inn," Doe Doe Green and other members of the "Green Pastures" company, and others. Another fifteen pages are devoted to W. C. Handy, who changed the course of American popular music with his "St. Louis Blues" and made a fortune out of it because he had the financial acumen to publish it himself. George W. Lee, a business man on Beale Street, obviously is not equipped to tell Handy's story in any other terms than those of financial success. What he really has written is "Beale Street: Where the Negro Business Man Began."

The story opens with a eulogy of a colored banker and "realtor" who controlled most of the businesses on Beale Street in the late eighties, and ends with a eulogy of his son, a Republican boss there today. It contains biographies and anecdotes of Beale Street's gamblers, dope peddlers, and dark courtesans, whose charms were officially reserved for white men; of colored preachers, bankers, "beauticians," tailors, doctors. It recalls the long, shameful history of lynchings in Memphis and the rumors, lies, and racial slanders that set them off; gives a somewhat technical account of how a few white men were backed by the Ku Klux Klan in seizing control of the Negro insurance companies; gives full details, including speeches and newspaper accounts, of the opening of a park named after a colored philanthropist; solves murders and fixes the blame for the local bank crash. Much of the material of the book is fascinating. But many pages, even chapters, are given over to facts of the kind a census taker might collect, gathered into little biographies that serve to conceal the subjects as effectively as so many obituaries. The valuable portions of the book are drowned in undistinguished matter which obviously did not interest even the author. The final chapters give the key. The author is a politician as well as a successful insurance man. The little obituaries are rewards for the faithful Republicans of the district. When we read, "In the same block with Booth's office is that of Edward R. Kirk, Beale Street's 'Brown Napoleon' in real estate," we may know that Mr. Lee is mending political fences.

The one personality who emerges from the book is Robert R. Church, Tennessee's colored Republican boss. Mr. Lee's admiration for him is naively uncritical; he presents the reader with a full view of his hero's political chicaneries, paternalism, patronage system, trade-ins with the Democrats, and sell-out to the Hoover machine, which he disapproved and which betrayed him. Mr. Church helped to nominate Hoover but threatened to withdraw votes because of the presence of Klan members on the campaign committee. Slight concessions brought him into line. But Hoover did not reward him with handsome patronage as Harding had done; expected Negro appointments were canceled and lily-whites were installed in every important place. Years of careful building to make the Negro a politically important factor in Tennessee politics were swept away. Church wrote to Hoover: "I wish only to report upon the grievous disappointment of colored people. I wish you to know that where their hopes had been fondest their sorrow is keenest now, and where they had been led to expect the bread of encouragement they have received the stones of contempt." The next campaign saw him maneuvering to hold his power in the county convention. Futile as it had proved, position in the Republican Party was preferable to political extinction.

The bourgeois Negro is in a peculiarly tragic position in America. By raising himself above the proletarian and farmer Negro he cuts himself off from his own main stream. The whites bar him from further advancement. The correct Babbittry of the middle class is intensified by the incessant need to prove that a Negro banker, doctor, merchant, or civil servant is as good as his white prototype or even better. This is the point of view in "Beale Street." It accounts for the pedestrian dulness with which Mr. Lee has handled the dramatic and heroic story of a Negro community struggling for economic and political power in the midst of the intolerant South.

MARGARET LARKIN

Shorter Notices

Full Flavour. By Doris Leslie. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The first section of this novel, a reconstruction of family life in the Victorian Age (1848-68), is by far the best written—perhaps the atmosphere persuades us. The book loses vitality as the narrative of four generations approaches modern times. Miss Leslie makes clever use of background. The Ducros (Ducroix) family make the acquaintance of various well-known historical and literary figures, and thumb-nail drawings of Disraeli and William Morris add a kind of familiar charm to the story. But the tale is mainly that of Catherine Ducroix, a young Victorian miss reared in a most Victorian manner, who becomes—a tobacco merchant. She enters her father's business, and upon his death controls it, having developed meanwhile a nose for cigars. She falls, rather unfortunately, in love with a young artist and marries him—the typical young artist of the Rossetti period. Part business woman, part wife and mistress, at once Victorian and a forerunner of the later feminist, she fails her husband, or so she thinks. The reader will have some difficulty persuading himself that it is Catherine's will to control the lives of those she loves that really destroys the marriage. Rather, he may conclude that Victorianism and Bohemianism don't mix. "Full Flavour" is popular romantic fiction rather better than most. But Evelyn Scott's "Breathe upon These Slain" is a far more important reconstruction of Victorian life and scenes and has an important theme. "Full Flavour" is merely a good story, which lacks, moreover, the subtle irony of "Cavalcade," the work it most resembles. Miss Leslie has a gift for creating atmosphere, but she seems to have little talent for portraying intricate characters and even less, if this book is any indication, for contriving original plots.

Tom Tiddler's Ground. By Edward Shanks. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

In homely language "Tom Tiddler's Ground" is the story of a man who danced and had to pay the piper. The case of Tom Florey, the hero of Mr. Shanks's long novel, is not an extraordinary one; readers will be pleased to recognize his prototypes among their acquaintance in America as well as in England. When the war ended, young Tom Florey, son of an unappetizing, fourth-rate English innkeeper, was thought to be on his way to a brilliant political career. But Tom did not care to climb the slow and honorable steps to power. He wanted quick recognition, quick money, and a great many quick drinks. He left the government service for a gold-plated executive position in the new business world. He married a beautiful, cold, luxurious wife, bought himself a house in the country, gave parties, and went more and more heavily into debt. He lost the gold-plated job and replaced it with another, shadier still, but lucrative. Whiskey, business worries, cold adulteries, brought about heart attacks. Still fairly young and still promising, he died in a hotel in Berlin after a drinking bout. The book is far more engrossing than its hackneyed plot would lead one to expect. Mr. Shanks has caught very well the atmosphere of pre-war Germany, of the war-time Organization Office, of the small-town inn, of London's young Bohemia. Also, among his minor characters there are a number of shadowy but arresting figures. Yet one gains the impression that Mr. Shanks has poured into his book a great deal of material that he does not fully understand. He undeniably has great perceptive talent, but he appears to be unconscious of some of his best effects, making an unimportant scene in a restaurant, an idle conversation, more striking than situations vital to the structure of his novel.

What Economic Nationalism Means to the South. By Peter Molyneaux. Foreign Policy Association and World Peace Foundation. 25 cents.

The thesis of this booklet is that, so far as the South is concerned, current plans for "permanent readjustment of economic arrangements" cannot mean anything unless they involve larger foreign markets for cotton. This will undoubtedly hinge upon larger imports to this country, and larger imports in turn will not be possible without a radical lowering of our tariff barriers. Mr. Molyneaux draws a picture of the relative poverty of the South. With roughly one-fourth of the land area and population of the nation, the cotton States have only one-eighth of the wealth. The per capita farm income in the cotton States is half that of the other States. The farm population of the South is sinking in the agricultural scale, for in the era of prosperity the number of owner-operated farms decreased in every cotton State; in half of them there was a decline in the number of share-tenant farms; and in all the number of croppers, who are in fact serfs, increased. Mr. Molyneaux does not think other crops may be satisfactorily substituted for cotton; he believes therefore that continuance of economic nationalism will further degrade the Southern population and as a consequence hold back the nation. The opposition of the cotton South to the protective tariff is of course historic. It takes on added force today, since the South has made important advances in manufactures, and since every country shows the effects of tariff strangulation. Here is an exhibit which the Administration must heed.

□ OPEN SHELF □

Henry George's Books

Sold here without profit. Ask for price list and appreciations by famous men—sent free.

None may call himself educated in social thought (says Dr. John Dewey) who lacks acquaintance with the great writings of Henry George.

ROBERT SCHALKENBACH FOUNDATION
30 Park Place, New York City

SUPPORTED BY ENDOWMENTS

ATTENTION! Write for free sensational bargain catalog of unusual and curious books. Private Press Publishers, Dept. N., 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

SEND postcard for free Little Blue Book catalog. Thousands of bargains. More than 350 books at 5c. each. Address: Little Blue Book Co., Box 2007, Girard, Kans.

□ SCHOOL □

9TH Year. The Home School opens Sept. 17. Co-ed. Ages 5-12 Elementary Jewish Department. Individual instruction, outdoor sports. Reasonable rates. Plainfield, N. J. Tel.: Plainfield 6-1474M1.

□ HELP WANED □

UNUSUAL OPPORTUNITY for vegetarian progressive educator with family, guiding small farm school in Florida. Ideal living and location—salary or percentage. Natural Health School, Zephyr Hills, Fla.

POSITIONS WANTED

EXPERIENCED kitchen manager and excellent dietitian (female) seeks position with private boarding school for young children. Box 476, c/o The Nation.

PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

J. G. EDMONDS, LITERARY AGENT. First novels, stories wanted. No advance charges. 108 West 85th St., N. Y.

AUTHORS! All books published . . . new plan . . . write for details. . . . Private Press Publishers, Dept. N., 100 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

MUSIC

BRAHMS, Bach, Beethoven and all great composers, the masterful symphonies immortalized on 100,000 new, large records (value $2), for 50c and 75c. Catalogue.
THE GRAMAPHONE SHOP, INC.
18 E. 48th St., N. Y. Tel. WIckersham 2-187[illegible]

□ PERSONAL □

THE world is waiting for the sunrise! Why wait? 1100 cultured members of Contacts, correspondence club for the intellectually isolated, are NOW spreading the sunshine of camaraderie and good fellowship. Send 3c stamp for prospectus 15a. CONTACTS, Box 91, Station D, New York City.

REFINED Jewish people. Bridge Club. Party Aug. 30th—Sept. 9. Admission 50 cents. Miss Corn, 121 E. 92 St. ATw. 9-7116.

□ FOR SALE □

DRESS SHOP, completely equipped, Long Island, 20 miles N. Y. Sacrifice account of ill health. Box 465, c/o The Nation.

APARTMENT WANTED

OCT. 1. Large living room, 2 medium-sized bedrooms. Modern kitchen, bath. Yard. Quiet, clean neighborhood. Convenient to playgroup for young children. Preferably south of 50th St., Manhattan. East or west near subway. $70. Or same as above with additional large room and bath, $95. Box 477.

FOR SALE, RENT OR EXCHANGE

24TH ST. Opposite London Terrace. Brick house, appropriate one-three families. 13 rooms, 3 baths, hot water heat, fireplaces; for sale, rent or exchange for farm dwelling 1½ hours from N. Y. Write, Weil, 51 W. 81 St New York City.

PHILADELPHIA—BOARD

ENJOY comforts private country home, year round! Attractive. Delightful. Modern conveniences. 20 miles north. Near town, bus, electric trains. Concrete highway. Opportunity for single person, or married couple. P. O. Box 1037—North Wales, Pa.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burling
OCT 17

NRA
U.S.
CODE

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1934 No. 3610

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 281

EDITORIALS:

The Munitions Investigation 284
Shall the Government Feed Strikers? 285
Upton Sinclair's Victory 285
Nazi Women Speak Out 286
ISSUES AND MEN. THE NEW CUBAN RECIPROCITY PACT. By Oswald Garrison Villard 287
CARTOON: WHEN PIGS FLY. By LOW 288
THE STRIKE OF CAPITAL. By Raymond Gram Swing . . . 289
HOW STABLE IS RECOVERY? By Maxwell S. Stewart . . . 291
LABOR MILITANCY SPREADS IN INDIA. By V. K. Krishna Menon 293
THE SHIPPING CONSPIRACY. By William Adams 295
THE SOCIALIST STUDENT CONGRESS. By Joseph P. Lash . 297
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 298
CORRESPONDENCE 299
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 300

LABOR AND INDUSTRY:

Stepchildren of the New Deal. By Warren C. Montross . . . 301
Berry Picker. By John Macnamara 302
Labor Notes 304

BOOKS:

Lewis Corey Examines American Capitalism. By A. A. Berle, Jr. 305
A Biographer in Search of His Subject. By Edna Kenton . . 306
Proletarian "Grand Hotel." By James Burnham 306
Texture and Meaning in Poetry. By Eda Lou Walton . . . 307
Fifty Million Peasants. By T. A. Bisson 308
Upton Sinclair—an Anthology. By Eric Ely-Estorick 308
Soviet Story-Teller. By James T. Farrell 308

BOARD OF EDITORS
FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS
MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States; to Canada, $5.50; and to other foreign countries, $6.00.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1887, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1934, by The Nation, Inc.; Oswald Garrison Villard, Publisher.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. British Agent, Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London W. C. 1, England. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

HAVING FAILED to budge their employers by more peaceful means, the cotton-textile workers have at length walked out. First reports indicate that the strike began by being at least 50 per cent effective in the South, but it still remains uncertain how far the walkout will extend to the wool and silk divisions of the textile industry. In any event, this is the first truly nation-wide strike of a major industry under the NRA, the threatened automobile and steel walkouts both having faded out. The U. T. W. A. is demanding a decrease in the work-week from forty to thirty hours with appropriate upward adjustments in pay rates. This, however, is not the most fundamental demand. In addition, the workers are striking against the extension of the stretch-out system, against the industry's production-curtailment program, against the incessant discharge of workers for union membership, and against the various tricks and stratagems by which employers have evaded compliance with present code provisions. Furthermore, the union wants "recognition," the most familiar issue of all in Section 7-a strikes since the summer of 1933. The Cotton Textile Institute refuses to consider any of these demands, singly or collectively. Instead, the institute points complacently to the supposed blessings of the original cotton-textile code, and expresses pained surprise that workers so blessed should ask for more. If the strike succeeds, the way will be opened to the complete unionization of the South. If the strike fails, it will be the heaviest setback any individual union has suffered since the Recovery Act became law.

TWO PRINCIPLES basic to the theory of collective bargaining have been enunciated by the National Labor Relations Board in its recent decision in the case of Federal Union No. 18838 of the United Automobile Workers and the Houde Engineering Corporation of Buffalo, New York. First, majority rule, the fundamental idea of democratic self-government, must apply in industrial relations as well as in politics. Concretely, when the majority of the workers choose a given labor organization as a "representative" within the meaning of Section 7-a, that representative shall be the "exclusive collective-bargaining agency of all employees." Second, the employer owes it as a duty to such a representative to negotiate in "good faith" so as to arrive at a collective agreement covering wages, hours, and other working conditions. Here we have a theory of industrial relations which starts from majority rule and advances to union recognition and the execution of bilateral contracts. Step for step it parallels the theory formerly developed by the now-defunct Wagner board. Like its predecessor, the Garrison board proceeds on the assumption that it was the intent of Section 7-a, in guaranteeing collective bargaining, to promote the making of collective agreements between trade unions and employers. This is no doubt bad news to anti-union employers, but it is good news to all who have the interests of the labor movement at heart. The repercussions of the Houde decision on the President's automobile-strike "settlement" of March 25 last will be most interesting to observe.

FIVE BIG STEEL COMPANIES, led by the United States Steel Corporation, have put their white-collar employees on the five-day week, with a corresponding salary cut amounting to 10 per cent. This reduction follows the sharp decline in steel production, which dropped from 52 per cent of capacity in June to 19 per cent in August. The announced salary cut gives little indication of the actual condition of the 40,000 salaried employees in the steel industry. Not only have they suffered three previous reductions of 10, 15, and 10 per cent, but part-time employment has kept the income of many of the clerical force below a subsistence standard. The pay cut has not yet been extended to the wage workers in the mills, but past history would indicate that wage cuts will shortly follow. As Maxwell Stewart points out elsewhere in this issue, recovery lies in an increase of consuming power. If it is true that "as steel goes, so goes the country," then the considerable slice which the steel companies have taken out of consuming power provides significant confirmation of Mr. Stewart's view that the New Deal is still badly in the red and getting worse.

THE PROSPECT that the Soviet Union will be officially admitted into the League of Nations, with a seat on the Council, shortly after the meeting of the Assembly on September 10 is one of the most heartening international developments of recent years. Adherence to the League by the largest of the non-member states will not only offset to a large extent whatever loss of prestige was suffered as a result of the withdrawals of Japan and Germany, but bring tremendous pressure on both of these countries for reentry. It should also substantially reduce the danger of an immediate conflict either in Europe or the Far East. Flanked on three sides by strong League Powers, Nazi Germany is much less likely to indulge in bellicose maneuvers than would otherwise be the case, and it is probable that as the result of League pressure both Germany and Poland will be forced to accept the proposed pact of non-aggression, known as the Eastern Locarno, which would afford at least a breathing spell for the nations bordering Germany's eastern frontier. It is possible, moreover, that the Soviet Union will request the League to investigate the provocative acts of the Japanese along the Chinese Eastern Railway, thus seriously hampering local Japanese militarists in their attempt to force Russia to accept Tokio's terms. And while it is perhaps too much to hope that the entrance of the Soviet Union will immediately turn the League into an effective instrument for peace, we can at least be assured that with Litvinov at Geneva, League sessions will no longer be dull and lethargic.

NEGOTIATIONS over the Russian debt have now come to a standstill. Mr. Troyanovski has made his "final" offer and the State Department has rejected it. The breakdown was over the issue of long-term credits. The final Russian offer introduced a new compromise, in that the Russians expressed willingness to divide the sum to be received on loan into two parts, one to be repaid in twenty years, the other to be made up by the usual short-term credits. Both parts were to bear interest at an increased rate, the increase to be applied toward the repayment of Russia's debt. The Russians felt this offer would not establish a precedent which Great Britain, France, and Germany could immediately seize upon. For to each of these countries they could offer a similar settlement if there were a similar long-term loan. But the State Department would not hear of credits longer than five years, and there the matter rests for the present. As the Russians are ready to commit themselves to spend a total of $200,000,000 in this country on this basis, it is hard to believe that negotiations will not be resumed later on. The thought suggests itself that the autumn campaign may not have been considered a propitious time for the Administration to announce a return to the unpopular practice of making long-term loans to foreign governments. The Russian plan, however, would not controvert the Johnson Act, in that the loans and credits would be made through the new Export-Import Bank, which is exempt from its terms. After the elections are over the President and American industry may look on a two-hundred-million-dollar order with more friendly eyes.

JAPAN'S DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS, which are to be presented at the preliminary naval negotiations at London, have the merit of both simplicity and economy—for Japan. Each of the three great naval Powers would be limited, according to the preliminary plan, to a global tonnage of 800,000. As this is approximately the size of the Japanese fleet at the present time, no expenditures would be required except for replacements, and Japan would avoid the necessity of scrapping its existing vessels. The disarmament, neatly enough, would be done by Great Britain and the United States, each of which would be compelled to reduce its fleet by upward of 300,000 tons. The plan would allow each country full freedom to decide on the type of ships which it required, except that the size of ships in certain categories would be limited. In exchange for the "face" obtained by the recognition of the principle of equality, the Japanese government is reported to be willing to enter into an informal understanding not to build up to parity. If the other Powers reject these proposals, which is almost certain, the Japanese appear to be determined to abrogate the Washington naval treaty. The real struggle at the preliminary negotiations, however, does not turn so much on the technicalities of armaments as on inclusion of political questions, notably the issues with regard to Manchoukuo. It is obvious that neither the United States nor Great Britain will grant anything approaching equality as long as Japan retains its strategic but illegal position on Chinese soil. The present negotiations are but the preliminary skirmishes in what promises to be a long-drawn-out and bitter struggle.

THE PRESENT TEMPER of the American people is "strongly conservative," if newspaper editorials are a criterion of the social and political attitudes of the population. This is the conclusion arrived at by Trust Companies, a monthly publication devoted to the interests of fiduciaries, after a six months' survey of newspaper opinion. In this survey ultra-conservative papers were graded 100 per cent and radical papers zero. Papers described as "wavering" in their adherence to the dogmas of 100-per-cent Americanism rated only 50 per cent; any substantial evidence of progressivism dropped the rating to 20 per cent. The regional comparisons shown in the survey are interesting. New England is at the top of the scale with 76.3 per cent and the Pacific Coast at the bottom with 58.4 per cent. However, we seem to detect one vital flaw in the survey's most fundamental premise; the assertion that "readers buy newspapers whose opinions most closely reflect their own outlook" ignores the quite obvious fact that most newspapers "reflect the outlook," not of their readers or even primarily of their editors or writers, but rather of their publishers and, a little less directly, of the advertisers upon whom their very life depends. Furthermore, radicals and liberals are obliged to read conservative papers because under modern conditions the expense of news gathering is so huge as to prevent the radical press from providing a comparable news service.

AMONG the most disquieting developments of the summer has been the evidence, which has come in from all sides, of a renewed campaign to force teachers in the schools to hew the line of orthodoxy. In Toledo six teachers were warned openly that their 1934-35 contracts would be withheld unless they recanted their radicalism. In one case the only charge against the teacher was that he had used Professor Tugwell's book for reference purposes. Previously the Board of Education had passed a resolution forbidding teachers and other citizens from speaking in board meetings without the authorization of the superintendent. Excitement has been aroused in North Carolina and in education circles generally by the dismissal of James M. Shields, principal of a school in Winston-Salem, for the single offense of writing a novel on school conditions called "Just Plain Larnin'." Meeting in San José, California, on July 31, the presidents of seven teachers colleges unanimously approved the suggestion of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction that all teachers, students, and school employees be required to sign a "pledge of loyalty to the country that will give an expression of absolute allegiance to the United States of America." In New York, Governor Lehman, with the hearty approval of the Benevolent and Protective Order of the Elks, has signed the notorious Ives bill requiring all teachers in public and private schools to swear unqualified support of both the federal and State constitutions. We wonder whether the patriotic gentlemen who passed these rulings are aware that no less than 16 per cent of the framers of the Constitution were foreigners, and that probably the majority of the citizens of the period were opposed to its adoption. Where, we wonder, would our revered ancestors have secured their teachers if Mr. Ives's great-great-grandfather had been on the job? But of course there were no Communists in 1789.

WE ARE NOT enthusiastic about Mayor LaGuardia's business tax as a means of obtaining funds for unemployment relief. Judged by all the principles of sound taxation, it is an extremely unsatisfactory means of raising revenue. It is cumbersome, discriminatory in certain features, and politically unpopular. There is a strong probability that, even with the proposed amendments, the tax will be pyramided and passed on to the consumer in the form of higher prices. Undoubtedly a luxury tax such as that suggested by ex-Mayor O'Brien, or a levy on higher incomes as proposed by the Socialists, would be vastly more equitable. But the necessity of providing adequate funds for relief must take precedence over all other considerations. With 400,000 families, nearly a quarter of New York's population, already on the relief rolls, and the prospect of a substantial addition this fall and winter, it is obvious that there can be no prolonged quibbling about the form of taxation. And we strongly suspect, on the basis of recent experience, that no tax which was imposed on those most able to pay would have any chance of being adopted. All of which leads us to the rather half-hearted conclusion that Mayor LaGuardia's tax is better than nothing and probably as good as we can hope to get.

THE INVESTIGATION into the trade disputes in Bombay, referred to in Mr. Menon's article elsewhere in this issue, has revealed a number of facts regarding the Indian textile industry which illustrate the serious obstacles faced by the labor movement in that country. Bombay, long the center of the textile trade, has naturally been among the most advanced in labor organization. During the past eight years there have been 471 strikes in the province of Bombay, involving a loss of nearly 35,000,000 working days. Of this total the city of Bombay itself has suffered a loss of over 32,000,000 days, while further to the north its chief rival, Ahmedabad—Gandhi's home—has been almost completely free from labor difficulties. Thus while the mill-owners of Bombay have been forced to content themselves with relatively moderate profits, the mills in Ahmedabad have been paying from 14 to 100 per cent a year. Even in 1932, at the lowest point in the depression, the profit was 16 per cent. Lured by high profits and freedom from labor difficulties, scores of mills have moved from Bombay either to Ahmedabad or to southern India, where wages are scarcely half those in the north. In addition to the difficulties imposed by geographic differences, the Indian workers have been greatly handicapped by lack of funds or reserves to fall back on in time of strike, especially since the police habitually bring pressure to bear on money lenders and shopkeepers to stop all advance of credit. Police interference is open and unabashed, and instances have been recorded where the employers publicly rewarded the police upon the successful termination of labor disturbances.

IN SOME STATES the consumer pays more for commodities than in others because of a sales tax, the revenue from which aids State finances. In other States local conditions or increased costs affect prices. But in New Jersey prices are higher than in New York or Pennsylvania, and the difference goes neither to the State nor to the producer. That is because New Jersey has a State system of codes which overlaps the NRA code system, and as a sovereign State enjoys the rare privilege of fixing prices. Only eighteen codes are in effect, about half of them in the service trades, and they have been enforced only a few months, but it is estimated they are taxing consumers at the rate of a million dollars a year—a million dollars which is spent only in enforcing the codes and in paying the salaries of a horde of State recovery officials. In spite of the satisfaction with which these codes are regarded by State officials and their politician friends, who hand out jobs just to help along the Democrats in their gubernatorial-senatorial campaign, a storm of protest from consumers and business men has forced the issue out into the open. General Johnson upheld the New Jersey codes if they would eliminate "existing inconsistencies" with the parent NRA codes and handed over to the politicians complete responsibility in the service trades. But meanwhile small business men, arrested for violation of the codes by price-cutting, are preparing to fight the matter out in the courts on the basis of constitutionality.

WITH THIS WEEK'S ISSUE of The Nation, Raymond Gram Swing becomes a member of the Board of Editors. Mr. Swing has for many years been a friend and occasional contributor of The Nation; he was, indeed, a member of the editorial staff during the winter of 1918-19. He will serve in the double capacity of editor and Washington correspondent, contributing a weekly letter of national developments. Mr. Swing brings with him an equipment much needed at this moment in American life—an intimate, first-hand acquaintance with the political and economic struggles of Europe throughout the post-war years. As correspondent in Berlin and, lately, in London, he has absorbed and interpreted the experiences that have accompanied the processes of economic collapse and political upheaval. This background has given him a perspective upon our own national crisis, the value of which is evident in his first article from Washington, The Strike of Capital, appearing in this issue.

The Munitions Investigation

THE Senate Munitions Committee headed by Senator Nye could hardly have chosen a more appropriate moment to launch its investigation of the armament industry. The hearings, which began in Washington on September 4, come at a time when the makers of war materials are enjoying the best business in years. They are far more active, if we can judge by the mounting totals of military expenditure throughout the world, than they ever were in the prosperous years before the World War. In the spring of 1914, when Philip Snowden startled the House of Commons with his charges against the British armament ring, the principal Great Powers were spending some two billion dollars annually on their armies and navies. Today they are spending from 30 to 300 per cent more than they did in 1914.

Mounting military budgets, however, are only one of the indices of business activity in the armament field. Warfare in the Gran Chaco continues unabated despite President Roosevelt's arms embargo last May and the feeble efforts of the League of Nations to block shipments from other producing centers. Nazi Germany is importing airplanes and airplane engines from abroad, while Air Minister Göring is speeding aviation construction at home. Japan is buying scrap iron, nitrates, and other essential war materials for its huge army and navy replenishment programs.

The Nye committee is in a position to expose the nature of this bloody traffic if it is only intelligent enough to seize the opportunity and courageous enough to carry through to the bitter end. We hope it will avoid the mistake of some zealous reformers who would have it set out to apprehend a band of "villains." Most of the gentlemen engaged in the arms industry are simply following the accepted rules of business and seeking in turn a neat profit wherever they can; there are "villains," no doubt, but they are relatively unimportant. What is important is the fact that the whole system is rotten, that it is a breeder of international suspicion, a source of corruption, and an essential part of all "national-defense" programs.

There are a great many pertinent questions about the armament industry which The Nation would like to see cleared up. We should like to know, for example, just how some American firms have managed to continue their shipments to the Chaco since the President's embargo proclamation. The Nye committee should be able to tell us why the State Department and the Department of Justice are still sanctioning the export of these war materials and what action the exporting companies took to secure contracts from the belligerents in the last hours before the embargo became law. We should like to know the sales-promotion methods employed in the case of Latin American countries which are in default on their government bonds, but are still able to place munitions orders. There was a revolution in Brazil a few years ago which incidentally reaped a profit for certain American munitions interests, though how it was financed we do not know. Shortly afterward the Brazilian congress, despite a deficit in the federal treasury, voted an expensive naval program in which one of the big American shipbuilding firms was actively interested. Then we are curious, too, about the reported munitions shipments which have been going to Cuba in recent months, apparently to both the government and the revolutionary factions.

The basic question which confronts the Senate investigation, however, comes much closer home. The War and Navy departments, of course, are the best customers of the American munitions industry. They are more than customers; they are close associates and business allies. It is the established policy of both the army and navy to "encourage" the development of the private arms industry in the United States. The three American shipbuilding companies which employed William B. Shearer to attend the Geneva disarmament conference in 1927 enjoy the whole-hearted support of the Navy Department and continue to get the lion's share of the current naval-building contracts. They were awarded contracts amounting to more than $100,000,000 on thirteen of the twenty-one ships laid down in private yards during the last twelve months. Their bids, incidentally, are said to have revealed evidence of collusion. The du Pont Company is the chief source of supply for the smokeless powder used by the army and navy, and as such a close ally of the two departments.

The War Department justifies its "encouragement" of the domestic armament makers on the ground that private industry must be equipped and ready to meet the needs of the nation in an emergency. This position might be tenable if the fantastic plan for industrial mobilization were really necessary to defense. But when the Chief of Staff asserts that the whole scheme is based on the requirements of our four field armies, amounting to 4,000,000 men, he gives his case away. He reveals what is undoubtedly true, that the War Department is not preparing for the defense of American soil but for participation in another world war, whether in Europe or Asia, fought with the same mass armies which produced the stalemate and useless slaughter in the last war. If the average American wants to do anything about the profiteers, he will have to scrap the national-defense system which produced them and nurtures them.

Before it gets far the Nye committee is certain to arouse the ire of the War and Navy departments. The War Department is opposed to all arms embargoes. It has the power to sidetrack this investigation. We do not know whether the Nye committee realizes the full implications of its investigation, or whether it can withstand the pressure which will be brought to bear against it from powerful quarters. Senator Nye has promised to see the fight through. His staff of investigators, under the able direction of Stephen Raushenbush, has had three months in which to examine the books and records of the industry and the files of government departments. He should be able to demonstrate the urgent need for an effective system which would eliminate excessive profits by taxation, control manufacture and export, and establish government manufacture in the basic fields of shipbuilding, armor plate, ordnance, and airplanes. This would not eliminate all the abuses, but it would be a start in the right direction.

Shall the Government Feed Strikers?

MORE and more the power of government to give or to withhold relief will become the crucial factor in the struggle of labor under the New Deal. Harry Hopkins, FERA director, has said repeatedly, "Yes, the FERA has fed strikers and will feed strikers." All strikers, any time and anywhere? Not quite. Mr. Hopkins, under fire from belligerent employers, was obliged to qualify his statement. Relief might be withheld, he admitted, in the case of strikes disapproved by the Department of Labor, although thus far there have been no such strikes. Later Mr. Hopkins said that he did not intend that indefinite support should be given to strikers, and that "if they think we are going to underwrite their strike they are mistaken."

But is it the function of the Department of Labor to approve or disapprove strikes? No, the Department of Labor, the National Labor Relations Board, and other related government agencies are in theory neutral, their functions being limited to interpreting and protecting the rights of employees and employers as these are prescribed by law. Public Resolution Number 44, the President's substitute for the Wagner bill, declares in its last section, inserted on the insistence of Senator La Follette, that "the right to strike remains intact." The resolution also provides that the National Labor Relations Board may investigate the facts and issues of a given industrial conflict with respect to both employers and employees. This is not new. The former National Labor Board, General Johnson, and the various NRA boards have repeatedly investigated industrial disputes and have repeatedly supported labor's right to organize and bargain collectively. But Mr. Hopkins's statement provides the first intimation that the government might go beyond this function and decide whether a given strike was or was not "justifiable," employing the weapon of relief to enforce its decision.

It is a crucial point. For the first time, out of the fog of the New Deal, there emerges the faint outline of something very like the "corporative state." If the government, after permitting employers to write codes limiting production and fixing wages, were to use the power of giving or withholding relief to back or break strikes, the resulting situation would be fascist in effect, by whatever name it was called.

The textile strike will supply the first major test. It involves, potentially at least, about 800,000 workers, practically all of whom now live at or below the subsistence level. Thousands of them are now getting relief to supplement even the meager minimum wages written into the codes. In the South chiseling employers have forced wages considerably below the code minimum of $12 a week. The cry of reactionary employers, "The government is subsidizing strikes," utterly misrepresents the true situation. In the first place, the relief administration, in feeding strikers, is acting in its only legitimate role—that of an impartial agency distributing relief to destitute persons who are acting within their rights under the law. In the second place, there is the additional and ironical fact that the striking textile workers are struggling to help the government put the burden of supporting workers where it belongs, on industry. If the Administration betrayed its worker-allies by withdrawing relief, it would simply be betraying and abandoning its own recovery program.

Understandably enough, Mr. Hopkins has tried to minimize the issue. On the eve of the textile strike he declared that although the FERA has followed the policy of granting relief to needy strikers for fifteen months, only about $100,000 has been paid to strikers in that period; strikers do not apply, or do not qualify, for relief on any large scale. This is itself a significant and a dubious statement. Can anyone believe that $100,000 actually represents either the demand or the "qualified" need of the many thousands of workers who have been on strike during the past fifteen months? As a matter of fact, what has happened is that local relief administrators, either sympathetic with or coerced by local employers, have repeatedly used as a strike-breaking weapon their power to withhold relief or discriminate in giving it. In northern Alabama 23,000 textile workers have been on strike for nearly two months. They appeared at the recent convention of the United Textile Workers in New York laden with affidavits showing that in many localities the relief power was used against them. Similar complaints have arisen in almost every major strike that has occurred in recent months.

In the textile strike, as in many other recent conflicts, the workers will be striking chiefly to obtain the code wage which employers have directly or indirectly withheld, and to establish the collective-bargaining agreements which the Recovery Act explicitly provides for. Notoriously, Section 7-a has been enforced only where and when labor has been sufficiently powerful to compel its enforcement. Under these circumstances we do not believe that the federal government will dare or wish to use the relief power against striking workers.

Upton Sinclair's Victory

UPTON SINCLAIR'S victory is astounding. It bears him out in his early assurance of success and his insistence from the beginning that he sensed a ground swell of revolt against the present order. It is the more remarkable because of the widespread belief that the red scare following the general strike had so aroused California that there was a reaction against the radicalism of Mr. Sinclair. The vote shows, on the contrary, that the lawless officials of San Francisco, the big business men and their loyal servants the police of that city, distinctly over-reached themselves. Again, the supposed resentment of large numbers of Democrats against a Socialist coming over to their party and trying to walk off with its nomination was evidently not as widespread as had been supposed. Union labor certainly supported Sinclair overwhelmingly in his extraordinary run. No one but Sinclair himself and a few devotees believed last February that he had even a chance. He had no money and no means of raising large sums; he had no organization of his own; he had been overwhelmingly licked when he ran for Governor on the Socialist ticket. But for once a candidate interpreted the popular current correctly.

If ever a revolution was due, it was due in California.

Nowhere else has the battle between labor and capital been so widespread and bitter, and the casualties so large; nowhere else has there been such a flagrant denial of the personal liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights; nowhere else has authority been so lawless and brazen; nowhere else has the brute force of capitalism been so openly used and displayed; nowhere else has labor been so oppressed; nowhere has there been a falser or more poisoned and poisoning press. It was time for some sign of rebellion. But the final victory is not yet won. We look to see the San Francisco and Los Angeles press strike hard in the effort to portray Sinclair as a dangerous bolshevik and anarchist; we look to see a union of all the conservative forces against him, plentifully supplied with money and controlling an overwhelming majority of the press. Yet somehow or other we feel that Upton Sinclair may win. Perhaps we underrate the forces against him. But his remarkable record shows that the political currents are running deep and strong in favor of a new deal in California. We look to see the seal of party regularity set on Mr. Sinclair even though it helps Republican efforts to portray the Roosevelt Administration as socialistic; Mark Sullivan and Henry P. Fletcher and Dr. Wirt and some of our other political jokes will not lose this opportunity to make the welkin ring with appeals to high heaven to save the Republic now. Already the Democrats are bolting in several quarters in California.

The drift of conservative Democrats to Governor Merriam, who has won the Republican nomination, is now open and—in the prints—impressive. It is to be welcomed. It is well to have a clear-cut line-up between conservatives and progressives, liberals and radicals. Perhaps this cleavage, like the formation of the American Liberty League, is another sign that the break-up of the old political parties is near at hand—it has already come in Wisconsin and Minnesota. It will make for political clarification and simplification and therefore for progress, since there can be no real progress as long as the conservatives dominate and own both of the historic parties.

Upton Sinclair's E. P. I. C. platform will, of course, bear the brunt of the attack, and good worshipers of the status quo, like the editors of the New York Times, are already consoling themselves with the thought that if this wild man is elected, he will be able to do nothing radical because he will have no control over the legislature. Not quite so fast, gentlemen! If Upton Sinclair sweeps the State, he will speak for the people with such force that even a California legislature will have to take some heed. We do not say that all of Mr. Sinclair's program is either wise or enforceable; we do not venture to prophesy how successful he who has never held an executive position would be as Chief Executive of California. That is for the future to show if and when he is elected. But we do give profound thanks that one man has had the courage to stand up and announce his candidacy without consulting any boss, or any newspaper proprietor, or any financier or capitalist, and has gained the first round. He has made multitudes think and will make still more. He has won them and will win others to his belief that the economic and political jungle we live in today is no more necessary and inevitable than were the foul horrors of that human cesspool of the stockyards which he—to his everlasting honor—revealed in his most famous book "The Jungle."

Nazi Women Speak Out

THE Nazis are supposed to be adept in the art of manipulating mass psychology. They have, however, made one serious mistake; they have apparently believed that the psychology of women didn't count. The Nazi appeal to men has been subtle and various. They have been offered the opportunity to sacrifice themselves for their country and for an ideal—always a coveted form of masochism. They have been offered at the same time a sense of power, of achievement, and of superiority—both sexually and racially; the "masculine protest" is written into their creed. They have been offered the satisfactions of comradeship in a common enterprise. Women on the other hand have been offered far less and they have received less than they were offered. Like the men they were invited to sacrifice themselves for their country, but they discovered very soon that their sacrifice was to be vicarious to a degree. Theirs not to march or to sing or to feel superior; theirs merely to minister to the heroes of the Great Awakening and to bear the heroes of the Third Reich's future triumphs. At first they acquiesced, expecting, in return for submission, at least a fair measure of honor and security.

That they have received instead humiliation both at home and in public life is the testimony of a number of prominent Nazi women. A recent Bulletin published by the American Committee of the International Relief Association contained excerpts from German women's magazines in which these views are expressed with astonishing courage and candor. For example, Frau Rogge-Börner, editor of Die Deutsche Kämpferin, writes in that publication:

> The younger generation of women . . . is beginning to feel uneasy. They are troubled by the fact that, carried away as they were by a deep-felt patriotism, they had encouraged a strange form of masculine delusion in making the National Socialists the absolute rulers of their destiny as well as masters over the fate of the entire German people . . . A really unbiased evaluation of women today shows that not only have they not taken one step forward, but many backward.

One quotation after another describes the subjection of women in all branches of public activity and the professions, even in those professions which have traditionally been under their control. And the same policy apparently applies even in domestic relations. Various articles quoted in the Bulletin express resentment at the degree to which Nazi activities have broken the unity of home life and drawn men away from their ordinary domestic responsibilities. Others, even more bitter, discuss the emotional results growing out of the Nazi ideal of masculine superiority. Dr. Leonore Kühn, writing in Die Denkschrift, says:

> . . . A young son, even the youngest, already laughs at his mother with "manly" superiority if she, rather than his father, attempts to exercise authority over him. Instinctively he recognizes his advantage from observing the subservience to which his mother has been reduced.

The opposition of Germany's leading women to the repressions of the Nazi regime may turn out to be quite as important as the other evidences of internal disillusion and rebellion that have recently been revealed.

Issues and Men

The New Cuban Reciprocity Pact

THE Administration in general, and Secretary Hull in particular, are to be heartily congratulated upon the conclusion of the new reciprocal trade agreement with Cuba by which some tariffs have been reduced by more than 60 per cent. It is a long step forward, and even with Cuba in its present weakened position, with its purchasing power reduced perhaps lower than at any time since the Spanish occupation, it should have far-reaching social and economic effects in the island. Of course it does not go far enough for me. As I have repeatedly pointed out, it is utterly ridiculous that we should not include this republic, which we created and officially set up, within our own free-trade zone. The only thing that keeps us from doing it is the fact that the flag which flies over Morro is not our own. The island is literally within sight of our shores—if one goes up in an airplane from Miami. No one can maintain that our imports from Cuba would be large enough seriously to injure the welfare of the 125,000,000 Americans if the tariff barriers should be wholly removed. And if the Cuban flag should be hauled down and ours hoisted in its stead, no sane man would think of demanding a tariff.

None the less, we can be grateful that this new agreement, according to one of our foremost experts, will probably double Cuba's trade with us during the first year of its life. Dr. John Lee Coulter estimates that the island's exports to us will rise to $100,000,000 as against some $50,000,000 in 1932 and 1933. Since about four-fifths of this increase will be in sugar, some relief will be brought to the Cuban masses, many of whom are utterly destitute and subsisting under conditions which American workers could not endure. On the other side, Cuba has reduced the tariffs on textiles, rayon yarns and fabrics, wool articles, cotton fabrics, and especially on automobiles with a factory list price of less than $750, radios, typewriters, and industrial machinery generally, as well as on iron and steel bars, structural iron, plumbing, and miscellaneous manufactured articles. The benefit to the United States from this speaks for itself. Cuba's trade with us from 1922 to 1926 averaged $480,000,000; in 1929 it amounted to $336,300,000; while in 1932 and 1933 it had actually dropped, as stated, to $50,000,000. It should now go back at least to the 1929 figure, that is, within the next few years.

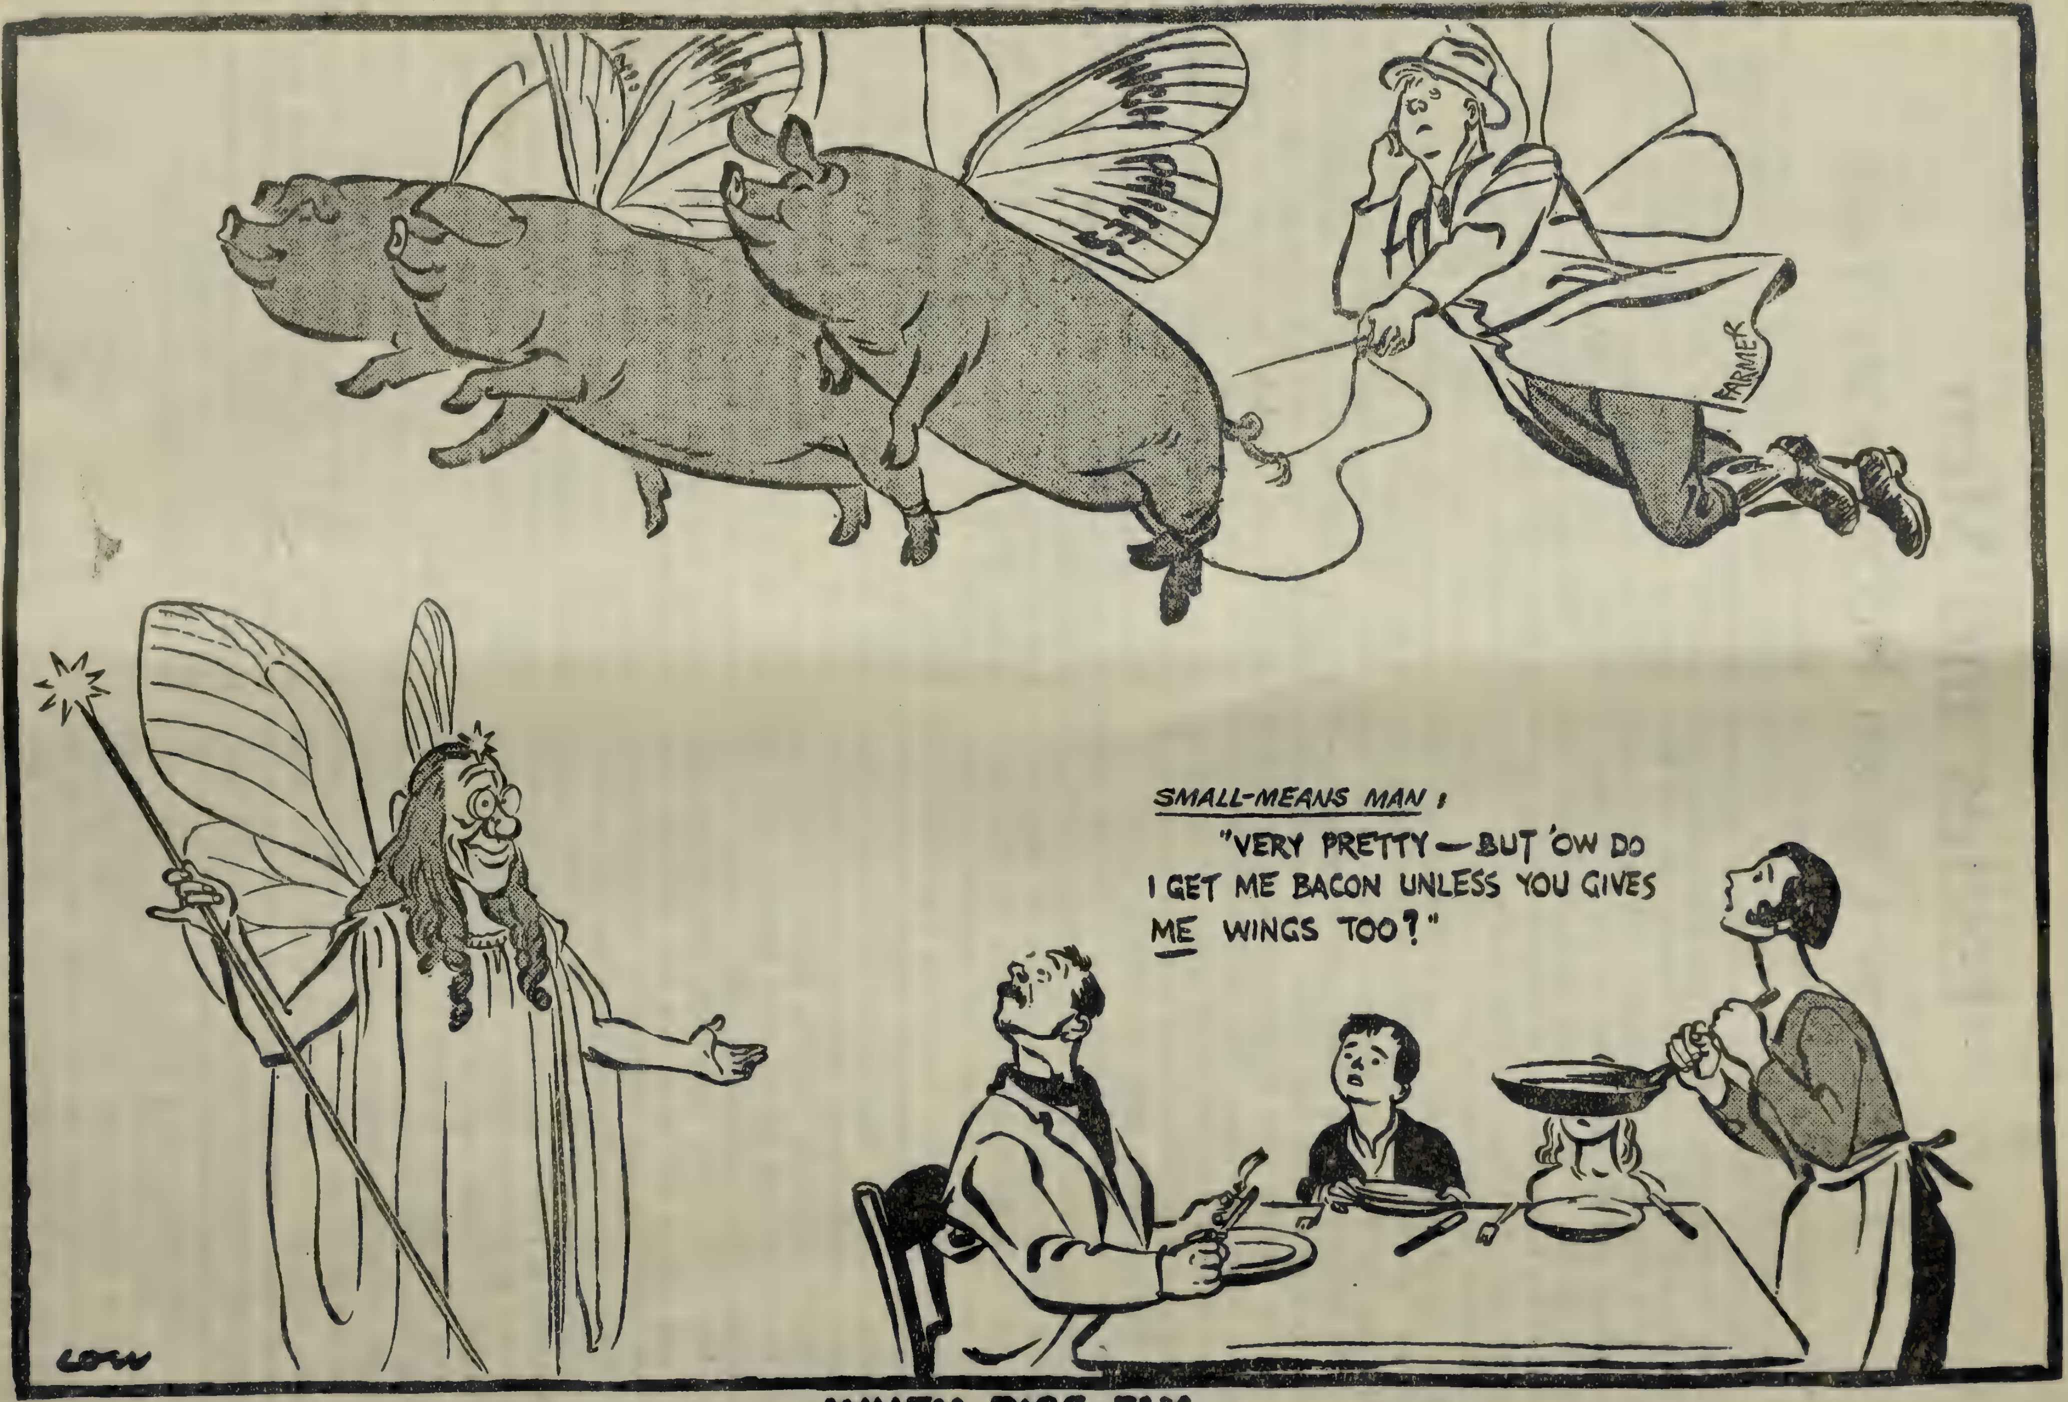
This move will also help our farmers tremendously, since there are to be substantial reductions in the Cuban tariffs on hog lard, corn, wheat, flour, pork products, potatoes, rice, fresh, dried, or evaporated fruit, animal foods, and canned meats. It is true that the head of one of the farm bureaus in Washington has hastened to warn our farmers that they must not expect too much from this, because Cuba has been growing more self-contained and has made some slight effort to diversify its crops. None the less, the opening up of this field is of profound significance because it is the right way and the only certain way to aid the American farmer—by getting back for him a foreign market. That beats all the horribly wasteful and really insane destruction of crops and limitation of output to which so good a man as Secretary Wallace has felt himself and the government driven by the dire necessity of the last year and a half—I still maintain that the Southern mules which refused to abandon their lifelong habits of walking between the cotton rows when called upon to plow the plants under had more sense than the AAA.

But this is not all the good news. It is announced that the next step is Haiti, which, having just said goodby to the departing American marines, is in the best possible frame of mind to sign a similar pact with us. Of course, Haiti is a one-crop country, dependent on coffee, and sorely in need of the development of the rest of its agriculture and its industry. Its total foreign trade in 1929 was only $33,962,000, of which we got less than one-third—in 1932 only $5,000,000—but if we could quadruple that $5,000,000 it would certainly be a help; we are not in a position to turn up our nose at anybody or any bit of foreign commerce. Already the State Department is working to begin similar negotiations with Brazil, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Ecuador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, El Salvador, Venezuela, and the Dominican Republic, which together supply 95 per cent of this country's coffee imports. This is of course in accord with the policy announced by Secretary Hull at the notable meeting of the Pan-American Congress in Montevideo last December. It is the best kind of business for the United States, for these are our natural markets. They can be expanded indefinitely as prosperity returns in Central and South America. What is more, the President has dropped all tariff barriers on cattle feed because of the drought. I suppose the average farmer will feel that this will not help him. But it will; at least it will help the country at large because of the simple fundamental fact that we cannot import any feeds, or any other goods, without paying for them with products of the United States. How strange it is that we can only unfetter our industry or farmers when they are in dire distress! Thus by various steps we are moving toward the acceptance of one of the grave alternatives placed before the country by Secretary Wallace, who, it will be recalled, stated that we must either take 50,000,000 acres of farming land out of cultivation or change our tariff policy.

As A. A. Berle, Jr., pointed out recently in the New York Times, our tariff war has reached an impossible situation. "In a gigantic chess game in which the trade routes of the world were being reapportioned, the United States was left out of it; and whatever foreign trade she had was hindered, disadvantaged, or completely blocked by an ever-tightening net of individual preferential arrangement." Mr. Berle is absolutely correct in saying also that our tariff policy has been "historic rather than reasonable."

Oswald Garrison Villard

A Cartoon by LOW



HIGH
HIGH PRICES
FARMER
SMALL-MEANS MAN:
"VERY PRETTY—BUT 'OW DO I GET ME BACON UNLESS YOU GIVES ME WINGS TOO?"
LOW

WHEN PIGS FLY.

Copyright by the Inter-Europa Press

PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Strike of Capital

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Washington, September 1

THE overshadowing problem in America today is the strike of capital. It is by all odds the most formidable strike America has known since the Civil War, and surpasses in gravity the aggregate of all strikes of labor of recent years. It is not a deliberate and organized strike. But even if unconscious, it is the most effective strike which confronts the community and one which must be broken if American institutions are to survive.

By the strike of capital I mean the refusal of the owners of bank deposits to lend their money to private enterprise. The deposits are there. They have risen nearly 6 per cent since last March, and more than 14 per cent since a year ago June. They are only 17 per cent below the figure for June in the halcyon year of 1929. They are staggeringly large for a land suffering a depression as severely as America. The figure on June 30 of this year was $26,762,000,000 for the member banks of the Federal Reserve system. Since March these deposits have increased a billion and a half; since June of last year nearly three billions and a half.

This enormous accumulation of available credit in itself does not prove that capital is striking. Deposits might be another label for loans by banks, which have to be deposited until they are spent. If, while deposits were rising 14 per cent this past year, loans had correspondingly risen, it would demonstrate that recovery had begun. But the contrary is true. Deposits rose but loans actually fell.

The decline in the volume of these loans is the yardstick of the strike of capital. Since June, 1929, loans have declined 51.2 per cent, while bank deposits have declined only 17 per cent. Allowing for the decline in deposits, capital to the extent of eleven billion dollars is being withheld from normal use.

The strike of capital, in so far as it consists simply of a refusal to make loans, is not of recent origin, since loans have been steadily declining in volume ever since the depression set in. Capital has been on strike in all countries in the same way. But there is a peculiarity about the strike of American capital since June a year ago. For in that month bank deposits began to increase. Prudence might well account for the refusal of banks and individuals to invest while deposits were declining. But when deposits began to rise, prudence was being given a margin to work with. And this margin it rejected. It may not be strictly accurate to speak of a strike of capital in this country before June, 1933. But since that month the strike is incontestable. Indeed, the strike has been progressive in its intensity. Fewer loans were outstanding in June than in March despite the rapid rise of deposits. The decline in these three months was $183,000,000. And in the past year, when deposits rose nearly three and a half billions, the volume of loans actually fell $383,000,000. These are the figures only for the member banks of the Federal Reserve system, and do not show the full extent of the strike. On the other hand some allowance has to be made for the fact that many old loans are being repaid to the banks, thanks to the rescue work of the Administration in reopening frozen institutions. Banks have not stopped making loans altogether, but they are not making them as fast as they are being repaid. But this allowance does not modify the statement that capital is on strike, or reduce the yardstick figure of at least eleven billion dollars as the extent of that strike.

It may be objected that the use of loans to measure this strike is not accurate, since banks can use their funds to buy the securities of private enterprises. The objection would be well taken if banks were doing so. An immediate use of growing deposits to finance commercial and industrial corporations would simply be another way of making loans. But the banks have not been doing this. They are doing the reverse. They were holding fewer private securities on March 5 than they did in June of last year. The decline is large, amounting to more than a billion and a half dollars. In the same period, on the other hand, they vastly increased their holding in government securities, the amount being over three and a quarter billion dollars.

Here we have the picture in its simple terms. Capital is on strike, and refuses to finance private enterprise to anything like a normal extent. The government is stepping in to perform some of the normal functions of capital.

One clear way to present this fact is to show the portion of the national income derived from government sources. In 1929 all government, federal, State, and local, produced 7.8 per cent of the national income; today it is producing about 20 per cent. The state as a financial enterprise is carrying one-fifth of the country's business, as against one-thirteenth in normal times. True, the national income has fallen by nearly half—from eighty-three billions to around forty-five billions—and the amount of income produced by the government has not more than doubled in actual amount. But it has increased from about six and a half billion dollars in 1929 to over nine billion dollars today. That is to say that the government is putting two and a half billions a year into the national income which capital itself might be putting in if it were not for its eleven-billion-dollar strike.

Now the striking capitalist does not admit that he is a striker. He blames the Administration. If his money is idle it is because the government is competing with private business, and making it unprofitable for him to invest. The Guaranty Trust Company in its last monthly bulletin complains of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the AAA, the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, the PWA, and other agencies as competing directly with private business. "There is a real danger," it warns, "that those powers will be perpetuated and extended until legitimate private business is buried under a mountain of bureaucracy. From the standpoint of business recovery, the conclusion is obvious. The revival for which the federal government is striving so arduously can come about only through individual initiative, and that initiative is being stifled, rather than being encouraged, by the restrictions and limitations that have been placed upon it, with the threat of further obstacles to come."

I have already shown a fall in loans during the past months and called this an intensification of the strike of capital. What faces America is a process of which it is hardly aware, an unformulated conflict between capital and the state. The longer the conflict lasts, the harder it is to resolve. The more the state interferes in business—even if it is to take the place of striking capital—the more capital will go on strike. And the more capital goes on strike, the more the government will have to interfere. Unless the strike is broken, there seems to be one of two possible endings. The state becomes the fountain-head of business, and controls it either for social purposes, which is socialism, or to guarantee the profit system, which is fascism. It may be doubted whether any unconscious process, such as this conflict, will lead to socialism—which is not to be attained before the country is ready for it. But that the country as a whole wants the profit system retained goes without saying. The end of this growing tendency is much more certain to be fascism, and a titanic effort to save the crumbling economic structure by a state guaranty of business returns. If the state becomes interested in profits, it will be logical to outlaw strikes and to suppress any criticism which jeopardizes the state's actions. American fascism might differ in outward form from other fascisms, but its spiritual content would be the same.

Can the strike of capital be broken? Before trying to answer this question it is well to exonerate capitalists from intending their strike to bring on government interference or to lead to a gradual revolution toward fascism. Indeed, the striking capitalist would be annoyed even to find himself called a striker. Who is he? Just one of the numberless individuals with money in the bank who knows no safe place to invest it; or one of numberless business men who might be branching out if they thought it was going to be profitable to do so; or the executive of the large company who usually invests its funds but now holds them in cash. It may prove to be the tragedy of the American form of capitalism that these individuals are unable to realize that their individual actions add up to a whole for which they share individual responsibility. Individually many capitalists bristle at much in the New Deal, but fail to see that unless they cooperate with the Administration, the American business system cannot possibly be restored, even in a modified way. They do not recognize that it is their inability to cooperate which is forcing the Administration still farther along the way which they cry out against.

The striking capitalist will tell you it is not his fault that cooperation is impossible. But in the spring of 1933 the same program was not impossible. The New Deal was not considered revolutionary, and un-American; it entailed both reform and rehabilitation of the American business system. It was understood that certain fundamental changes had to be made: wealth was to be more equitably distributed, individuals were to have greater economic security, and the control of money was to be ordained with a deeper sense of trusteeship. The United States Chamber of Commerce mentioned the need for social insurance before the President ever used the phrase in a message to Congress. The NRA was much more the creation of big business interests than of American radicals. Hardly a week passed in those days without the utterance of some business leader in favor of a broader social philosophy. Cooperation a year ago was promised and intended; this summer there is the intensification of the strike of capital. What has happened to change things?

One explanation is repeated over and over again. Business men have lost confidence. They complain that they cannot look into the future and plan their affairs. They made the same complaint long before Roosevelt took office, but now they say they fear new unheralded schemes by the Administration, still further interfering with business. They live in an anguish of uncertainty. At the same time they rationalize their fears by pretending a faith in the very system which collapsed in 1929, and will tell you that if the President had not interfered at all, we should now be in the noontide of automatic recovery.

The demands of business come down to this—insistence on certainty. Business men must know that they can make profits. The state must not interfere. They ignore the fact that the essence of the American system of capitalism was its uncertainty, its lack of any guaranty of profits whatever, and that the factor of loss helped it to function as long as it did. They also ignore the fact that it was the Hoover Administration which began interfering with the operation of loss in the system, and much of their trouble may be due not to what they have lost but to what the rescue of capital by the government has saved them from losing. American investors have never lent their money in the certainty of profit but in the hope of it. And their hopes have been blasted as often as they have been sustained, if not oftener.

So what really holds back investment today is not the want of certainty but the want of hope, which is a problem of quite another character. It is a psychological problem. If the strike of capital is to be broken, it will only be by changing the attitude of investors. This may, of course, be impossible. When faith is lost, as obviously some of the faith of business men in the Administration has been, there may be no way to restore it, and the strike of capital may have to continue until it brings results which few business men ever dreamed of, much less desired.

But one contribution might be made which would go some way toward conciliating the minds of striking capitalists. Eighteen months have passed since the President took office. The time surely is near when the maximum program which he intends to carry through might be stated. If business has a legitimate complaint against the Administration it is that the President has never told them the worst. They are going to have to pay, but they don't know how much. No word of his has ever given them any idea that he has a maximum in mind. They do not know that he has any intention of writing a final figure on his blank check and presenting it at the bank.

But assuming that the President looks forward to a second term, he is known to have in mind enough reforms to pack every minute of his time until he relinquishes office in 1941. Redistribution of wealth is to come, one must assume, by two of the most efficacious methods known to man—a heavy tax on incomes, private and corporate, and genuine social insurances. Individual security is to come by economic planning, supplemented by the insurance system. Does the President believe he can do more in the next six and a half years? It took England a generation to adopt a social-insurance system, and brought the country to the brink of grave troubles in 1911. America knows little of social insurances, and the business men who lightly advocated them a year ago will be aghast when they find out how heavy the bill will be, added to the burdens of the NRA. Six and a half years will be a short time in which to educate the country to support a genuine insurance policy and force it through Congress. The system of heavy income taxes will arouse still more bitter opposition. And these two together, in addition to the good features of the NRA and the Securities Act, are enough to signalize any two Presidential terms. They would be the greatest program of social reform ever achieved by an American President.

This much certainty the President might give American business, the certainty of what it is he proposes to do for the remainder of his time in office and the certainty of how much it is going to cost. And in giving this he might include certainty on monetary matters without weakening his reform program in the slightest. Last summer's escapade with the commodity dollar has not had fatal consequences, but it has not been worth the loss of confidence it cost the President. Whether the price level is to be controlled by varying the gold content of the dollar a fractional amount or by changing the discount rate a similar fractional amount may not matter much, but it matters a great deal to people who do not understand these things. And one of the easiest ways for the President to recapture faith is to admit he is through with such details. Recovery and reform alike lie in the increase of consuming power, which neither the variation of gold in the dollar nor inflation can help to create permanently.

Certainty over the extent of the New Deal, over its ultimate cost, and over the President's monetary reliability would give business a basis on which to plan and figure. Self-interest is the final denominator in business. The strike of capital will only be broken if the capitalist sees where his strike is taking him, and can estimate that the New Deal with all its cost is a better way for him to go.

How Stable Is Recovery?

By MAXWELL S. STEWART

AT first sight the statement issued by Donald R. Richberg listing the gains achieved by the national recovery program is impressive. The facts, so far as they go, are accurate and fairly representative. Approximately four million more persons were employed in June of this year than had jobs in March, 1933. Total pay rolls in the manufacturing industries were 37½ per cent higher than in June, 1933, as against an increase of 9.6 per cent in the cost of living. Business failures have registered a sharp decline, while the index of corporation profits has risen from a deficit of 6.9 in the first quarter of 1933 to a profit of 32.2 in the second quarter of the present year.

That the United States has enjoyed a substantial measure of recovery is indisputable. Mr. Richberg's statistics could be supplemented by others scarcely less encouraging. Industrial production in the first six months of 1934 averaged nearly 18 per cent higher than in the corresponding period of 1933. Farm income has risen by one-fifth, despite reduced production. Our export trade jumped no less than 47 per cent—in terms of dollars—during the first seven months of 1934. Taken in the aggregate, these statistics would seem to indicate not only a return of better times, but that the improvement was fairly well distributed throughout the national economy.

But instinctively most of us recognize that there is something drastically wrong with these figures. While we realize that there has been a certain degree of improvement, we know from personal experience and that of acquaintances that the recovery is by no means as great or as general as is claimed. What, then, is the catch? Is the Roosevelt Administration, like its predecessor, guilty of juggling figures for political purposes?

It is interesting that Mr. Richberg should have chosen June as a basis for comparison instead of July, in view of the fact that the figures for the latter month were released on the same day as his statistics. Yet in some respects July would seem to be more suitable, since it represents a more advanced stage in the recovery program, and—taking business as a whole—was really the last of the pre-NRA months in 1933. It so happens, however, that the July comparison is considerably less favorable than that of June. The Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial activity, for example, was 23 per cent lower than that of a year ago. Weekly car loadings were from 5 to 10 per cent below those of last year; residential building was more than 30 per cent under that of July, 1933. The first fifty-eight railroads to report showed a 5 per cent decline in gross operating revenue and a 44 per cent drop in net income. Owing to shorter hours under the NRA codes, employment has held up much better than production, though it showed a decrease of approximately 5 per cent since May, and was below the level of last September. Even farm income, despite high food prices, was 6 per cent lower than in July, 1933.

Judging by such indices as are available, the recession which started in May continued through August. At the close of the latter month the steel industry was operating at 19 per cent of capacity, the lowest mark for well over a year, while car loadings were likewise at their lowest ebb. It is safe to hazard a guess, therefore, that Labor Day found business conditions as a whole at a point as low as, or somewhat lower than, last year at the same period, which is small comfort for the National Recovery Administration.

It is significant to note in passing, moreover, that even at the peak of production last spring American recovery was less than that of a number of foreign countries whose domestic policies differ widely from those of the United States. Three of these—Great Britain, Sweden, and Japan—have surpassed the 1928 level of production, while Germany, France, and Canada are all well in advance of this country.

This fact alone, apart from the recent setback in business activity, is sufficient to raise substantial doubts regarding the stability of the entire recovery movement. The theory underlying the Administration's program was that once the upward swing of the business cycle had been started by "priming the pump," the process would become virtually automatic. Devaluation of the dollar, the restriction of crops, and the increase of wages under the codes were all justified on this assumption. Having rather thoroughly exhausted the resources for "pump priming," however, during the past eighteen months, it is perhaps fair to ask whether, after all, this is the technique by which business revival can be achieved, or whether by tinkering with the mechanism we have delayed the natural flow of recovery.

The question is a delicate one. In many respects the national economic structure presents a more balanced picture today than was the case a year and a half ago. Although farm prices are still far short of the hypothetical 1909-14 purchasing-power parity, there has been a certain amount of progress in this direction. Wholesale prices have increased more rapidly than retail prices, while the depreciation of the dollar has lessened, to a certain extent, the real burden of indebtedness. Wage-earners of the lowest category have probably enjoyed a more substantial rise in income than those in the higher brackets, and the prevailing income has been somewhat more widely distributed.

On the other hand, there are many features of the recovery process which appear to be basically unsound. The first of these—excessive governmental expenditures—need scarcely be elaborated. The majority of economists are agreed that a large outlay for public works as an emergency measure is both defensible and necessary. But if the expenditures are too small to stimulate recovery, and yet large enough to obstruct the normal channels of finance, they might conceivably lead to a collapse of government credit. A day of reckoning is inevitable, and unless the money expended brings improved conditions, and thereby increased revenues, serious difficulties are bound to occur.

Much more disturbing, however, is the evidence that great numbers of the population have not only failed to profit by the economic upturn but have actually lost ground during the past year. The chief beneficiaries of the NRA, oddly enough, appear to have been the business men. As evidence of this Mr. Richberg pointed out that business failures from February to May of this year were actually 40 per cent fewer than in the corresponding period of 1929! Big business especially seems to have reaped a harvest under the New Deal. Net profits of 506 corporations rose from $157,579,000 in the first half of 1933 to $408,572,000 in the first six months of 1934, an increase of 260 per cent! The National City Bank estimates the average annual rate of return of 250 companies having a net worth of $9,724,000,000 to have been 5.7 per cent in the first half of 1934 as against 1.7 per cent in 1933.

Other sections of the population have also enjoyed a rise in money income, though on a much more moderate scale. An increase in dollar income does not, however, necessarily indicate improved economic conditions. The true position of any group can only be measured by real wages and comparative living standards, taking into consideration cultural and recreational opportunities as well as the essentials of livelihood. Here, unfortunately, data are extremely meager and frequently conflicting. Mr. Richberg claimed, on the basis of increased weekly pay rolls, that despite increased living costs "there remained a net increase of 25 per cent in the total purchasing power of manufacturing wage-earners." Adjusting this figure for the rise in employment, he admitted that per capita income had failed to keep pace with the advance in living costs. Taking into consideration the 6 per cent fall in factory pay rolls in July and the additional rise in food prices, it appears that the real income of industrial workers for July was at least 8 per cent lower than a year ago—truly an appalling state of affairs. Yet industrial wage-earners have been in a favored position under the NRA as compared with office workers and white-collar employees. Unemployment among the latter groups has undergone a much smaller decline than among factory workers, and wage increases have been fewer in number. We know definitely from Mr. Richberg's statistics that the total labor income in June was 62.5 per cent of the entire national income, which is a 3 per cent smaller share than labor obtained in any year of the Hoover Administration. The growth in the number of families on relief indicates, moreover, a continued deterioration of conditions in the lowest stratum of society—now numbering one-sixth of the entire population. Taking these various factors into consideration, one is forced to conclude that the purchasing power of the urban population has failed to keep step with rising prices.

This hypothesis is confirmed by the evidence of lower consumption throughout the country, particularly in the large cities. Over the nation as a whole department-store sales in July were only 72 per cent of the 1923-25 average in dollar volume, 3 per cent above July, 1933. Since retail prices, as measured by the Fairchild index, rose approximately 22 per cent in the past year, it is evident that the volume of purchases was actually only about 84 per cent as great as in 1933. Nor is this merely a symptom of the present recession in business. The physical volume of department-store sales for the seventeen months ending in July was below that of the corresponding months of 1932-33. For foodstuffs the picture is much the same. The turnover of groceries was less in June of this year than in the corresponding month of 1933, while chain-store sales for July were unchanged in dollar volume from a year ago in spite of increased prices.

Additional evidence of the reduction in living standards is to be found in the cultural field. Although shorter working hours and the elimination of child labor have brought an increased demand for cultural opportunities, public expenditures for education and recreation have continued to decline. In rural districts some 2,000 schools have closed their doors, while in 18,000 other schools a total of 900,000 children received less than six months' schooling during the year just past. Despite an increase in school enrolment, 40,000 fewer teachers were employed in 1933-34 than in the previous year. Libraries have frequently suffered even more severely. Although attendance has shown a marked rise in recent years, the appropriation for books in eighty-two of the largest cities in the country has been cut by over a third.

Thus, added to the paradox of want in the midst of plenty, we have that of declining living standards in a period of economic upturn. The latter becomes somewhat less paradoxical, however, when we realize that real wealth must be measured in terms of physical production rather than dollars. Viewed from this angle it was practically inevitable that the Administration's agricultural program, together with the effects of the drought, should lead to a decline in food consumption. This is, of course, particularly true of a perishable commodity such as milk, the production of which, according to the Department of Agriculture, has been reduced between 5 and 6 per cent during the past year. Similarly, the losses in the drought region of the Middle West are irreparable. By taking care of the stricken farmers we can shift the burden of the loss to society as a whole, but we cannot restore the lost grain or vanished buying power. As a matter of fact the shrinkage of production is greater than is usually realized. The wheat crop of 484,000,000 bushels is the lowest since 1893, while unusually small crops of corn, rye, and cotton are also expected. Owing to the shortage of feed the number of hogs raised this year will be 30 per cent smaller than last year, and there will be a serious shortage of meat, eggs, and poultry.

Perhaps the most substantial ground for questioning the stability of American recovery, however, is the fact that it has not been accompanied by a corresponding improvement in international trade. True, there has been a considerable rise in the dollar value of American foreign commerce, but this has largely been a reflection of higher dollar prices. Measured in terms of gold—which still remains the international unit of value—the decline has continued unchecked since 1929. Tonnage or quantum figures show a slight increase, but much of this was due to speculative purchases of raw materials during periods of uncertainty regarding the fate of the dollar. And while there has been some rise in exports as a result of a cheaper dollar, the improvement has been much less than was expected.

Recovery in the United States, therefore, as in most other countries, has been almost entirely dependent on domestic forces. Primary among these has been the need for replenishment of stocks and the replacement of capital goods which had been neglected during the early years of the depression. Fear of inflation has probably stimulated this process to a considerable degree, but it is doubtful whether this bogy could be used again with the same effectiveness. Increased federal expenditures have also contributed to the upturn, although these have been partially offset by the various economy moves of local and national governments.

According to Hobson and certain others of the more radical economists, the root of instability in the present economic system lies in the tendency for capital accumulation to outrun investment. This surplus was disposed of in the years prior to the depression by large-scale foreign investments. But with the breakdown of the international financial structure—due largely to the anachronistic commercial policy of the United States—foreign investments have practically ceased. As a result there has been not only a catastrophic decline in our export trade, which in itself has serious deflationary effects, but an addition to the accumulation of idle capital which represents "frozen" purchasing power. Depreciation of the dollar tended to alleviate this situation temporarily by throwing our export products on the world market at bargain prices; as well as by protecting the domestic market, also temporarily, against the deflationary influences still operative throughout the world. But it did so at the expense of international recovery, and through the reduction of living standards in the United States. Meanwhile, by stimulating business profits the New Deal appears to have intensified the maldistribution of wealth as between profits and wages, and thereby aggravated the fundamental cause of instability.

The truth is that under the profit system only one road to recovery has been charted. That is through the reestablishment of a functioning international economic system, which implies a reduction of trade barriers, the stabilization of currencies, and the resumption of foreign lending—the program laid down in the agenda for the World Economic Conference. Whether this type of program can be reconciled with the present apparently irresistible trend toward planning and control is as yet an open question. It does, however, appear to conflict at several points with the postulates of the national recovery program.

[In next week's issue Mr. Stewart will compare the economic upturn in the United States with that in various foreign countries and discuss the relationship between the Administration's domestic policy and the problem of world recovery.]

Labor Militancy Spreads in India

By V. K. KRISHNA MENON

ON May Day in Delhi 150 persons were injured in riots. This incident is typical of a growing restiveness on the part of Indian labor against the organized might of the British Raj. In India, when the police have beaten up an unarmed and unresisting crowd with five-foot lathis, the incident is officially described as a "clash" between "rioters" and the forces of law and order. In all the principal industrial centers of India labor gatherings are prohibited by the authorities, especially before and during a dispute. The police disperse processions and demonstrations by force, and the leaders of the working people are either threatened with imprisonment or actually arrested. Armed forces are brought in from outside to quell the "riots."

Bombay was the principal center of the recent conflict. The cotton-mill owners cut wages by about 12½ per cent. The operatives refused to acquiesce in this, and in less than a week 70,000 of them were out on strike. Almost all the mills closed; a few continued to run with blackleg labor, recruited and worked under armed police escort and protection. In Delhi 7,000 textile operatives went out on strike in sympathy with their fellow-workers in Bombay. The mills in Delhi closed voluntarily. The "riots" and the injuries to the 150 workingmen were the result of police interference with the strikers and attempts to disperse them by force.

Strikers' demonstrations in Bombay were dispersed by repeated lathi charges. Those who offered passive resistance were beaten until they moved on or were dragged out by the police. Armed police reinforcements were drafted into the city from the suburbs. Labor leaders were arrested. Miss Mani Ben Kara, the first to be taken away, is one of the ablest of Bombay's labor organizers. Her influence on the textile workers in that city has been one of the healthiest factors in the development of the labor movement there in recent times. In 1932 the government prosecuted her for a May Day speech on the ground that it "created disaffection between different classes of His Majesty's subjects." She was acquitted by an Indian High Court judge.

The Governor of Bombay issued a statement in which he referred to "grave dangers of disorder" as a result of the speeches and activities of the strikers and their leaders. The government, the statement added, has therefore resorted to emergency powers, but "desires to make it clear that no restriction has been placed on the functioning of trade unions." Apparently the official mind does not regard the arrest of leaders, the dispersal and prohibition of labor gatherings and demonstrations, as interference with the "functioning" of trade unions. Nor does it consider the government's use of its forces to protect blackleg labor for the employers anything more than a legitimate function of government.

